

A decorative border with intricate floral and scrollwork patterns, rendered in a dark gray color, framing the entire page.

The Zombie Knight

George M. Frost

"1 -- I.

((Note to new readers: If you are reading on a phone, then I recommend switching to the desktop theme and holding your device horizontally. Some people do prefer the mobile theme, though, so take your pick. If you find the white-text-on-black-background hard on your eyes or just dislike the Courier New font, you can also read this story over on RoyalRoad, where those things are adjustable. Or, if you prefer the e-book format, you can find those on Smashwords and Amazon.))

Chapter One: 'O, benevolent darkness...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"Hello there, friend."

"...Where am I? What's happening?"

"Easy now. Don't panic. Everything's alright."

"...What's going on? Why can't I see anything?"

"I'm going to tell you, but I need you to listen. I promise to answer all of your questions, so just try to stay calm, okay?"

"...O-okay."

"Listen. You're dead."

"...What?"

"You're dead. You don't have a physical body, anymore. That's why you can't see or move."

"...What kind of crazy joke is this?"

"I'm sorry, friend, but I'm not joking. If I were joking, you'd be laughing. I'm hilarious."

"What the...?"

"Just relax a moment and think about it. You should remember your death.”

“But... I...”

“Do you remember?”

“I... yes... I remember... I...”

“Don’t worry. It’s alright. I was there when you died. I know what happened.”

“I’m... really dead?”

“Yes.”

“...Does that mean... this is... some kind of afterlife?”

“Not quite. You haven’t reached that point, yet.”

“...What do you mean? Why not? Is it... because I...”

“No, it’s nothing like that. Everything is perfectly normal. I just woke you up a little early, is all. Because before you move on, I have a proposition for you.”

“Proposition...? Who are you?”

“I’m called a few different things, but you’d probably know me best as a reaper. You know. The grim kind.”

“The hell...?”

“I guide and protect souls as they make the journey into the afterlife. Or oblivion. Whichever.”

“You... don’t know?”

“Sure don’t. I’m just a ferryman.”

“Oh... that’s... disappointing...”

“Hey. It bothers me, too. In fact, shut up about it. I don’t need you reminding me of my shortcomings.”

“Uh, sorry...”

“Normally, you’d never know I was here, but I had to disturb you to ask a question.”

“...A proposition.”

“Right. See, as a reaper, I have the power to keep one servant, someone who will help me with various things.”

“Servant...? You want me to be your servant?”

“Servant, partner, friend, ally, whatever you wanna call it, but yes, that’s basically the idea. I’d revive your body, and you’d be able to live again, as long as you help me out. You died very young. I thought you might want a second chance, a chance to, perhaps, live a more fulfilling life.”

“More fulfilling...?”

“Was I wrong?”

“Well... no... but... you could really do that?”

“Yes. No one’s discovered your body, yet, so there’s no problem.”

“So... you could, like, make me into some kind of billionaire or something in my new life?”

“What? No, of course not. That’s not how it works.”

“Then what the hell were you talking about just now?”

“It’s like this: your body is dead, now, but I can revive it and reattach your soul. I can’t give you a brand new body and tons of money. That’d be crazy. I’m a reaper, not a friggin’ genie.”

“Oh... so I’d be living the same life as before...”

“Almost. Well. Kind of. I mean. Things could get a bit complicated.”

“...What the hell does that mean?”

“I wouldn’t revive you for no reason, of course. I’d want you to help me out, like I said.”

“...Help you with what?”

“Saving lives.”

“...Huh?”

"3

“I’ve been around for thousands of years, ferrying souls across this rift between realms. And I’m able to observe the living, but I can’t interact with you until you die. So, as you might imagine, I see a lot of terrible things happen in your world, things that I’d like to be able to do something about. But obviously, I can’t. Not by myself. That’s where you’d come in. I’d find people who are about to die, and then you’d go save them.”

“Uh... wow...”

“Wow?”

“It’s just... I mean... are you serious?”

“Yes.”

“But... uh... That sounds great and all, but... I don’t think I’d be able to save anyone...”

“Sure you would. With my help, you’ll be unkillable.”

“Un...killable...? You mean, like, immortal?”

“Yes. You’d be my undead servant, so naturally, if you die, I’d just revive you again.”

“Whoa... undead...”

“Are you interested in giving it a try?”

“Uh... I dunno. Sounds kind of... insane...”

“Eh. That’s a little rude.”

“You said... I’d be your servant?”

“Yes.”

“...What happens if I disobey you?”

“If you decide you don’t want to help me, anymore, then I’d just release your soul and let you die.”

“You’d kill me...”

“Hey, you’re already dead. What’ve you got to lose?”

“...In that case, it sounds a little too good to be true.”

“It wouldn’t be permanent. If you decide later that you don’t like the arrangement, I’ll find someone else and let you go back to dying.”

“How do I know you’re not lying?”

“Uh. I suppose you don’t. You’ll have to take a bit of a risk. Same as how I’m taking a risk on you.””

"4

“I don’t know...”

“Well, I hate to rush you, but you might want to decide before someone discovers your dead body. It could cause you problems if people find it before you come back to life.”

“I haven’t said yes, yet...”

“I’m aware. Please decide. I’m impatient.”

“A-alright... I’ll give it a shot. It can’t be much worse...”

“Excellent. I’ll get right to it, then.”

“...What’re you gonna do?”

“Just hold on. This might be a little jarring.”

“Hold on? To what? There’s nothing here... What the...? Whoa!”

-+-+--+--

Hector awoke with a cringe. A bolt of pain ran through him, but it vanished after a moment. He blinked away the haze in his vision and sat up.

It was the bathroom, he saw, remembering. This was where he had died, in this little, not-so-white-tiled bathroom. At least, that's what he thought. Obviously, he wasn't dead.

The fan in the ceiling buzzed, still, just as before. He remembered that sound, remembered thinking about how it would be the last thing he ever heard, remembered how it had made him feel all the more pitiful in his final moments.

But now, hearing the sound again, the droning hum, he wasn't sure what to think. It seemed almost like a different noise even though he knew it hadn't changed.

His shirt was wet, Hector realized, and he looked down at the crimson stains in its thin white cloth. He stood and saw the floor, a pool of his own blood.

He scratched his head. "Huh..."

A mirror greeted him next, his face reflected through a slight cloud of soapy fog. Everything looked the same. The black skin, the shaved head, the somber brown gaze--all his. Somehow, part of him expected to see someone else. Part of him wanted to."

"5

His eyes fell to the sink, to the razor blade in it. It seemed a strange way to die, suddenly, by way of such a small thing, a tiny strip of sharpened metal. But then, he supposed it hadn't really been the razor so much as the long, vertical gashes along his arms, which were still there, though they didn't seem to hurt at all. In fact, he couldn't even feel them. He seemed capable of moving them just fine, but they were completely numb.

'Hello, again,' came a voice, and he turned to see a figure appear next to him, sitting there... floating there. A skeleton, it seemed to be, its bones emanating white from behind a shroud of the pitchest black he had ever seen. A scythe sat in its grip, the blade hanging low beneath its body.

Hector just kind of stared, wide-eyed.

‘No return greeting, huh? Well, fine.’ The skeleton’s jaw moved with its words, though Hector couldn’t understand how.

After a moment, he managed to conjure up a word of his own.
“You’re...”

‘The reaper you were just talking to, yes. Nice to meet you. Officially, that is.’

“You look... you look just like I imagined you would.” He blinked a few times. “Is this really happening...?”

‘Ah, right. My appearance.’ It gave a skeletal shrug. ‘Whatever you’re seeing, right now, it’s not really what I look like. In truth, I don’t actually look like anything.’

“...What?”

‘Your brain forms an image of what I should look like and projects it onto my presence. Appearance is something for your physical reality, where I do not exist.’

“I... don’t understand...”
"6

‘Ah, well, it’s no big deal. Oh, and before I forget...’ The reaper hovered closer and reached a gangly hand toward him.

Hector recoiled a little, but the hand still found his shoulder. And suddenly, he felt his arms begin to burn. He looked down to see the bloody gashes bulge and tighten. A groan escaped his lips as he watched the wounds close themselves, leaving only streaks of blood behind, both still wet and already dried. The pain subsided after a few moments.

“What the hell...?” He traced over his arm where one of the slits had been, brushing away the blood. Not even a scar remained. What’s more, his arms were no longer numb.

‘Might want to clean up all this blood,’ said the reaper, motioning to the floor. 'I can restore your body, but once the blood leaves, I can't put it back. Same goes for your limbs, if they get chopped off or something. I don't reattach things. I just regrow them.'

He squinted a little. "Regrow...?"

'I can revive you, no matter how bad your injuries are,' it said. 'Even if your whole body is destroyed, I can recreate it again. That's how my power works. As long as I maintain a link to your soul, I can resurrect the physical body that accompanies it. Without the soul, though, I can't do anything.'

He wasn't sure what to say.

'It's too bad, really. If I could create a body from scratch, then I wouldn't need anyone's help. I could just make a body for myself and go be a superhero or something.'

"Uh... I-I see... I think."

"7

'But there's a lot more I should explain before we start trying to save the world and whatnot, and you should probably clean up this mess before someone sees. Unless you plan on starting things off by revealing your secret to someone.'

"Er, right..." He moved toward the door and then paused awkwardly. "Uh..."

'Maybe a mop would be useful?'

"R-right..." He opened the door and left. A narrow hallway awaited, and he couldn't help staring at it for a moment. Such a simple place. Creamy white walls and plain brown carpeting. He must have seen it thousands of times, but it seemed somehow different. Everything did, in fact. His scuffed sneakers, his baggy black trousers, even the hallway light over his head and the moth fluttering around it; everything was a reminder of himself, of who he was, of his sudden uncertainty as to whether or not he was still that same person.

He made sure to close the bathroom door behind him and went downstairs. His parents sat together in the den, watching television in the dim light of a tall lamp. They didn't bother to look at him as he crossed into the kitchen, though he was sure they must have heard his footsteps. But then, he supposed it was better that they didn't see him. Explaining all the blood on his shirt would have been difficult. Quickly, he grabbed the mop by the refrigerator.

'Don't forget a bucket,' came the reaper's soundless voice, and Hector nearly dropped his mop, juggling it between hands for a few moments. 'Some towels would probably be good, too.'

"8

He looked around, blinking. The kitchen was empty, still. He chanced a whisper. "Where are you...?"

'Still in the bathroom,' came the reply. 'I can talk to you, no matter how far apart we are. Has to do with the fact that I'm tapped directly into your brain, rather than talking with a physical voice.'

There was a pause, and Hector just kind of squinted as he waited.

'It works both ways, you know. Say something in your head, and I'll hear you.' Another pause. 'You have to actually think something explicitly, though. Concentration is what solidifies the thoughts in our minds and makes them understandable.'

"Uh... Oh." '...Like this?' he thought, letting his gaze wander toward the ceiling.

'Yeah. Easy, right?'

'Er... sure...' He grabbed the other accouterments that the reaper had mentioned, made his way back upstairs without drawing the attention of his parents, and began mopping up the bathroom floor. With each stroke, the crimson ebbed away, leaving behind a pinkish residue as the pool of blood crowded back in on itself.

He wasn't sure how long the blood had been there, but it had begun staining the tile, so he guessed a few hours must have passed, at least.

'You've gotten quiet,' said the reaper, making Hector look up from his work. 'I thought you'd have more questions for me.'

He stared at the blood for a bit. "...They didn't notice."

‘What?’

“My parents,” he said, wringing the mop out over the bucket. “They didn’t notice I was dead.”

There was a noticeable pause. ‘You were locked in a bathroom, you know. It probably would have been a while before they discovered your body.’”

”9

“I wonder how long it would’ve taken...”

The reaper fell quiet after that. It wasn’t until after Hector had nearly finished cleaning that the conversation resumed.

‘I’m Garovel, by the way. Garovel is my name, that is.’

Hector took a seat on the edge of the bathtub and looked at the floating skeleton again. “Okay,” was all he said.

Garovel tilted his head. ‘Not much for conversation, eh? You talked more when you were dead.’

“...Sorry. I don’t... I mean... yeah.”

‘Well, don’t worry about it. There’s no need to rush things.’ Garovel drifted nearer the mirror, and Hector realized suddenly that the reaper had no reflection. ‘You don’t seem to be the very curious type, so I guess I’ll just explain. Stop me if you have a question.’

Hector waited.

‘You and I are now connected,’ Garovel said. ‘I am what sustains your life, now. Biologically, your body is alive again, but I am the only thing that keeps you attached to your body. Your soul, your consciousness, your sense of self, whatever you want to call the thing, I’m the one who maintains its connection with this world, now.’ The reaper paused a moment, considerate perhaps. ‘I suppose that might sound like a bad thing. Having your soul controlled by someone else, that is, but there are actually some pretty fantastic advantages to this whole scenario. The first is, of course, the ability to restore your body, but I already talked about that. And I believe you’ve already glimpsed the second major advantage. That is, the ability to continue moving, even after your body is technically dead.'

He blinked."

"10

'It has to do with your brain.' Garovel tapped a long phalanx bone against his bare skull. 'Rather than having to rely on blood and flesh for all of its energy, your brain now relies entirely upon me, largely because I now inhabit your brain, so to speak. But, in terms of this physical world, your brain is now self-sustaining. Even if, say, you bleed to death or your heart stops beating or you even stop breathing, your brain will continue to work just fine.' The reaper paused again. 'Of course, it's not quite as simplistic as it sounds, since the brain is a pretty complicated piece of equipment. I did have to numb all sorts of signals that might otherwise fool your brain into thinking it needs to shut down due to a lack of blood or glucose or what have you, but you don't really need to worry about all that. I've got everything covered.'

Hector tried to say something but found he didn't have the words, so he just kind of stared with a raised brow.

The reaper tilted its head at him. 'Did that make sense?'

He merely nodded.

'Alright, then. The third advantage is, obviously, having my shining personality around whenever you need me.'

He couldn't help smirking just a little.

'Though, it's more than just my personality,' Garovel went on. 'As a reaper of death, I have the ability to sense whenever someone is on the verge of it. The verge of death, that is. Simply put, I perceive an aura of impending doom about a person's soul. It's very dramatic. Especially because I can't do anything to help them. You, on the other hand, can. So whenever I sense that aura around someone, I want you to try and save them. Understood?'"

"11

“Er, yeah...” He nodded again.

‘You should know, however, that I will always require this of you. My entire purpose in reviving you is so that you can help me save lives. So no matter how your life may change--be it a new job, getting married, having children, or anything else--if you ever become unable to help me, then I will have to release your soul and find someone else.’

“O-okay...” He squinted. “But... how could I ever become ‘unable’ to help you? I mean... I doubt I’ll ever be too busy to go save a person’s life...”

‘That’s good of you to say, but it may not always be your decision. For instance, if your brain ended up in a jar, you wouldn’t be able to save anyone. And I wouldn’t be able to get you out. Well. Maybe if it was a weak jar. I mean, a REALLY weak jar. I’m not too sure.’

He blinked a couple times. “Uh... what? Why would my brain end up in a jar?”

‘I dunno. I was just giving an example.’

That example was far too specific, Hector felt. “Are... are you gonna ask me to fight a mad scientist or something?”

‘Oh, um. I wasn’t planning on it, but I can’t say its an impossibility, either. Who knows what the future will bring, right?’

“Er... right...” Hector’s gaze drifted toward the ground for a moment, then to the unbroken skin on his arms again. “I do have a question, though...”

‘What is it?’

“If... if you can... resurrect people like this... then... why don’t you... you know... do it... for everyone?”

Garovel hesitated. ‘Uh. What? I can’t understand you. Stop pausing so much when you talk.’

“Agh...” He tried again. “If you can resurrect people, then... why don’t you just... resurrect everyone?”

‘You’re still pausing. I told you to stop that.’”

“Dammit, I’m... trying...”

‘Ah well. I understood you the second time, anyway.’

“Then answer my question, already!”

‘Hey, you didn’t pause that time. Good job.’

“I wish you had a body so I could strangle you...”

‘That’s an important question, though. Obviously, if I could keep more people alive, I would. I don’t know about everyone, but yes. The problem is, I can only maintain a stable connection with one soul at a time. If I tried to maintain it with a second person, then my energy would begin to dissipate, which would end up exhausting or destroying me. And if either of those two things happen to me, then the people I’m connected to would have their souls ripped from their still-living bodies, which would result in either brain death or a psychotic break. And a body with a broken consciousness can become rather monstrous, to say the least.’

He cocked his head back. “You mean, they’d... like... start killing random people?”

‘Among other gruesome things, yeah.’

“Wow... okay.” He folded his slender arms, and his face distorted a little. “But if that’s the case, then... why’d you pick me for this job?”

‘Well, I had to pick someone. I needed a servant, and there you were.’

“That’s it...? It was just coincidence that you picked me...?”

‘Mostly.’

Hector eyed the reaper. “And what does that mean? ‘Mostly’?”

‘I try not to petition murderers and the like for this job, so yes, there is some judgment involved, on my part. What’s more, I didn’t pick you. I asked you. You’re the one who agreed.’

“But... a second chance like this... who the hell would turn down your offer?”

‘Someone who just wants to die.’”

"13

At that, Hector hesitated. For a time, he merely sat there, letting his gaze fall from Garovel to the floor. “But,” he finally said, “I killed myself...”

‘I know. I watched you do it.’

“Then... then why didn’t you ask someone else? Someone who died by accident or something?” He breathed a curt breath. “Someone who actually deserves a chance like this...”

‘If you’d really wanted to die like that, then you wouldn’t have agreed to help me when I asked you.’

As he sat there, his head eased down between his hands. “But...” He sighed.

‘Before you died, I had been watching you for quite a while.’

He looked up. “What...?”

‘From the moment you decided to commit suicide, I could sense the aura of death around you.’ The shadows of Garovel’s missing eyes seemed abruptly more intent upon him. ‘That’s how it works. I sense death when the soul becomes directly imperiled. If you were about to get hit by a bus, I wouldn’t sense your death until you walked in front of the thing. Situations like that really suck. But for people like you, people who intend to commit suicide, I sense death when the decision is finalized in your mind.’

He blinked. “Then... you must’ve been...”

‘Yes. I was waiting for nearly seven months. That’s how long it took you to do it.’ Garovel gave a small shrug. ‘Not the longest I’ve ever seen, but definitely up there. I’d check on you from time to time, maybe two or three times a week. Eventually, I started to wonder why you were letting things drag out so much, why you didn’t just get it over with. And then I figured it out.’

His gaze returned to the floor, and his eyes eased shut as he listened.”

'The last couple weeks, I watched you quite a lot. That's when I noticed. You were always alone.' Garovel paused. 'At school, you almost never speak to any of your classmates. Maybe it's because you have such trouble communicating. Even here, in your own house, you're very distant from your parents. I don't think I ever saw you say more than a few words to them at a time.'

He squinted hard, feeling the sudden tension behind his eyes, trying to keep it away.

'The reason you waited so long to kill yourself, it was because you were waiting for someone to stop you, wasn't it?'

He covered his eyes with his hand, as if to make some vain attempt at hiding himself. "But... no one did..."

'No. No one did.'

The tears were there in full now, streaming down his face, and he couldn't make them go away, much as he wanted to.

'And then, after you died, when I asked you if you would help me, you agreed. That was all the confirmation I needed. Because like I said, if you had really wanted to die, then you wouldn't have said yes to me.'

He tried to say something else, uncertain what, but found his breath too choked to form words.

'So now you've got another chance. And this time, you'll try to help me, just like I'll try to help you.'

Chapter Two: 'Hark! Ye quiet horrors...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had snuck out of the house, which he had never done before and was not sure he ever wanted to do again. His room was on the second floor, so he jumped out the window and broke both of his legs, which hurt like hell, he discovered."

‘The last couple weeks, I watched you quite a lot. That’s when I noticed. You were always alone.’ Garovel paused. ‘At school, you almost never speak to any of your classmates. Maybe it’s because you have such trouble communicating. Even here, in your own house, you’re very distant from your parents. I don’t think I ever saw you say more than a few words to them at a time.’

He squinted hard, feeling the sudden tension behind his eyes, trying to keep it away.

‘The reason you waited so long to kill yourself, it was because you were waiting for someone to stop you, wasn’t it?’

He covered his eyes with his hand, as if to make some vain attempt at hiding himself. “But... no one did...”

‘No. No one did.’

The tears were there in full now, streaming down his face, and he couldn’t make them go away, much as he wanted to.

‘And then, after you died, when I asked you if you would help me, you agreed. That was all the confirmation I needed. Because like I said, if you had really wanted to die, then you wouldn’t have said yes to me.’

He tried to say something else, uncertain what, but found his breath too choked to form words.

‘So now you’ve got another chance. And this time, you’ll try to help me, just like I’ll try to help you.’

Chapter Two: ‘Hark! Ye quiet horrors...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had snuck out of the house, which he had never done before and was not sure he ever wanted to do again. His room was on the second floor, so he jumped out the window and broke both of his legs, which hurt like hell, he discovered."

Garovel laughed, promptly apologized for laughing, and then fixed him. He asked Garovel why he could still feel pain, and the reaper explained that pain was still useful in letting him know which parts worked and which didn't.

"Are you really sure about this?" he mumbled into the cool night air.

'What do you mean? Of course I'm sure.'

"But... how am I supposed to stop a serial killer...? You're not gonna... make me... kill this guy, right?"

'Oh, no. That could get messy. Serial killers are matters for the authorities, but I've been observing this guy, and in this instance, the police could use an assist. Just someone to point them in the right direction, that is.'

"Point, how?"

'An anonymous phone call.'

"That will actually work?"

'We just have to give them an excuse to visit his apartment at a particularly inconvenient time for him. The rest should follow.'

They walked for a long while in the dark, leaving the modesty of Hector's inner city neighborhood for the downtown towers. He wasn't sure what time it was, but judging by the fog gathering between the buildings, he guessed it was late enough to be considered early again. The air tram had not stopped running, though, carrying rowdy passengers above the street on its suspended rails, and loud music in the distance bridged the gaps not already filled by sirens.

People on the sidewalks and in the street paid him little mind as they laughed at each other's jokes or stumbled out of a night club or slept on the bench in front of a Nancy's."

"16

He wondered what he would do if some stranger came up to him and started talking, like what happens in every movie where a young person ends up in a strange neighborhood late at night, and the more he thought about it, the more he resolved that there wasn't much for him to be afraid of. In fact, he almost wanted some creepy drunk person to saunter up and start a conversation, just so he could see what would happen. He figured it would inevitably be something surprising, like them turning out to be really fun and perfectly harmless, if a bit over-friendly from the inebriation. And if they tried to kidnap and murder him, well. That would be surprising for them.

'Here,' said Garovel, stirring him from his wonderment. The reaper drifted near a phone booth, and Hector entered. 'Up there.'

He looked where the reaper pointed and saw a fourth floor balcony of a high-end apartment building. A man stood there, smoking in front of a lamp over a window. Even at this distance, he could see that the man was well-dressed in a dark suit and undone tie.

"That... that's the guy?"

'Yeah.'

Hector eyed the phone in front of him. The next step was obvious enough, but he hesitated. "But... what if..."

'Hmm?'

"What if I call the police... and they come and... what if that guy kills one of them?"

Garovel looked at him heavily. 'If you're wondering why I'm not sending you in there instead, it's because this is your first try. I don't intend to give you more than you can handle.'

"But... if someone has to risk their life... then it should be me... shouldn't it?"

"17

The reaper made no response.

Hector kept pressing. "I mean, because, I-I can't die, right? He won't be able to kill me? And... because I... I already wasted my life, anyway, so... I wouldn't even be risking anything..."

‘Are you telling me you want to deal with him yourself?’

“I... uh... yeah.”

Garovel tilted his head. ‘That’s surprisingly bold of you. I thought you’d prefer to take things slower.’

“I just... don’t want anyone getting killed, is all...”

‘If that’s the case, then you should probably hurry.’

Hector’s face stiffened. “What? Why?”

‘Well, you know how I said the plan was to have the police visit him at an inconvenient time? He kills women by seducing them and bringing them back to his apartment, so the intention was to have them show up in the middle of--’

“What?!” He looked back to the balcony, but the man wasn’t there anymore. He grabbed the phone and dialed the police.

‘Now you’re calling? But you just said--’

“Hello?!” he yelled into the receiver. “There’s a guy in my building about to kill someone! He’s got a gun--”

‘He uses a knife.’

“--I mean, a knife, and ah--I heard him making threats on someone’s life from outside his apartment!”

<“What is your location?”>

“Ah--” Garovel gave him the address of the building, and he relayed it to the operator.

<“Please stay on the line, sir.”>

“Sorry, I can’t! Just get here!” He hung up and ran across the street. He barged through the entrance, and a security guard scrambled to stop him, but Hector had quite a head start. “Matter of life and death!” he shouted back as an apology.”

He bounded up the first staircase he saw and got off at the fourth floor. A pair of hallways bade him choose, so he followed Garovel's directions to the door of the murderer.

Hector pounded on the door. "Hello?! Please open up, sir! There's, ah--a gas leak, and we need to evacuate the building!"

No answer.

Garovel ventured inside. 'He's hiding her in the bathroom.'

He backed up and started kicking the door. "Please, sir! I know you're in there! This is very important!" The door didn't budge at all. It might as well have been a wall.

'He's about to slit her throat.'

"No!"

'Here.' Garovel found his shoulder, and Hector immediately felt an explosion of pain throughout his body before it vanished familiarly. 'Kick it in!'

The door flew from its hinges, ripping its deadbolt and chained lock right out of the wood and plaster.

"What the fuck?!" came a voice from the bathroom, and when the man came out and saw Hector, horror struck his face and he backed away toward the living room. "What the fuck are you?!"

And Hector was confused, because he couldn't see his own skin eating away at itself, revealing the dried, bloodless muscles of his face. He couldn't see his shaved hair gone ghostly white or his bloodshot eyes outlined in dead, blackened flesh. Hector just kept walking forward, undeterred by the knife that the murderer threw into his chest, and he grabbed the man by the throat and slowly tightened his grip. Hector could hardly believe how weak the man's struggles were. He easily kept him pinned against the wall, strangling the man until he fell unconscious."

"19

Hector looked at his hands for a second, awed and frightened of himself. He spotted a bundle of rope by the bed, presumably used on the victim earlier. He wrapped it around the killer and tied a triple knot as tightly as he could manage.

Then he saw the woman in the bathroom. She was still alive, and conscious, even. When she saw him, she tried to scream and wriggle free, but her constraints kept her in place all too perfectly. She'd been beaten, apparently, and shallow cuts riddled her arms and face and stomach.

Hector stepped toward her and then stopped, thinking better of it. "Sorry," he told her. "I'd untie you, but... you should probably stay and explain... uh, to the police... about what he tried to do to you. Otherwise, he could... you know... get away with it... and... yeah..."

She only stared back at him, wide-eyed.

"Oh! But, uh... don't worry! The police will be here any minute. And he's unconscious now. And I tied him up just in case. So... uh... y-you're safe, now. And I-I should, I should go..."

Upon hearing sirens in the distance, he ran. Some onlookers had gathered outside, the security guard from earlier among them, but he just pushed past them. He didn't stop running until he couldn't see the apartment complex anymore.

Garovel grabbed his shoulder, and suddenly, his strength left him. He fell to his knees, gasping for breath. His deathly body, however, returned to normal. The blackened and missing chunks of flesh grew anew, becoming the livelier ashy brown color they were before. He barely felt capable of walking, as if he'd just run a marathon where the prize was getting run over by a bus."

"20 -- III.

"You didn't mention anything... about whatever the hell... you did to me back there..." This time, his pauses were attributed more to his exhaustion and strained breaths.

'I converted the energy your body would normally use to support your life into muscle strength. Which sorta makes you look like a corpse and is why that guy freaked out when he saw you.'

"Oh... okay..."

‘You’re going to feel like I ripped your muscles out of your body and replaced them with flaming needles tomorrow, by the way.’

“Joy...”

Chapter Three: ‘Thy path be not gentle...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Sneaking back into his house had been a chore. He couldn’t very well have gone through the front door; he was sure he would’ve woken one or both of his parents. So instead, he climbed up the wall to his bedroom window--a wall which clearly was not meant to be climbed. He lost count of how many times he fell. Garovel eventually just decided to empower his body again so that Hector could finally make it back up to his room and into the relief of his bed.

Too soon, however, his alarm clock went off.

‘Oops, sorry. Time to get up.’

He groaned into his pillow. “Oh, just... just fuck right off. Seriously... I wouldn’t get out of this bed right now if you set it on fire...”

Garovel tapped him on the head. ‘It’s fine. You can catch up on your sleep later.’

He felt his eyelids recede, the weight from them completely lifted. His exhaustion was gone, he realized, and he sat up. He glared at Garovel. “Why didn’t you just do that earlier?” He winced as aching pains vaulted from muscle to muscle all over his body. “And why don’t you do something about this soreness, too?”

"20 -- III.

“You didn’t mention anything... about whatever the hell... you did to me back there...” This time, his pauses were attributed more to his exhaustion and strained breaths.

‘I converted the energy your body would normally use to support your life into muscle strength. Which sorta makes you look like a corpse and is why that guy freaked out when he saw you.’

“Oh... okay...”

‘You’re going to feel like I ripped your muscles out of your body and replaced them with flaming needles tomorrow, by the way.’

“Joy...”

Chapter Three: ‘Thy path be not gentle...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Sneaking back into his house had been a chore. He couldn’t very well have gone through the front door; he was sure he would’ve woken one or both of his parents. So instead, he climbed up the wall to his bedroom window--a wall which clearly was not meant to be climbed. He lost count of how many times he fell. Garovel eventually just decided to empower his body again so that Hector could finally make it back up to his room and into the relief of his bed.

Too soon, however, his alarm clock went off.

‘Oops, sorry. Time to get up.’

He groaned into his pillow. “Oh, just... just fuck right off. Seriously... I wouldn’t get out of this bed right now if you set it on fire...”

Garovel tapped him on the head. ‘It’s fine. You can catch up on your sleep later.’

He felt his eyelids recede, the weight from them completely lifted. His exhaustion was gone, he realized, and he sat up. He glared at Garovel. “Why didn’t you just do that earlier?” He winced as aching pains vaulted from muscle to muscle all over his body. “And why don’t you do something about this soreness, too?”

"21

‘Sorry, but that really needs to go away on its own. I told you to expect pain, didn’t I?’

He stood slowly and regretted every moment of it. “Agh, oww...”

‘It’s bad if I keep putting off the recovery pains and exhaustion. They’ll just come back stronger later.'

"You can't just... ugh... keep putting it off forever?"

'Yeah, and then one day, I forget. Or we end up separated for a long time, and guess what happens? You experience pain that is so strong, it drives you actually insane.'

He sighed. "Okay, fine..."

'You're very cranky in the morning.'

Hector blinked and flushed red. "Ah--I'm sorry. I didn't, ah, I didn't mean to be rude..."

Garovel seemed amused. 'It's fine. Don't look so worried.'

He readied himself for school and left, not needing to say goodbye to his parents who were already gone, and he arrived at the bus stop just as it was pulling up to the curb. Garovel floated steadily along with him, even keeping pace with the bus right outside Hector's window. No one sat next to him.

Calman High School was notoriously cramped. It sat on a crowded high street, its seven stories paling in comparison to every building around it, and since the property was nowhere near large enough to house any fields or facilities whatsoever, every last one of the school's physical education courses and sports teams had to be exported to rented buildings. An eighth floor was being added in order to cope with the number of students, but that meager relief was still months from fruition.

Hector arrived at his morning mathematics class and took his seat in the back corner of the room, thankful at least for the walls on two sides of him instead of another pair of warm bodies breathing down his neck."

"22

It sometimes seemed a strange thing to him that he could feel so alone with so many people around, but the more he thought about it, the more he supposed that to be the exact problem. He wondered if anyone else felt as lost in the crowd as he did. And now, being undead and seeing Garovel drift among the students like the most unapproachably frightening teacher in the world, Hector also began to wonder if a school where everyone knew one another would have changed his life. Or his death.

Garovel hung around throughout his first few classes, making the occasional remark about how no one in the room was about to die or pointing out an inaccuracy in the teacher's lecture. Honestly, Hector was glad for the company, strange as it was, but he wasn't entirely sure why the reaper was staying. Surely, Garovel had better things to do than observe a second-year geography lesson about the Eloan continent's tropical regions. Hector refrained from asking about it, however, figuring it might prompt Garovel to leave.

But as the teacher's lecture drew out and transformed into one of current events, of civil unrest and brutalities in the modern world, a more serious question began to brew in Hector's mind; and when it was time to break for lunch, he decided to petition Garovel for an answer.

'There's something else I want to know,' Hector thought, not wanting to look like the crazy kid in the corner of the refectory who sat talking to himself.

'Yeah?'

'Uh... why aren't you somewhere more important?'

Garovel cocked a bony eyebrow. 'Excuse me?'

"23

'No, I mean... uh... why are you trying to help people here in Brighton? I mean... with all the horrible shit going on in the world, aren't there lots of other places that need help...? Not that, uh... not that I think preventing murders isn't important and all, but, ah... there are whole countries at war in the southeast, you know...'

'I do know, yes. The Korgum-Dozer conflict. And the Kavian civil war in the north. And Jesbol and Horsht far to the west. I'm keenly aware.'

'Then why are you here?'

'Perhaps you think I'm the only reaper in the entire world.'

Hector blinked.

‘I’m not, just so it’s clear. I’m merely one of hundreds of thousands. And while it’s true that most of us don’t take on servants, the number of us who do still ends up being quite substantial.’

‘So... you’re saying the other reapers have the war-torn areas covered? Because that doesn’t really--’

Garovel shook his head. ‘No, no. Unfortunately, circumstances are appreciably more complicated than that.’ The reaper drifted around the side of the table. ‘Those of us who decide to take on servants and involve ourselves in the world... well, we don’t always agree with one another.’

‘Oh, you mean... oh...’

‘Yeah. It’s especially prevalent in war zones. Some of us will side with one army, while others side with the opposing army. Or some will form their own side, perhaps trying to protect people in the crossfire, perhaps... not.’

Hector sat up in his chair. ‘Wait... are you saying... some of you guys are actually trying to make things worse?’

Garovel nodded. ‘It may depend on your perspective, but... yes.’”

"24

‘But... why? I don’t...’

‘Like I said, we don’t always agree with one another. That extends to more essential questions, as well. Such as whether or not human lives are even worth protecting in the first place.’

‘That... that sounds horrific...’

‘You see? If we tread into a battlefield, we’ll almost certainly encounter other reapers with servants. And frankly, you are nowhere near ready for that. Their servants will stomp you into the dust.’

‘Aren’t I unkillable, though?’

‘You are, but I’m not. And until you’re able to protect me, we’ll be keeping our heads low. I may be a grim reaper, but I don’t have a death wish.'

'O-okay...'

'But there is a reason why I chose Brighton specifically,' said Garovel, hesitating slightly. 'There's something... unsettling about this city.'

'Unsettling? How do you mean?'

Garovel gave a strained expression. 'I'm not sure. There's a presence in this city I've never felt before. And it's hiding. I think we may be able to draw it out, given time.'

'Oh... Hmm.'

'Did you have any other questions? Feel free to ask me anything.'

Hector bit into an apple. Chewing used more muscles than he realized, and he felt his neck and face aching in protest. 'Actually, there is something. That woman from last night... were you... I mean... were you going to let her die...? In order to catch the murderer, I mean. If I hadn't interrupted, would you have--'

'Whoa, whoa, hold on now. The plan was to have the police catch him in the midst of torturing her, not with her dead body. The reason he came so close to killing her was because you spooked him by knocking on the door. Otherwise, he would have been torturing her all night, which would have given the police ample time to arrive.'"

"25

'Oh... okay... So I... so I just screwed things up, then...'

'No, you did fine, Hector. In fact, your intervention ensured that it didn't develop into a hostage situation.' Garovel eyed him a moment. 'Make no mistake, this is risky territory we're heading into. The idea is to be smart and make the best of situations that are already terrible. Sometimes, there won't be a good option left to choose, and we'll just have to endure. Luckily, you're pretty durable now.'

A cup of chili sailed past Hector's head, and he abruptly realized that a food fight had broken out a few tables away. A half-eaten hot dog landed in his lap and slathered ketchup all over his shirt.

“Oh shit!” came a voice from the crowd. “Sorry about that, pal!” It belonged to a young man he knew to be Micah, smiling apologetically. Micah took a chunk of mashed potatoes to the face.

‘That looks fun,’ said Garovel. ‘Incredibly wasteful, but fun.’

Hector went to get up and had to stifle a groan. When not moving, he could nearly forget that every muscle in his body hated him at the moment. He made his way over to the napkin dispenser at the condiment table, but someone bumped into him. They turned, presumably to apologize, but stopped.

When Hector saw who it was, he averted his eyes and offered his own apology. “Sorry, Davia.”

She looked at him as if she were addressing a blank wall. “Why are you apologizing?” she said. “I bumped into you, didn’t I?”

Hector didn’t chance a reply.

“I’ll look where I’m going next time,” she said. “So don’t tell on me, Hector.” She left him alone.”

"26

‘What was that about?’ Garovel asked, floating closer. ‘You can’t even talk to a girl? You do remember only needing one hand to subdue a serial killer, right? Did that do nothing for your self-esteem?’

‘No, that’s not what that was. She’s... I mean... I don’t... It’s because she’s from the carpentry club and... I...’

‘Hmm? You have a history with her?’

Hector tilted his brow at the reaper. ‘You... don’t already know?’

Garovel merely shook his head.

‘I thought you knew everything about me...’

‘I occasionally followed you around a bit over the course of seven months. I don’t know your entire life story.’

‘R-right...’ Hector occupied himself with the stain on his shirt. The slash of red reminded him of the bloodied shirt he trashed the night before.

‘So? Who is she to you, then?’

He glanced in the direction she had gone and saw her eating with a bunch of other students. ‘I was almost part of that group,’ he said. ‘We were... we were almost friends, I guess...’

Garovel followed him back to his table, phasing through a passing lacrosse player. ‘I take it things didn’t end very well.’

Hector didn’t answer.

‘Tell me what happened.’

He sighed and grabbed his fork. ‘Why?’

‘Do you remember what I said before? You would help me, and I would help you.’

‘Thanks, but... there’s nothing to help with...’

‘Even so, I’d like to know more about you.’

A wash of gratitude ran through him like a shiver, and Hector hid his face downward, as if his food could be so utterly fascinating. For an incredible moment, he thought he might actually cry, which only made him flush with embarrassment. He wished he could tell Garovel how much those words just now had meant to him, but he just couldn’t. He didn’t know what was stopping him, and he hated whatever it was, but he just couldn’t."

"27

At length, Garovel relented. ‘Well, have it your way.’

When Hector finally looked up again, hoping the red in his face was gone, he saw the aftermath of the food fight. Several students were cleaning up the mess under the supervision of teachers and custodians. Even after the bell rang, they were made to keep cleaning.

‘I’m going to go check on a few things while you’re in class,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ll meet up with you again after school, potentially with a new task, so be ready.’

Hector felt himself panicking slightly. 'Ah--um... where are you going?'

'The police station, among other places. I'd like to follow up on our serial killer's case, make sure there aren't any problems.'

'Um... please... um...'

'Hmm?'

'Please... don't leave me alone...'

Garovel paused for an extremely toothy smile. He tapped Hector on the head with the butt of his scythe. 'Don't you remember? When you talk to me in your head, I'll hear you no matter where I am. So don't frown like that. You understand? You're never alone, Hector. Not anymore.'

He nodded uncertainly.

'Unless you want to be alone, that is. Then just don't think at me.'

'Right...'

Throngs of students filed past him as he watched Garovel disappear through the wall's steely blue-and-white tile. He took a breath and proceeded to his history class.

As he sat and listened to the mousy Jeremy Voller attempting to give a report about the recent history of the Crown, Hector began to wonder why he even bothered coming back to school. He could see the instructor growing more impatient with Jeremy's every redundant word. Mr. Cormac had a reputation for candidness that made most of the students like him, and Hector might have been included in that group if he didn't find all teachers inherently frightening."

"28

"Thank you, Jeremy. That was very informative and tedious. You can take your seat, now."

Jeremy took his seat.

Mr. Cormac stood and addressed the class. "Lovely. Which one of you delightful curs would like to bore us with your historical insights next? Hector Goffe, how about you?"

Hector shook his head furiously and tried to shrink into his desk.

"Oh come on. You did the assignment, didn't you?"

Of course he hadn't. He'd planned on being dead for today's class. In fact, not having to do any of his homework had provided all the more motivation to kill himself. And now that he thought about it, he wasn't sure if he would still be able to pass any of his classes. He wasn't sure if he should care, either.

At length, the instructor grew tired of Hector's silence and moved on.

Hector was just waiting for the day to end. After a while, he decided to try the reaper. 'Um... Garovel?'

'Yeah?'

He smiled faintly. 'Are you... er... Have you learned anything, yet?'

'The case seems to be proceeding well. Better than I expected, in fact. I thought they would only be able to get him for attempted murder of the woman you saved, but they found evidence in his apartment which implicates him in the murders he committed previously as well.'

'That's good.'

'Yes. Though, apparently you crushed the man's windpipe.'

'Oh shit... did... He's not dead, is he? I wasn't trying to--'

'No, he's alive. Somehow. I should've given you time to familiarize yourself with that level of strength.'

'If you'd done that, then... we might not have made it to her in time...'

'You make a fair point. By the way, her condition is good... Wait a minute.'

Hector looked around the classroom, as if it would somehow help. 'Garovel?'

'Uh-oh.'

'What's wrong?'

'One of the police officers. I see the aura of death around him.'"
"29 -- IV.

Chapter Four: 'Embolden thy steeled heart...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector shifted at his desk. 'Uh... okay... So what do I do?'

'Hmm.'

'Garovel?'

'I'm thinking. He looks perfectly healthy, so it's probably not illness. I can see the aura around him--Officer Mallory, by the way--but the danger doesn't seem to be immediate. He IS in the middle of a police station, after all. I suspect the exact nature of the threat won't become apparent until he leaves the building.

'You want me go to the police station right now?'

'It looks like his shift doesn't end for a few hours. You have time. Head down here after school.'

'Are you sure...? I mean, it's a man's life at stake... and I really don't mind skipping class...'

'I'll let you know if the situation changes. In the mean time, you should probably take steps to conceal your identity. If you end up having to take a bullet for this man, it'd be best if he doesn't see your face when you shrug it off.'

'O-okay, but... I don't exactly have a mask or... anything...'

'Figure it out. Borrow something from a store along the way, if you have to.'

'I don't think that's borrowing...'

'If you can't find a mask in time, then. Well. You're just going to have to risk it. Obviously, concealing your identity is not more important than a person's life.'

Hector paused a moment, and then quietly sighed. 'I... think I know where I can borrow one...'

'Splendid.'

'It, uh, it might look really weird, though...'

'Oh. Well. Forget it, then. We can't have you looking weird.'

'You don't have to be mean...'

'It's tough love, Hector. Tough love.'"

"29 -- IV.

Chapter Four: 'Embolden thy steeled heart...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector shifted at his desk. 'Uh... okay... So what do I do?'

'Hmm.'

'Garovel?'

'I'm thinking. He looks perfectly healthy, so it's probably not illness. I can see the aura around him--Officer Mallory, by the way--but the danger doesn't seem to be immediate. He IS in the middle of a police station, after all. I suspect the exact nature of the threat won't become apparent until he leaves the building.

'You want me go to the police station right now?'

'It looks like his shift doesn't end for a few hours. You have time. Head down here after school.'

'Are you sure...? I mean, it's a man's life at stake... and I really don't mind skipping class...'

'I'll let you know if the situation changes. In the mean time, you should probably take steps to conceal your identity. If you end up having to take a bullet for this man, it'd be best if he doesn't see your face when you shrug it off.'

'O-okay, but... I don't exactly have a mask or... anything...'

‘Figure it out. Borrow something from a store along the way, if you have to.’

‘I don’t think that’s borrowing...’

‘If you can’t find a mask in time, then. Well. You’re just going to have to risk it. Obviously, concealing your identity is not more important than a person’s life.’

Hector paused a moment, and then quietly sighed. ‘I... think I know where I can borrow one...’

‘Splendid.’

‘It, uh, it might look really weird, though...’

‘Oh. Well. Forget it, then. We can’t have you looking weird.’

‘You don’t have to be mean...’

‘It’s tough love, Hector. Tough love.’”

"30

A few minutes before the final bell, he slipped out of class. He could hear the instructor hollering at him for leaving early but ignored it and made his way down to the basement level. He was hoping he could get into the carpentry room before any of the club members arrived, but he ended up waiting for its last class to empty. He took to the corner, trying to be invisible, which was surprisingly easy with so many students, and when he spotted the welding mask that someone had yet to return to the storage rack, he gathered himself and reached out. He grabbed it, but so did someone else.

“Hey, what the--? Let go--Hector?”

Hector cringed, realizing it was Lance Alexander, treasurer of the carpentry club and one of the people he’d been trying to avoid.

“What are you doing here, Hector? Don’t tell me you want to rejoin the club.”

“No,” he said, pulling the mask away from Lance. “I just... need to borrow this for a while.”

“No one’s allowed to take the equipment out of the classroom.”

“I’ll bring it back.”

“That’s not the problem.” Lance was bigger than Hector, bigger than most people, and no small measure of intimidating, but at that moment, Hector had every reason in the world to not give a damn about what he had to say.

“Report me, then.” He fled without waiting for Lance’s response.

Hector knew Lance wasn’t a bad guy. He knew Lance was just following the rules, and he knew that this would probably earn him detention for a week or two, but he didn’t see a way around it. Perhaps the drama club had masks he could borrow, but he didn’t actually know where the drama club met; and seeing as the school didn’t even have its own auditorium, he figured it wouldn’t be an easy place to reach.”

"31

He stuffed the black welding mask into his bag and left the campus on foot. He asked Garovel for directions and received them, discovering it was no short journey; but in time, he arrived and the reaper met up with him on the street corner in front of the station.

Hector took a seat on a wood-and-stone bench. ‘So, uh... have you learned anything else about him?’

‘He doesn’t get along with his partner or any of his fellow officers here. Everyone seems to think he’s an asshole.’

‘Is he?’

‘Maybe. I’ve only known him since this afternoon.’

‘I guess it doesn’t matter much...’

‘He appears to have a daughter. Unlike him, she’s a brunette and wears glasses. She looks very young, though the photo on his desk could be several years old by now. No information on the mother, yet.’

‘Wow... you’re observant...’

‘You’re easily impressed. It’s not much to go on. Mallory doesn’t seem to have an active case, at the moment. I only saw him doing follow-up paperwork, but I did discover that he’s scheduled to appear in court in a few days.’

‘For what?’

‘Not sure, but there aren’t many things that cops go to court for. If he were being prosecuted for something serious, I doubt he would still be allowed to come to work. Could be they just bumped him off active duty, but I’d guess he’s appearing as an expert witness.’

‘So... someone wants to kill him before he testifies?’

‘Seems likely. But then, killing a cop right before his court date isn’t exactly easy to cover up. If I’m right, then someone’s either very stupid or...’

‘Very influential.’

‘Yeah.’ Garovel looked at Hector and smirked. ‘Heh.’

‘What’re you smiling about?’

‘Y’know, for someone dumb enough to kill himself, you’re smarter than I thought.’

Hector’s face went flat. ‘Fuck you, too, Skeletor.’”

"32

Garovel just laughed. ‘How’s the soreness, by the way?’

He groaned a little. ‘Incredibly painful... but... I’m starting to get used to it... I guess.’

‘It’ll probably get a lot worse after today.’

“Ugh...”

They both spotted a police car exiting the station’s side garage, a uniformed officer in the driver’s seat.

‘There he is,’ said Garovel, clutching Hector’s shoulder. ‘Get ready. I’ll follow him and give you directions. When I tell you, start running as fast as you can.'

Hector felt a blaze of vigor run through him. The soreness vanished, and he breathed deep. "Whoa...!" He could feel his muscles pulsing, his blood rushing, and a surge of so much energy that he thought he might go insane if he didn't expel it.

'You might not need it, but put your mask on just in case. And make sure you don't run into anyone. That's more important than catching up to us.'

He slid the welding mask over his face. He had to pull up the small, black visor in order to see at all. The rectangular slit of glass bore a few scratches but not enough to obstruct his vision.

The police car was pulling away. Garovel flew after it, and Hector waited. They fell out of sight, and he kept waiting. Passersby gave him uncomfortable looks as he stood there in his mask, trembling with anticipation.

'Move straight ahead five blocks and turn right. Tell me when you've reached it.'

Hector bolted forward. His legs bounded over the pavement with more force than he expected, but he could tell that he wasn't even breaching his potential yet. He broadly weaved between pedestrians, still picking up momentum, but when he saw an intersection full of passing vehicles, he realized he wouldn't be able to stop in time. So he didn't. He ran into traffic. A white town car blared its horn at him as he leapt clear over its roof and landed still running down the sidewalk."

"33

It was so easy to run, as if it required no effort, as if it was more natural to run than to walk. Someone stepped out from a shop in front of him, and he swiped past the flaps of their coat. He slowed down a little to ensure he had control, and when the turn came up, he went right.

'I reached the turn,' he told Garovel.

'Keep going straight until you see the ramp onto the highway and take it.'

People were becoming a blur, so he slowed his pace again. A crowd filled the sidewalk up ahead. Hector could see himself nearly keeping pace with the cars, so he ran into the street. Striding the white lines between lanes and not feeling winded in the slightest, he couldn't help laughing inside his mask as he searched for a road speed sign. He saw one that said "40 km/h."

Once he boarded the highway, however, the cars began speeding past him again. He pushed his legs as hard as he could, and he was sure that he was running much faster than he had been previously, but the cars still roared by, and he stuck to the shoulder of the road. The next sign he saw said "110 km/h."

Still, after what must have been at least half an hour of running, he exited the highway, per Garovel's instructions, and found himself breathing heavily but not gasping. He figured his blood still needed all the extra air, but his muscles didn't hurt or feel tired in the slightest.

He soon arrived in a quieter neighborhood. He could see the police car parked in a driveway up the street. When he saw the reaper approaching, he slowed to a walk."

"34

"How fast--" He paused to slide his mask off his face. "--Exactly how fast am I, anyway?" As he stood still, he could feel his own heart pounding faster than it ever had in his entire life.

Garovel shrugged. 'How fast can your body run without tearing itself apart?'

He scratched his head and returned with a wet hand. He wiped the sweat on his shirt, but it was similarly soaked. He wiped it on his pants instead.

'Officer Mallory is in his house. You should keep your distance until--' Garovel stopped when they both saw a black van pull up in front of the house. Five men stepped out. Two started for the front door, three circled around back. 'You'd better put your mask back on.'

'Right.'

Dashing up to the house, he saw them knocking on the door.

‘Deal with the ones in the back first.’

‘Okay.’

He snuck along the neighbor’s fence and leapt over into the backyard. The three of them noticed him immediately and stiffened their postures, hands in their coats.

“Who the fuck are you?” said the nearest one, square-jawed and younger than the others. “What’s with the fucking mask?”

“Uh... I-I heard you had some leaky pipes?”

“Get outta here before we--”

‘You don’t have time to chat.’ Garovel touched his shoulder, and that familiar pain flashed through his body. ‘Go.’

He rushed the youngest guy, who pulled a gun, but Hector flattened him before he could fire. The man stayed down. The other two pulled, and Hector took two in the chest before reaching the next man, slugging him in the face, and kicking his gun away from him. The last one fired five more times, three of which missed Hector completely, and went down with a kick to the testicles and an elbow to the forehead.

Gunfire erupted from inside the house.”

"35

He stomped the door down and found Mallory crouched behind the kitchen’s island, clutching his side with one arm, trying to reload his service weapon with the other, and staring right back at Hector. A ponytailed gunman was in the hall, and Hector walked straight toward him. A bullet ripped through the mask and pierced his neck. Hector yanked the man’s gun away and smashed him in the face with it. A few teeth flew from his mouth and hit the hardwood floor as he did.

A gunshot made him run back into the kitchen. The last thug was slumped in the other doorway, his head blown open and bleeding all over the tile. Officer Mallory took a ragged breath and looked at Hector, doubtless wanting to ask the obvious question, but he pulled out a cellphone instead and dialed. He tried to stand but slid back down against the counter, bleeding nearly as much as the dead man.

"I'm going to assume--guh--that you didn't come here to kill me," said the officer. He put the phone to his ear. "Yeah, I need an ambulance." Giving his address and eyeing Hector, he added, "And there's someone else here in even worse shape than me... I think."

He tried to speak, but the bullet in his larynx made it impossible. Garovel invoked the recovery. None of his wounds hurt, but Hector could feel flesh contracting and expanding, fractured bones shivering as they rejoined, and bullets getting pushed out of his body and clattering to the floor.

"Who are you?" the officer finally asked.

'What will you tell him?' said Garovel."

"36

Hector was abruptly thankful that his embarrassed face was hidden and decided to do what came naturally to him. He said nothing.

"Well--"" Mallory paused for a grimace. "--Thanks for your help, though I can't imagine why you did it."

'Ask him who sent these men.'

"Wh-who sent these men to kill you?"

Mallory squinted. "How old are you? You sound like a kid." At Hector's silence, he said, "Rofal. Joseph Rofal."

"Because you're testifying in court a-against him?"

"Not against him. His little shit stain of a nephew. I was there. I saw him murder that boy. No more than ten years old. Dropped a cinderblock on top of the kid's head. And then laughed. Fuckin' little bastard--" He broke off for a pained cringe and began coughing. His skin had grown pale. Sweat covered his face. "And now I'm dying 'cuz of that little fuck? I should've just... sh-should've just shot that piece of... stupid piece of shit..." The dreary look in his eyes seemed to suggest he had forgotten what he was saying. Or that he no longer cared.

'Ask him about his family.'

"Your family," said Hector. "Do you... do you think they could be in danger, too?"

Mallory just sat there, breathing slowly and staring vacantly at the yellow cabinets in front of him. Sirens in the distance told Hector it was about time to leave.

"Officer Mallory, y-your family... I can help."

'I think you should go, Hector.'

'But we need him to tell us...'

'I don't think he can hear you.'

Blood dripped from the corner of the officer's mouth."

"37

"Officer Mallory... say something. Nod if you can hear me. Blink if you can..."

'Hector...'

"Is he...? He's not... You--you'd know, right?"

'He's not dead yet,' said Garovel. 'But he's probably not going to make it.'

"You can't... do anything? Nothing...?"

'I'm sorry.'

Hector closed his eyes and sighed. "I failed to save him...?"

'We failed, Hector.' The sirens were loud enough to fill the room. 'And if you don't run right now, our failures will only increase.'

He ran. Out the back, through the rear yard, and over the fence. He cut between houses to avoid the street.

'You should take your shirt off.'

He stopped behind the corner of a stuccoed house. He looked down at his shirt, riddled with bullet holes and soaked in blood. "This is..." He sighed. "This is going to become a thing, isn't it..."

'Probably.'

"B-but... uh... I'm not sure... a black guy running shirtless through this neighborhood will, uh... go over so well..."

'Better than a black guy running through the neighborhood covered in blood. From a crime scene, might I add.'

"But I... I don't know if... uh..."

'This is not the time to be shy, Hector.'

"You say that like it's supposed to make a difference..."

'Take off the damn shirt!'

He pulled it off. And as he looked at the wet cloth, he realized his hands were trembling. Arms, too, even all the way into his chest. It was faint, hardly even noticeable unless he was standing still, but there it was.

'Ah. Your body's gone into shock. I tried to suppress the effects, but this is to be expected.'

"What...? Why am I in shock...?"

"38

'Seriously? You were just shot five times, Hector. Not to mention you saw a guy's brain spilling out of his head. And then Mallory, too. I'm surprised this didn't happen when you were stabbed last night. Just relax a moment. Sit down. You'll be fine.'

The sirens had stopped. They'd reached the house. Sitting in the grass with his legs folded together, he just breathed and tried to think. He frowned and pulled his mask off, as well. He touched the bullet hole with his thumb. "What did I do wrong, Garovel?" he whispered. "I could have saved him... couldn't I? I screwed up... but... agh..."

The reaper floated around him. 'Do you remember what I said before? Sometimes there won't be a good option left to choose.'

“...Is that supposed to be comforting?”

‘No. It’s not. Because we’re not supposed to be comfortable. Being comfortable makes us complacent. Sloppy.’

“Then... what are you saying?”

‘I’m saying we did our best. And we don’t respond to failure with depression. We respond by becoming better. Until our best is good enough.’

Hector hesitated, but gave a solemn nod. After another moment, he asked, “What do we do now?”

‘At the very least, you need a change of clothes. Do you know how to get home?’

“Um... actually, no. I’m completely lost...”

‘Then I’ll guide you home and return on my own to observe. Hopefully, I’ll be able to find out where the mother and daughter are. Put your mask away. It’ll only draw attention. It’s a bit cold, but without your shirt, you can just look like a jogger.’

He bagged the mask and shirt both and started running, sticking to sidewalks whenever he could.”

"39

He kept going over the scene in his head. He kept questioning his decisions during the fight. Maybe it was a mistake to take out the three men, first. Maybe the gunshots alerted the two men out front and caused them to start shooting at Mallory sooner. But if he’d gone for the two front men first, then Mallory would’ve been alone against three. And even if he had somehow managed to meet Mallory before them, there was no way he could have convinced the officer that he wasn’t also there to kill him. Maybe he didn’t have to convince him, though. Maybe if he’d--. Maybe he could’ve--. Maybe...

When he arrived home, he found himself alone again. His parents were still out, probably at a restaurant, considering the hour. Garovel had left as soon as Hector began to recognize buildings.

He made his way upstairs and threw his bag on the bed. He wondered if he would have time to relax at all. He wasn't tired, exactly, but he felt like he should be. He sat down to take his shoes off. A bit of blood had seeped into his right sock.

'I'm at home,' he told Garovel. 'I'll be changed soon.'

'I'm at the scene.'

'What have you learned?'

'Apparently, the daughter was upstairs the whole time.'

'Holy shit...' Hector's brow lowered, and he scratched his head. 'Sh-she... she heard the gunshots and everything...?'

'I'm looking for her now. Word is, she saw a black male in a red shirt and a strange mask fleeing the crime scene.'

'Of course...'

There was a long pause. 'Shit.'

'What's the matter?'

'I see her. She has the aura. Rofal put the hit on her, too.'

"40 -- V.

Chapter Five: 'Beholden to thy grim task...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Night arrived by the time Hector reached the hospital. He tried to air out his freshly sweat-soaked clothes as he entered the building.

Mallory's daughter was supposed to be in protective custody for the remainder of the night, and Garovel had initially wanted Hector to get some rest. But then the reaper heard some of the officers talking privately. Each of the four guards assigned to her expected Rofal's men to come for her by night's end, and only Officer Colt seemed to harbor any notion of standing in their way. And it hadn't taken the other three long to talk him down.

Having no need of further direction, Hector waited until the man at the reception desk wasn't looking and snuck past. He held his bag close at his side and tried not to make eye contact with any of the passing attendants.

Mallory had been taken to the rear wing of the hospital for surgery, and according to Garovel, his daughter sat in the waiting room. Hector peeked around the corner and saw the four officers standing at the other end of the hall.

'I see the room,' he thought. He took a seat out of the officers' sightline.

'Good. I'm with the daughter.'

'Learn anything new?'

'Her name is Melissa. A bit on the short side, looks a couple years older than you, brown hair, ponytail in a braid, green shirt with a cute dog on it, blue pants, white sneakers--'

'That--uh--that's a lot of information...'

'You may need to know what she looks like.'

'Uh... yeah, okay. Thanks. I meant more, um... about the mother or about Rofal, maybe...'

"40 -- V.

Chapter Five: 'Beholden to thy grim task...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Night arrived by the time Hector reached the hospital. He tried to air out his freshly sweat-soaked clothes as he entered the building.

Mallory's daughter was supposed to be in protective custody for the remainder of the night, and Garovel had initially wanted Hector to get some rest. But then the reaper heard some of the officers talking privately. Each of the four guards assigned to her expected Rofal's men to come for her by night's end, and only Officer Colt seemed to harbor any notion of standing in their way. And it hadn't taken the other three long to talk him down.

Having no need of further direction, Hector waited until the man at the reception desk wasn't looking and snuck past. He held his bag close at his side and tried not to make eye contact with any of the passing attendants.

Mallory had been taken to the rear wing of the hospital for surgery, and according to Garovel, his daughter sat in the waiting room. Hector peeked around the corner and saw the four officers standing at the other end of the hall.

'I see the room,' he thought. He took a seat out of the officers' sightline.

'Good. I'm with the daughter.'

'Learn anything new?'

'Her name is Melissa. A bit on the short side, looks a couple years older than you, brown hair, ponytail in a braid, green shirt with a cute dog on it, blue pants, white sneakers--'

'That--uh--that's a lot of information...'

'You may need to know what she looks like.'

'Uh... yeah, okay. Thanks. I meant more, um... about the mother or about Rofal, maybe...'

"41

'The mother is not alive.'

'Oh...'

'The nurse asked Melissa about it. She said her mother died nine years ago. She didn't mention any other family.'

'Geez... and now this...'

'Yeah. Wait. Here comes the doctor. The surgery's over already?'

Hector held his breath.

'...They couldn't give him a blood transfusion in time. He's dead.'

He exhaled and shut his eyes.

‘Melissa’s a wreck.’

Hector ran a hand down his face. ‘You were right.’

‘I wish I wasn’t.’

They waited. Hector shifted uncomfortably in his seat. The tension was suffocating. He poked his head around the corner every now and again, wondering what the officers were talking about. Then he saw one of them walking in his direction.

The man was mumbling under his breath as he turned the corner. “--morons...” He locked eyes with Hector, who immediately tried to look away, but to no avail. “Hey, kid. What are you doing here?”

“Uh--” When he met the man’s eyes again, he was a bit surprised to see a very calm blue gaze, relaxed, or perhaps just confident. The pin on his uniform read ‘COLT.’ “I’m... just waiting for someone... Why?”

“Maybe you should go for a walk. Get some fresh air or something. It’ll do you good.”

Hector lowered his brow a little. “Thank you, but I’m fine...”

Colt leaned in. “I can’t order you to leave. I don’t have that kind of authority, and frankly, I’m a man who respects another man’s right to go where he likes and do what he wants. But, kid. It’s about to get real fucked up in here. And trust me when I say you’re gonna wish you were somewhere else.”

"42

Hector only shrunk into his chair, pulling his bag to his chest and looking at the sterile floor.

“Shit, kid. It was a warning, not a threat.” After a moment, Colt shrugged and started walking away. “Fine. Do what you want.”

He watched Colt go, watched him talk with a pair of nurses and a doctor, watched them all scurry away not long after he left them alone.

Hector didn't have to wait much longer after that. He noticed the men as soon as they entered the intersecting hallway. He counted four, walking together, all wearing sunglasses at night and dark hats indoors. He donned his own mask and stood.

'They're here,' he said.

'As am I.' Garovel emerged from the wall and grabbed Hector's shoulder. Hector was starting to get used to the pain. 'Wait until we're a hundred percent sure it's them,' Garovel said. 'It'd be awkward if you attacked a dance troupe or something.'

Hector gave him a look.

'Hey, it's possible. Maybe one of their members broke his leg during a routine, and they came to visit him in the hospital. You don't know.'

He waited until they approached the group of officers. When the uniforms started to make way for them, that was good enough confirmation for Hector. He bounded down the hallway. They turned at the sound of his footsteps, but it was far too late for the leftmost thug. Hector barreled into him. The man's body punched through the thin wall, raining plaster into Melissa's room. She shrieked."

"43

"The fuck?!" The thugs drew their weapons, which made the cops draw theirs, but Hector had already grabbed his second thug by the arm. He flung him into the third like a rag doll, and they both stayed down. Hector turned to the fourth, took a bullet in the chest, and punched the man so hard that he felt the guy's jaw break.

"Holy shit. Who the--" A gunshot cut the words short.

He spun around in time to see Colt gun two other officers down, the third already on the ground. All in the back of the head, before they even knew what happened.

Colt looked at him. "Hey, you're that kid, aren't you? What's with the mask?"

Hector was on him in a blink. He slapped the gun away and shoved him against the wall. "What are you doing?! Why did you kill them?!"

“What can I say? My boss is a family man.” Colt squirmed under Hector’s grip. “You know, you really should’ve listened--”

Hector felt the blade enter below his chin. Everything flashed and went dark.

This was a familiar feeling. Emptiness. A vague notion of being in a vacuum. No life, no breath, no light, nothing to sense or be conscious of.

And then he was back. He sat up, discovering he had been on the floor. He shook his head, blinking. “What happened...?”

‘I’m sorry, Hector... I couldn’t revive you fast enough...’

“Wh-what? I don’t--”

‘Colt stabbed you. The knife pierced your brain. You still need your brain. I had to resurrect you.’

He climbed to his feet. His mask had come off, but that wasn’t his first concern. “Where’d he go?”

‘I don’t know. I couldn’t follow him and revive you at the same time.’”
"44

“Dammit...” Then it dawned on him, a sudden horror. What Garovel had just said. About being sorry. “Oh no...!” He barged into Melissa’s room.

She was on the floor, shot in the head.

Hector reeled back out of the room. His eyes were wide open, looking at everything around him, but the image of her was stuck there. He stumbled. Just breathing was difficult, as if the air itself was choking him. He squinted hard and gnashed his teeth.

‘I’m sorry, Hector.’

“Fu--ck!” He clenched his fists so hard that they bled. “I was supposed to save her! I was supposed to save at least her! I can’t--I don’t--! H-how--?! I have strength! I don’t get tired! I can’t even be killed! And...! And you’re telling me that’s still not enough?! Wh-what more do--?! I just...! I don’t...! Understand...!”

‘We lacked something more important than all of those things.’

“What?!”

‘Information,’ said Garovel. ‘If we’d known Colt worked for Rofal, we would have approached the situation differently. It was an act. He was testing the other officers’ sense of duty when he brought up the topic of protecting Melissa. I failed to see through it...’

Hector’s face broke in two. He started sobbing.

‘I’m sorry...’

“S-stop,” he cried. “It’s not... it’s not your fault...”

‘It is, though. You rely on me for information. Please don’t blame yourself, Hector. Please...’

He only wept harder.

It was quiet for a long time. No one came to check on them. Everyone who hadn’t already left probably fled when they heard gunshots. Garovel said nothing, just let him cry. His bloody hands were warm, throbbing, and he thought he could feel something grainy in them, like dirt, but with his vision blurred, he couldn’t tell what it was.

When the tears finally stopped, however, something else consumed his attention, something entirely unexpected. A second reaper appeared through the wall."

"45

‘Ah. Someone got here before me,’ said the other reaper. He was different from Garovel. He spoke slower, more deliberately, and somehow, his soundless words just felt different. He appeared as a skeleton as well, but his bones were lankier, his face longer. ‘Just as well. So many dead at once would have taken a while on my own.’

‘My name is Garovel. What’s yours?’

‘Bohwanox. Pleasure to meet you. Who’s the kid? The killer?’

‘No. He’s with me.’

'That would explain why he's staring at me.' Bohwanox paused and looked at the two of them again. 'Ah. Tried to have him stop it, did you?'

'Please, now isn't the time.'

'Four dead? Sure you didn't end up making things worse? How many would have died if you'd just let it be?'

'Stop talking,' said Garovel. 'You take two, and I'll take two.'

Bohwanox drifted over the three dead policemen. 'What about the morgue? That's what I usually come here for.'

'Ah. Right.' Garovel shook his head. 'I don't know. There's at least one more there.'

'Let's go there first, then. Allow these ones here the chance to go cold at least.'

'Very well.'

Bohwanox looked over them both again, perhaps considering saying more, then drifted off in silence.

'Hector,' Garovel said gently. 'I have to ferry these souls through the void, now. It's going to take me a while. I won't be back until tomorrow. You should rest.'

He stood up slowly. He stared at Garovel vacantly, face spattered with blood save where his tears had fallen.

'Come on. I'll take you home first. You can sleep all you want, my friend.'"

"46 -- VI.

Chapter Six: 'Of iron promise...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector never had such a deeply consuming sleep. The second Garovel's hand left his forehead, he was out, as if his exhaustion were a dammed river that had finally broken.

He awoke slowly. His eyes only opened halfway as he regained consciousness. He could already remember everything that had happened, but he wasn't ready to think about it. He hid in the warmth of his bed a bit longer, the lulling tug behind his eyes telling him that nothing mattered just yet. It was all okay for a few more moments.

He took a long breath and sat up. It was still dark outside. No. That couldn't be right. He looked at his clock. It was dark again. He must've slept the whole day.

'Garovel?' He waited for an answer but received none.

He could sense the dreadful thoughts there, the familiar, anguished throes. But he ignored them. It was strangely easy--uncomfortably so, even. But at the moment, he much preferred a vaguely unsettled feeling to whatever those pangs would bring. At the very least, he wanted to wait until Garovel returned.

Hunger drove him downstairs, despite how sore he still was. He found his mother in front of the refrigerator.

When she noticed him, she frowned. "Your school called," she said. "Why did you miss class today?"

He lowered his eyes. "I... wasn't feeling well... I stayed home and slept."

"Are you being bullied again?"

"I've never been bullied..."

"You're too quiet, sweetie. If you were a bit more outgoing, I'm sure they'd stop bothering you."

"I'm not being bullied, Mom..." As difficult as it was to talk to her, he couldn't help being a bit glad, still. She was showing concern for him. That was rare enough on its own."

"46 -- VI.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector never had such a deeply consuming sleep. The second Garovel's hand left his forehead, he was out, as if his exhaustion were a dammed river that had finally broken.

He awoke slowly. His eyes only opened halfway as he regained consciousness. He could already remember everything that had happened, but he wasn't ready to think about it. He hid in the warmth of his bed a bit longer, the lulling tug behind his eyes telling him that nothing mattered just yet. It was all okay for a few more moments.

He took a long breath and sat up. It was still dark outside. No. That couldn't be right. He looked at his clock. It was dark again. He must've slept the whole day.

'Garovel?' He waited for an answer but received none.

He could sense the dreadful thoughts there, the familiar, anguished throes. But he ignored them. It was strangely easy--uncomfortably so, even. But at the moment, he much preferred a vaguely unsettled feeling to whatever those pangs would bring. At the very least, he wanted to wait until Garovel returned.

Hunger drove him downstairs, despite how sore he still was. He found his mother in front of the refrigerator.

When she noticed him, she frowned. "Your school called," she said. "Why did you miss class today?"

He lowered his eyes. "I... wasn't feeling well... I stayed home and slept."

"Are you being bullied again?"

"I've never been bullied..."

"You're too quiet, sweetie. If you were a bit more outgoing, I'm sure they'd stop bothering you."

"I'm not being bullied, Mom..." As difficult as it was to talk to her, he couldn't help being a bit glad, still. She was showing concern for him. That was rare enough on its own."

"47

Her brow furrowed. "Well, whatever the case, if you're going to skip school, then at least get good at it. I used to call the school and pretend to be my mother when I was your age."

"Are you... encouraging me to skip school?"

"Don't be stupid, sweetie. Of course you should go to school. But I can't force you to go, so if you're going to skip, then do it in a way that they don't end up calling me while I'm at work. I nearly lost a client because of the interruption today."

Hector just looked at her.

"Hold on." She left briefly and returned with a small box. "I made you plenty of notes." She handed it to him.

"Uh..." He was usually able to figure out what he wanted to say after a bit of fumbling, but this time he had nothing.

"Or you can just call ahead and pretend to be your father. Or do something creative. Whatever."

Incredulous, he stared at his mother. "Uh... is Dad okay with this...?"

"Of course. You're old enough to make your own decisions about your life, sweetie. You'll be eighteen in a couple years, and then you'll be on your own. It's best you learn to start being responsible for yourself now. Goddess knows you've been a burden on your father and I long enough, already." And she left him there.

He wasn't sure what this feeling was. At once confused, distraught, and still faintly happy to be thought of. It wasn't exactly pleasant, but he wondered if causing trouble would earn him further attention. He immediately discarded the notion."

"48

Back upstairs with turkey, cheese, and tomato on toast, he sifted through the notes she had given him. Her signature was on all of them, as were a plethora of different excuses, usually involving some kind of sickness. Impressively, some were paired with forged doctor's notes with the dates left blank. Some for P.E. Some for band. Some for chemistry. He might have been genuinely amazed, if he were actually enrolled in any of those classes.

Still, he supposed the generic notes could be useful. He smirked. He never would have expected this from his mother. Strange as it seemed, she may have just helped him and Garovel save someone's life.

He sat back as he finished eating. Every part of him ached, but his hands had the worst of it for some reason. He couldn't remember putting them through anything worse than the rest of him. They throbbed enough that he felt the blood pumping through the veins between his fingers. He rubbed his hands together.

There it was again. That grainy feeling. He held his hands under the lamp at his desk.

His eyes narrowed. "What is this?" Specks of dirt littered his palms. Only, it couldn't be dirt. The color wasn't right. They were dark and gray, not light and brown.

Without any ideas, he wiped his hands on his pants and eyed his bed again. Perhaps there was something more productive he could do, but he couldn't think of it, so he went back to sleep, hoping Garovel would be there when he woke up. And in fact, he was.

'Sleep well?'

Hector breathed deep. "Yeah... surprisingly. How'd, uh... how'd it go with Bohwanox?"

"49

'Fine,' was all Garovel said.

He tilted his head at the reaper.

Garovel waved a hand. 'We didn't quite see eye to eye, but we were cordial. Trust me, it could have been far less pleasant.'

"About what he said in the hospital... um..."

'You're thinking he had a point.'

“Didn’t he? If we hadn’t intervened, Colt might not have killed those other three policemen...”

Garovel was quiet for a time. ‘You’re right,’ he said. ‘In fact, I’m almost certain he wouldn’t have killed them.’

Hector reared back. “Certain?”

‘Colt wasn’t just in disguise. He was an actual policeman. The other officers knew him. That kind of infiltration takes time to establish. It’s not something you throw away unless you absolutely have to. Rofal must have really wanted her dead.’

“Well... he got what he wanted...”

‘Yes...’ Garovel frowned. ‘How are you holding up?’

“Oh... um, I, uh... I-I’m okay.”

‘Hector.’

He rubbed his cheek with a shaky hand. “I, uh... I’ve been trying not to think about it...”

‘Better to think about it here and now, instead of when you confront Colt again. Or Rofal.’

“W-when will that be?”

‘I’m not sure. We’re in the business of saving lives, not taking them.’

Hector looked at him heavily. “You would want me to kill them?”

‘It’s too soon to give my opinion,’ said Garovel. ‘I will need to observe their circumstances much more, first.’

“But...?”

‘But... what are your thoughts on the matter? Could you purposefully kill someone? It’s not what you signed up for.’

“You wouldn’t force me to do it?”

‘No.’

“I don’t know... I don’t want to kill anyone.”

‘Few do.’”

"50

“I guess if... if... killing Rofal would spare innocent people... and if there's no other way to stop him... then... maybe I could... but I'm not sure what it would take to convince me that... y'know... there really wasn't another way...”

‘Heh. Part of me thought you'd be ready to go rip their heads off the second you woke up.’

“I mean, I am angry... but...”

‘That's not you. I know. Would have been interesting to see, though.’

Hector nearly smiled at that.

‘Anyhow, I need to gather more information. And I think I know where to begin.’

“You do?”

‘The state of play is changed,’ said Garovel. ‘Four police officers murdered in a single day. Even Rofal can't keep that quiet. All of Brighton is in shock, right now. The police will be feeling the pressure to respond. I'm sure they'll have a few leads for me.’

“Hmm. You should be careful what leads you choose to follow. I think Rofal probably has another cop in his pocket. Maybe more than one.”

Garovel cocked an eyebrow at Hector. ‘Ah... huh. Yeah, you may be right. That might explain why Colt was so quick to blow his cover. He wasn't Rofal's only agent.’

“Exactly.”

‘Well spotted, Hector. I'll keep that in mind.’

He tried not to blush. “And, uh... there's something else.” He rubbed his hands together.

‘What are you doing? Hatching an evil plan?’

“No. Just... wait a second... There.” He showed his palms to Garovel.
“Can you tell me what this... uh... this crud on my hands is? It’s starting to bother me...”

Garovel leaned in. ‘Specks of something? Where’d they come from?’”
"51

“I don’t know. They just keep showing up... And my hands already ache like crazy. It’s not like the normal soreness.”

The reaper’s eye sockets widened. ‘Oh...’

“What? Is it something bad...?”

‘On the contrary, this is unexpectedly good news. I guess it was a stress trigger. Do you have any idea what the specks are?’

“That’s what I’ve been asking you!”

‘Oh, sorry. They could be pretty much anything.’

“You’re not being very helpful, right now...”

Garovel laughed. ‘You’re right. Let me start over. Hmm. Essentially, what’s happening is that your ability is manifesting itself.’

“Ability? What kind of ability is this? It’s just... powdery shit.”

‘That, my friend, is the beginning of a materialization ability. Creating something from nothing, that is.’

“Uh... whoa...”

‘Right now, though, you’re only able to produce trace amounts of it.’

“Trace amounts of what?”

‘Hard to say at this stage. Let me have another look.’

He held his hands up again.

‘Materialization is typically based around raw elements. This is something dark gray in its natural form. Maybe iron? I don’t think there’s a way we can be certain yet.’

He licked his hand. "Yeah, that's definitely metal..."

'Tch. Having a sense of taste is cheating.'

"I didn't realize we were competing."

'The reason blood tastes metallic is because of iron-containing hemoglobin in your red blood cells.'

"What does that have to do with anything...?"

'I just wanted to say something smart.'

"Okay, um... about this ability..."

'Hemoglobin is what allows blood cells to transport oxygen.'

"Garovel..."

'Oh, fine. What do you want to know?'

"How does this ability work? And, uh... what can I do with it?"

"52

'What you create is yours completely. You have dominion over its existence. For instance, if you create a fully iron sword, you could then destroy it utterly, leaving no trace. But if you came upon an iron sword which already existed, you wouldn't have that same power over it, because you didn't create it.'

"What's mine is mine completely... Hmm..."

'That's the principle of it, anyway. You shouldn't get too excited, though. Servant abilities grow extremely slowly. Even very simple objects will take practice to create.'

"How much practice?"

A beat passed as Garovel eyed him. 'Shitloads.'

"Aw, c'mon..."

'The thing about servants, though, is that they don't die, which gives them ample time to hone their abilities. Suffice to say, they can become very powerful. Frighteningly so.'

"Those other reapers you mentioned... the ones involved in wars..."

'Yeah. This is the main reason why their servants are so dangerous. And why we will keep our distance.'

"Right..."

Training was simple enough. It required concentration, Garovel told him. Focus, clear his mind, and begin by imagining simple metallic structures. He tried a sword, but Garovel said that was too complicated, so he imagined a cube. Garovel said that was also too complicated because of the straight edges and perfect symmetry. He relegated himself to an amorphous lump, in the end.

Garovel told him to maintain this state of meditation for as long as possible without letting his mind wander into anything else. He managed an hour and sixteen minutes. The reaper seemed impressed, though Hector thought he could do better.

Afterwards, the only discernible progress seemed to be that he could make the specks disappear and reappear. And seeing as he hadn't thought to try beforehand, he wasn't sure if that really qualified as progress."

"53

He wanted to try again, but there wouldn't be enough time before he had to leave for school. Instead, he stood and went for his bag. He pulled out the welding mask.

'I guess that's yours now, unless you've thought of a way to explain that bullet hole.'

He rolled the mask over in his hands. "This... isn't..."

'Hmm?'

"I need more than... just a mask... don't I?"

'What do you mean?'

"My brain is my weak point," he said. "I need something strong... something that will actually protect my head..."

'Ah! That would be fantastic. But what, exactly? And not to sound pessimistic, but I don't see how you could get your hands on anything that strong. Your metal might serve one day, but not anytime soon.'

"I have to rejoin the carpentry club."

Garovel's brow receded. 'You're just full of ideas today, aren't you? It's starting to annoy me.'

"I'm sorry... I'll be sure to act stupider from now on."

'Most of the elements in the periodic table are metals, you know.'

"That's very interesting, Garovel."

'You piece of shit,' he laughed. 'I have thousands of years of knowledge and experience.'

"I'm sure that'll come in handy one day."

'I hope you start shitting metal turds.'

"That... th-that's not really gonna happen, right...?"

'Beats me. I don't know anything useful.'

He readied himself for school. He was a bit dubious about bringing the mask with him, wondering what might happen if someone caught him with it, but he decided to take the risk. In the event of some emergency, he would be glad to have it.

To Hector's surprise, Garovel accompanied him."

"54

'I thought you had leads to chase down at the police station,' Hector said.

'What, are you trying to get rid of me?'

'Y-you know I'm not...'

‘Hmm. I guess I do.’ Garovel was quiet for a moment. ‘Honestly, I’m concerned about you. After what happened, I think you should rest a bit. We both should. Because if we go out there again, and things go badly again, I don’t want you to... well...’

‘Lose hope?’

‘Is that so ridiculous?’

Hector eyed the other students on the bus. They were rowdy this morning, hassling the driver and throwing paper. ‘I’m terrified of making things worse again...’

‘As am I.’

He met Garovel’s gaze. ‘So... what, then? We just... we just wait?’

‘Until we’re ready. Yeah. Rest is important, Hector, even for us. Take it when you can get it.’

‘But school just seems so... insignificant, I guess. Like... why am I even bothering...?’

‘I think you’re looking at this the wrong way.’

‘It wouldn’t surprise me...’

‘School is a respite.’

Hector eyed the reaper doubtfully.

‘Comparatively, that is. You’re probably going to see many terrible things, Hector. But your time in school is a chance to relieve yourself of that mindset. For a little while, at least.’

‘Hmm...’

‘Moreover, school could be of profound help to us in the future.’

‘Um... I find that hard to believe, Garovel...’

‘Well, perhaps not the methods. Your grades are unimportant. For our purposes, you don’t need a well-paying job, and going to college would actually be a major hindrance. You won’t likely have enough time for proper studying, let alone sitting through lectures.’

Hector laughed under his breath. ‘It’s a good thing my teachers can’t hear you.”

"55

‘Though, if I’m completely honest, I actually would like you to receive a higher education, albeit more slowly. Perhaps one or two classes at a time. A small enough workload that it won’t clash with our more important goals.’

‘I’m getting mixed messages here...’

‘We respond by making ourselves better,’ the reaper said. ‘School can be a major source of information, if you allow it to be.’

Hector bowed his head at that.

‘I don’t think I need to remind you how important information can be to us.’

‘No, you don’t...’

‘You’re right to be skeptical, I suppose,’ Garovel said. ‘Most of what you learn will probably never help us in the slightest. But there will undoubtedly be a small amount which WILL be useful. You can’t really know when or where you’ll acquire it, but for our undertakings, it’s entirely worth the effort. Wouldn’t you agree?’

He stared distantly at the seat in front of him. ‘Some tiny thing could be the difference... between saving someone and... not.’

‘I’ve made my point, then?’

‘Yeah...’

‘Good.’

Hector waded through the day like bog water. Everything seemed a painful bore, but he persevered. Listening to everything that was said in class still felt like a gigantic waste of time, but he hoped that feeling would go away if he ignored it long enough. He didn’t know how Garovel could float around him so patiently the whole time.

‘Alright,’ Garovel said between classes. ‘I’m going to help you make a new friend.’

Hector shut his locker. 'I don't like the sound of this...'

'Too bad. Four hours, we've been here. I've watched you walk past about five hundred different people and not say hello to a single one of them.'

'Is that all it takes to make a new friend? Saying hello?'

'It's a start. Real friendship takes time.'

Hector tried not to sigh. 'W-what do you want me to do?'"

"56

'Don't look so scared. We'll do something easy. Just find someone you know and say hi to them.'

'...Right now?'

'Right now.'

He grimaced and looked among the passing faces. He knew quite a lot of them, actually, but he wasn't jumping at the chance to tell that to Garovel.

'How about her?' said Garovel. He pointed to blond Jenny Friedman, with whom Hector had attended middle school.

'Fuck no!'

'Why not? What's wrong with her?'

'She's a girl!'

'What?! I had no idea! Eww! Keep her away from me, Hector! Don't let her touch me with her girl-cooties!'

He pursed his lips. 'I... just... agh... There's just no way... Talking to a girl is way more difficult...'

'Why?'

'Because! They--! They're--! I don't know! It just is!'

‘Fine. What about him, then?’ The reaper pointed to Micah Chamberlain. ‘I remember him from the other day. Seemed nice enough.’

Hector’s face soured as he strained for an excuse. Nothing sprung to mind, and he gave a defeated sigh. ‘Alright, I’ll... try...’

‘You’re not moving.’

‘I’m... just... waiting for the right moment...’

‘There isn’t one. Go on.’

‘B-but... uh... what do I say after hello?’

‘Don’t worry about it. I’ll help you.’

He made his way through the crowd to Micah’s locker. When the other young man turned and saw him standing there, Hector was so afraid of looking like a deer in the headlights that he just blurted the word out. “Hello.”

“Hi,” said Micah, friendly but a bit hesitant. “Uh... who are you?”

‘Fuck me, what do I say?’

‘Your name. Say your name.’

“H-Hector Goffe.”

“Oh! You’re the guy I accidentally hit during the food fight! I’m really sorry about that. I meant to find you afterwards and apologize properly, but I forgot. I hope you’re not too mad.”

Hector was the deer now."

"57

‘Tell him you’re not mad.’

“N-no... I’m not mad.”

“I didn’t ruin your shirt, did I?”

“I’ve, uh.. I’ve had worse...”

‘Pfft.’

“Well, uh, I’m Micah.”

“Yeah, I know. We... we, um... have a couple classes together.”

“Really? I never noticed. I guess that makes sense, though. You seem like the quiet type.”

‘Pfft!’

“Yeah... I have a little trouble... uh... speaking my mind...”

‘A little, he says!’

“You should come sit with me and my friends at lunch tomorrow. I’ll introduce you to everybody. Unless you’d rather not. It’s fine, either way. Hey, you alright? You look a bit red in the face.”

Hector averted his eyes.

“Whoa, are you blushing? I’ve never seen a black person blush before. That’s pretty awesome. Kinda hard to notice, at first. Holy crap, not anymore, though. You’re like a tomato, now.” Micah laughed. “Am I making it worse? Should I stop talking about it? I’ll stop talking about it.”

Hector just stood there awkwardly, fighting the urge to flee in abject horror.

“But, um, yeah. Come sit with us tomorrow. I promise not to throw things at you. Anyway, I gotta get going. Seeya later?”

He managed a nod. He leaned against the row of lockers after Micah was gone.

‘That went surprisingly well,’ said Garovel. ‘What do you think?’

‘He’s way too friendly,’ Hector thought, wide-eyed. ‘This can only end in disaster...’

‘Oh, just calm down, drama king. If you don’t like him, that’s fine. There are plenty of other people you can be friends with.’

‘No, that’s not it at all... I mean... I’ve, um... uh...’

‘C’mon. Spit it out. You can do it.’

‘Please... stop... patronizing me... I’m trying my best here...’”

"58

‘Sorry. I know you are. What were you trying to say?’

‘I’ve always wanted a friend who was... uh... well, friendly. I mean, like, y’know... the opposite of me... Not that, uh, I didn’t want any other type of friend, but just. Really outgoing people... they always intimidate me, but...’

‘I see. So you’re thinking it’s too good to be true.’

‘Basically, yeah...’

Garovel shrugged. ‘Maybe it is. Maybe he’s secretly a total dick.’

‘What the...? This was your idea!’

‘Yeah, and it’s worth seeing through. But you still shouldn’t get your hopes up too much. Better to be pleasantly surprised than bitterly disappointed.’

Hector had to nod at that as he started for his next class.

At the day’s end, it was time to pay a visit to the carpentry club once again. Strangely, he hadn’t been dreading it. He knew it would be terrible, but something about the necessity of it, the unavoidability, made it easy to just accept.

He entered the workroom to the sight of a dozen familiar faces and a handful of new ones. He heard the chatter dull as a few people noticed him. Lance Alexander approached him straight away.

“Please tell me you came to return the mask.”

“Sorry,” Hector said. “I lost it.”

“Geez. Well, could you at least tell that to Ms. Trent? She didn’t believe me when I told her you took it. She gave me detention.”

Hector nodded. “I’ll tell her.”

Lance eyed him. "I'm sure you won't mind if I go with you."

"Just... show me where she is."

Lance led him into the back room where the club instructor sat at her desk, marking quiz papers. She looked up as they entered. "Hector?" she said. "What brings you here?"

"59

"It's like I told you," said Lance. "He's the one who took the mask. Then he went and lost it."

"Is this true?"

He gave another nod. "Yeah."

Ms. Trent glared at Lance. "Did you bully Hector into saying this?"

"Of course not!"

"You'd better tell me the truth now. If I find out later, I swear to goddess I will have you suspended."

"I didn't bully anyone!"

"He's telling the truth," said Hector. "He, uh... he tried to stop me, actually." "Why does everyone think I'm being bullied?"

'You do look very bulliable.'

"Alright," said Ms. Trent. "Lance, you're off the hook. Hector, you have three days' detention, and you'll have to pay a fine to replace the mask."

Lance took a relieved breath and left.

"Uhh... but I don't have any money..."

"Then your parents will have to pay."

Hector frowned. "W-what if they don't?"

"They'll pay if they want you to graduate. The school will withhold your diploma if you have any outstanding fines."

He didn't think that would make a difference, but he kept his doubts to himself. He could worry about it later. "I, um... I also came here for another reason."

"What would that be?"

"I'd like to rejoin the club."

"Oh, is that so? Well, all you have to do is start showing up again. I'm still not sure why you stopped."

"Ah... just... personal reasons..."

Ms. Trent wasn't the type to pry. Or perhaps she just didn't care very much. Hector had never quite figured her out. But whatever the reason, she didn't push the issue and let him return to the workroom with the others."

"60

Four or five students sat around each of the black tables, absorbed in various group projects, with a few extra people hovering around the machinery at the back of the room.

He approached the nearest group, but as soon as he got close, three people left. Only Lance and a guy he didn't recognize stayed, but after a moment of apparent confusion, the stranger followed the others.

"Popular as ever," said Lance.

"You're... not going with them?" said Hector.

Lance looked at him for a long moment. "You could've really screwed me over, you know."

Hector didn't say anything.

"Let me know if you need help with something," said Lance, and then he left as well.

With the whole table to himself, Hector glanced around again. Only the new members spared him the occasional look, and he could see a couple of them asking the others about him.

‘What’s with this atmosphere?’ Garovel said. ‘It’s annoying.’

‘It doesn’t matter...’

‘Want me to suck their souls out through their eyeballs?’

‘You can’t do that.’

‘No. I could try, though.’

He smirked faintly.

‘I’ll get you to tell me what happened sooner or later.’ At Hector’s persistent silence, he changed the subject. ‘Anyhow, are you sure you can make something for your head here?’

‘It won’t be anything amazing, but yeah... I just need some materials.’ He paused, blinking. ‘Shit. I completely forgot...’

‘Hmm?’

He looked toward the corner storage room, around which was a caged enclosure with a hatch and a countertop. ‘I’m an idiot. The materials aren’t free... If I want some metal, I’ll have to pay for it... or steal it, I guess... but I really don’t want to do that again...’

‘Aha. That time already, huh? I was wondering when we’d need to find some startup capital.’”

"61 -- VII.

Chapter Seven: ‘O, truculent fortune...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘How many guys are there?’

‘I counted forty-three. No, wait. I see another one.’

Hector furrowed his brow at the evening sky. ‘Uh... holy shit... I mean, are you sure I can take forty dudes?’

‘Of course you can. Probably. Oh, hey, it’s that ponytail guy.’

‘Ponytail guy?’

‘You remember. You knocked his teeth out. I’m surprised he’s out of jail already. It’s barely been two days since he was arrested.’

‘Perks of being on Rofal’s payroll, I guess...’

‘Even so, two days is a bit ridiculous. The police force must be more corrupt than we thought. Maybe lawyers, as well.’

Hector eyed the building another time. It didn’t look like a drug den. It looked like a bowling alley. And it probably was, most of the time. The men loitering around the entrance were an indicator, however. They shooed away potential customers, despite the neon sign illuminating the street.

‘Ah,’ Garovel said, ‘looks like Ponytail is here to move the money. Smart. This is probably why the police can’t seem to find any of these cash houses. As soon as they start getting close, I bet someone in the department warns Rofal’s people. Must be why there are so many of them here right now. They seem to be in a hurry. You should probably come introduce yourself now.’

‘Will do.’ He put his mask on and started down the street. The men at the front all stared at him as he passed, and when he circled around toward the back entrance, a few of them broke away to follow him. Several more were already waiting behind the building, alongside a parked truck with its engine running. A circle of Rofal’s muscle grew around him."

"61 -- VII.

Chapter Seven: ‘O, truculent fortune...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘How many guys are there?’

‘I counted forty-three. No, wait. I see another one.’

Hector furrowed his brow at the evening sky. ‘Uh... holy shit... I mean, are you sure I can take forty dudes?’

‘Of course you can. Probably. Oh, hey, it’s that ponytail guy.’

‘Ponytail guy?’

‘You remember. You knocked his teeth out. I’m surprised he’s out of jail already. It’s barely been two days since he was arrested.’

‘Perks of being on Rofal’s payroll, I guess...’

‘Even so, two days is a bit ridiculous. The police force must be more corrupt than we thought. Maybe lawyers, as well.’

Hector eyed the building another time. It didn’t look like a drug den. It looked like a bowling alley. And it probably was, most of the time. The men loitering around the entrance were an indicator, however. They shooed away potential customers, despite the neon sign illuminating the street.

‘Ah,’ Garovel said, ‘looks like Ponytail is here to move the money. Smart. This is probably why the police can’t seem to find any of these cash houses. As soon as they start getting close, I bet someone in the department warns Rofal’s people. Must be why there are so many of them here right now. They seem to be in a hurry. You should probably come introduce yourself now.’

‘Will do.’ He put his mask on and started down the street. The men at the front all stared at him as he passed, and when he circled around toward the back entrance, a few of them broke away to follow him. Several more were already waiting behind the building, alongside a parked truck with its engine running. A circle of Rofal’s muscle grew around him."

"62

‘I, uh... I went around back,’ he told Garovel.

“What are you doing here?”

“What’s with the mask? Looking for a beating?”

“Hey, didn’t Swank mention a masked guy?”

“Is that you, asshole? Huh? Say something!”

Garovel appeared from the wall and reached for him. ‘I’m not sure I approve of all these new friends you've made, Hector.'

The strength blazed through him. He took a deep breath and moved for the door. The first man to stand in his way ate pavement. The others all took a step back at how quickly their comrade had been left bleeding on the ground, but after a moment, they seemed to find their courage again.

Three rushed him at once. He pummeled two into each other and took a metal baseball bat to the back of the head. When he turned around, shaking the disorientation away, the guy who hit him staggered back. Hector ripped the bat away and returned the favor, lobbing the man into four of his buddies.

They started pulling knives, and in the ensuing mayhem, he received six stab wounds, all in the gut, chest, and back. When there were only a few left, he was a bit surprised to see that instead of pulling guns on him, they just ran. Looking down at the blades stuck in his torso, he supposed he could understand their sentiment. He decided to leave the knives in a while longer.

Groaning or unconscious thugs riddled the alleyway, draped over the staircase, the side of the parked truck, and for one lucky winner, a 10-foot brick wall. Hector held onto the baseball bat as he went inside the building.

The first person he saw seemed more confused than aggressive, and Hector was kind enough to wait until the man attacked before punching him into next week."

"63

'The money is in the rearmost room,' Garovel told him. 'Hold on a minute.' The reaper phased through the wall while Hector waited in the dimly lit hallway. 'Six men. Oh, Ponytail is talking about Colt. Rumors, he's saying... about Colt being a psychopath... but at the same time... forced to work for Rofal?'

'Wait, what...?'

'I'm listening... Bah. They're talking about food now. They want to go get pizza. At gunpoint? What the hell is wrong with these people? Please come stomp their heads in.'

He flung the door open and kicked the first man he saw across the room.

“What the fuck?!”

“Oh, shit! You!”

Hector leapt on his second victim and knocked him out cold. Now the guns were out, but the hail of bullets didn't stop him from reaching the third and fourth men and clapping their skulls together. Only Ponytail and another thug remained, fumbling too much to reload their weapons, their spare magazines clattering to the floor.

Hector stood in front of them for a moment, considering what to do next. Bashing their faces in hardly seemed necessary at this point, and besides, Ponytail's face was still swollen blue and purple.

He walked up and pulled their guns away from them. They both just stared at him, wide-eyed and cornered.

“What the hell are you?” said Ponytail. “I heard Colt killed you.”

Hector eyed the table full of duffel bags in the middle of the room. He slung all seven bags over his shoulder with one hand.

‘You’re not going to stomp their heads in, too?’ The reaper sounded disappointed. ‘Well, at least threaten them before you leave.’”

"64

“I-I... uh... d-don't...”

‘Hector, c'mon. Scare them. Just yell or something.’

‘Yell? I can't... I don't... that just isn't--agh...’

Ponytail ran for the door.

Hector was on him in a heartbeat and kned him back into the corner.
“Please don’t run...”

‘Wait a minute,’ said Garovel. ‘Okay, no yelling. Just talk to them very quietly. Whisper, if you need to.’

‘Really? B-but, uh...’

‘Trust me. Speak very slowly and deliberately. Make them strain to hear you. Oh, and be polite, too. Say please, like just now.’

‘Uh...’ “Please tell your boss... that I’m coming for him...”

‘Oh, that was good! Tell them that anyone else who gets in your way will be visiting the morgue.’

‘But I don’t want to kill them...’

‘Of course, but THEY don’t need to know that.’

‘Ah, okay...’ “And anyone who gets in my way... will be paying a visit to the morgue...”

Both of their faces went white.

‘Aha, look at them! This is way better than yelling.’

‘You’re starting to creep me out, Garovel...’

‘Me? You just about made them piss themselves with creepiness.’

He left the room, barely squeezing all the bags through the door. He knew there were still more men in the building, but he didn’t see them before hearing the gunshot. The bullet tore through his jaw and ripped the mask from his face. His severed chin and tongue splattered to the floor in a gory mess."

"65

Blood and drool oozed from the gaping hole in his face. Hector just turned and locked eyes with the shooter. It was a young guy, not much older than himself, holding a magnum unsteadily with both hands, but when he saw Hector, he dropped his gun and stumbled back.

More men rushed in from the entrance, but when they saw Hector, they all stopped.

“Holy fuck...”

“What is that thing?”

Hector’s undead glare seemed enough to prevent any of them from taking another step. He waited a bit to see if they still wanted to fight, but when they merely kept staring, Hector picked up his dented mask and left.

As Garovel reconstructed Hector’s jawbone, he stood at the other end of the street, waiting again to see if any of them would pursue. None did.

‘I’m going to follow Ponytail back to Rofal. Once we know where his headquarters is, we’ll be able to launch an assault at our leisure. You know your way home, right?’

His mouth completely reformed, he said, “Yeah.”

The reaper looked at him a moment, bony fingers hovering in front of Hector’s face. ‘I’m going to bring the soreness back to let your body recover while I’m away. Are you ready?’

Hector groaned. “Go ahead...”

Pain exploded through his mouth.

“Ffff--! Kuh! It feels like my face’s been ripped off!”

‘Well. It was. Actually.’

He dropped to one knee, clutching his mouth with his free hand. “Fucking...! Agh...!”

‘On the bright side, I’m sure the rest of your body feels completely painless by comparison.’

He stood and started walking again, trying to stifle his continued groans. “Fuck this hurts...!”

‘Alright, potty mouth.’

“Fuck you! Agh! This is the worst one yet!”

Garovel laughed. ‘Only joking. You should be swearing. It’ll help you cope with the pain.’

“Fuckface!”

‘Okay. You don’t have to be insulting about it.’

“Just... ugh...”

"66

Garovel floated off to go find Ponytail, and Hector was left to grumble his way through the night by himself. It wasn’t long before he heard Garovel laughing again, however. ‘It’s fair to say we’ve stirred things up here. You left your chin behind, and it’s freaking them out.’

‘Oh... should I have... uh...’ The pain made it difficult to even think straight. ‘Should I have taken that with me?’

‘Nah.’

‘They won’t, er... try to... study it and reverse engineer my power or something?’

‘What.’

‘I mean... uh... like... I dunno...’

‘You’re afraid they’ll unlock the secret of immortality by studying your chin?’

‘Is that... stupid?’

‘Um. It’s just impossible. Your flesh is just flesh. I’m what makes you unkillable. They could study your body all they like, and they wouldn’t learn anything.’

‘Okay... good.’

‘You have a strange imagination by the way.’

‘I’m just... trying to be diligent...’

‘Right.’

‘Uh... so... how much money do you think we got, anyway?’

‘They’re talking about that now, actually. Well. Yelling about it. Ooh, seventy grand, Ponytail says.’

Hector’s eyes widened.

‘Looks like Rofal consolidated several weeks worth of cash here from all over the city. I wonder if he was planning a big purchase.’

‘Seventy thousand troas... what do I even do with this kind of money...?’

‘That’s our funding for critical purposes. No spending it on booze and hookers.’

Hector snorted. ‘What about drugs? Meth and heroin are okay, right?’

‘Oh yeah. Let’s just give it all back to Rofal while we’re at it.’

‘Are you, um... er... are you sure we can even spend this money? Isn’t it, like... being tracked by the government or something?’

"67 -- VIII.

‘No. We didn’t rob a bank. We just won’t be able to make large purchases at licensed vendors without drawing attention.’

‘R-right...’

‘We could have stolen from Rofal’s gun running business,’ said Garovel, ‘or his car theft ring, but money doesn’t change hands nearly as often in those. And stealing from the prostitution business would have probably done more harm to the prostitutes than to Rofal.’

‘But what if, uh... Rofal tracks the money himself?’

‘Hmm. Fair point. You should stop and check for devices.’

‘Alright.’ He found an alley and put the bags down to search them all. Stacks of troas filled each, more money than Hector had ever seen in his life. A single-troa note was a blue-and-white paper bill with the bearded face of King Martinus I at the center. His great granddaughter currently wore the crown. 'I'm not seeing anything that looks like a tracking device...'

'Good. Store the money somewhere away from your house, just to be safe.'

'Okay.'

'Ponytail is finally leaving. I'm in pursuit.'

Chapter Eight: 'Where an Aberration doth grow...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Beneath the city, below the pipes and sewers and miles of cable, lay the mansion. Old wood and cold stone sat stark against the lamplight along the path to the entrance. Its turreted roof bore a pillar at the center which led up into Brighton, but the elevator therein was reserved for the Rofal family. Jeremiah Colt had to use an entrance hidden beneath a liquor store, a staircase into a lift the size of a broom closet.

The guards at the entrance stood upon his arrival and searched him, relieving him of his firearm and three knives."

"67 -- VIII.

'No. We didn't rob a bank. We just won't be able to make large purchases at licensed vendors without drawing attention.'

'R-right...'

'We could have stolen from Rofal's gun running business,' said Garovel, 'or his car theft ring, but money doesn't change hands nearly as often in those. And stealing from the prostitution business would have probably done more harm to the prostitutes than to Rofal.'

'But what if, uh... Rofal tracks the money himself?'

'Hmm. Fair point. You should stop and check for devices.'

'Alright.' He found an alley and put the bags down to search them all. Stacks of troas filled each, more money than Hector had ever seen in his life. A single-troa note was a blue-and-white paper bill with the bearded face of King Martinus I at the center. His great granddaughter currently wore the crown. 'I'm not seeing anything that looks like a tracking device...'

'Good. Store the money somewhere away from your house, just to be safe.'

'Okay.'

'Ponytail is finally leaving. I'm in pursuit.'

Chapter Eight: 'Where an Aberration doth grow...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Beneath the city, below the pipes and sewers and miles of cable, lay the mansion. Old wood and cold stone sat stark against the lamplight along the path to the entrance. Its turreted roof bore a pillar at the center which led up into Brighton, but the elevator therein was reserved for the Rofal family. Jeremiah Colt had to use an entrance hidden beneath a liquor store, a staircase into a lift the size of a broom closet.

The guards at the entrance stood upon his arrival and searched him, relieving him of his firearm and three knives."

"68

Colt didn't much care for the way Rofal's men looked at him as he passed them in the hall. Whenever he caught one staring, he would meet their gaze evenly until they averted their eyes. Geoffrey was a different story, however.

"Mr. Colt! I was hoping to see you!" Geoffrey was a strange creature. Not yet a grown man, but he often wore tailored black suits and ties with even blacker undershirts. His dark hair was always sharply cut and combed, and his pointed eyebrows made him look perpetually and indignantly attentive.

Colt wondered if ignoring him would make him go away.

"I heard you killed five people the other day," said Geoffrey. "How was it? Did they scream a lot?"

He figured not. "No. They didn't even know what happened."

"Ah. I see. Efficiency. That's less fun, but I can appreciate the preference."

Colt squinted at him as they walked. "What do you want, kid?"

Geoffrey's brow receded a little. "Only to get to know you better, Mr. Colt. I like you. We're kindred spirits, I feel. You're not like the dullards my uncle usually has working for him."

"The dullards I used to make a habit of killing, you mean."

Geoffrey's smile was full of teeth. "My uncle says you're a true savage."

"You should hear what he says about you."

"Oh? Do tell."

"That you're an irreverent pain in the ass with no mind for the consequences of your actions."

Geoffrey laughed. "He worries too much. Still doesn't trust me to handle my own affairs. Well, he's only human, I suppose."

It was then that Colt noticed Geoffrey was carrying something.

A severed human hand."

"69

Colt at once remembered why he loathed this person. "Whose hand is that?"

"Oh, do you want it? I was thinking about giving it to you, actually. I have the other one, as well."

It was a small hand, thin fingers with long nails and pallid skin, preserved, likely taken from a corpse. "Who does it belong to?" he said, even less patient now.

"The girl you killed. Melissa Mallory."

Colt ground his teeth and glowered. "Why do you have it?"

Geoffrey tilted his head, confused. "Because I wanted it, obviously. It makes a nice souvenir, don't you think?"

"How did you even get it? You're not allowed out of the building."

"That would be telling."

"A year ago, I would have killed you where you stood for this."

Geoffrey smiled, and his eyes widened manically. Eagerly. "Perhaps we are not as similar as I thought, Mr. Colt. But then, I can't say I am disappointed. This may be even better."

"And people think I'm psychotic."

"You should be glad," said Geoffrey. "I wouldn't let you talk to me that way if I did not like you, Mr. Colt."

"I'm not afraid of your uncle, idiot."

"Oh, I know. Honestly, that is the most annoying thing about being his nephew. Everyone thinks they should be afraid of him. It tries my patience, sometimes. People are afraid of you, though, aren't they? How do you manage that, exactly?"

"Get the fuck away from me before I break both your legs and throw you in your uncle's pool."

"Intimidation. Charming. I'll keep that in mind." Surprisingly, he actually left Colt alone. The other people in the hallway were quick to get out of Geoffrey's way."

"70

Joseph Rofal's chamber was just ahead, two guards at the door, Molester-stache and Baldie, as Colt remembered them. He entered after they patted him down.

Rofal and Swank were having a heated conversation. Rofal ripped the glass lamp off his desk and threw it against the wall. "That money was for a seat at the table!" He saw Colt approaching. "You! This is your fault! You said you killed that asshole!"

Colt raised an eyebrow and looked at the swollen-faced Swank. "What asshole?"

"A guy in a mask showed up and stole seventy grand earlier tonight. Same guy I saw before."

"How do you know it was the same guy?" Colt asked.

"Well, I guess I don't, but he was definitely wearing the same welding mask. I saw the bullet hole that I put in it."

"Bullet hole." Colt thought back. "Yeah, I remember that, too. Bottom of the mask?"

"Yeah."

"Couldn't be the same guy, though. I definitely killed him."

"I don't know," said Swank, rubbing his purple cheek. "That guy ain't human. We must have shot him at least five times, stabbed him like six. He had knives sticking out of his fucking chest, man! Didn't even slow him down. I have twenty men out of commission. Broken arms, legs, ribs. Fucker gave Rogers a concussion the other day."

Rofal glared at him. "This is your responsibility, Colt."

"What the fuck do you want me to do?" said Colt. "Do you even know where he is?"

Swank shook his head and looked at their boss. "He said he was coming for you. And no disrespect to Colt, but I'm not sure he'd stand much of a chance, anyhow. The guy took down, what, an eighth of all our muscle? In the span of a few days?"

"71

Rofal sat down. "Leave us," he told Swank, who promptly exited. He took a deep breath and ran a hand through his red and gray hair. The weathered lines of his face made his expression all the more foul.

"You sure Swank wasn't followed?"

"He said he wasn't, but who knows. Do you remember anything about this person? You said he was young.”

“Looked like a teenager. Seemed really intimidated by me. Before he started beating the shit out of everyone, anyway. But it can’t be the same guy. He must have had a partner.”

“Then what’s their objective?”

Colt shrugged. He couldn’t help grinning. “Can you think of any reason why someone would want to hurt you?”

Rofal did not look amused. “You are obviously not the person to discuss this with. Tell me how your assignment went.”

“I contacted some of my old colleagues in the department. Told them I was innocent, like you said. I’m pretty sure none of them believed me.”

“I didn’t expect them to. But now they will be conflicted. And perhaps more malleable.”

Colt furrowed his brow. “You mean to coerce them.”

“Empires are not built on alliances. They are built on conquests.”

Colt just looked disgusted.

“Three of your fellow officers and two teenagers,” Rofal reminded him. “And you felt nothing when you killed them, no? I’m sure a bit of surreption won’t pose too much of a moral dilemma for you.”

He stared back coldly. “I expect I’ll feel something when I kill you.”

“Careful, Colt. Do not jeopardize the understanding we have.”

“I apologize,” he said through his teeth.

“I’m aware of your current hatred for me,” Rofal said. “But in time, I believe you will see the situation as I do.””

"72

“Fat chance,” said Colt.

“Is it really so ridiculous? With you, I finally have someone reliable who can never betray me. With me, you finally have an employer who appreciates your finer talents. An employer who will not hesitate to show his generosity.”

“You have a strange idea of generosity.”

“I like guarantees, Colt. A man in my position shouldn’t trust anyone when he has the opportunity not to. I’m sure you can understand that. But when I have my guarantee--” He placed a briefcase on the desk. It was full of cash. “--I am free to show my gratitude.”

Colt eyed the money. By the size of the bills, there must have been at least five thousand troas. “Money isn’t enough,” he said.

“Of course. I believe you have earned another two hours.”

Colt took the briefcase. “Where are they?”

“Today, they’re here.” Rofal motioned toward the broad double doors behind him, ornately wooden with brass lamps on either side.

“Tomorrow, they’ll be somewhere else.”

Colt proceeded through into what could only be Rofal’s bedchamber. Four guards looked up as he entered, and then put away their cards, book, and newspaper in order to watch him in silence. He approached the crib in the middle of the room.

Two babies lay sleeping, twins boy and girl. Colt took a relieved breath. He could not smile at them. Not here. He touched his son’s forehead and then his daughter’s.

Two hours, he had. It wasn’t enough. He wanted to spend it as efficiently as possible, but he didn’t know how to do that. So before it drove him mad, he decided to just sit down and watch them sleep.

Garovel merely continued observing.”

"73 -- IX.

Chapter Nine: ‘Forbearant soul, gird thyself for war...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

With all his new monetary concerns, Hector had nearly forgotten about the invitation to have lunch with Micah and his friends. On the one hand, he was glad that he didn't end up a nervous wreck through his first few classes, and on the other hand, when he did remember, the sudden fear that came over him was akin to petrification.

Micah, Nathan, Janine, Sheryl, and Gregory were all their names; they were quick to introduce themselves. Hector had been less so, but struggled through it nonetheless. His face still throbbed something terrible, but after everything he had been through in the past few days, hiding the pain in front of everyone was easy enough.

"So what do you do for fun, Hector?" Micah seemed to be the resident icebreaker.

"Uh... f-fun...?" The question had him dead to rights.

"Yeah. You know. What do you like to do in your spare time?"

'Garovel, save me...' He could hear the reaper laughing.

'You don't want to tell them you beat up murderers and drug dealers?'

'Garovel!'

'Just pose the question back at them and listen to their answers. Then go from there.'

"Um... what do you guys do for fun?"

"Oh," said Micah, looking at the others, "well, as a group, we like to go to movies and stuff together, but they're expensive, so we can't always go."

"Yeah, but parks are free. Nathan, Sheryl, and Gregory all have dogs that they like to take."

"You remember that time when Duro started humping that one lady having a picnic?"

"Duro--that's Gregory's dog--he's massive. That lady was freaking out like you wouldn't believe. I thought she--"

'Holy shit, Garovel, you're a genius...'

'You're welcome.'

Micah looked at him. "But you never answered the question, Hector."

‘Fuck!’
"73 -- IX.

Chapter Nine: ‘Forbearant soul, gird thyself for war...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

With all his new monetary concerns, Hector had nearly forgotten about the invitation to have lunch with Micah and his friends. On the one hand, he was glad that he didn’t end up a nervous wreck through his first few classes, and on the other hand, when he did remember, the sudden fear that came over him was akin to petrification.

Micah, Nathan, Janine, Sheryl, and Gregory were all their names; they were quick to introduce themselves. Hector had been less so, but struggled through it nonetheless. His face still throbbed something terrible, but after everything he had been through in the past few days, hiding the pain in front of everyone was easy enough.

“So what do you do for fun, Hector?” Micah seemed to be the resident icebreaker.

“Uh... f-fun...?” The question had him dead to rights.

“Yeah. You know. What do you like to do in your spare time?”

‘Garovel, save me...’ He could hear the reaper laughing.

‘You don’t want to tell them you beat up murderers and drug dealers?’

‘Garovel!’

‘Just pose the question back at them and listen to their answers. Then go from there.’

“Um... what do you guys do for fun?”

“Oh,” said Micah, looking at the others, “well, as a group, we like to go to movies and stuff together, but they’re expensive, so we can’t always go.”

“Yeah, but parks are free. Nathan, Sheryl, and Gregory all have dogs that they like to take.”

“You remember that time when Duro started humping that one lady having a picnic?”

“Duro--that’s Gregory’s dog--he’s massive. That lady was freaking out like you wouldn’t believe. I thought she--”

‘Holy shit, Garovel, you’re a genius...’

‘You’re welcome.’

Micah looked at him. “But you never answered the question, Hector.”

‘Fuck!’”

"74

‘C’mon. Just make something up.’

“I... uh... I like to, uh... ah...” He could feel himself turning red.

‘Tell them you’re into metalwork. That’s kinda true.’

“I like to work with... metal...”

“Metal?” said Sheryl.

“Yeah, like... welding... and stuff...”

“That’s cool,” said Gregory. “What kind of stuff do you make?”

“Ah... I, uh...”

Sheryl giggled. “Micah, where did you find this guy? He’s so shy--it’s adorable! Makes me want to just wrap him up in a blanket and take him home with me!” She took his arm in both of hers.

Hector jolted away from her and out of his seat. His chair toppled over, and everyone at the table stared at him. “Ah--” He flushed even redder than before. “S-sorry... I just--ah. Y-you’re all s-so nice... w-we should definitely do this again, but, uh... I-I just remembered that I... uh... I gotta go.” He fled.

In the hall, navigating through the crowd, he looked back to see if any of them were following, but he only saw Garovel.

'What the hell was that?' the reaper said.

'I... I-I don't know, she just... she surprised me... and I... ugh... I really fucked that up, didn't I?'

'No, I'm sure it's fine. Just a bit unexpected. Do you also have a phobia of women?'

'N-no, I think it's just... people in general. Maybe, um... maybe girls slightly more than guys, but, um...'

Garovel sighed.

'I mean... it was th-the physical contact...'

Garovel sighed harder.

'If I'd known! That she! Was gonna--! I wouldn't have--! Agh!'

'Okay, I get it. You have trouble with friendly people. Relax.'"
"75

He rested against his locker and took a long breath.

'That's it. You're safe now. The big bad girl can't get you anymore.'

'You... you fuck...' He gave a weak laugh. 'Why am I like this, Garovel...? Why is nothing ever easy...?'

'I don't know, Hector. But I can't say I dislike this part of you.'

'R-really? I thought it annoyed you...'

'No, no. If anything, I get annoyed FOR you. Not AT you.'

'Huh...'

'It's important you understand that. I can't really be annoyed at you when I see you trying so hard all the time.'

He nodded. 'Thanks... I guess I sorta knew that a little... but I, uh... yeah...'

‘Now you know it a lot.’

Later in the day, he paid off his equipment fine. He’d stuffed a thousand or so troa in his bag before coming to school, which was obviously more than he needed, but he wanted to be prepared. It did feel a bit odd carrying so much money around school with him. He wasn’t sure how he would explain the money if someone searched his bag, so he kept the strap around his arm or wrist at all times.

He bought a few sheets of metal from the carpentry club’s storeroom and settled at a table all to himself.

‘You’re going to make a helmet out of that? It looks pretty flimsy.

‘Thicker metal would need to be melted down and recast. Which... would be great, but... we don’t have a furnace. I need to weld multiple layers of this metal together if I want something resilient.’

‘Sounds tedious.’”

"76

‘Thinner metal is easier to cut, and I should be able to shape it with just my hands and a hammer. But I need to make sure the measurements are perfect with each layer or the welding won’t be very strong.’

‘You seem to know what you’re doing.’

‘I have some experience, and... I, uh... I did some reading last night. But, um... even though I know what to do, I’m not sure how well it’ll turn out, honestly... If I screw up too badly with the hammer, it might not even fit around my head...’

‘So you need to concentrate, is what you’re saying.’

‘Uh... yeah...’

He began drafting. He measured the circumference of his head in five different places, then the distance from the far corner of one eye to the other. He reckoned that a single slit for both eyes together would save cutting time and hopefully provide better visibility. Ear holes wouldn’t be necessary, he decided, nor would holes for the mouth and nose, but there was one major problem: the jaw.

Shielding the area under his jaw was absolutely vital. His all-too-brief fight with Colt assured him of that point.

He decided to just cut off the bottom half of the face completely and then screw it back on so that it could swing freely over the top half. It would look like some kind of gigantic underbite, but it would protect below his chin while still allowing him to fit his head into the thing.

Lance ventured over after a while. "What're you making?" he asked.

"...A, uh... a helmet. Or helm, I guess."

"Oh, that's awesome," said Lance, eyeing the sketches. "It's too bad you're not allowed to make a sword to go with it. That'd be amazing."
"77

"I don't think I'd be able to forge a very good sword, anyway," said Hector. "It's really difficult. I mean, people used to do that as their entire profession."

"Yeah. Swordsmiths were pretty rare, though. You'd have to be friggin' legendary to make a living off of swords alone."

"Yeah..."

"It would be amazing, though."

"Yeah."

"Maybe I could make something else to go with your helm. Like a shield. Oh, or some gauntlets."

Hector raised his brow at him. "You can make gauntlets? That sounds so difficult. I mean... the links around the fingers would be brutal..."

"I bet I could do it," said Lance. "Maybe."

"W-well, that sounds awesome. I'll, uh... I'll help you if I can."

"Cool." And Lance went off to work, leaving Hector slightly dumbfounded at what just happened.

He had to get permission from Ms. Trent to use a table saw, and she had to supervise while he worked. There was only one saw with a carbide-tipped blade, but it didn't get used much since most of the students worked with wood.

And as he eyed the blade, he realized he could save himself more time if he forewent the eyehole as its own cut and just merged it with the cut for the jaw pieces. He quickly remarked the metal and set about cutting. The carbide made short work of it, and soon enough, instead of three sheets of metal, he had six separate pieces.

A brief trip to the miller gave him the holes needed for the jaw. Next he had to mold the three head pieces into similar enough shapes that they could be securely welded together; and then do the same for the jaw pieces. He started hammering."

"78

This would be the most time-consuming stage by far, Hector knew. Welding would also take a while, assuming he managed to accomplish this part properly, but there was a tremendous amount of measuring and remeasuring and hammering and rehammering needed in order to achieve the desired shapes.

'It's time we discuss what to do about Colt, don't you think?'

Hector didn't stop hammering. 'I want to help him.'

Garovel paused. 'Are you sure about that? He killed four innocent people, you know.'

'Yeah... I know... and I'm not sure I can forgive that, but... you said he has children...'

'I did, yes. But being a father doesn't absolve him of his crimes.'

He stopped to remeasure. The forehead was still too broad. 'He's trying to protect them,' Hector thought, 'and even if... even if he doesn't deserve our help... his children still do... I mean, don't they?'

The reaper stared at him a moment. 'You continue to surprise me, Hector.'

He felt the blush coming on and stopped his hammer before he screwed up the next hit.

‘Hmm. A rescue mission, then.’

‘Yeah...’

‘And once the kids are safe from the Rofals, we can turn Colt over to the police, too.’

‘Ah... somehow, I don't think he'll agree to that, even if we save his kids for him.’

‘Well, we don't have to tell him that part of our plan. Point is, he's already got an inside track on the enemy. If we team up with him, we could bring down the whole organization in one fell swoop.’

‘You really think he'll accept our help?’

‘I don't know. His circumstances are uniquely precarious. It's hard to say how he'll respond to anything at this point. But I don't think offering him our aid will pose any risk to us. I'll be observing him without him realizing it, so if he ever tries to betray you, you'll have plenty of warning.’

‘He probably still thinks I'm dead, though, doesn't he?’

‘Yeah, probably.’

‘So he'll be freaked out to see me again.’

‘Yeah. And he may require some convincing that it's really you.’

‘You think it's worth revealing that I can come back from the dead? Just to convince him to work together?’

‘If it helps us bring down the entire Rofal operation before anyone else gets killed, then yeah, I'd say it's worth it. Sure, we could take a more attritional approach, but the victims are just going to keep piling up in the meantime. Hell, the Rofals might start trying to use hostages against us, if we take too long. Giving them time to strategize is not a good idea, I think.’

‘Hmm, okay...’

‘I'll go keep tabs on Colt while you work. Tell me when you're done.’

‘Right. But, uh... I'm gonna be here a while...’

'If you have to leave before it's done, then so be it. But keep at it until I tell you otherwise.' Garovel left, and Hector returned to his work.

He knew he would need to stay extremely late if he wanted to finish the helm. Thankfully, this was a common occurrence in the club. Members would routinely hang around several hours after other clubs wrapped up, and oddly, Ms. Trent never seemed to mind very much. As long as there were at least a couple of students still around, she would just stay in her office and read a book or some such thing, employing ear plugs for any machining noise.

It was convenient, yes, but Hector knew there were other reasons why some of his peers did not want to go home.

At length, he felt the shapes were as good as he could get them. He lathered an adhesive between the layers of the metal and positioned them into place. He checked out a welding torch, apron, gloves, and mask, and then started melting the edges together. He added lines down the center of the metal as well, both inside and out.

After a while, Ms. Trent came out of her office. "It's gotten dark out, Hector. I'm closing up shop."

He released the trigger on the torch and lifted his mask. "I-I just need a few more minutes. I'm almost done."

"Done?" She approached and assessed his work. "You didn't even have the drafting started when you came in today, right?"

"Eh, y-yeah..."

"Impressive. A bit rough still, but you work quickly."

"Ah... th-thank you... I just... I need to get it done."

"Need?"

"I mean... I really want to get it done."

"Hmm. Aren't you tired?"

He shook his head.

"You certainly know how to stay focused; I'll give you that." She smirked faintly. "A few more minutes. But then we're outta here. I've got an important home life, you know. My dogs need to be fed."

"Yes, ma'am..."

He finished up the welding, screwed the jaw into place, stuffed the helm in his bag, and exited the building with Ms. Trent.

"You okay to get home?" she asked.

"Y-yeah, I'm fine."

"You sure? We're not supposed to give students rides, but I can't just let you walk home in the dark."

"No, really. I, uh... I mean, uh... my parents should be here soon."

"Then you won't mind if I wait with you."

He grimaced. "Uh... th-that's not necessary."

"Oh, I insist," she said.

He sighed.

"They're not coming, are they?"

He had to think of something. Lying wasn't working. He decided to try a version of the truth. "No, they're not," he said. "I'm not going home yet. I h-have somewhere else I want to go first."

"Aha. Somewhere you'd rather not tell a teacher about, is that it?"

He nodded his head to the side a little. "Y-you could say that..."

"Alright," she said. "It's not my business. But stay out of trouble, Hector. You're a good kid."

He watched her go out into the parking lot and drive off in a white compact.

He pulled out the helm as he started walking and held it up to inspect. He hadn't been able to look at the finished product very closely before leaving the workroom. He turned it over in his hands.

'Wow, this looks like shit...'

Garovel laughed. 'Are you done?'

"81

'Yeah... I mean, it's functional... but the face is all dented from the hammer. I could smooth it out with the grinder, but that'd weaken the metal...'

'Substance over style, Hector.'

'These corners on the jaw piece are going to dig into my neck if I don't shave them down...'

'You want to stay and keep working?'

'I can't. The clubroom is closed. I don't think there's anyone even left in the school...'

'Then you might as well get over here.' Garovel started giving directions.

'So, uh... what's Colt been doing?'

'Sleeping, mostly.'

'The whole day?'

'Yeah. But then, he is the most wanted man in Brighton right now. I can't imagine daylight being very friendly to him.'

‘Oh yeah...’

‘But he’s awake now. Looks like he’s preparing to leave.’

‘Any idea where he’s going?’

‘No. But it must be something important if he’s risking exposure. He’s taking a gun with him.’

Hector started running. Soon, he reached Brighton’s inner city and asked for more directions. Garovel gave them, but Colt was moving now, so following was made more difficult. Hector wasn’t empowered with strength, either. His body still ached in protest every time his feet hit the pavement.

He finally stumbled to a stop when he saw Garovel.

‘You don’t look so good,’ the reaper said, grasping his shoulder.

Relief washed through him. ‘Where is he?’

Garovel pointed toward an alley behind a department store.

Hector slipped his head into the helm.

‘It doesn’t look so bad,’ the reaper observed. ‘The dents make it look a bit abnormal, but in a good way. An imposing way. How does it fit?’

He rubbed his neck. ‘Could be worse, I suppose...’ He made his way over to Colt."

When Colt spotted him approaching, the man's posture stiffened and his hand moved for his coat pocket. "Who the...? Wait. It's you, isn't it? I heard you were causing trouble. Looking to avenge your partner, are you?"

"No, I... I, um..."

Colt squinted at him.

'Calmly. Deliberately. At your own pace, Hector.'

"I... know about your children, Officer Colt."

"Do you, now?"

"I'll be brief," said Hector. "I'm going to rescue them, because... whatever I think about you... your children are innocent."

Colt seemed amused. "You're going to rescue them," he said. "And how, exactly, are you going to accomplish this feat? Do you know where they are?"

"I don't... have to tell you that..."

Colt revealed his gun, but kept it pointed low. "Hold on, kid. I'm not going to let you run in and put them in danger."

"They're already in danger..."

"The only thing keeping them safe is me," said Colt. "My actions. As long as I do what he wants, they're not in danger."

"What happens... when he wants you to do something... that you can't do?"

"I'll do anything. You understand that, kid? There are only two lives that matter to me, and mine ain't one of them."

Hector was quiet a moment. He took off his helm. "I've never had a partner," he said, holding it under his arm.

"You're lying," said Colt. "You're that kid's twin or something. It's the only explanation."

"Then shoot me," said Hector. He walked closer. "Shoot me right in the head... and then you'll see..."

“Stupid kid. Are you suicidal?”

‘Don’t answer that.’

“I thought you said you’d do anything,” said Hector.”

"83

Colt glowered and holstered his weapon. “Alright,” he said, “but I won’t waste a bullet.” He drew his knife, and Hector scarcely saw the blade coming before it drove through his eye socket.

Darkness. Hector reawoke on the pavement, Colt dragging him toward the trunk of his car. He called out to the man. “Hey...”

Colt dropped Hector’s legs. “Impossible...” He backed up against the car as he watched Hector stand up again.

“Is this... proof enough?”

Colt just stared at him, face like stone.

“I want information,” said Hector.

“You seem to have plenty of information already,” said Colt. “What else do you need?”

“Uh...”

‘The identities of other double agents. We don’t need any more surprises.’

“Tell me who else... um... who else Rofal has on the police force... or anywhere else I should know about.”

“The only other cops I know about are Toller, Robstoy, and Vance.” He paused, furrowing his brow at Hector. “But I... I can look into finding more.”

‘Get him to ask Rofal about his plans. There seems to be a bigger play.’

“Also... if you can tell me about his plans... I’ll have a better idea of what to do after your children are safe...”

“Fine. I’ll find out what I can. If that’s all, then I have an appointment to keep.”

Hector stiffened. “Appointment? If you’re going to kill someone...”

“I won’t kill him if he cooperates,” said Colt.

“Officer Colt...”

“Kid, it’s not like I have a choice here.”

“I know, but...”

‘Tell him to kill you again,’ said Garovel.

‘Why?’

‘We need to know where the children are, and the only way to do that is to have Colt give Rofal what he wants. And Rofal wants you dead.’

“Okay, Officer Colt. Here’s what we’ll do...”

"84 -- X.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Colt was glad the kid wasn't heavier. He lugged the body over his shoulder and approached the entrance to the Rofal mansion. He held the metal helmet in his free hand. The kid had been adamant about not leaving it behind.

The guards searched him. He had hoped that carrying a dead body would allow him to forgo such formalities, but they still made him stand there and wait while they confiscated his weapons. They even searched the kid's body.

Rofal chose to receive him in the atrium, and Colt dumped the body on the floor.

Swank backed away. "It's him! You brought him here?!"

"Him?" Rofal eyed the body.

"This kid was the thorn in your side," said Colt.

"Ah, is that so?"

Swank nodded. He did not venture out from behind the staircase. "You're sure he's dead, right?"

"Of course," said Colt. He turned the kid's head to the side, revealing a bloody gash below the base of the skull. "I would've stabbed him in the face, but I wanted to make sure you could recognize him. There is a reward for this, right? Oh, generous boss of mine?"

Rofal laughed. "Spectacular! Of course I'll reward you. Have a whole day--no, two days. Incredible work. How did you even find him?"

"He came to me," said Colt. "Said he wanted my help. Thought I'd betray you and feed him information."

Rofal's smile broadened. "Let me guess. You said you would, and then stuck him as soon as his back was turned."

"Pretty much."

"I love it," said Rofal. "That's what I admire about you, Colt. That ruthlessness."

Colt merely returned a smile of his own."

"84 -- X.

Chapter Ten: 'And ye shall know fear...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Colt was glad the kid wasn't heavier. He lugged the body over his shoulder and approached the entrance to the Rofal mansion. He held the metal helmet in his free hand. The kid had been adamant about not leaving it behind.

The guards searched him. He had hoped that carrying a dead body would allow him to forgo such formalities, but they still made him stand there and wait while they confiscated his weapons. They even searched the kid's body.

Rofal chose to receive him in the atrium, and Colt dumped the body on the floor.

Swank backed away. "It's him! You brought him here?!"

"Him?" Rofal eyed the body.

"This kid was the thorn in your side," said Colt.

"Ah, is that so?"

Swank nodded. He did not venture out from behind the staircase.

"You're sure he's dead, right?"

"Of course," said Colt. He turned the kid's head to the side, revealing a bloody gash below the base of the skull. "I would've stabbed him in the face, but I wanted to make sure you could recognize him. There is a reward for this, right? Oh, generous boss of mine?"

Rofal laughed. "Spectacular! Of course I'll reward you. Have a whole day--no, two days. Incredible work. How did you even find him?"

"He came to me," said Colt. "Said he wanted my help. Thought I'd betray you and feed him information."

Rofal's smile broadened. "Let me guess. You said you would, and then stuck him as soon as his back was turned.”

“Pretty much.”

“I love it,” said Rofal. “That’s what I admire about you, Colt. That ruthlessness.”

Colt merely returned a smile of his own.”

"85

“How did you kill him?” Swank asked.

Colt furrowed his brow. “I stabbed him in the back of the head. Stupid question.”

“Yeah, but...”

Colt looked to Rofal. “So how long are you going to make me wait?”

“I’ll arrange for you to meet them tomorrow.”

“Tonight,” said Colt. “I want to see them tonight.”

That gave Rofal pause. His smile lessened. “Impatient, aren’t you?” He eyed Colt again, then the body. “Fine. I suppose you’ve earned it. I will have them brought here and give you the first three hours tonight.”

Rofal had the body moved to the medical ward, accompanied with a handful of guards. Colt handed the weird helmet off to one of them, who seemed to find it amusing.

They made their way into Rofal’s office. Rofal poured Colt a glass of whiskey. He did not offer one to Swank.

“There’s something else I’d like to know,” said Colt.

“Yes?” said Rofal.

“The money that the kid stole, what was it for?”

“Why? Did you recover it?”

“No.” The kid did have a gripload of money in his bag, Colt had discovered, but Rofal didn’t need to know that. The money was stuffed under the backseat of his car. "But you said something about it being for a seat at a table. What table?"

Rofal paused again. "Why do you want to know?"

"Let's say I've been considering my circumstances," said Colt. "And being more cooperative with you is starting to seem more advantageous."

"I see." Rofal leaned back in his chair. "Well, I would be lying if I said I did not want to tell you. However, if honesty is the game now, then I have to say, I am a bit taken aback by your sudden change of heart. And I have never been a very trusting man."

"I've noticed."

"86

"I will tell you this," said Rofal. "That money was my means of acquiring an introduction with certain... like-minded individuals."

"I see," said Colt. "Is that all ruined now?"

"For the time being, yes. A frustrating set back. But I'm sure another opportunity will present itself in time."

Colt swilled his whiskey around the glass.

--+-+--+--

"Agh... where am I...?"

"Relax. I've got you."

"Ah... this again, huh?"

"I have to hold onto your soul while we wait for Colt's children to arrive."

"Okay... but, uh... this feels... a little different from the last time..."

"Well, without sounding too corny, our souls have had time to get acclimated to one another."

"What does that mean...?"

"We've bonded."

"Aww... come to think of it... this does kinda feel like a warm hug."

"Hmm, I suppose it does."

"It's really nice..."

"Uh. Okay."

"Hold me more tightly, Garovel."

"Getting a bit weird now."

"Haha. So, uh. What's going on with Colt? I can't see anything."

"He's speaking with Rofal now. He's not getting much information out of him."

"But Rofal doesn't suspect anything?"

"Not yet. It's been a bit boring, actually. They're just waiting for the kids to arrive. Colt's asking about his plans, but Rofal is being predictably cryptic."

"So... what do you think now? You said before that you needed more time to observe, but... do you, um... do you think I should kill Rofal?"

"No, I don't think you should."

"Really? Why?"

"Because we still don't know what will happen to Rofal's business in the event of his death. Contrary to popular belief, cutting the head off the snake doesn't always work. I don't think his enterprise will just dissolve."

"87

"You're worried someone worse might take his place?"

"Until we know otherwise, yes."

"But you don't object to his death on moral grounds...?"

"Not particularly, no--hmm? Ah. Bohwanox just showed up. Hold on."

"Bohwanox? What's he doing here?"

"He's telling me."

"I can't hear him."

"Yeah, your soul isn't linked to him, so--agh, I can't carry two conversations at once like this. Just wait a minute."

"...A-alright... um..."

"There's something wrong."

"What is it?"

"Bohwanox says he followed someone here who had the aura of death. But it went away on its own, somehow. I'm not sure what he means. He says he's been investigating a series of missing persons reports, and he thinks this might be related."

"Ah, uh... w-what do we do?"

"...Bah. We need you awake. This person he followed is probably in serious danger."

"But it's too soon, isn't it?"

"Yeah, it is."

"So, then...?"

"We make do. Get ready. Ah. Looks like they're dissecting your body."

"Wha--?"

--+-+--+-+--

Hector's eyes stuck open, and he saw a woman in blue scrubs standing over him. He looked down to see his chest cavity pried open with metal clamps, and a pair of burly thugs watching in the corner of the room. One of them was wearing his helm.

She noticed his eyes open and froze. "Uh, guys..."

Hector sat up. They all screamed.

‘Keep them quiet!’ Garovel yelled.

He bounded up and barreled into the man with his helm, punching him in the gut and yanking the helm free. The other guy slugged him in the face, flooring Hector. They jumped at the opportunity to kick the huge gash that was his chest."

"88

Hector caught one of their legs and flung the man into his partner. They both bounced off the wall and toppled onto one another. He waited for them to get back up, but when he saw them reaching for their guns, he pulled their weapons straight out of their hands and pistol-whipped them both over the head. They stayed down.

Hector eyed the medic crouching in the corner and donned his helm once more. "Please remain quiet..."

The woman nodded furiously.

More guards filed into the room, however. Hector used the first thug who entered to push through the others and create a path for himself. He made sure that they all went down before they could start shooting or call for help. A couple of them ended up caught in the rafters. He initially thought that the corridor had a typically bare ceiling, so he was confused when the first guy he kicked up there didn't come back down.

‘Well, this descended quickly,’ said Garovel.

Hector ripped the clamps out of his chest, tearing flesh and bleeding all over the marble floor. Broken ribs stuck out at jagged angles, and he touched his own beatless heart. He tried not to think about how painful this would be later. ‘So where do I go now?’

Bohwanox appeared through the wall. ‘I apologize for my imposition,’ he said.

‘Uh, it-it’s fine...’

‘Bohwanox can’t hear you,’ Garovel said as he initiated the regeneration, causing Hector’s bones to bend and snap back into place. ‘He isn’t linked to your brain like I am, so you have to talk aloud to him.’

“Oh. Uh... Garovel said that, um... you saw the aura of death go away on its own?”

"89

‘Yes,’ said Bohwanox. ‘It just vanished, with no apparent cause. Then the man it belonged to suddenly decided to come straight here, as if in a trance. I saw him go this way. Please follow me.’

Hector did so, smashing security cameras where he saw them. “I thought, um... I thought you didn’t care about saving people,” said Hector.

‘I don’t like to get involved, if that’s what you mean,’ said Bohwanox. ‘But this is something different. You’ve sensed it too, haven’t you, Garovel? The strange discomfort in this city?’

‘Mm. I have. You believe this to be connected?’

‘Not just connected. I believe it to be the root cause. I believe these missing people may be dying very... abnormally.’

“What do you mean?”

‘I’m not wholly sure myself,’ said Bohwanox. ‘These people who have been going missing, they’re all different ages, races, and genders. I couldn’t find a common thread between them all, and their disappearances don’t seem to have benefited anyone in particular. So I don’t suspect that they’re being held prisoner for sake of ransom or slavery. I believe they’re being killed. But if that’s the case, then why haven’t I found any trapped or wandering souls? It’s very strange.’

‘And troubling,’ added Garovel.

‘Here,’ said Bohwanox. ‘I saw him go through that door.’

“You didn’t check inside already?”

‘No, I...’ Bohwanox shied away from the door. ‘I was... reluctant.’

Hector tilted his head. He looked at Garovel for an explanation, but the other reaper was also backing away. “A-are you guys okay...?”

‘You feel that, Garovel?’

‘I do. I’m wondering how I missed it before...’

‘Because it’s quiet,’ said Bohwanox. ‘It’s like a shadow that doesn’t belong. You don’t realize it’s there until the person casting it suddenly moves... and it lingers.’”

"90

The reapers both fell in behind. ‘Please go first, Hector,’ said Garovel. ‘And be very careful.’

The door was locked, so he broke it down. It clapped to the floor so loudly that he was sure more guards would be coming soon, but the first things he saw in the room were two people--a young man in a dark suit staring back at him and an older, seated gentleman staring vacantly at a wall.

“Excuse me,” said the younger man, “but what the hell do you think... you are... Hmm.” He squinted at Hector. “What do we have here?”

-+-+--+

“Fine,” said Colt. “Then maybe you can tell me more about your family. I’ve only ever met you and Geoffrey.”

“Ah.” Rofal took a swig of his alcohol. “My father and mother retired successfully some ten years ago now. Great man, my father. These days, some people question his lucidity--namely, my mother--but sometimes, I can still see that brilliance of his. That ambition. One moment, he’ll be talking about his great grandfather or his dead sister like they’re in the room; and then the next, he’ll be whispering to me about some secret store room he had built thirty years ago.”

“I met him once,” said Swank. “He offered to cut my hair for me. And replace it with possum fur. I’m still not sure if he was joking.”

Rofal laughed. “Apart from that, I have a few siblings. I inherited the business because my older sister, bless her, hates everything about it.”

Colt snorted. “One of you isn’t a criminal?”

“Oh, she has the mind for it. We all know she does. But she fell in love with an electrician and decided to become a housewife, if you can believe that. Still not sure I do.””

"91

--donation bonus (day #1, post 1/5)--

“What about your other siblings?” Colt asked.

“You are very curious today,” said Rofal, laughing lowly. “If this is part of some ploy to take my family members hostage in exchange for your own, then for your own sake, allow me to dispel that plan in its infancy. You can take whomever you want. Or try to. My family members certainly do not need me to protect them from the likes of you. They would be upset if I did.”

“I’ll keep that in mind.”

“Ha.”

“What about Geoffrey’s parents? Are they dead?”

“No, they are alive. But they entrusted him to me. They struggled with him as a child.”

“I can imagine.”

“I do not think you can,” said Rofal.

Colt raised an eyebrow.

Rofal downed the rest of his whiskey and rested the glass in front of him. “There are very few people in this world who frighten me,” he said. “I am all too glad to have that monster’s favor.”

--++-+-++-

‘What the hell is that thing?’ said Bohwanox.

‘I don’t know,’ said Garovel.

Hector didn’t have time to ask for an explanation. A group of five more guards appeared in the doorway and laid hands on him. He soon dispatched them, rendering three unconscious and two groaning in pain on the floor.

“Oh, wow! What a pleasure to meet you! My name is Geoffrey. What is yours?” When Hector did not reply, Geoffrey’s face scrunched up. “Why are the interesting people always so rude to me?”

Upon a second look, Hector noticed an unusual décor in this room. Not more than a meter to Geoffrey’s left lay a row of objects encased in glass. A foot, a hand, a nose, a little finger, a pair of eyes, a hairy scalp, a shriveled heart, a blackened brain. Various sizes and skin colors. All bloody.”

"92

--donation bonus (day #1, post 2/5)--

Hector’s expression darkened beneath his helm. He eyed the vacant-eyed man in the chair. “Who is that person?” he said.

“Oh, him?” said Geoffrey. “He is my new fetcher. My old one was starting to smell.”

“...Fetcher?”

“Yeah. I use him to bring me stuff. From the outside. My uncle does not want me to leave, and I want him to be happy, so I use fetchers.”

‘That man is dead,’ said Garovel. ‘The body is alive, but there is no soul.’

“Hmm.” Geoffrey’s eyes moved, and Hector wasn’t sure where the young man was looking. “If you will not tell me your name, then what about these two here?”

Hector blinked. “What?”

‘He can see us!’ said Bohwanox.

“Why, yes, I can.” Geoffrey grinned. “Am I not supposed to?”

The reapers backed away even further.

“You asked what ‘that thing’ is,” said Geoffrey. “You were referring to me?"

'Yes,' said Garovel. 'What are you?'

"I am not sure what you mean."

'You are NOT human,' said Bohwanox. 'So why do you look like one?'

"Hmm. You know, I have always had a feeling I was not human. Everyone treats me like one, so I did not think much more about it, but you seem to know what you are saying. What are you, anyhow? Phantoms?" Geoffrey stepped closer and reached out to touch Bohwanox.

Hector placed himself in the way. "Did you... kill that man there?"

Geoffrey eyed Hector again. "You have not answered any of my questions, yet you continue to ask more of your own. You are trying my patience."

"Too bad," said Hector. "Did you kill him?"

"93

--donation bonus (day #1, post 3/5)--

"I suppose I did," said Geoffrey. "The soul, as your friend called it, is always destroyed when I take them for my own. Now out of my way. I wish to inspect your phantom." He tried to push past, but Hector held him back.

"I don't think so."

"Hmm. Interesting."

In an instant, something red flashed across Hector's vision, and suddenly, his forearm was gone, flesh and bone cut so cleanly off that it took a moment to start bleeding. Geoffrey held the severed limb by the wrist.

Hector remained unfazed.

Geoffrey tossed the meat over his shoulder and stared. "Did that not hurt?" he asked.

Hector clocked him in the mouth, and Geoffrey flew back, toppling over the sofa. "Did that?"

Geoffrey stood up immediately, shaking his head. "That was surprising," he said. And when he looked up, a crimson shade was covering his mouth.

Hand growing back, Hector's eyes narrowed. "What is that?"

"I see no reason to tell you." Geoffrey bounded forward and swung, but Hector just took the hit and punched him in the gut, launching him even farther back than before. When Geoffrey stood, this time the red shadow covered his stomach. He began to laugh. "Interesting! You certainly hit hard!"

Hector waited as the young man approached. The reapers fell back into the corridor, observing from beyond the doorway. "What the hell are you?"

"A good question," said Geoffrey. "I would like to know as well. But right now, I am more interested in what they are. You are not going to let me touch them, are you?"

Hector made no response."

"94

--donation bonus (day #1, post 4/5)--

"Fine." Geoffrey waved his hand, and the man in the chair sprung up and leapt on Hector, thrashing and biting.

Hector flung him off, but not before Geoffrey ran past. There was nothing between him and the reapers. They split up, and Geoffrey went after Bohwanox. Hector pursued, but they were too far ahead. Geoffrey reached out, and it seemed like Bohwanox was still far enough away, but from Geoffrey's hand, the same red shadow flew forth, jagged and fast, and it slashed the reaper's backside.

'Agh!'

"I just want to touch you!" Geoffrey laughed.

Hector was there. He grabbed Geoffrey by the collar and threw him against the wall, keeping him pinned there. He glanced at Bohwanox, who was turning over in the air. "Are you alright?!"

Ghostly black-and-white smoke rose from the wound. 'I-I'm not sure,' he said, grimacing.

'You'll recover,' said Garovel. 'But you need to leave now. You've done all you can here.'

'Y-yes, very well.' Bohwanox disappeared through the wall.

"Hey, where did he go?!" said Geoffrey. "Come back! I was not done!"

Hector made a fist and punched him in the face with all his strength. The wall cracked behind Geoffrey's head.

But the red shade was there again, and when it vanished, Geoffrey's face remained untarnished. "Your attacks hurt," said Geoffrey, "but they do not wound. Not like this." He speared Hector through the chest with a red-coated hand. Blood flew everywhere. Geoffrey's hand stuck out of Hector's back, clutching an extracted heart.

Bleeding from the mouth, Hector did not move. "...You were saying?" He headbutted him, reared back, and kicked Geoffrey through the wall."

"95

--donation bonus (day #1, post 5/5)--

Geoffrey flew into the billiards room. Wood and plaster rained down on the pool table he'd landed on. He sat up and eyed the bloody heart in his hands. "How the hell...?" His gaze locked on Garovel. "This is their doing, isn't it?" He climbed to his feet.

'Behind you!' Garovel shouted.

Hector at once knew what he meant. Geoffrey's puppet man was running at him. Hector stepped to the right, caught the man, and swung him straight into Geoffrey. The pair crashed into a ceiling fan and hit the ground in a heap of shattered glass and splintered wood.

Once again, Geoffrey stood. The red shadow covered his entire body before disappearing again. "You are beginning to annoy me."

"I've never been very good at making friends..." Hector's chest began to reform for the second time that night.

Geoffrey waved his hand. When his puppet man did not immediately leap forth, he turned to see why.

Small cuts riddled the man's face, and his leg was bent the wrong way. He struggled even to stand, collapsing after a moment.

Geoffrey frowned. "Broken already? I just made this one." He sighed. "Oh well." A red flash cleaved the man in two. Blood didn't start spraying until his body hit the ground.

Hector scowled. "Fucker...!"

"It appears I need a new fetcher," said Geoffrey, starting closer. "Perhaps I should make things simple and just take you." The red shadow swirled free of Geoffrey's body, amassing in hulking form.

Hector dove back into the hallway, but the shadow still enveloped him. He thrashed within its grasp, expecting some kind of horrific pain or black out, but there was none. He turned to Garovel, who looked entirely unconcerned--even strangely amused."

"96

The streak of crimson bounded back to Geoffrey, and the young man stared at Hector in disbelief. "Why?! You should be mine, now!"

'Fool,' said Garovel. 'You can't have him. He already belongs to me.'

Geoffrey lashed out with a red whip.

Hector and Garovel split out of the way. Geoffrey tore after the reaper. Garovel slipped through a wall, and when Geoffrey turned, that metal helm was right in his face. Hector launched him the full length of the corridor to leave an impressive crack in the far wall. He could already see Geoffrey getting up as Garovel's skull poked out of the wall.

'Hector,' said the reaper. 'This is a losing battle.'

'What do you mean? I'm doing fine, aren't I?'

‘For the moment. But we aren’t prepared for this fight. There’s no time to explain. You need to remember what we came here for.’

Hector’s expression soured. ‘The children...’

‘Colt will probably be needing your help about now.’

He saw Geoffrey charging him.

--+-+--+--

The conversation ended abruptly when a pounding thud shook the room. The three men all eyed each other a moment.

“What the fuck was that?” said Swank.

Rofal picked up the phone on his desk.

Colt’s gaze hardened. “Who are you calling?”

Rofal looked at him but did not respond. “Report,” he said into the receiver. A brief interval passed as he listened. “I see.”

Colt shifted in his seat. He did not like the look on the other man’s face.

Rofal hung up and started dialing again.

He could wait no longer. Colt bolted up and ripped the phone from Rofal’s grasp.”

"97

“So this was your game.” Rofal was far too calm. “I am disappointed, Colt.”

Colt smashed the phone on the ground.

Rofal stood as men entered from the far door. “Congratulations,” he said. “You correctly guessed the next call I was going to make. Your children are still on their way here.”

He assessed the numbers. Seven against one. All armed, save himself.

"I suppose I could find another phone, but they should be here any minute, so why bother? Your resolve is clear to me now at least." Rofal walked around the desk. "But you know, I am nothing if not determined. I will give you one more chance."

"Is that so?" said Colt.

"When they arrive, I will allow you to choose which of the two you wish to keep."

"Like fuck you will."

"Refuse, and I will take both. And I will not kill them, Colt. They will become my children. I have none of my own, you see. I will raise them. They will come to love me. They will come to hate you. And when they are old enough, I will send them to kill you in my name."

Colt's expression alone seemed enough to slaughter everyone in the room.

"Agree to my terms, and you will be allowed to keep one child for yourself. Our amiable relationship may continue, and perhaps in time, you will be able to earn back your second child."

He clenched his teeth. "I'm going to kill you."

"You seem so determined not to leave this building alive. Perhaps you would prefer to watch as I kill them in front of you before you die as well? That would certainly save me considerable time and effort.""
"98

--donation bonus (day #2, post 1/5)--

Another pounding thud shook the room even more violently than before. Everyone looked around nervously.

"I'm not the one you should be worried about right now," said Colt.

"Who--?"

The double doors flung open, and the kid ran into the room, metal helm looking between everyone. A red streak followed him in and struck at him. He dodged the first couple strikes before it pierced his leg, dropping him to his knee. Red coiled around the kid like rope, swung him up, then smashed him into the floor. The kid struggled in his bindings as Geoffrey entered the room, the red source.

"Pardon us, Uncle."

"Who the hell is this?" Rofal asked.

"He refuses to tell me," said Geoffrey. "You should stand back, Uncle. He is rather dangerous. And very protective of--" Geoffrey choked the word back as the kid started pulling on the red streak, dragging Geoffrey towards him.

A jagged red blade grew from Geoffrey's other hand, and he slashed the kid. It cut into the helm and got stuck there. The kid pulled him in the rest of the way and smacked him in the jaw, freeing himself. He launched Geoffrey across the room, collapsing a table as he landed.

The kid looked to Colt. "Are they here?!" he said.

Still a bit in shock, Colt struggled to answer. "Soon!"

Back on his feet, Geoffrey's wild eyes searched frantically. He pointed to a few of Rofal's lackeys. "You three!" A surge of crimson shot forth and enveloped them. They quickly panicked, began screaming like they'd been set on fire, then all too suddenly, fell deathly silent. "Kill him!" They all bounded toward the kid, splitting up to attack from different sides."

"99

--donation bonus (day #2, post 2/5)--

Regaining himself, Colt took advantage of the chaos. While the other mooks were distracted, he ran up behind one of them. He kicked him in the back of the knee, took the man into a chokehold with one arm, and stole the gun from its holster with the other. He immediately switched off the safety and opened fire. Two shots, two dead lackeys.

The kid was tossing his three around like they were lawn chairs. For some reason, Geoffrey seemed intent on getting around the kid rather than fighting him directly, and the kid seemed equally intent on holding his ground.

Rofal scrambled through his desk, no doubt for a weapon, but when he saw that Colt already had the gun on him, he stopped and backed away. For the first time that Colt had seen, the man looked genuinely fearful. "Be reasonable, Colt... If you kill me--"

Colt shot him in the chest.

Rofal dropped, hands vainly touching the wound as he watched Colt walking closer. "No...!"

"Yes." The bullet splattered Rofal's brain all over the floor.

He didn't have long to feel satisfied, however.

"What have you done?!" someone yelled. It was Geoffrey. The red shadow boiled around him. "What have you DONE?!"

Colt opened fire. The shadow deflected each bullet, causing Geoffrey scarcely more than a momentary grimace. The magazine soon ran out.

The kid ran up and grabbed Geoffrey by the arm, then flung him back into the hall. One of Geoffrey's minions was back up, and Colt bashed his skull in with the butt of his gun.

"What the fuck is that red shit?!"

"No time," the kid said. "Where will your children arrive?"

"I don't know!"

"Think!"

"100 -- XI.

--donation bonus (day #2, post 3/5)--

"Ah--maybe the elevator in Rofal's bedroom. But it could just be the main entrance. I can't know for--"

The red flew around the door and straight for Colt. The kid jumped in front of him and took it through the chest, losing a mass of blood. The jagged shade stopped just short of Colt's stomach.

"Go!" the kid yelled. "I'll check the entrance!"

Colt didn't need to be told twice. He stopped only to rip a gun off of one of the dead bodies. The other two minions were up and barreling at him. He didn't hesitate to shoot them both in the head. He kicked the door to Rofal's bedroom open. The elevator sat on the far left side, adjacent the bathroom. The numbers above the elevator door were already lighting up in descending order.

Colt ducked into the bathroom and waited.

Chapter Eleven: 'A true flesh wound...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's feet dangled above the floor as he hung from the red blade through his chest. He grasped the blade with both hands, trying to pull it free, but he couldn't grip it with his blood all over it.

"This little helmet of yours is curious. And annoying. Is your head your weak point, by chance?" Geoffrey's red shade coiled around the helm's jaw, tugging on it.

Hector felt himself panicking. He didn't know what else to do. The only thing he had left in mind was his iron, but that was useless. He tried it anyway. He put a hand forth, and from it came a light shower of gray particles, about as dangerous as a handful of confetti.

Geoffrey laughed. "What the hell is this?" He gently blew the powder away and laughed even more. "Are you a party clown in your spare time? Do that again! Go on!"
"100 -- XI.

--donation bonus (day #2, post 3/5)--

"Ah--maybe the elevator in Rofal's bedroom. But it could just be the main entrance. I can't know for--"

The red flew around the door and straight for Colt. The kid jumped in front of him and took it through the chest, losing a mass of blood. The jagged shade stopped just short of Colt's stomach.

"Go!" the kid yelled. "I'll check the entrance!"

Colt didn't need to be told twice. He stopped only to rip a gun off of one of the dead bodies. The other two minions were up and barreling at him. He didn't hesitate to shoot them both in the head. He kicked the door to Rofal's bedroom open. The elevator sat on the far left side, adjacent the bathroom. The numbers above the elevator door were already lighting up in descending order.

Colt ducked into the bathroom and waited.

Chapter Eleven: 'A true flesh wound...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's feet dangled above the floor as he hung from the red blade through his chest. He grasped the blade with both hands, trying to pull it free, but he couldn't grip it with his blood all over it.

"This little helmet of yours is curious. And annoying. Is your head your weak point, by chance?" Geoffrey's red shade coiled around the helm's jaw, tugging on it.

Hector felt himself panicking. He didn't know what else to do. The only thing he had left in mind was his iron, but that was useless. He tried it anyway. He put a hand forth, and from it came a light shower of gray particles, about as dangerous as a handful of confetti.

Geoffrey laughed. "What the hell is this?" He gently blew the powder away and laughed even more. "Are you a party clown in your spare time? Do that again! Go on!"

"101

--donation bonus (day #2, post 4/5)--

Hector had a better idea. He coated his hands in iron dust and gripped the blade again. There it was. The friction he needed. He yanked the blade out and hit the ground rolling. He could hear Geoffrey's elongated blades digging into the floor behind.

'The main entrance is straight ahead of you,' said Garovel.

He ran but felt something slowing him down. A bit of the red shadow was still wrapped around his helm, he realized. He pulled on it, but it stretched like taffy.

Geoffrey soon caught up. "Keep struggling," he said, smiling. "Perhaps you'll break it eventually." When he saw Hector turn and walk towards him, his smile disappeared, however. He slashed Hector's helm, but the sharp edge didn't hit cleanly and just ricocheted off. Hector's punch sent him bouncing from wall to ceiling to floor and out of sight around a corner.

He started for the entrance again, but Garovel stopped him.

'Wait! You have to make sure Geoffrey stays on you! He has every reason to go after Colt, right now!'

"Shit." He turned and ran back but didn't have far to go. A red streak came soaring after him, and he rolled to the side. Seeing Geoffrey again was confirmation enough, so Hector bolted for the entrance.

Past the broad welcoming chamber and outside the house at last, he found no one but Garovel. Still underground and surrounded by dark rock formations, it would have been pitch black if not for the pathway lamps showing the way to a slew of elevators some dozen meters away.

Glancing back, he saw twin red lashes gunning for him. He avoided the first but caught the second through the gut, and a moment later, the first returned to hack his leg off."

"102

--donation bonus (day #2, post 5/5)--

Hector dropped to the ground, blood spurting out of his severed limb as he wrestled the thrashing red python. 'Get back!' he told Garovel.

The reaper listened, but too late. Geoffrey had reached the doorway, and one of the streaks was already snaking toward Garovel. It wrapped around the reaper and pulled him closer to Geoffrey.

"Found you!"

'Garovel!' Iron powder gave Hector the traction he needed to rip the streak out, but he couldn't stand yet. His leg had scarcely regrown at all. "Don't you hurt him!"

“Tell me what he is, and I won’t,” said Geoffrey.

The reaper struggled to break free of his red bonds but to no avail.

“Fine!” said Hector. He could feel his leg slowly returning. “Okay! I’ll tell you...!” He made Geoffrey wait a moment longer. “He’s... a reaper. You know. A reaper of death.”

Geoffrey raised an eyebrow, turning Garovel around in the air. “Ah... I see. Interesting. I still want to dissect him, though.” He stuck Garovel through the chest.

‘Ugh!’

“No!” It didn’t matter that his leg hadn’t fully returned. Hector stomped toward him with one gory stump. He clenched his fist so hard that he thought it might break, and he felt iron gathering around his knuckles almost involuntarily.

He slugged Geoffrey square in the face with every ounce of strength in his body.

Geoffrey smashed through the front of the house, and from the sound of it, several more walls within the building.

Hector looked at his hand. A thin metal veil covered the back of his palm and fingers. It wasn’t stable. Even as he stared at it, he saw it cracking and crumbling into dust, but it was still much more than he had expected to see.”

"103

‘Agh... Hector...’

“Garovel!”

The reaper just hovered there, the gash clear as day and smoldering.

“We’re leaving.” He vainly tried to take the reaper’s arm, phasing through it like smoke. “Dammit, we have to...! You have to follow me, Garovel!”

‘The children...’

"They aren't here," he said. "They must be with Colt. We have to get out of here."

'Alright, just... listen.'

"I swear to goddess, if you tell me to leave without you...!"

'No... but I can't move. I need you to... carry me.'

"Fine, fine. How?"

'I have to attach myself to your soul... Come closer.'

"Okay. Do it."

Immediately, Hector's body felt stranger. Everything had a dull ache to it, and his strength diminished. He could feel the reaper's presence, he realized, like a cloud hanging over his shoulders, dark and familiar... and weak.

'Go quickly...'

He ran. He chose the closest elevator, but when the door didn't open as soon as he hit the button, he moved to the next. The fifth attempt yielded immediate results, and he rode the small lift up in silence, listening intently for sounds of pursuit.

The door opened again, and he found himself in a closet, which led into the back of a drugstore. No one was around, as it was still the middle of the night. He slid over the counter and made his way outside. With no key to lock the door again behind him, he felt a bit bad about it but had to leave and hope no one took the opportunity to rob the place. Then again, the store was involved with Rofal, so maybe it deserved it."

"104

Running with only one shoe soon grew awkward, so he pulled it off and threw it in a dumpster. One pant leg was also missing below the knee, but running around without pants on seemed less reasonable.

None of the buildings looked familiar. He slowed to a walk. 'Where do I go, Garovel?'

The reaper did not answer.

‘Garovel?!’

‘Mm... what?’

He took a breath. ‘You scared me...’

‘Sorry... I’m... very tired... I need to rest...’

‘I need you to tell me where to go first. I don’t know where we are.’

‘Ah... uh... sorry, I... I’m...’

‘Garovel?’ He waited for answer but received none. He stopped walking.

Everything had happened so quickly. He hadn’t had much chance to take it all in. And standing in the open street, he still wasn’t ready to. Part of him was afraid Geoffrey would find them if he stopped moving for too long. So he kept walking, aimless and barefoot over cool, damp concrete.

‘Hector!’

At first, he thought it was Garovel, but then he realized. “Bohwanox?”

The reaper descended from the sky, the wound on his back still smoking, though less than before. ‘What happened?’

“Garovel was hurt... pretty badly... he’s, um... resting now.”

‘Ah... I see.’

“Are you alright?”

‘I think so, yes. I’ve never been wounded like this before, but I only feel mildly weakened.’

“That’s good... How’d you, um... h-how’d you find me?”

‘Searching, is how. From up high. I was worried you two didn’t make it. I saw that other man leaving earlier.’

“What other man?”

‘The one you were working with. He was talking to Rofal when I found you both tonight.'

"Ah! You saw Colt?!"

'Was that his name?'"

"105

--donation bonus (day #3, post 1/5)--

"Did he have two babies with him?"

'He did have both arms full.'

"Can you take me to him?"

'I believe so. Follow me.'

He had trouble keeping pace. His limbs were beginning to feel like lead. Bohwanox slowed down for him.

'I should thank you, Hector.'

"What for?"

'You saved my life.'

"Oh... well... I mean, I couldn't just let you die..."

'Yes, you could have.'

Hector's brow lowered within his helm. "I wouldn't have, then."

Bohwanox eyed him quietly, his bony expression made thoughtful, and a silent intermission passed. 'Are you sure Garovel is alright?'

Hector hesitated. "N-no... but then... if he dies, then..."

'So do you.'

"Yeah..."

'Do you feel like you're dying?'

"Not exactly... This isn't what it felt like before, anyway..."

‘Hmm. What happened to Geoffrey?’

“Still alive, I’m pretty sure... What is he? Do you have any idea?”

‘No, I don’t. Perhaps Garovel does. I get the impression he’s much older and more experienced than I am.’

“Really? Uh... h-how old are you?”

‘As a reaper, I’m only about seventy years old.’

“What do you mean, ‘as a reaper’...?”

‘If you count my human life, then I’m about a hundred or so, I suppose.’

Hector blinked. “You... you were human?”

Bohwanox’s skeletal brow rose. ‘Of course. All reapers were humans before they died. Garovel didn’t tell you?’

“Ah... well... we had a lot of other things to talk about. But, um... he did say that he was thousands of years old...”

‘It’s as I thought, then.’ Bohwanox circled around Hector to look at Garovel resting there.

“I just, um... I just thought all reapers were that old...”

‘Most are. I’m the rare one here.’

“Oh...”

"106

--donation bonus (day #3, post 2/5)--

‘We don’t choose to be reapers. It’s inherited, a recessive trait that barely manages to live on into modern times. The vast majority of reapers once lived among various ancient civilizations as humans.’

“Huh... why does it barely survive? Er, I mean... why isn’t it more, um... prevalent?”

'I believe it's a genetic reason, but honestly, that's about all I know. I'm sure Garovel is more informed. I generally avoid involving myself with other reapers. I've seen many who are... well, violently insane would be an understatement.'

"Eesh... Garovel said something like that, too..."

'Deluded zealotry, believing in absolute madness. And the ones who fight them aren't much better.' Bohwanox shook his head at the ground. 'I can partly understand why. This existence after death... seeing but not being seen, hearing but not being heard... it's not difficult to imagine it having ill effects on someone. Especially if that someone believed fiercely in the religions of their time.'

"Religion? What does that matter?"

'The ancient religions of the world weren't exactly renowned for their mercy and kindness.'

"Ah, right..."

'Modern religions aren't paragons of that, either, but at least society has abolished things like ritual sacrifice and slavery... well. Most societies, anyway. Horsht and Dozer are still full of stupid fucks who believe that garbage.'

"Y'know, for a spirit... you don't seem very... spiritual..."

'I will take that as a compliment,' said Bohwanox, and he stopped. 'Ah. Hold up. I saw Colt around here. Let me see if I can find him again.' The reaper flew off.

Hector had the street to himself. Only the occasional vehicle or illuminated window spoke of any other life in the neighborhood. Not that he minded. The peace was much welcomed--especially as he eyed his shredded, blood-soaked garments."

"107

--donation bonus (day #3, post 3/5)--

"Gah... I'm burning through clothes like toilet paper..." Hector felt something in his head shift, and then realized it was just Garovel's presence.

‘Did I hear... you found Colt...?’

‘Yeah. Bohwanox thinks he’s here. How are you feeling?’

‘Vaguely conscious...’

‘Y-you will recover, right?’

‘Yeah... don’t worry... But what will you do about... um... ugh...’

‘Garovel?’

‘Wha?’

‘You were saying something.’

‘Oh. Are you going to just let Colt go? He’s still a... uh... a murder...’

‘I know... And I’d like to put him in prison, but... that’d be a death sentence. Even assuming the other inmates wouldn’t kill him just for being a cop... Geoffrey’s gunning for him now.’

‘Ah... good thinking...’

‘I also don’t know what would become of his kids. I mean... would they actually be safe in foster care? Or with their mother? Who is she, even? Or is there someone else who--?’

‘Okay, shut up. I stopped listening... Handle it on your own...’

He exhaled a curt laugh. ‘Rest up, jackass.’

Soon, Bohwanox returned. ‘Found him. He’s parked around back.’

Hector followed the reaper through an abandoned terrace, paint peeling off the walls in large, leafing flakes. The ones on the floor stuck to his feet as he passed from dark room to dark room and finally out into a musty alley.

Colt spotted him immediately and took a moment to lower his gun. “Holy fuck, kid. I thought I looked like shit. What happened to you? Did you bathe in Geoffrey’s fuckin’ blood?”

“No... this is all mine...”

“Wait. You didn’t kill Geoffrey? Don’t tell me you let him live ‘cuz of some bleeding heart bullshit. I swear, that fucking kid deserved--""

"108

--donation bonus (day #3, post 4/5)--

"It's not that I didn't," he said. "It's that I couldn't... He's too strong. Or I'm too weak. All I know is... I couldn't even hurt him..."

"Well, fuck."

"Did you... did you get your kids?"

And Colt actually smiled--not with sarcasm, but with relief. "Yes, I did," he said. He motioned over to the car, and there they were in the backseat, both wrapped in blankets. "They were screaming their heads off the whole way here. I don't know how they're sleeping now."

"What about you?" Hector asked. "Are you injured?"

Colt revealed a gash under his left sleeve briefly. "There were three guys in the elevator."

"You... killed them?"

"I did. That a problem for you?"

Hector sighed. "I guess not... You don't have my advantages, so... I understand, but still..."

Colt tossed him something. "Here." It was a burner phone.

Hector just waited for him to elaborate.

"I thought you might find me again. How the hell do you keep doing that, anyway?"

"It's... too difficult to explain..."

"Whatever. My number's in that phone."

"Thank you...?"

"Thank yourself. I used your money."

Hector tilted his head. "Cellphone stores aren't open at this hour..."

Colt shrugged. "I may have broken a window to make my purchase."

"You're supposed to be a cop..."

"It's fine. I left plenty of money on the counter."

Hector pocketed the phone. It fell through his pants and hit the ground. He decided to just carry it. "You'll call me if you need my help, I take it?"

"Well, since you're offering, sure." Colt moved for the driver's door. "By the way, you need a ride?"

He thought a moment. "No..."

"109

--donation bonus (day #3, post 5/5)--

"Bah. Don't want to show me where you live, huh?"

"There's that... but mainly... I'd rather not be seen with the most wanted man in the country, right now."

Colt gave an admmissive nod.

"Where will you go?" Hector asked.

"Gotta get out of the city at least. Hopefully out of the country as well, but that'll be difficult." He reached into the backseat and pulled out Hector's bag. He tossed it to him. "Thanks for all your help, Hector Goffe."

Hector eyed the bag. His algebra book lay atop the mass of cash. He hadn't expected Colt to rifle through his things, but he supposed he should have. "If you're really thankful... then don't make me regret letting you go... don't ever hurt those children."

"Of course I won't."

"So you say..."

Colt's expression hardened. "What was that?"

"You're a murderer... a violent man with violent tendencies... How do I know you won't just... get tired of their crying one day and snap? Or lose your patience when they're older and beat them?"

Colt glared. "I'd never hurt them. I swear on my life. You already know I'd die for them."

They merely exchanged stares for a long moment.

"I'll be keeping an eye on you--" He glanced at Bohwanox, who nodded. "--so I'll know if you break that promise."

"I won't."

"Good... because I will hunt you down, if you do..."

Colt looked at him heavily, and then let out a brief laugh, which turned into a sigh. "You show up out of nowhere. You know all these things that no one else should. And you turn everything upside down... Just what the hell are you, kid?"

"...I haven't figured that out yet, either.""

"110 -- XII.

Chapter Twelve: 'O, vigilant heart, take heed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had been relieved to have Bohwanox help him find his way home again. The reaper knew exactly where Cedar Street was and had no trouble guiding him toward more familiar surroundings before flying off. He'd worried that Bohwanox would have trouble finding Colt again, but the reaper did not seem to share his concern.

Lying in bed, Hector awoke to Garovel floating over him.

'Best wake now,' the reaper said. 'People will start to wonder where you are if you miss more school again.'

He rolled over. His body felt like a sack of bricks. "It's the weekend..."

'Not anymore. You've been sleeping for four days.'

“Ugh... of course I have...”

‘I only slept for two. You’re a wuss.’

He eyed the reaper incredulously and shook his head. “So you’re all recovered, I take it?”

‘For the most part. C’mon, get up.’

He groaned and sat over the side of his bed. “I feel fucking terrible...” As usual, everything hurt, his chest most of all. It had a kind of burning ache to it that made him regret each breath he took. “Agh, Garovel... why...?” He gave a laughing whimper. “This sucks so bad...”

‘I know. I managed to mitigate some of it while you slept, but the next few days’ll be pretty rough.’

“I regret everything...”

‘No one likes a whiner.’

“I especially regret saving you...”

‘Right back at you, Hector. Right back at you.’

His laugh broke off into a grimacing smile. “Please...! Don’t make me laugh...!”

‘Sorry.’

He slowly dressed himself and half-stepped his way down stairs with wooden legs. He found his father in the dining room, overseeing a coffee and newspaper."

"110 -- XII.

Chapter Twelve: ‘O, vigilant heart, take heed...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had been relieved to have Bohwanox help him find his way home again. The reaper knew exactly where Cedar Street was and had no trouble guiding him toward more familiar surroundings before flying off. He’d worried that Bohwanox would have trouble finding Colt again, but the reaper did not seem to share his concern.

Lying in bed, Hector awoke to Garovel floating over him.

‘Best wake now,’ the reaper said. ‘People will start to wonder where you are if you miss more school again.’

He rolled over. His body felt like a sack of bricks. “It’s the weekend...”

‘Not anymore. You’ve been sleeping for four days.’

“Ugh... of course I have...”

‘I only slept for two. You’re a wuss.’

He eyed the reaper incredulously and shook his head. “So you’re all recovered, I take it?”

‘For the most part. C’mon, get up.’

He groaned and sat over the side of his bed. “I feel fucking terrible...” As usual, everything hurt, his chest most of all. It had a kind of burning ache to it that made him regret each breath he took. “Agh, Garovel... why...?” He gave a laughing whimper. “This sucks so bad...”

‘I know. I managed to mitigate some of it while you slept, but the next few days’ll be pretty rough.’

“I regret everything...”

‘No one likes a whiner.’

“I especially regret saving you...”

‘Right back at you, Hector. Right back at you.’

His laugh broke off into a grimacing smile. “Please...! Don’t make me laugh...!”

‘Sorry.’

He slowly dressed himself and half-stepped his way down stairs with wooden legs. He found his father in the dining room, overseeing a coffee and newspaper."

By appearance alone, Samuel Goffe was certainly Hector's father. They shared their slender builds, their thin noses, their prominent brows, and their slightly darker skin tones. About the only things Hector took from his mother were her eyes and hair, but as he kept his head shaved, that left only the prior.

"Morning, son."

"Morning..."

Hector made himself a bowl of cereal. And a bowl of oatmeal. He grabbed a chocolate muffin as well. Then a banana. A glass of milk, too. Some strawberry yogurt. Peanut butter on toast. And a couple waffles for good measure. He sat down across from his father.

As he ate, he kept expecting his father to bring up the subject of his school attendance, but the man seemed content for them to sit in silence. Hector could see the coffee mug shaking as his father sipped from it.

Garovel floated around the table. 'Maybe you should ask him something.'

'Like what?'

'I don't know. How his day is going? Say anything.'

'No...'

'Why not?'

'Just... no...'

The reaper made a face but didn't press further.

His father finished his coffee and moved to the living room to watch the morning news. Hector devoured the rest of his breakfast, climbed back upstairs, brushed his teeth, grabbed his bag, and shambled off to the bus stop.

Garovel was not prepared to let the topic of Hector's father go, however. 'I know you don't have the warmest relationship with your parents, but even still. You could have at least attempted a conversation with him.'

‘There was no point,’ he said. ‘Dad’s having a bad day...’

The skeleton raised an eyebrow. ‘What do you mean?’”

"112

--donation bonus (day #4, post 1/5)--

‘My dad takes medication,’ said Hector. ‘Sometimes, he has... bad days... and... I mean, even normally, he’s not very... um... talkative. But... he likes to be alone on his bad days...’

‘Hmm. What kind of medication?’

‘Eh... honestly, I’m not sure...’

‘What?’

‘My parents have always kinda... hid it from me... I think Dad’s embarrassed by it. And Mom just... I don’t know...’

‘How could you tell he was having a bad day, then?’

‘He was home when he should have been at work, for one thing. And... I could see the tremors... in his hands. They were weak, but...’

‘Ah.’ Garovel paused. ‘Y’know, I could follow him around and probably figure it out, if you want.’

Hector’s eyes widened, and he shook his head. ‘N-no, that’s... please don’t do that...’

‘Why not? You’d rather not know?’

‘I just... That’s, um... My parents are very private people. My dad even more so than my mom. I don’t... wanna... do that to him... I mean, he doesn’t want me to know, so...’

The reaper shrugged. ‘If you say so. Personally, I think it’d be better to know, but it’s your family.’

On the bus, Hector took the seat behind the driver and stared out the window. Garovel floated right outside.

‘So do you, um... do you really not know what Geoffrey is? Bohwanox thought you might have some idea.'

'I wish I did,' he said. 'But that creature... I've never seen anything like it. It was just so...'

'So, what?'

'Wrong.'

'How do you mean...? Like, his aura was really fucked up or something?'

'Essentially, yeah. But it didn't seem like a human soul that had become corrupted somehow. It seemed completely inhuman to begin with.'

'Hmm...''

"113

--donation bonus (day #4, post 2/5)--

'Pure evil doesn't exist,' said Garovel. 'People can only be evil insofar as making evil decisions--possessing an intent to harm or cause suffering. Evil actions. Even people who do evil things purely for the sake of amusement are still human. They're twisted, sure. They have evil tendencies, but they still aren't MADE of evil. But... Geoffrey's aura... I can't think of any other way to describe it. It was like an evil consciousness.'

Hector raised an eyebrow. 'So... you're saying Geoffrey is pure evil?'

'No! I'm saying he's NOT! Because there's no such thing!'

'So why'd you bring it up then?! You're making it confusing!'

'Because it IS confusing! I don't know what he is yet! And seeing the way he acted, it's easy to feel like he's evil incarnate or some shit!'

Hector sighed. 'Whatever... You're not making any sense...'

'Tch. I need to find out more.'

Hector looked at the reaper heavily. 'You're not going anywhere without me. It's way too dangerous with him out there.'

'Oh, please. The odds of me randomly encountering Geoffrey are ridiculously low. And even if I did, I'd just outrun him.'

'You don't know that,' said Hector. 'If you don't even know what Geoffrey is, then you definitely don't know what he's capable of... I mean, he could still have abilities we didn't see before...'

'Hector, I've been doing this a long time. I can handle myself.'

'You're not going anywhere without me,' he repeated.

Garovel lowered his brow. 'You're being very unreasonable today.'

'I don't care... You're not gonna go out and get killed while I'm sitting through a fucking biology lesson...'"

"114

--donation bonus (day #4, post 3/5)--

'You do realize that you are the servant in this relationship, right? I don't have to listen to you. I could put you to sleep and fly to the other side of the planet, if I wanted.'

Hector just glared at him.

'Ugh. Fine. I won't wander off, for the time being. But I will need to venture out on my own again sooner or later. You're going to have to trust that I know what I'm doing, eventually.'

The bus squealed to a stop in front of the school, and Hector exited.

'Tell me how to kill Geoffrey,' he said as he walked. 'You said we weren't prepared for that fight before. So... prepare me.'

The reaper floated ahead of him. 'You're already resolved to kill him?'

'It's him or you, isn't it? That's not a hard choice. I... I would've done it before, if I could've...'

'Him or US, Hector.'

'R-right...'

‘Well. In order to hurt Geoffrey, you have to be able to break the red shadow that protects him.’

‘Okay...’

‘The reason it seemed like an impervious shield was because your attacks were only physical, whereas the shadow was both physical and mental. That shadow is something real and imaginary at the same time, which is why it seemed to constantly disappear and reappear.’

‘Imaginary? But if it’s imaginary... then...’

‘How can it exist? Because reality is relative. Take me, for instance. I’m imaginary. All reapers are. Relative to our servants, and apparently Geoffrey, we exist. But relative to the rest of the world, we don’t.’

‘But... the powers you grant me are definitely real...’

"115

--donation bonus (day #4, post 4/5)--

‘Those powers are the result of a marriage between something real and something imaginary. It’s the same for Geoffrey’s shield.’

‘I think I get it... maybe...’

‘So, in order to fight it, you have to add a mental--or imaginary--side to your attacks.’

‘And how do I do that?’

‘Oh, it’s not that difficult. Because your body has already had its soul “hollowed” out, so to speak, you’ll be able to gain a stronger sense of your own presence and even begin to manipulate your soul in different ways. You’ll be able to get the basics down fairly quickly. It’s only when you want to become genuinely proficient that things go less smoothly, but we won’t be worrying about that too much yet. For now, we’ll mainly focus on trying to grow your materialization ability. I expect that’ll be more immediately useful.’

‘Hmm.’

‘By the way, in the interest of full disclosure, there are actually two ways that your metal power can grow.’

‘Oh?’

‘The first is meditative training, just like you’ve already been doing. It takes a while, but it’s the more reliable of the two.’

‘The other way is faster?’

‘Very much so, yeah. The second method is to throw yourself into an incredibly dangerous situation, almost get us both killed, and hope that the desperation and rush of adrenaline are enough to force a breakthrough.’

‘What the fuck? That sounds...’

‘Reckless and stupid? Yeah. We won’t be attempting that one. The almost-getting-killed part is a dealbreaker for me.’

‘Huh. Okay... But, um... about this soul power or whatever. When should I, uh... start working on that?’

‘We’ll get to--’

“Hector? You okay?”

Finally reaching his locker, he turned and saw Micah standing there.
“Uh... hi. I’m--I’m fine. Why?”

“Well, it’s just, you’re walking like you’re half-dead or something.”

“Ha... that’s, um... yeah...”

“Did something happen to you?”

‘Shit, what do I say?’

‘Uh... You fell down the stairs!’

‘That’s stupid!’

‘Just say it!’”

"116

"I fell down the stairs!" he blurted.

"Holy crap, seriously?!" Micah came closer, sizing him up and down. "Is that why you've been missing school? Did you break anything? Did you go to the hospital?"

"N-no... I'm okay. Just some... really bad bruising..."

"Wow, dude. Need me to carry your bag for you?"

He tightened his grip on the straps. "Th-that's alright... I'd rather hold onto it."

"Alright, well... come sit with us again at lunch, okay? We were worried when you didn't show up to school the past couple days. Sheryl thought she might've scared you off or something."

"Ah... yeah, okay..."

They walked to class together, and Hector was glad when he could sink into his chair in the corner of the room and just listen to the teacher talk. It was difficult to understand, having fallen so far behind on his homework, but he welcomed the comfortable normality of it. And the chair. Not having to walk anymore was amazing. He rubbed his chest and closed his eyes, trying not to groan.

'By the way,' said Garovel, 'are you feeling alright? In your head, that is. Not your body.'

Hector threw him a look. 'Excuse me...?'

'You're not feeling light-headed or disoriented at all? No inexplicable confusion or anything?'

'No... why?'

'No reason.'

'Garovel...'

The reaper hesitated. 'When I'm close to death, it will begin to affect you. Your consciousness will begin to... well... tear itself from your body. Perhaps even destroying itself in the process.'

'Ah... and disorientation is a warning sign?'

‘Yeah. I suppose I wasn’t as wounded as I thought. You’d be feeling some lingering effects, if I was.’”

"117

Hector struggled through the day. He wished there wasn’t so much damn walking. A few times, he considered skipping class to go take a nap somewhere, but he knew Garovel wouldn’t permit it. He tried to pay attention to each lecture, but he felt like he had missed more than a few things.

History class was the worst yet. Mr. Cormac was talking about the rise of workers’ unions, and people kept raising their hands to ask questions about the royal family. Hector stopped trying to follow what was going on and just shut his eyes.

Garovel, however, did not. ‘Something’s strange here...’

‘Hmm?’

‘Raise your hand and ask why everyone is suddenly so interested in the Crown.’

‘What? Why?’

‘Because I want to know.’

‘But... I don’t like to... participate...’

‘I don’t care. You can be a shy bastard on your own time.’

He sighed and raised his hand.

Mr. Cormac stared at the hand a moment, about ready to lose his patience. “Yes, Hector?”

“Uh... sorry, I was just wondering... why... everyone else was asking about the royal family...”

A few laughs rang out, and the entire classroom turned to look at him.

His knuckles went white around the edges of his desk. ‘Oh, fuck. What did you make me do...?’

"You're joking, right?" someone said.

"He really doesn't know?" said someone else.

He tried to melt into his seat. "D-did... did something happen...?"

"I know you've been absent," said Mr. Cormac, "but you didn't hear about it on the news or from your parents or anything?"

"H-hear what...?"

"Three days ago, someone tried to assassinate the Queen."

Hector and Garovel exchanged confused expressions."

"118 -- XIII.

Chapter Thirteen: 'O, blood of noble birth...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The drawing room was quiet. Helen merely continued reading in silence as the young man on the other side of the broad writing table shifted uncomfortably for the twentieth time.

Helen had forgotten his name. "V"-something, perhaps. Highborn. Ties to her cousins in the House of Carthrace. Both attributes which disqualified him.

After a while of fidgeting, the young man finally grew bold enough to pose a familiar question. "F-forgive me if I sound impertinent, Your Majesty, but is there a purpose to this visit?"

She smiled. Your Majesty was how commoners addressed her. He should have said Your Highness. It made no difference to her, of course, other than providing amusement. "What purpose need there be?" she said.

The boy's face spoke of difficulty. "Begging your pardon, Your Majesty, but it seems very strange that you would invite so many of us to sit with you individually... without purpose."

"Why should it be strange?" she said.

He had no answer, and the silence returned.

She looked at her clock filigreed in silver. "You may go now," she said. As the boy stood, she added, "Please send in the next person as you leave." She watched him go.

'It's finally the girl's turn, isn't it?' said Mehlsanz. 'Please tell me it is. I'm so sick of this waiting.'

Helen glanced at the reaper by the furnace. To her eyes, Mehlsanz was a ghostly gray thing, vaguely feminine in form, and perhaps even beautiful, in a haunting way. 'Indeed,' Helen said. 'I honestly do not care much for the waiting, either.'

'You couldn't come up with a plan that required less patience?'"
"118 -- XIII.

Chapter Thirteen: 'O, blood of noble birth...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The drawing room was quiet. Helen merely continued reading in silence as the young man on the other side of the broad writing table shifted uncomfortably for the twentieth time.

Helen had forgotten his name. “V”-something, perhaps. Highborn. Ties to her cousins in the House of Carthrace. Both attributes which disqualified him.

After a while of fidgeting, the young man finally grew bold enough to pose a familiar question. “F-forgive me if I sound impertinent, Your Majesty, but is there a purpose to this visit?”

She smiled. Your Majesty was how commoners addressed her. He should have said Your Highness. It made no difference to her, of course, other than providing amusement. “What purpose need there be?” she said.

The boy’s face spoke of difficulty. “Begging your pardon, Your Majesty, but it seems very strange that you would invite so many of us to sit with you individually... without purpose.”

“Why should it be strange?” she said.

He had no answer, and the silence returned.

She looked at her clock filigreed in silver. “You may go now,” she said. As the boy stood, she added, “Please send in the next person as you leave.” She watched him go.

‘It’s finally the girl’s turn, isn’t it?’ said Mehlsanz. ‘Please tell me it is. I’m so sick of this waiting.’

Helen glanced at the reaper by the furnace. To her eyes, Mehlsanz was a ghostly gray thing, vaguely feminine in form, and perhaps even beautiful, in a haunting way. ‘Indeed,’ Helen said. ‘I honestly do not care much for the waiting, either.’

‘You couldn’t come up with a plan that required less patience?’”

"119

‘I would have thought a reaper of death to be well-suited to the task of waiting.’

‘Suited. Not pleased.’

When the large doors opened once more and a young woman entered, Helen stood to greet her. “Please have a seat,” she said.

The girl sat. She removed the sheathed sword from her belt and rested it by her side--a respectful gesture, if a bit antiquated due to the decline of swords among the Queen’s Guard.

Lynnette Edith was her name. Only nineteen, according to her file, but her sharp eyes and harsh cheek bones made her look older. Her caramel brown skin clashed against the white-and-blue uniform. She kept her wavy, raven hair in a braided ponytail that came over her shoulder, and she was clearly not afraid to look the Queen in the eye.

“Do you carry that weapon wherever you go?” Helen asked.

“Yes, I do, Your Highness.”

Helen did not let the silence last. “You are curious as to your presence here, no?”

“Yes, ma’am. Everyone is.”

“It is all a ruse,” the Queen said.

“Ma’am...?”

“To organize this very meeting with you,” she explained. “If I met with you out of the blue, everyone would wonder why. You would be given far too much attention, which would ruin everything. If I meet with all one hundred and twelve of my Guard, however, then this meeting here becomes a matter of course.”

Lynnette’s posture stiffened. “Why would Your Highness wish to have a secret meeting with me? What could I possibly--?”

“You are one of the few people in this castle whom I believe I can trust. Most of your peers carry obligations toward their families, which exist within a sphere of complications and nuisances, to put it mildly. Your family, however, affords me no such trouble.”

--donation bonus (day #5, post 2/5)--

"My family, Your Highness?" said Lynnette. "Because I am lowborn...?"

"Indeed," she said plainly. "Lowborn families are rare, and while I am under no delusions that this alone renders you without ambitions or unequivocally loyal to me, I believe the fact that you are also ostracized by your comrades splits the difference."

The young woman's ice blue gaze hardened. "They don't ostracize me, Your Highness. I ostracize them."

"Oh? And why is that?"

"Because... ah... I must apologize, Your Highness. I spoke carelessly."

"No," said Helen, returning to her chair of velvet and rosewood.

"Please speak candidly."

Lynnette took a moment to become certain again. "They are undisciplined, elitist fools, Your Highness. They think every minor effort they put forth deserves praise and rewards."

The Queen's hands came together at their fingertips. "I knew I would like you." She could hear Mehlsanz chortling.

The girl's expression betrayed nothing of her thoughts.

Helen decided to move on. "So. What have people been saying about my sudden interest in my guardsmen? What rumors have you heard?"

Lynnette seemed reluctant but answered nonetheless. "Most people seem to think you're looking for someone to investigate the assassination attempt in secret, because you don't trust the official investigators."

"Ah. I thought as much. Is that what you believe, as well?"

"In all honesty, ma'am, I don't really listen to rumors. I find them tedious."

"That is unfortunate, because you are going to start," said Helen. "You are my secret ally. You will tell me what others are afraid to. Listening to rumors is now very much worth your time."

“But, Your Highness...”

“I believe I have made myself clear.”

She straightened, and then nodded. “Yes, ma’am.””

”121

--donation bonus (day #5, post 3/5)--

“You must tell no one of your work. Not your family. Not your friends. Not your superiors. No one can support you in these endeavors, except me.”

“What endeavors, ma’am?”

“Two days from now, you will begin to observe my brother Nathaniel’s chambers in secret.”

“Prince Nathaniel? May I ask why?”

“At that time, I am almost certain that someone will attempt to plant evidence that implicates him as the assassin. I want you to remove said evidence and then follow the person who planted it.”

Lynnette blinked. “Why would someone want to frame him?”

“Because he is guilty.”

Lynnette blinked again. “W-what? I don’t understand...”

“I have seven brothers,” the Queen said. “Nathaniel is by far the most foolish. And while that does not allow me to forgive what he has done, there is no doubt in my mind that someone is using him. I want you to help me discover who my true opponent is.”

The young woman’s expression wavered for only a moment. “I understand, Your Highness. I will do as you command.”

“Thank you, Lynnette. However, I must tell you, your circumstances will temporarily worsen, and I will not be able to improve them without revealing my intentions to my enemies. I am going to have you demoted to nightly patrols, where your absence among the Guard will be least problematic, but it will still not go unnoticed. Your superiors may have you removed from the Queen's Guard entirely."

"I understand..."

"Endure this hardship for me, and I shall show my gratitude as only I can. You and your entire family will want for nothing. That is my promise."

"Thank you, Your Highness."

"122

--donation bonus (day #5, post 4/5)--

"Please recite your task back to me."

"In two days, I will begin observing Prince Nathaniel's bedchamber. When someone arrives to plant evidence, I will remove it and follow the perpetrator, where I will attempt to learn the identity of the person responsible."

"It will likely be one or more of my brothers. I merely need to know which."

"Yes, ma'am."

"Now be on your way. If anyone asks what happened during our meeting, tell them that you sat with me in silence, just like everyone else."

"As you command." Lynnette stood and returned her sword to its place on her belt.

"And please send in the next person on your way out."

Lynnette nodded and exited the drawing room.

Helen eyed the reaper. 'I would like you to accompany her when the time arrives.'

'You don't trust her to follow your orders?'

'This is not just about finding my enemies,' the Queen said. 'I need new allies. I hope you will be able to tell me if she is as trustworthy as I think she is.'

'Alright. I suppose I don't have anything better to do.'

The next member of the Queen's Guard entered, and Helen bade him sit, allowing the quiet to return in force.

Mehlsanz floated around the new guest, eyeing him and soon growing bored. 'Do you really have no idea who convinced Nathaniel to kill you?' she asked.

'I fear I do not know my family as well as I should. I have often wondered what my father was thinking when he chose me as his successor. Surely, he must have known the ire it would earn me.'

'He must've really believed you were the best person for the job.'"
"123

--donation bonus (day #5, post 5/5)--

'Perhaps,' said Helen. 'But the tradition of primogeniture is not so easily ignored.'

'Well, yeah. I doubt your father intended for the succession to get you murdered.'

'Given my circumstances, it now seems more likely that my father appointed me not because he believed I would do well, but because he believed others would do evil.'

'Hmm.'

'The most irritating part of it all is that I saw the assassination coming in time, and yet I could not save myself. Suddenly, my most trusted subordinates were nowhere to be found. I died, because I misjudged the true characters of my friends.'

'Ah. Hence, your determination not to make that mistake twice.'

'Yes...'

--++-++-++-

Sitting in his room, Hector scratched his head as he struggled over his algebra homework. Garovel floated next to him, reading the newspaper sprawled across his desk.

The rest of the school day had gone rather strangely. His new group of lunch friends had been extremely apologetic, even though he couldn't imagine what they had to feel sorry for. They ended up discussing television and pudding, afterwards, though Hector mostly just listened.

Carpentry club had been the real surprise, however. Word had gotten around of Hector's tumble down a flight of stairs, and when he had hobbled into the clubroom, thinking he would get a bit more work done on his helm, he had been assailed with a slew of inquiries and concerns about his health from everyone in the club. People who had ignored him for the past year were suddenly talking to him again. He handled the situation the best way he knew how. By running away. Or waddling briskly away, at least."

"124

'Turn the page, please,' said Garovel.

He did so. "How much do you know about the Queen, anyway?"

'Not much. I know she's quite young for a functional monarch. Still in her early thirties, I believe. And I know it was a big deal when she was appointed by her father.'

"Oh yeah, I remember that. It was only like four years ago, wasn't it?"

'Yeah. She's the youngest of eight direct descendants, and all seven of her siblings are male. The King broke Atreyan royal tradition in a big way by choosing her.'

"That's right... I remember 'cause everyone thought she'd rule in name only or just... have her power taken away as soon as her father died... but he died like a year later, and nothing's changed. Well... until now, I guess..."

'I wonder if one of those siblings is responsible for the attempt on her life.'

Hector's brow receded. "One of her own brothers...? That'd be so fucked up...”

‘Well, when you have that kind of power within your reach, and you’re raised to believe it’s your destiny or some stupid shit like that, only to see it given to someone else... I mean, who knows if that’s really the case? But it’s not hard to imagine, given what a huge fuss was made over her appointment initially.’

“Geez...”

‘Shouldn’t you be focusing on your math, by the way?’

Hector sighed. “I should be meditating...”

‘You meditate way too deeply, you freak. I need you to turn the pages for me right now.’

“Maybe I can just... hang the pages from the ceiling, and you can float around them or something...”

‘Just do your damn homework. You can meditate later.’”

"125

“Ugh... Y’know, I thought you’d be a faster reader than this.”

‘Oh, I’m sorry. How many non-native languages can YOU read? Because I’m only fluent in about three hundred or so.’

Hector blinked. “Three hundred?!”

‘Well. A good number of them are dead, but still.’

“Hmm... You’re thousands of years old, though. So that’s only like one new language every hundred years. Not all that impressive, really.”

‘Oh, shut up.’

After quietly agonizing through a few problems with trigonometric functions, he was relieved to hear Garovel begin musing again.

‘Hmm...’

“What’s the matter?”

‘It’s just, this article...’

“Are you gonna start spinning wild theories, now?”

‘No.’ A beat passed. ‘Maybe.’

“Ha.”

‘It says the Queen informed her own guards of the attack an hour after it occurred.’

“Huh... Is that odd?”

‘Well. Kind of. You’d think the Queen’s Guard would be a bit more on the ball, wouldn’t you? Even if they’d been unable to stop the assailant, shouldn’t they have at least known there was one? If not right away, then surely within an hour?’

“Well... uh... maybe there wasn’t an assailant. Maybe someone just poisoned her drink or something, and no one saw who.”

‘Hmm. It says here that the Queen was “in a state of confusion” and has yet to remember any details of the attack. What the hell does that mean?’

“Yeah, I dunno about that one...”

‘Apparently, she’s scheduled a public press conference a few days from now, and they’re expecting more details then.’

“Weird... It’s already been three whole days, right?”

‘This sounds like... a reaper may have been involved.’

Hector reared back. “W-what? What makes you think that...?”

"126

‘Mainly, the fact that it took her an hour to report the attack, but also the fact that no one else seems to know anything about it. Perhaps the reason she waited so long was because the assassin actually succeeded in killing her.’

“Damn... a reaper revived the freaking Queen?”

‘There could be some other explanation I’m not thinking of. But it’s not unheard of for reapers to take on people in positions of power and try to use that person for some purpose.’

“Holy shit... are you saying what I think you’re saying...?”

Garovel looked at him heavily. ‘If a reaper is controlling the Queen, then we’d better find out what their intentions are.’

“They could... they could start a fucking war, couldn’t they?”

‘It’s a possibility.’

“...What do we do?”

‘Hmm.’ Garovel moved away from the paper. ‘It’ll be dangerous, but I think we should go to the capital and try to see the Queen.’

“Really? But, um... should we, uh... should we really just leave Brighton? I mean... what about Geoffrey? He could be hurting people. I feel like we should... uh, stay and... kill him...”

‘That’s another reason why I want to go, actually. I’m wondering if the Queen’s reaper can tell us anything about what Geoffrey is. If they chose to revive a queen, then they’re probably more informed about circumstances around the world than I currently am.’

“Hmm. But even still... there’s no way we’d be able to get an audience with the Queen. I mean... even if someone hadn’t just tried to kill her...”

‘I can go in alone.’

Hector just lowered his brow."

"127

‘Don’t give me that look. Meeting her won’t be dangerous. If she’s just been revived, then she won’t be able to hurt me yet. But I definitely want you to escort me everywhere else. We might not be the only reaper and servant to pay her a visit.’

“You think so? Do you, uh... do you think I’m ready to fight another servant?”

Garovel fell quiet a moment. 'We won't engage anyone like that unless we absolutely have to. But all the same, you'd better start meditating.'

"Right..."

'Oh, but before you do, lay out the classified ads for me.'

"What for?"

'I'll see about finding you transport. Sescoria is a good four hundred kilometers away. You can't just run there.'

"So I'll take a train."

'Yeah... Problem with that is, we might have to leave Sescoria in a hurry. If we're getting chased, you won't exactly have time to stand around waiting for a train to arrive.'

"O-okay, but... I don't even have a driver's license..."

'I'll give you a day to practice.'

"Oh, gee, a whole day?"

'Twenty-four hours of nonstop practice should be more than enough to get the basics down.'

"Uh, but it's still illegal..."

The reaper shrugged. 'Eh.'

He sighed. "This is gonna end with me impaled on a fencepost or something, isn't it...?"

'Probably.'

"Ugh..." Hector rubbed his face. "This whole thing feels like a terrible idea..."

'I know it does. But a hell of a lot of lives could be in danger. And if they aren't, then so much the better. It could still be an opportunity to make a valuable ally.'

"Yeah... I guess you're right..."

'We only have a few days before her public appearance. Let's not waste them.'

He nodded."

"128 -- XIV.

Chapter Fourteen: 'Foul souls, gather ye wits...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Timothy Swank ducked into an alley and held his breath. In a cold sweat, he listened for the footsteps to pass. They did not.

"Are you trying to hide from me?"

He saw the figure there and screamed. "Please...! D-don't...!"

"Oh, stop your shrieking," said Geoffrey. Only, it wasn't Geoffrey. It was one of his expressionless puppets. This one was a girl, and she might have been cute before, but now her sickly pale skin and listless eyes just made Swank want to run away. "I am not going to kill you, Mr. Swank. You are much more useful to me alive." The rest of her face didn't match the words coming out of her mouth at all.

He swallowed the lump in his throat and tried to shrink into the brick behind him. "You can make them talk," he said, trying not to tremble too visibly. "You weren't doing that yesterday..."

"Yes, I know." The puppet girl's smile made Swank cringe.

"I s-still don't know where Colt is... so, u-um... I mean, I'm looking. Of course I'm looking. But he's just--no one's seen him, so, ah, I d-don't... please..."

"I see. How unfortunate. I just wanted to check in. I am about to go into a meeting, but please keep searching in the meantime." A red vapor released from the girl's skin like a kettle just gone off, and she collapsed to the ground, twitching.

Swank thought he might vomit.

The past few days had been hell. He'd barely managed to escape the Rofal mansion with his life. Between Geoffrey, Colt, and that freaky kid in the mask, that place had been an absolute minefield, but somehow, shitting his pants in the corner of the room had been enough to render him beneath notice."

"128 -- XIV.

Chapter Fourteen: 'Foul souls, gather ye wits...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Timothy Swank ducked into an alley and held his breath. In a cold sweat, he listened for the footsteps to pass. They did not.

"Are you trying to hide from me?"

He saw the figure there and screamed. "Please...! D-don't...!"

"Oh, stop your shrieking," said Geoffrey. Only, it wasn't Geoffrey. It was one of his expressionless puppets. This one was a girl, and she might have been cute before, but now her sickly pale skin and listless eyes just made Swank want to run away. "I am not going to kill you, Mr. Swank. You are much more useful to me alive." The rest of her face didn't match the words coming out of her mouth at all.

He swallowed the lump in his throat and tried to shrink into the brick behind him. "You can make them talk," he said, trying not to tremble too visibly. "You weren't doing that yesterday..."

"Yes, I know." The puppet girl's smile made Swank cringe.

"I s-still don't know where Colt is... so, u-um... I mean, I'm looking. Of course I'm looking. But he's just--no one's seen him, so, ah, I d-don't... please..."

"I see. How unfortunate. I just wanted to check in. I am about to go into a meeting, but please keep searching in the meantime." A red vapor released from the girl's skin like a kettle just gone off, and she collapsed to the ground, twitching.

Swank thought he might vomit.

The past few days had been hell. He'd barely managed to escape the Rofal mansion with his life. Between Geoffrey, Colt, and that freaky kid in the mask, that place had been an absolute minefield, but somehow, shitting his pants in the corner of the room had been enough to render him beneath notice."

Geoffrey was decidedly not his uncle. Joseph Rofal understood that killing his employees for failure served no purpose. Geoffrey did not. Or perhaps he did and just didn't care, because simply fleeing was also out of the question. Two men tried to leave the city the other day. Geoffrey had their heads in his office now.

The search for Colt had not been much better. Of the three men that Swank sent to retrieve Colt's personnel file from the police station, only one returned, delivering a message to stop looking for the man. Geoffrey killed the poor bastard anyway.

He had no idea what to do at this point. The Rofal empire was a sinking ship, and its new captain didn't give a shit, because he was a fucking shark.

Swank left the girl's body where it was. He pulled his coat's collar up around his neck and stuffed his hands in his pockets as he walked. He had been on his way to a bar, and now, the idea of getting hammered out of his mind seemed even more appealing. It wouldn't do much to settle his stomach, but that wasn't really the point, anyway. He turned into his usual place, the neon green sign reading Bart's Bar. It was an arm-pit of an establishment, but he had yet to find a place with cheaper booze. He took the first seat he saw and petitioned the bartender for a bottle of vodka.

Not long into his drink, however, a man on the other side of the room got up and ventured over. "Are you Swank?"

Swank nearly told him to fuck off, but after reflecting for a moment on his recent string of luck, he decided he'd try not to piss off a total stranger. "Yeah. Who are you?"

"130

"Oh, I'm no one important," the man said. "But I've been waiting here because I've heard you're the guy to ask about getting certain jobs done."

Swank could not imagine a more annoying answer. Still, he restrained himself with another mouthful of vodka and said, "That so?"

"I hear your boss is a man with discreet interests."

Swank rolled his eyes. "I guess you haven't heard that he's also dead now."

For some reason, the man took that as an invitation to sit down. "I'm sorry to hear that. Does that mean you're in charge now?"

"No."

"So you have a new boss, then. Perhaps I can meet him, instead."

He held back a laugh. "Trust me, guy. You don't wanna meet my new boss."

"Oh, but I do. The sooner the better, in fact."

Swank eyed the man. Something about the guy's face annoyed him, really clean-shaven with a chiseled jawline and a condescending look in his eyes. Swank took a longer swig. "On second thought, I'd like to see that, too."

--++--++--

Geoffrey tilted his head as he laid eyes on the lone pancake house. He hadn't been sure what to expect. Having to leave Brighton for some little town called Chesterville was strange enough to pique his interest on its own, but when he had also seen that the invitation was from the CEO of Boulder Inc., Geoffrey had been positively brimming with curiosity.

Alone under a luminous moon, he entered.

Five people sat around a pair of joined tables. They all turned to look at him--as did the five accompanying reapers.

Geoffrey gave an open-mouthed smile as he looked over everyone."
"131

"Have a seat, boy," said an older gentleman on the right.

Geoffrey approached them, and the reapers all edged away from him. To his eyes, each reaper looked very human, except a bit blurry and flickering like an old video recording. "Why did you invite me here?" he asked.

"Because I liked your uncle," the same man said. "Now be quiet. You haven't earned the right to speak at our table."

Geoffrey's smile tightened. "I do not like being told what to do."

The man held up an open hand and clenched it into a fist. "I said be quiet."

The air escaped from Geoffrey's lungs. His eyes bulged as he struggled for breath and found none available. He glared at the man and ran forward, but an invisible pressure held him back, sturdy as if a wall had been there.

Geoffrey lashed out with red, snaking around the room and across the table at the man's reaper.

The man stood and speared the shadow through the center with only an index finger. The shadow crackled and died. "I didn't know you were a monster when I invited you here," said the man, "but it changes nothing. You will learn respect, boy."

Geoffrey fell to his knees, able to breathe again. He scowled at all of them, but they paid him little mind.

"What were we talking about?" said someone with a low, scraping voice. This one was an even older gentleman, oily smudges all over his face and faded overalls. "Vincent?"

The man from before acknowledged his own name. "This business with the Queen," he said. "Each of our enterprises will likely suffer if blame for the attack is shifted to a criminal body."

"132

"You think so?" said a younger man. This one looked like a common office worker in a plain gray suit and black-rimmed spectacles. "Isn't that why we refused that idiot prince's request in the first place?"

"Yes," said Vincent, "but if the investigators don't realize it was his doing, then the result is the same. And I'm betting the prince will make sure they don't realize."

"Fair point," said one of the two women at the table. She was younger as well, with a plump, rosy face. "If the public believes some random criminal tried to kill the Queen, then there'll be a wave of support for stricter legislation and law enforcement across the board. Things'll only get harder for us."

"But the Queen must have her own plans as well," said the other woman. "She has clearly been taking her sweet time with this whole ordeal. She might just expose the true culprit on her own."

"Perhaps," said Vincent, "but if we can assist in that, we should. Or at least ensure a suitable scapegoat takes the fall."

"You want us to help the Queen?" said the oldest man. "Us?"

"She is young," said Vincent, "and likely now a servant as well. If she were to become indebted to us, our position would be much improved, wouldn't you agree?"

"Are you serious?" said the man in glasses. "That woman is going to have a target on her back, and not just from her brothers. If she really has a reaper now, then the Vanguard and Abolish must be watching her. One or both of them could send someone to kill her. Are you suggesting we get in the middle of that shitstorm?"

"133

"I'm not saying we should stick our necks out for her," said Vincent. "But I do think one of us should go to the capital and observe the situation. If things go badly enough, it may be best to pull up our roots and move to a new country."

"Fuck that!" said the man in glasses. "Atreya is my home. I'm not leaving for anyone."

The others all eyed him.

"That is your choice," said Vincent.

"We already have plenty of eyes in the capital," said the plump woman.

“Yes, but only a servant’s eyes will do. It has to be one of us.”

A brief silence fell over the group. “Are you volunteering?” asked the oldest man.

“If that is the group’s wish,” said Vincent. “But truth be told, I was hoping Roman would do it.”

The man in glasses cocked an eyebrow. “Why me? Gerald lives in the capital.”

“He can support you, but your ability is ideal for the task. If you need to kill anyone, you’ll have the easiest time making the body disappear.”

Roman frowned. “I do have my own affairs to run, you know.”

“I’m sure your second-in-command can handle things while you’re gone,” said Vincent.

“Ugh. Fine.” Roman looked at the old man in overalls. “Mind if I temp at your garage, then?”

Gerald looked similarly displeased. “Just as a cover, right? You won’t be doing actual work, will you?”

“I don’t even work at my real job. You think I want to touch your shitty cars?”

“As long as that’s clear. I have an actual clientele depending on my mechanics.”

Roman laughed. “Right. You just spend time with us because you like our personalities so much.””

"134

“A good reputation is easiest to maintain when part of the business is both legal and public,” said Gerald.

“Whatever, old man,” said Roman. “Vincent’s the only one of us who really needs a legitimate business.”

“A certain degree of independence is also important. But I don’t expect a thief to understand a businessman’s thinking.”

Geoffrey despised listening to this drivel. None of it was of any concern to him. Eyeing the reapers again, he wondered why none of them ever said anything. Perhaps they were hiding their voices from each other for some reason. Or from him. Unlike their human associates, the reapers seemed particularly wary of his presence, which pleased him to no end.

The people kept talking, but Geoffrey had ceased paying attention. Instead, he made a game of staring at the reapers, trying to see just how unsettled he could make them. His game came to an abrupt end, however, as Roman grabbed him by the neck and pinned him to the floor.

"My friend doesn't like you," said Roman. "And I'm inclined to agree with her."

"Stop," said Vincent. "The Rofal boy is my guest."

"This thing isn't even human," said Roman. "I don't see a reason to let it live." Roman's fingers dug through the red shadow and reached Geoffrey's skin.

His neck started to burn. The man's hand felt like acid against his flesh. Geoffrey cringed in real agony. But after a moment, he began to laugh. "You can actually hurt me!" he said, eyes widening eagerly. "Aha! More!"

Roman obliged, and Geoffrey's laughter turned to coughing.

Vincent stepped closer but did not intervene. "It's true that he requires discipline, but he could be a useful pet. And we can use him to leverage the Rofals for support. Killing him would certainly burn that bridge."

"135 -- XV.

Roman let up. "I'm not so sure these fucking things can be tamed, Vincent. Just look at him."

Each breath felt like swallowing fire, but the pain only delighted Geoffrey further. "Do you people know what I am?" he asked, voice raspy and torn. "Tell me!"

“Ah.” Vincent pulled the boy to his feet. “Learn to obey, and I will tell you all I know.”

Geoffrey’s expression soured.

Chapter Fifteen: ‘Behold! Thy deathly steed...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘This is the address that was in the ad,’ said Garovel.

‘I still think this is a terrible idea...’

‘Just ring the doorbell.’

Hector pushed the button and heard the chime go off inside the house.

A brawny, middle-aged bloke opened the door. He scratched his head as he looked at Hector. “Yeah?”

“Ah, I, uh... I’m the one who called earlier, uh... about your ad...”

“Ugh, you?” The man frowned. “Why ya gotta waste my time like this, kid? I thought you sounded young on the phone, but hell.”

“No, I, uh... I want to buy it for my dad.”

“Yeah, sure you do.” He started closing the door.

Hector stopped it with his hand. “Please, just...” He dropped a duffel bag full of cash on the doorstep.

The man eyed the money, and then Hector. “A gift for your dad, huh? Let me show you to the garage.”

Hector picked the bag back up and followed him around to the rear driveway. They entered a standalone shed where the man pulled a tarp off of a motorcycle.

“Here we are,” the man said. “You know much about bikes, kiddo?”

“N-not really, no...”

“Well, like the ad said, this is a Revenant Softail RS1800 Cruiser.”

“Right. Um... w-what do all those words mean, exactly?”

“135 -- XV.

Roman let up. "I'm not so sure these fucking things can be tamed, Vincent. Just look at him."

Each breath felt like swallowing fire, but the pain only delighted Geoffrey further. "Do you people know what I am?" he asked, voice raspy and torn. "Tell me!"

"Ah." Vincent pulled the boy to his feet. "Learn to obey, and I will tell you all I know."

Geoffrey's expression soured.

Chapter Fifteen: 'Behold! Thy deathly steed...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'This is the address that was in the ad,' said Garovel.

'I still think this is a terrible idea...'

'Just ring the doorbell.'

Hector pushed the button and heard the chime go off inside the house.

A brawny, middle-aged bloke opened the door. He scratched his head as he looked at Hector. "Yeah?"

"Ah, I, uh... I'm the one who called earlier, uh... about your ad..."

"Ugh, you?" The man frowned. "Why ya gotta waste my time like this, kid? I thought you sounded young on the phone, but hell."

"No, I, uh... I want to buy it for my dad."

"Yeah, sure you do." He started closing the door.

Hector stopped it with his hand. "Please, just..." He dropped a duffel bag full of cash on the doorstep.

The man eyed the money, and then Hector. "A gift for your dad, huh? Let me show you to the garage."

Hector picked the bag back up and followed him around to the rear driveway. They entered a standalone shed where the man pulled a tarp off of a motorcycle.

"Here we are," the man said. "You know much about bikes, kiddo?"

"N-not really, no..."

"Well, like the ad said, this is a Revenant Softail RS1800 Cruiser."

"Right. Um... w-what do all those words mean, exactly?"

"136

He squinted at Hector a moment, perhaps debating whether or not he wanted to answer that question. "Revenant is the name of the manufacturer," he explained. "Softail is a type of rear suspension-- basically means it's not as bumpy as other bikes might be. RS1800 is the model number. Cruiser is just a general type of motorcycle, as opposed to say, a sport bike or a touring bike or something."

"Ah... okay..." Hector eyed the bike's silver frame and black leather seating.

"It's about eight years old, now, and it has a hundred and eighty thousand kilometers. It's been good to me, but keeping it maintained has become more of a hobby than a need, these past few years."

Garovel started laughing. 'I hope you like skulls, because this thing has them all over the gas tank.'

"It, uh... it does actually run, right?"

The bike seller retrieved the key from a rack by the door, as well as a helmet and a jacket.

Hector tried to watch as carefully as possible while the man started the bike. He saw the guy turn the key in the ignition first, then turn a tiny spindle at the neck of the handlebars, then hold a metal clutch with his left hand, and then finally slam his foot down on the ratcheting lever beneath the seat. The engine roared to life, and the man took the bike out of the garage.

Hector watched him ride it up and down the street, and that was good enough for him. The money changed hands, as did the key and helmet, and Hector was soon wheeling the bike down the sidewalk.

The man told him that all the paperwork was in a compartment beneath the saddle, but Hector wasn't terribly concerned about it, and after seeing the money again, neither was the man.

He pushed the bike all the way to the empty parking lot of a long-abandoned department store. He took a deep breath as he stared at the machine."

"137

'Try not to wreck it before we even get it on the road,' Garovel said.

"Yeah, thanks..." He whipped his leg over the side and steadied himself. He was abruptly thankful it wasn't taller, because his feet barely reached the ground. He attempted to mimic what he saw the guy do before, but Garovel stopped him as he went to turn the spindle below the handlebars.

'Don't do that,' the reaper said. 'That's the choke. It enriches the fuel-air mixture in order to make the engine start more easily, but you only want to do that when the fuel is cold--or in other words, when the engine hasn't been started recently. Otherwise, you're just wasting fuel.'

"Oh... how the hell do you know anything about motorcycles, anyway?"

'I had a passing interest in them a few years back. I remember when I first saw one. Looked like a lot of fun. Then the guy riding it crashed into a hedge.'

"How comforting..." He started the engine.

'My knowledge is pretty spotty, though. You'll be shocked, I'm sure, but I've never actually ridden one personally, so you'll kinda be on your own with some things.'

With the engine roaring, Hector reverted to thought. 'Great... can you, um... can you at least tell me how to start moving?'

'Shift into first gear, and it should start going on its own, I think.'

'Uh... how do I shift into first gear?'

'There's a lever by your left foot. Push it down.'

He did as Garovel said, and indeed, the bike began to drift forward, slow enough that he could walk with it. 'Now what?'

Garovel hesitated. 'Um...'

'Really? That's the extent of your help?'"

"138

'Try the throttle,' said Garovel. 'Under your right hand. The brake is there, too.'

The bike surged forward, faster than Hector expected. He pulled on the brake, and the back tire came up. He fell out of the seat. The bike skidded slowly into him on its side.

Garovel floated over to him. 'Well. I guess the paint job wasn't important.'

The plan was to spend the entire day learning, of course. Garovel had allowed him to skip school, even, which gave Hector some idea of how important the reaper considered this trip to be. And as expected, the going was quite slow. He first practiced low-speed turns. Garovel advised him that for this type of motorcycle, turning at higher speeds would require countersteering, but to even reach those higher speeds, he had to be able to shift gears in a passable manner, which was perhaps the hardest part.

Shifting gears was an actual skill that he had to develop. It meant closing the throttle, holding the clutch, moving the lever with his left foot into the correct position, then easing off the clutch and throttling to pick up speed. Hector often released the clutch too quickly and ended up stalling the engine, but after a while, he started to get the hang of it.

Before attempting higher speeds, however, they decided to take a break. Hector had to fetch more fuel, anyway, and not being confident enough to actually ride to a gas station meant walking all the way there, purchasing a pair of canisters, filling them up, and overpaying the bearded clerk so that he didn't think too hard about what Hector wanted it for. He also grabbed a bite to eat and took the opportunity to meditate for a little while."

"139

‘Alright, try hitting me,’ said Garovel.

‘What?’

‘That’s how we’ll gauge your progress. If you can hit me, then you can hit Geoffrey. Or another reaper.’

‘Are you serious...?’

‘Hey, I’m not thrilled about it, either. Why do you think I didn’t have you practicing this as soon as I revived you? Once you get it down, you’ll be able to kill me.’

‘Then I definitely don’t want to practice on you...’

‘Oh, please. You’re not going to kill me on accident, Hector. Give me some credit.’

He pursed his lips. ‘Alright... here goes, then...’ Hector inhaled deeply and closed his eyes a moment. He made a fist and focused on it. Like anyone, he didn’t need to see his own fist in order to know where it was, but there was more to it now. He could place a presence into his fist, and it felt as if his entire arm had doubled in size. It hadn’t, of course, but there was a weight in his mind there, and he knew it was ready.

He smacked Garovel in the torso.

Garovel eyed him a moment, not looking particularly fazed. ‘Hmm. Well, I felt something at least. That was kind of pathetic, though.’

‘Gah...’

‘You sure you’re not holding back on me?’

‘I... I don’t know, I mean... I really don’t want to hurt you, Garovel...’

‘Okay, okay. Fine. How about just aiming for my perimeter, then?’

‘Huh? Perimeter?’

‘Yeah. You said you see me as a skeleton, right? So I have hands and feet and everything?’

‘Uh... actually, I’m not sure whether you have feet or not. I see hands, though, yeah. You want me to punch your hand?’”

"140

‘Yeah. Anywhere but my center, and you won’t hurt me.’

‘You’re sure about this...?’

‘Duh.’

‘A-alright...’

‘Don’t hold back. This is important, Hector. If you don’t learn this properly, we are both going to die. You understand? The only way to really stop a servant is to kill the reaper, and reapers can’t even touch each other, so it has to be you. Sooner or later, we will find ourselves in that situation, and if you can’t kill them, they will kill us. There is no doubt here.’

Hector nodded slowly. ‘Okay. I, ah... I won’t...’

Garovel’s brow lowered. ‘Excuse me? You won’t? Hector, what the--’

‘N-no, I meant, ah... I won’t let anyone kill you. I’ll protect you. Definitely.’

For a moment, the reaper just looked at him. ‘Well, prove it, then.’ He held out his skeletal hand.

Hector gathered his focus again. He envisioned the presence in his hand again. Determination colored everything in his mind. This had to work. Garovel’s life depended on it. He felt the massless weight, stronger than before. He threw the punch.

Garovel’s hand obliterated on impact. The reaper reeled back. ‘Agh, fuck! You asshole!’

‘Oh, shit! I’m sorry!’

‘Only joking.’

‘Agh, wha...?’

‘That was better, though. Good job. You’ve pretty much got it down, already, but you should keep practicing until it becomes second nature.’

‘You dick...! I really thought I hurt you!’

‘Oh, c’mon, that was funny.’

‘But your hand is gone! How does that not hurt?!’

‘Yeah, about that, um. It’ll grow back. And I don’t really feel pain. At least, not in the same way you do. It’s more like an extreme unease. It’s painful in the same way that a sudden surge of anxiety or fear is painful.’”

"141

Hector looked at him unhappily. ‘Geez... don’t do that again...’

‘Sorry.’

He looked at his fist, opening and closing it. ‘You were right, though. That was kind of easy...’

‘Yep. All it really takes is an acknowledgement of your imaginary mind as something real. Which, y’know, isn’t very difficult, given everything you’ve already experienced. But that’s just for the basics.’

‘Hmm. Why can’t normal people do this, again?’

‘Because the soul has to be carved out of the body first, which is something only accomplished by death.’

‘Does that mean Geoffrey died before, too?’

‘Egh, I don’t know. Maybe. But I got the impression he had been that way his whole life.’

Hector wanted to try materializing iron next, but Garovel said that could wait, so he returned to riding practice instead. He donned the riding helmet and mounted the bike. It was time to start picking up real speed.

He had not been looking forward to this part.

After going around in a circle and achieving his previous pace, Hector throttled up and shifted gears when Garovel told him to. The bike responded, and soon, he was going much faster than was comfortable. But that was the point of the exercise.

He sped across the massive parking lot, coming up to the edge and knowing he would have to make a gradual left turn. He moved the handlebars to the left, but the bike resisted and leaned the other direction.

‘Countersteer!’ said Garovel.

‘Oh, shit! But--!’ He struggled, and the bike just went straight.

‘Too late. Try to protect the bike, if you can.’

‘Fuck!’

The front tire hit the curb. The bike flipped, and he went flying."

"142

Hector hit the dirt head first. He tumbled over himself and landed just perfectly enough to see the bike sailing toward him. In the split second he had to react, he decided to embrace the madness and put his arms out wide to catch the bike. The rear tire crushed his ribcage, but his hands grasped the metal frame and held on.

Eyes wide, he set the bike down. He looked down at his caved-in chest and tasted a mouthful of blood. ‘It doesn’t hurt...’

‘I got to you just in time,’ said Garovel. ‘You’re welcome by the way. And nice catch.’

Practice resumed. By the time daylight began to wane, Hector had crashed several more times, though none so bad as before. When Hector finally felt as if he had acquired a passable degree of competence, the bike was hardly recognizable anymore with all its new dents and scratches.

As the engine began to make a fresh clanging noise, Hector slowed to a stop. ‘That can’t be a good sound...’

‘Yeah. But it’s fine. We don’t need the bike to last that long. It’ll probably get destroyed one way or another, anyhow.’

‘Really? It’s starting to grow on me, though...’

‘Don’t get too attached. I’ll be shocked if it’s not a smoldering pile of scrap in a couple weeks.’

‘Aww...’

--++--++--

“I h-have someone here who wants to meet you...” Swank squirmed under Geoffrey’s gaze.

“Oh? Show them in, then.”

Swank exited the room briefly and returned with the person in question.

“You are the man in charge?” said the stranger, smiling in a groomed, confident way. “You’re much younger than I anticipated.””

"143

Geoffrey was not in the most amiable mood. Mr. Vincent Boulder had told him to go home and talk to his family, which in itself was no terrible thing, but even so. Geoffrey was being told what to do again. And perhaps worse, he couldn’t actually refuse.

So when he set his sharp eyes upon this strange man, the first thought through Geoffrey’s head was that he would very much like to torture this person. So he did.

There was no need for a chair. Geoffrey pinned him to the floor with a blanket of red and stood over him, smiling and trying to decide which body parts he wanted next. Swank, of course, had left the room shortly after the agonized screaming began.

“Why are you doing this?!” the man kept saying. His face looked much better now, Geoffrey thought. Replacing the eyebrows with bloody gashes made him seem much less condescending. “What possible reason could you have for doing this to me?!”

"Hmm." Geoffrey stroked his own chin a moment. "How much do you like your nose, exactly?"

The man shrieked. "Please! Stop this! I'll do anything you want! Just--! Please! I only wanted to talk!"

Geoffrey's brow perked up. "Oh, right. What did you want to talk about, anyway? If it is something boring, you will not be leaving this room alive."

The man whimpered. "I-I'm an advisor to Prince Nathaniel... and I was asked to find someone who w-would... u-um..."

Geoffrey placed a red blade under the man's nose.

"Kill the Queen!" he said. "He asked me to find someone who would kill the Queen!"

"Aha." Geoffrey smiled curiously. "And you want me to do it?"

"I-I think we thought you'd just, ah, s-send someone else to do it..."
"144

"Oh. Well, no deal then."

"Y-y-you can do it yourself, if you like! It's fine! Do whatever you want! I'm sure Prince Nathaniel would appreciate that kind of can-do attitude!"

Geoffrey thought a moment. "By chance, did you ask anyone else to do this before me?"

"Uh, y-yeah, I did. But they refused. So I came all the way out here to Brighton, because I heard of the Rofal family's reputation--and might I just say, you have lived up to it most admirably. You certainly have. Why, I'm sure you're a much better person for the job, anyway. I don't know why I didn't come to you first, in fact. How silly--"

"Please stop talking."

The man just nodded.

Geoffrey frowned. "I suppose I should not kill you, then. My dear uncle said it was bad business to kill your employer, unless you wanted their job, and I certainly do not want yours.” He released the red shadow and used it to prop the advisor up on his feet. “When do you want me to do it?”

The man hesitated. “You don’t want to know why he wants her dead?”

“Not really, no. When do I kill her?”

“Ah--as soon as possible. Preferably before her press conference two days from now.”

Geoffrey just grinned.

“W-we tried to kill her before, you see, but we failed, and now Prince Nathaniel is worried, um, that-that she is going to expose him, so--”

“Yeah, whatever. Do I only get to kill the Queen, or can I kill some of the other royals, too?”

The man’s eyes bulged. “J-just the Queen, please...”

“Oh, very well.””

"145 -- XVI.

He had not forgotten what he heard the night before. Those five people with reapers had wanted the Queen to live, of course; but then, neither had they expressly forbidden him from killing her. So as far as he was concerned, he was not technically disobeying Mr. Boulder.

Geoffrey’s grin only widened the more he thought about it. “This is going to upset some people I know,” he told the advisor as they exited together. “But that only makes me want to do it even more. I wonder what they will do.”

Chapter Sixteen: ‘Trust thy suspicious heart...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The last day of meetings with the Queen’s Guard had begun. Helen sat across from yet another discomfited young man in abject silence.

Having Mehlsanz observe the castle for the past few days had been a rather convenient means of gathering information. Only two of Helen's brothers, Nathaniel and David, lived with her in Belgrant Castle, but all seven brothers were currently visiting. They had, of course, rushed to be by her side as soon as they heard the news of the assassination attempt. In fact, one of the reasons she had decided to employ this strategy was for the peace it afforded her from their incessant "advisement."

To her mind, the most likely culprit was her oldest brother, Prince Gabriel, as he had been the presumed heir to the throne before her ascension. And yet, according to Mehlsanz, Gabriel was not behaving strangely. If he was guilty, then he was hiding it well enough to fool someone he couldn't even see. However, Mehlsanz could not keep eyes on him at all times while still observing the others as well.

The young Lynnette Edith had thus far proven loyal. Mehlsanz had not seen her tell anyone of Helen's orders, even when asked by her comrades, but again, Mehlsanz could only give an incomplete account of events."

"145 -- XVI.

He had not forgotten what he heard the night before. Those five people with reapers had wanted the Queen to live, of course; but then, neither had they expressly forbidden him from killing her. So as far as he was concerned, he was not technically disobeying Mr. Boulder.

Geoffrey's grin only widened the more he thought about it. "This is going to upset some people I know," he told the advisor as they exited together. "But that only makes me want to do it even more. I wonder what they will do."

Chapter Sixteen: 'Trust thy suspicious heart...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The last day of meetings with the Queen's Guard had begun. Helen sat across from yet another discomfited young man in abject silence.

Having Mehlsanz observe the castle for the past few days had been a rather convenient means of gathering information. Only two of Helen's brothers, Nathaniel and David, lived with her in Belgrant Castle, but all seven brothers were currently visiting. They had, of course, rushed to be by her side as soon as they heard the news of the assassination attempt. In fact, one of the reasons she had decided to employ this strategy was for the peace it afforded her from their incessant "advisement."

To her mind, the most likely culprit was her oldest brother, Prince Gabriel, as he had been the presumed heir to the throne before her ascension. And yet, according to Mehlsanz, Gabriel was not behaving strangely. If he was guilty, then he was hiding it well enough to fool someone he couldn't even see. However, Mehlsanz could not keep eyes on him at all times while still observing the others as well.

The young Lynnette Edith had thus far proven loyal. Mehlsanz had not seen her tell anyone of Helen's orders, even when asked by her comrades, but again, Mehlsanz could only give an incomplete account of events."

"146

The drawing room's side door opened, and a blond-bearded man popped his head through. He looked directly at Helen. "I know you wished not to be disturbed, but I need to speak with you."

Helen excused herself and stepped into the adjacent room with him.

This man was William Belgrant. He was her husband. And in the event of her death, all the power of the Crown would pass to him.

According to Mehlsanz, he had been working harder than anyone else to find the assassin, but that somehow made him more suspicious in Helen's mind. If she was honest, he was the very last person she wanted to be responsible for the assassination attempt, but that was emotion talking, not reason, and she refused to let that blindside her.

Still, it made little sense for him to desire her death. Yes, he was the King consort and not the King regent, but there was no terrific discrepancy between the two, unless his political views were wildly different from what he claimed they were. And surely, fourteen years of marriage had taught her something of this man's heart. He may have had the biggest motivation to kill her, but she couldn't imagine him doing such a thing. At the moment, anyway.

Taking long, slow blinks with bags under his eyes, William led her to the other end of the L-shaped chamber, and motioned to the rather broad, elderly woman standing there--his aunt, Duchess Jezebel Belgrant. "She told me something that I thought you should hear," said William.

"I believe I know the assassin's motivation," said the duchess.

Helen merely waited for her to elaborate.

"It has to do with your tendency to... ignore certain members of your council. Most members, in fact."

"147

"I am not certain as to what you are referring," said Helen.

Jezebel frowned, and the many wrinkles on her plump face turned down as well. "You know there is considerable support for the expansionist movement, yes?"

"We believe your opposition to the movement is what prompted the attack," said William.

"Ah," said Helen. They weren't telling her anything she didn't already know. There wasn't much else that would spur one of her brothers to kill her. But these two probably didn't know that her brothers were responsible. All the same, she guarded her tongue. Until she knew their true loyalties, she saw little reason to give them information needlessly.

"I'm surprised you needed us to tell you," said Jezebel. "A queen should know her court better." The woman had never been short of criticism.

Helen gave a squinting smile. "I will take that under advisement. Can you tell me who leads the expansionist movement?"

"I'm afraid not," said the duchess. "There are at least a dozen council members supporting it, all of equal standing."

From the corner of her eye, Helen saw Mehlsanz phase through the wall. She decided to thank the duchess and the King for their information and return to the drawing room, reaper in tow.

‘You really think your husband did it?’ said Mehlsanz. ‘He seems like a decent man.’

‘I must be certain. I never gave it much thought before--and perhaps I should have--but I recall William being initially reluctant to marry me.’

‘Oh? And you weren’t?’

‘I... quite fancied him.’

‘Aha.’

‘He has never been terribly affectionate. But then, neither have I.’

‘Y’know, I had an arranged marriage, too. Though, I was a slave, so my parents didn’t really have a say in it, either.’”

"148

Helen took her seat again. ‘You were a slave?’

‘Only until I was old enough to give birth,’ said the reaper. ‘My master sold me off straight away. Little did they know that I was infertile.’

With the young guardsman still present in the room, the Queen just glanced at Mehlsanz.

‘Anyhow, you should really get some meditating done.’

‘I still do not understand how you could need me to protect you from anything.’

‘Yeah, well. The world is a bigger and scarier place than you yet realize, Your Majesty.’

‘Please do not call me that.’

‘Helen of the House Belgrant?’

‘Simply Helen will suffice.’

‘Okay, Simply Helen.’

'You...'

'Sounds like the title of a movie. "Simply Helen. Come along as one woman discovers what it means to be herself." I bet you'd go see it, too, you generic old biddy.'

'You are insufferable...'

'Yeah, you definitely would.'

'Please return to observing the castle.'

'Fine. Do your meditation while I'm gone.'

'Very well.'

The reaper left, and Helen attempted to do as she was asked, but she found it incredibly difficult to meditate with a stranger watching her. Surely, the guardsman must have thought she was sleeping, and the idea that he would then return to his comrades and tell them of how he saw the Queen sleeping on the job was more than enough to disturb her focus.

At length, however, Mehlsanz interrupted her vain efforts. 'Oh no...'

'What is it?'

'I found a wandering soul in the basement. Someone died down here. And recently, too.'

'How recently?'

'Hours, at most.'

-+--+--+--

Hector didn't mind the highway so much. The turns were long and gradual, and there wasn't much traffic this early in the morning. The only bad part was having to avoid road debris. He couldn't just run over a blown-out tire or a plastic jug and expect to keep control of the bike."

Save the dwindling towers of Brighton, rolling green hills filled all horizons as he sped across the road. White and dark clouds spotted an otherwise blue sky, and Hector could see a faint drizzle gathering on the visor of his helmet. Garovel had pointed out that it was unsafe to continue using a helmet that had already been involved in a collision, and Hector had promised to find a new one at the earliest convenience, since they were obviously so safety conscious.

He couldn't remember a time when he saw the Atreyan countryside so clearly. The most mundane things drew his gaze. A massive, lone tree, branches sprawling higher and wider than anything he'd seen in Brighton. A quaint flock of sheep grazing on a hill, shepherd and dog not far away. The faint shadow of eastern mountains on his right, thankfully not between him and Sescoria.

Then he felt the bike shake beneath him and realized he was straddling the yellow ridges in the middle of the road. He corrected his course and decided to save his gawking for later.

'There are some things I should tell you before we get there,' said Garovel.

'Things?'

'In particular, names. I don't know what we'll encounter in the capital, but I figure this'll become relevant eventually, anyway, so I might as well tell you now.'

'Okay.' Hector was just trying to keep his eyes on the road.

'With reapers, there are two big entities: Abolish and the Vanguard. The balance of power shifts between them. Though, for all I know, there could be a third major power these days. I'm a bit out of the loop, if that wasn't already obvious.'

'Hmm. These two sides are at war?'

'Constantly. All over the world. Been that way for ages.'

'Geez... what are they fighting about?'

"150

'Well,' said Garovel, 'you remember how I said that some reapers are trying to make things worse?’

‘Yeah?’

‘I was talking about Abolish. That’s what they do.’

‘Why?’

‘The main reason is that they all want to “move on” into the afterlife. See, they believe that the reason reapers exist is to ferry human souls into the afterlife; and moreover, they believe that once there are no more souls left to ferry, our “purpose” will have been fulfilled, and we will then be able to proceed into the afterlife ourselves.’

‘But... is that, I mean... is that true?’

‘No. It’s bullshit. There’s absolutely no reason to believe we’d be magically transported to another plane of existence just because everyone on Eleg dies.’

‘Y-you’re sure?’

‘Even if we suppose that it is true, I still think it’s fucking crazy to use it as justification to destroy humanity.’

‘Eesh... They really wanna destroy the human race? I mean... that’s just so...’

‘Stupid?’

‘It’s just... you guys can still die, right? I mean, if these Abolish guys wanna get to the afterlife so badly, then why don’t they... y’know... have one of their servants kill them or something?’

Garovel sighed. ‘Because they believe in that fucking thing called “destiny.” They think a higher power has ordained us to be reapers, and if we kill ourselves to avoid that divine responsibility, then we get punished in the afterlife. Or some shit like that--I dunno. It’s all very disturbing. And also, because they’re cowardly, deluded bastards.’

‘But... wouldn’t a higher power or whatever... have a problem with them killing everyone?’

‘One would think. Hey, I told you they were fucking crazy.’

‘Gah...’

‘Though, I imagine that some reapers have actually done that before-- just trained up a servant in order to end their own lives. But obviously, those reapers would be dead now, and not causing problems for us.’

‘Mm, good point...’

"151

‘And honestly,’ Garovel went on, ‘I don’t think all the members of Abolish actually believe it, either. I think some of them just relish the opportunity for destruction. Which, y’know, I can almost understand. Destroying things is fun. But not when it causes wanton misery and death.’

‘That kinda sounds like... someone we already know...’

‘You noticed that, too, huh? I’ve been wondering if Geoffrey is somehow tied to Abolish, as well. But if he was, you’d think that he would’ve already known what reapers are before he met us.’

‘Maybe he was lying.’

‘Eh, that’s a strange thing to lie about. And I’m not sure Geoffrey even knows how to lie. He was more than happy to talk about his murders.’

‘Ah... so then, what about this, uh... Vanguard group? They’re trying to protect the world?’

‘Yeah. You have to understand, though, that both groups can be broken down into tons of smaller factions, each with slightly different goals or variations on the beliefs of the whole. While we might be able to find allies in the Vanguard, we can’t count on them to always be friendly. I remember a few reapers there that we really don’t wanna be around.’

‘Wait. Are you a member of the Vanguard?’

‘I used to be. My last servant and I worked with them for a long time, so I know a lot of reapers there.’

Hector’s brow perked up. ‘Your last servant... what happened to him? Or... her?’

‘We’d been together for a while, and he’d grown tired of it all. He decided that he was ready to die, so he asked me to release him. And I did.'

'What was he like?'

'Some other time. Right now, you need to know the big names--the most powerful servants in the world, that is. The names that everyone knows not to fuck with, including us.'

'Ah, uh--okay...''

"152

'There are four names you need to be particularly aware of. They are Dozer, Morgunov, Sai-hee, and Sermung.'

Hector squinted. 'Dozer...?'

'You know how there's also a country called Dozer, right?'

'Yeah...?'

'That's not a coincidence.'

'Oh...'

'Morgunov and Dozer both lead Abolish, even though they're said to hate each other. Sermung leads the Vanguard by himself, and Sai-hee is neutral.'

'This Sermung person fights two at once?'

'It's not just them, remember. They have armies of reapers and servants supporting them, and even though they might be the most famous, their highest ranking subordinates are also extremely powerful. But yes, Sermung is an absolute monster.'

'I see...'

'Age is generally the determining factor. These four people have been emperors of the community for, I dunno, two or three hundred years now; and that's because they've survived the longest. I think Sermung is about six hundred years old, and I think the others are all similar.'

‘Eesh...’

‘I know a little more about Sermung, because I actually met him before--him and his reaper, Tenebrach.’

‘Whoa, what were they like?’

‘They were a fiercely impressive pair. Honorable, intelligent, and... they had this odd presence that was just... overwhelming to be around.’

‘You said... he’s six hundred years old, but... isn’t that actually kind of young? I mean, if the oldest servants are the most powerful, then I would’ve thought he’d be like... as old as you, basically. Y’know, thousands of years.’

‘Ah. Yeah. Well. There’s a long and complicated history, but suffice to say, the most powerful people in the world tend to get killed, eventually. The longer an empire exists, the more prone to corruption and so forth it becomes. Sooner or later, new generations rise up; a massive power shift takes place; and then it’s utter chaos until a new balance of power is achieved.’

‘But not in the past couple hundred years, you said?’”

"153

‘Things have reached a kind of stalemate, I suppose. Big shifts in power generally require these rising stars--that is, servants whose power is skyrocketing because they’re constantly involved in huge conflicts. Which happens quite a lot, actually, but I think the trouble nowadays is that the emperors are all paying close attention to this. When they see some young gun making waves in the world, they don’t just ignore that person.’

‘What, so they just kill them?’

‘Or recruit them, yeah. That’s the deadliest time period in a servant’s growth. You suddenly have four giants breathing down your neck, and you’re left with a choice: pick a side, or try to survive long enough to become an emperor yourself. Which isn’t exactly a fun dilemma to be in. I know a lot of reapers intentionally release their servants before they reach that threshold just so they won’t be targeted.’

Hector’s eyes widened, and he shifted his hands. ‘A-are you gonna do that with me?’

‘Don’t be stupid. Of course not.’

‘But then... are you saying you want me to join the Vanguard? Or... become an emperor? Because I wasn’t really planning on, uh... I mean, I...’

Garovel laughed. ‘I just want you to stay alive, Hector.’

‘I... I mean, you’re talking about all this crazy stuff, but... I just wanna protect people... y’know, if I can...’

‘That’s good enough for me. We’ll worry about it later.’

Abruptly, Hector noticed a highway police truck coming the opposite direction. His posture went rigid, and he held his breath as he waited for it to pass. It did, and he watched in his side mirror, making sure it didn’t suddenly turn around.

After a few minutes, he relaxed again. Then he took the next turn too wide, ran off the road, and flipped the bike into a ditch."

"154 -- XVII.

Chapter Seventeen: ‘Hold thee dear...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector proceeded on, though the cruiser now sported a bent kickstand, a grass-smudged dent in the gas tank, and a missing left side mirror. His helmet had cracked open like an egg, and now he could feel the wind brushing the top of his head.

He soon stopped to refuel. He looked for a new helmet in the shop, but it didn’t have any.

‘Maybe you should just use your helm,’ the reaper suggested.

Hector reached into the satchel over the rear tire and pulled out the helm. The large gouge across the top right temple abruptly reminded him of his fight with Geoffrey.

‘Then again, maybe not.’

Hector pursed his lips to one side. 'I think I... hmm...' He pressed his palm to the metal and slowly moved it across the cut. In his hand's wake, the sundered metal was filled in. Once finished, he held it up to look at his work. His iron was clearly darker than the rest of the helm's sheet metal, so it looked like a kind of jagged scar with specks of iron splaying outward.

Garovel tilted his head. 'Hey. Since when have you been able to do that?'

'Uh... just now, I guess. I didn't really think it'd work, honestly...' He tapped a finger against it, and the iron rattled. 'Ah, it's loose, though. I couldn't make it fit perfectly...'

'Oh, why don't you just cover the whole thing?'

'Huh?'

'Instead of just filling it in, add an entire layer of iron.'

He blinked. 'That's a great idea...' He breathed deep and moved his hand all across the helm until it was completely darkened. The dents from the original molding were no longer visible. The new coating stuck fast, one solid chunk. 'Wow... it's a lot heavier now, but it's a lot stronger, too...'

'And it doesn't look so shit anymore.'"

"154 -- XVII.

Chapter Seventeen: 'Hold thee dear...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector proceeded on, though the cruiser now sported a bent kickstand, a grass-smudged dent in the gas tank, and a missing left side mirror. His helmet had cracked open like an egg, and now he could feel the wind brushing the top of his head.

He soon stopped to refuel. He looked for a new helmet in the shop, but it didn't have any.

'Maybe you should just use your helm,' the reaper suggested.

Hector reached into the satchel over the rear tire and pulled out the helm. The large gouge across the top right temple abruptly reminded him of his fight with Geoffrey.

‘Then again, maybe not.’

Hector pursed his lips to one side. ‘I think I... hmm...’ He pressed his palm to the metal and slowly moved it across the cut. In his hand’s wake, the sundered metal was filled in. Once finished, he held it up to look at his work. His iron was clearly darker than the rest of the helm’s sheet metal, so it looked like a kind of jagged scar with specks of iron splaying outward.

Garovel tilted his head. ‘Hey. Since when have you been able to do that?’

‘Uh... just now, I guess. I didn’t really think it’d work, honestly...’ He tapped a finger against it, and the iron rattled. ‘Ah, it’s loose, though. I couldn’t make it fit perfectly...’

‘Oh, why don’t you just cover the whole thing?’

‘Huh?’

‘Instead of just filling it in, add an entire layer of iron.’

He blinked. ‘That’s a great idea...’ He breathed deep and moved his hand all across the helm until it was completely darkened. The dents from the original molding were no longer visible. The new coating stuck fast, one solid chunk. ‘Wow... it’s a lot heavier now, but it’s a lot stronger, too...’

‘And it doesn’t look so shit anymore.’”

"155

Hector snorted a laugh. He considered coating the inside of the helmet as well, but he figured it fit his head snugly enough already. He did add smoother corners to the jaw, however.

‘Hmm. What else can you do with your iron?’

‘Uh... I’m not sure, actually...’

‘Try creating something from scratch. Like a replica of your helm.’

His brow receded at the idea, but he nodded and returned the helm to its satchel. He rubbed his hands together a moment, then slowly pulled them apart until it was as if he were holding an invisible ball between them.

Gradually, he could see the dust appear on his skin, gathering into powdery chunks, then into one larger mass, like grains of sand forming a tiny hill and climbing it.

But it didn’t take shape properly. Hector squinted as the iron amassed into an amorphous lump, far too small and nothing like the image in his head. He frowned at his work.

‘Wow,’ said Garovel. ‘You really did start shitting out metal turds.’

‘It doesn’t look like...’ His frown deepened. ‘Actually, it kinda does...’ He let the lump drop from his hand and made it disintegrate before it touched the pavement. ‘Specific shapes are too difficult,’ he said. ‘Just giving things a thin coating is way easier.’

‘I suppose that’s to be expected,’ said Garovel. ‘It’s like the difference between tracing a picture and drawing something completely new. But your skill is definitely growing. And iron coating could prove immensely useful. How much coating can you create?’

‘Let’s see.’ Hector stuck his arms out as if hugging the air in front of him. He concentrated, and the metal began to swirl around his fingertips. Iron powder collected together, covering his hands completely in lustrous metal, running up his wrists, reaching for his elbows. It stopped before touching his shoulders, however, and he shut his eyes, shaking his head. ‘I think that’s all I can get...’

"156

‘Well. Color me impressed, Hector.’

‘R-really?’

‘Yeah. Unless you’ve just trapped your arms in your own metal, that is.’

He smirked and annihilated the iron. He stretched his arms and popped his knuckles.

‘By the way, those people are staring at you.’ Garovel pointed to the pump station behind Hector, where a family of four was gawking with varying degrees of confusion.

Hector flushed red. “Uh... I was, uh... that... mgh...”

‘Time to go?’

‘Y-yeah.’ He donned his helm and gave the family a stilted wave before roaring out of the gas station.

His helm didn’t have a visor like the riding helmet, so he had to get accustomed to squinting against the bit of wind that made it through.

He came upon an amusement park with a big green sign that read ‘Serpent World’ in swirling letters. He’d forgotten it even existed out here. The place was famous for its winding coasters and snake exhibits. He remembered wanting to visit as a kid.

Seeing the park meant they were close to the capital, he recalled, and sure enough, no more than ten minutes later, he could see Sescoria’s skyscrapers in the distance. A couple of suburban towns still lay in the way, but they soon fell behind him.

Traffic picked up as he entered the city, and he stiffened his posture, trying to watch the road even more carefully. He eased to a stop at the first intersection. ‘So, um, how do I get to the royal palace?’ he asked as he waited for the light to turn green.

‘The Queen doesn’t live in the palace,’ said Garovel. ‘She lives in Belgrant Castle.’

‘Oh... then what’s the palace for?’

‘Ceremonies, international receptions, that sort of thing. Though, I’m sure she could’ve lived in the palace if she wanted. Some of her relatives probably do.’

‘Huh...’

‘You really should know more about your own country, Hector.’

‘I, ah... yeah, okay...’

‘Just keep going until you see Belgrant Avenue and turn right. Should lead us straight there.’

Hector had only been to Sescoria once before, years ago for a field trip in elementary school, and he didn’t remember much--just some museum, an old knights’ monument, and the palace itself, which was a massive, turreted affair with people always bustling through it. The city center, he discovered, was oddly similar in that regard. Pedestrians and vehicles filled the streets, and buildings were often rounded, if not perfectly cylindrical, with flat rooftops and arching windows.

Blue was a frequent color, he noticed. Sky blue brick here, pale blue wood there, even the sidewalk turned a faint blue as he rolled up toward the Belgrant Gatehouse.

To Hector’s eyes, Belgrant Castle was certainly no less impressive than a palace. Through the gaps between the fence’s thick, white bars, he could see a lush garden sprawling across an entire city block and a fountain splitting the center walkway up to the main entrance. The castle itself was a multi-towered structure, rising up four stories and flying Atreyan flags on both ends. He’d also heard that the rear of the castle extended out onto a small lake, but he couldn’t see it from this angle.

Passersby were starting to give him strange looks, so he removed his helm and held it under his arm. He saw two lines in front of the gatehouse: one for vehicles and one for foot traffic.

He looked at Garovel. ‘What’s the plan?’

‘You wait here, while I scout the situation.’

‘That plan sucks.’

‘No arguing. I’ll tell you if I need you.’

‘How would I get to you in time? Just climb the fence in broad daylight?’

‘Yes.’ Garovel grabbed Hector’s shoulder. ‘I don’t care if you have to break into the castle live on television. You get your ass over there and protect me.’”

Hector felt the vigor course through him. He inhaled deeply and exhaled a laugh. "Okay, I will," he said, drawing more discomforted glances. The sudden energy made every muscle in his body anxious. 'How long does this boost last?'

'Should last about half an hour before I need to renew it. So, I won't be long.'

He looked through the fence another time and saw numerous guards patrolling the grounds. 'Keep me updated.'

'Of course.'

-+--+--+-

The guards found the body stuffed into a storage locker. They said it was a young man named Mark Stockton. She remembered him. He was a serving boy, no more than seventeen. He often brought her meals. She doubted that was coincidence.

Helen decided to cancel the rest of her silent meetings. Time was no longer her ally, she realized. And besides, Mehlsanz refused to leave her side now, apparently afraid to chance upon the murderer without Helen to protect her.

She found her husband just outside their bedchamber. She dismissed the attendant he was talking to and pushed him into the room, shutting the door behind her. "I need to know something, and I need to know it now," she said.

The King straightened and met her gaze. "Yes?"

"Were you the one who tried to have me killed?"

His expression turned over on itself. He blinked and opened his mouth but hesitated. After a moment, his eyes narrowed. "Is that why you have been so distant these past few days? You suspect I had something to do with it?"

"Yes."

He lowered his brow and breathed a short laugh. "I always did like your candor.”

“I do not see what is amusing,” she said. “Goddess, William, if you had that boy killed because of some quiet grudge against me, then I--”

”159

“I did no such thing! Helen! How can you even think that I--?!” He stopped himself, pensive. He took a breath and scratched his brow. “No. I understand. This is just like you, isn’t it? Suspecting everyone. And as well you should, I suppose. But I promise you, I had nothing to do with it. Any of it.”

“Convince me,” she said.

His expression hardened. “Fine. What are your reasons for suspecting me, then?”

It was her turn to be reluctant. “Well, firstly... you did not wish to marry me.”

“Helen, that was a lifetime ago...”

“What was the reason? Or reasons. Tell me the truth, William.”

He cast his eyes at the floor briefly, frowning as he looked back up at her again. “I had feelings for another woman when we met. She was a commoner. My parents did not approve and so organized my marriage to you.”

A familiar story. Her brother David experienced something similar, though he did not go through with the marriage--or rather, he had gotten the woman to hate him so much that she refused to go through with it. As for William, Helen could believe him. She remembered how timid he was in those days, particularly around his family.

“I never resented you,” he said. He took a deep breath. “In fact, I... I’ve never loved anyone more in my life.”

Her eyes widened, and she turned red.

‘Wait, what?’ Mehlsanz floated around the two of them. ‘Why the hell are you blushing? You’ve been married to this guy for years, already.’

Helen struggled for the right words. "I did not realize you felt that way..."

"I often find it difficult to tell you my feelings..."

'Are you fucking kidding me?'

"William, I also... love you."

'Hold on, this is a trick, isn't it? You're trying to trick him, somehow.'

The King smiled.

The Queen smiled.

'Holy shit, it's not a trick.'"

"160

Helen's smile weakened. "I also thought you might resent me for never wanting children."

"Honestly, I never wanted children, either," he said. "My family wanted an heir, of course, but I was quite content with upsetting them by then."

'What the fuck is happening right now?' said Mehlsanz. 'You do remember that there's a murderer loose in the building, don't you? More than one, if you count Nathaniel.'

That brought Helen's attention back to the present, and she looked at William again. "If you are not the one responsible, then the most probable suspect is Gabriel."

The King blinked at her. "Gabriel?"

"Nathaniel poisoned my wine," she said. "I have known all along that he was the assassin, but I do not yet know who convinced him to kill me." She could see the gears turning in William's head.

He pressed a hand to his temple. "Gabriel... yes... He has been trying to convince me to support the expansionist movement for months now. He wanted me to talk to you about it. He thinks you don't listen to him."

"That is because I don't."

“His nationalism must be even stronger than I imagined if he would go so far as to have you killed. His own sister...” He straightened. “This changes things. I need to meet with my aunt again. She probably knows more about Gabriel than I do.” He moved for the door.

Helen stepped closer. “Before you do, can you find a guardswoman named Lynnette Edith and tell her to come see me?”

“Lynnette Edith?”

“I do not wish to see her in public, but I need to amend my orders for her.”

He nodded. “Very well.”

They paused a moment, standing by the door together, both abruptly realizing that their conversation had ended. Then the King kissed her, and they let it linger.”

"161

“Please be careful,” she said.

“You as well.” And he was gone.

Helen turned away from the door, rubbing her flushed face and trying not to look at Mehlsanz.

‘Well, aren’t you just adorable.’

She stiffened. ‘I was merely trying to ensure his cooperation.’

‘No, you weren’t.’

‘W-we are often apart, traveling internationally. Our relationship has-- has been very--oh, why am I justifying myself to you, anyway?’

Mehlsanz just laughed.

‘Excuse me,’ came another voice.

They both turned to see a second reaper hovering by the window.

‘I apologize for the interruption, but I’d like to inquire... Wait. Aren’t you Mehlsanz?’

'I am.' She tilted her head. 'Garovel?'

'You remember me. So it was you who revived the Queen, then?'

'Indeed.'

'I didn't think the Vanguard was in the habit of reviving royalty. Wasn't there a rule about that? Affecting the living world too greatly or some such?'

'I left the Vanguard,' said Mehlsanz.

Garovel floated closer. 'Why?'

'It's a long story. Reviving the Queen was my attempt to stop the Vanguard from hunting me down.'

'They want to kill you?'

'They don't just let you leave, anymore. It's not like it was when you were there, Garovel. I attached myself to her because now killing me also means killing her.'

'Ah.' Garovel eyed the Queen. 'A pleasure to make your acquaintance, Your Majesty.'

Helen nodded. "Likewise."

'What are you doing here?' said Mehlsanz.

'I was worried that whoever revived the Queen wanted to exploit her influence. I'm relieved to see that's not the case. Or is it?'

'Of course not. Did you bring a servant?'

'I did.'

'How powerful?'

'Why do you ask?'

Mehlsanz hesitated. She looked between Garovel and the Queen. 'I was backed into a corner. They were going to kill me. You understand?'

'I don't. What're you getting at?'

‘The Vanguard won’t come after me,’ she said. ‘But now... Abolish probably thinks that the Vanguard is trying to seize Atreya.’

“Give the lady a prize,” said a voice beyond the bedchamber door. A man entered, dressed as a butler. He had a reaper with him. “That is indeed why we have come.””

"162 -- XVIII.

Chapter Eighteen: ‘O, crashing pyre...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

She didn’t recognize his face. He was a redhead, young and stocky, and the butler’s suit barely fit him. She could see blood on his sleeves, as well as a guardsman on the floor in the hallway.

“Finally,” the man said, not even bothering to close the door behind him. “We’ve been waiting all day for a chance to talk to you alone.”

‘Less alone than we expected,’ said his reaper, eyeing Garovel. ‘And just who are you? You didn’t identify yourself as Vanguard, either.’

Garovel chose not to reply.

“Perhaps we are being rude.” The man pressed a hand to his chest. “My name is Desmond,” he said. “This is my friend, Ezmortig.”

‘Frankly,’ said Ezmortig, ‘we are relieved to hear that you are not with the Vanguard. And yet, after coming all the way here to Atreya, it would be a waste to leave now.’

“What do you want?” said Helen.

Ezmortig looked to Mehlsanz. ‘Your cooperation, of course. Having Queen Helen on our side would smoothen the transition.’

“Transition to what?”

‘War,’ said Mehlsanz.

Helen’s brow lowered. “I think not.”

“Now, now, Your Majesty. Hear us out.”

‘We’re listening,’ said Garovel.

Desmond stepped forward. “See, your brother, Prince Gabriel, he thinks he hired us. He doesn’t realize that we found him. And while he seems like a cunning man, I think everyone here can agree that he’s in a bit over his head, now.”

‘We don’t care who’s on the throne,’ said Ezmortig, ‘just so long as they’re ours.’

“The Prince wanted us to waltz right in, kill you, and be done with it,” said Desmond. “Which, admittedly, I’m still more than happy to do, but my friend here says that killing the Queen would cause a bit of a stir-- both politically and publicly. And I’m inclined to agree, because if it comes to a fight, I might accidentally destroy half this castle. So we thought we should at least give you a chance to make things easier for everyone. And hey, the best part is, you all get to live.”

"162 -- XVIII.

Chapter Eighteen: ‘O, crashing pyre...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

She didn’t recognize his face. He was a redhead, young and stocky, and the butler’s suit barely fit him. She could see blood on his sleeves, as well as a guardsman on the floor in the hallway.

“Finally,” the man said, not even bothering to close the door behind him. “We’ve been waiting all day for a chance to talk to you alone.”

‘Less alone than we expected,’ said his reaper, eyeing Garovel. ‘And just who are you? You didn’t identify yourself as Vanguard, either.’

Garovel chose not to reply.

“Perhaps we are being rude.” The man pressed a hand to his chest. “My name is Desmond,” he said. “This is my friend, Ezmortig.”

‘Frankly,’ said Ezmortig, ‘we are relieved to hear that you are not with the Vanguard. And yet, after coming all the way here to Atreya, it would be a waste to leave now.’

“What do you want?” said Helen.

Ezmortig looked to Mehlsanz. 'Your cooperation, of course. Having Queen Helen on our side would smoothen the transition.'

"Transition to what?"

'War,' said Mehlsanz.

Helen's brow lowered. "I think not."

"Now, now, Your Majesty. Hear us out."

'We're listening,' said Garovel.

Desmond stepped forward. "See, your brother, Prince Gabriel, he thinks he hired us. He doesn't realize that we found him. And while he seems like a cunning man, I think everyone here can agree that he's in a bit over his head, now."

'We don't care who's on the throne,' said Ezmortig, 'just so long as they're ours.'

"The Prince wanted us to waltz right in, kill you, and be done with it," said Desmond. "Which, admittedly, I'm still more than happy to do, but my friend here says that killing the Queen would cause a bit of a stir-- both politically and publicly. And I'm inclined to agree, because if it comes to a fight, I might accidentally destroy half this castle. So we thought we should at least give you a chance to make things easier for everyone. And hey, the best part is, you all get to live."'

"163

She saw Garovel and Mehlsanz exchange looks.

'Very well,' said Garovel. 'What exactly do you want the Queen to do?'

Helen was about to protest when Mehlsanz's voice silenced her.

'Listen. Only you can hear me,' she said. 'We're merely stalling, so don't fight. That man will kill all of us.'

"Well, the expansionist movement is a good start," said Desmond. "Greater militarization efforts would--"

‘Stop,’ said Ezmortig. ‘That was far too easy. I don’t know about this Garovel here, but Mehlsanz was Vanguard. She wouldn’t cooperate so easily.’

Desmond frowned. “What’re you saying?”

‘They’re up to something. Kill them now.’

Desmond smiled. “Can do.”

‘Wait a minute,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘We acknowledge that we’re no match for your servant. We’re simply--’

‘You’re lying,’ said Ezmortig.

Desmond approached, and Helen put herself in front of the reapers.

Mehlsanz touched Helen’s shoulder. ‘No helping it.’

Desmond held an index finger up to her face. “You don’t even have an ability yet, do you?”

Helen grabbed the finger, intending to break it, but it snapped right off. It darkened in her hand and started sizzling as Desmond backed away.

‘Get rid of it!’ Mehlsanz shouted.

She tossed it. The finger exploded in mid-air. Helen staggered back, half the flesh gone from her face.

‘He has a transfiguration ability!’ said Garovel.

“That’s right.” Desmond was there, and he grabbed the Queen by the neck, lifting her off the ground. “You’re not much of a fighter, are you, Your Majesty?”

Dizzy, Helen could only see through one eye, the other just a bloody gash, slowly growing back.

‘Behind you, Desmond.’

Lynnette’s sword hacked the man’s arm clean off, and Helen hit the ground. Desmond spun to swing at the swordswoman, and she hacked the other arm off as well.

He looked at his two stumps, then at her, and laughed. “Impressive. But you’re out of your depth, girl.”

Lynnette brandished her two-handed blade. Desmond dodged the next slash smoothly and swept at her legs, but she was ready, bounding back a step and slicing his foot off.

The foot was already sizzling, however, as it rolled to a stop in front of Lynnette's confused gaze. Helen tackled her to the ground, and the explosion rocked the whole chamber.

Helen's back and legs smoldered, sundered muscle and snapped bone under shredded cloth, but Lynnette was tucked safely beneath her, dazed and intact. "Please stay back, Lynnette," she said softly.

Desmond pulled her off Lynnette with his one returned arm. "I thought the guards were supposed to protect the Queen, not the other way around."

A heavy thud made the walls tremble.

"What was that?" said Desmond.

Helen elbowed him in the nose, making him release her, and she hit the ground flat.

Desmond shook his head and scowled, but another thud made him pause. He looked to Ezmortig. One more thud, and the ceiling gave way on top of him.

Through the rubble, a thick marble slab fell toward Desmond. He raised both sleeveless arms and caught it full on, making the floor crack beneath him.

A black figure was crouched atop the slab, grasping its broad edge with both hands and staring down at Desmond through a metal helm.

"You must be that other reaper's servant." Desmond grinned up at him, still holding the marble steady. "Nice entrance."

--++--++--

Desmond chucked the slab across the room.

Hector bounded off of it, coated one shoe in iron, and punted Desmond into the far wall, stuck waist deep.

‘Kill the reaper now!’ Garovel shouted.

Hector lunged for Ezmortig, swiping at him with iron-tipped fingers, but the reaper sunk through the floor first.

‘Nice try, bastard.’

Hector growled and looked back toward the others.

Lynnette was helping the Queen up, bloodying her uniform in the process. Helen steadied herself and saw Hector there."

"165

It was the first time Hector had ever gotten a good look at the Queen. Even on television, he'd only caught the odd glimpse of her. But perhaps now wasn't the most accurate depiction, either. She didn't look like she was having the best day, what with her blue-gray pantsuit in tatters and her makeup smeared with blood.

‘Introductions later,’ Garovel said preemptively. ‘We should leave.’

‘Your servant can't defeat Desmond?’ said Mehlsanz.

‘I don't know, but I doubt he can kill the reaper before Desmond brings down the building.’

Hector nodded. “Okay, we'll meet you at the bike.”

‘No,’ said Garovel. ‘There could be other enemy servants. We stick together.’

“Who is he talking to?” said Lynnette.

Desmond broke himself free of the wall.

‘Go now!’ said Garovel.

The Queen ushered Lynnette out of the room, and Hector brought up the rear, seeing Desmond starting toward them.

‘What did you say his ability was?’ Hector asked as they ran.

‘Transfiguration. He can make his body parts explode. I’ll explain if we make it outta this alive.’

A swarm of guardsmen were waiting in the foyer.

‘Tell them to get back!’ said Mehlsanz.

“Do not engage!” Helen yelled as they pushed through. “I order you all to move away from here!”

Hector looked back again and saw Desmond’s entire severed arm flying toward them.

‘That’ll kill everyone here!’ Garovel yelled. ‘Hector!’

He understood and jumped. He caught it by the wrist and pulled it tight against his chest. The darkened flesh crackled, burning. Hector rushed to cover his torso with metal.

The explosion ripped his arms and legs off. His metal shredded like paper. He flew over the crowd of guardsmen and smashed into a chandelier. Glass shattered and rained down on marble tile as he hit the floor and rolled up against a limestone pillar."

"166

Everything was red, presumably from blood in his eyes. He couldn’t breathe and was pretty sure he’d ruptured both lungs. He knew his limbs would soon grow back, but he couldn’t help panicking at not being able to feel them at all. Not being able to move. Not being able to speak. Barely being able to see or hear.

But after a moment, he felt someone pick him up. The numbness in his ears quickly subsided, and he turned his eyes up to see the Queen’s face there.

“I have you, young knight.”

“How is he still alive?! For that matter, how are you, Your Highness?!”

They made it out into the courtyard. More guards were there, and the Queen yelled at them to disperse as they pushed through.

Desmond was soon to catch up. However, he stopped, as did everyone else, when they saw the gatehouse crumbling ahead of them.

“Aww,” said Desmond. “I wanted to do it on my own.”

A broad-bellied man lumbered out of the rubble, arms like tree trunks. His red hair was a bit darker than Desmond's, and he could not have been any less than two meters tall. A reaper followed him.

‘Did you really have to destroy the gatehouse?’ said Ezmortig, overlooking the scene from the sky.

‘You made a mess first,’ said the new reaper.

Desmond laughed. “Hey, I tried to tell them we weren’t the people for this job.”

The big guy seemed to have nothing to say. By the look on his flat face, he scarcely seemed aware of what was happening.

Hector still needed more time to regenerate. He’d barely recovered his knees and elbows.

Aside from Lynnette, one of the guards had yet to flee as ordered. He was a bespectacled man, and he stepped toward the giant, fiddling with the black brim on his officer’s cap. “I really hate you Abolish guys,” he said. “Always recruiting these poor simpletons as servants. Aren’t there enough crazy assholes like that guy over there?”

‘Who the hell are you?’

“I’m Roman. And you fuckers aren’t welcome in my country.”

"167

‘And I’m Voreese.’ Yet another reaper appeared, straight out of the ground. ‘This is our land, you shitheads.’

“Oh, shut up,” said Roman. “No one cares what you have to say.”

‘Fucking brat! I’m the important one here! You’re just my servant!’

“You’d be dead if it wasn’t for me!”

‘No, you would! I’d have found a different servant! One who didn’t give me so much lip, you four-eyed fuckwit!’

“Imaginary bitch!”

The Queen set Hector down as his hands and feet began to form, bones emerging before the flesh around them.

Desmond rolled his neck and cracked his knuckles. “We’re more than happy to kill you newcomers along with everyone else.”

The big man charged at Voreese.

Roman slammed his foot down. The ground heaved up and flipped the big man toward Desmond like a pancake.

Desmond just moved out of the way.

Roman tossed his white coat to Hector. “C’mon, kid. This is no time to be free-ballin’ it.”

Hector turned beet red and hurriedly wrapped the cloth around his waist. He held it there with an iron band.

Another sizzling arm flew at the group.

Roman swatted it straight up into the air, and it exploded harmlessly. The big guy’s gut bulged, and a second later, he vomited acid.

The left side of Roman’s face and torso melted away, revealing raw bone and gooey, bubbling muscle. Undeterred, he raised a fist. It trembled and started crackling red, creating visible smoke. He put the hand out. Orange flames poured forth.

Their opponents split up to avoid the fire, and Roman pursued the big man.

‘What kind of ability does that guy have?!’ Hector was back on his feet.

‘Vibration of some sort. Keep your eyes on Desmond.’

Hector saw him approaching from the side. Desmond was still regrowing his arm. “I’ll hold his attention,” Hector whispered to the ladies. “Try to get behind him and take his head off.”

“Very well,” said Helen.

Lynnette nodded and readied her sword."

"168

Hector moved first, a frontal assault. Desmond dodged the punch and delivered his own to the gut, knocking Hector back a few steps.

Hector kept pressing. He coated both hands in iron and swung. Desmond caught the left hand and ripped it off at the wrist. He slammed Hector into the concrete, making a small crater.

Abruptly, Lynnette was there. But Desmond saw her and smacked the flat side of the blade before it could connect with his neck. Off balance, she struggled to maintain her grip, and this time, Desmond succeeded in sweeping her legs out from under her. She landed on her back, and Desmond left a severed hand in front of her face. For an instant, Lynnette and Hector could both see it darkening.

She didn't have time to crawl away. She was going to die. Hector knew it. Someone else was about to die in front of him.

The memory of Garovel's words flashed in his head.

Respond by becoming better.

Hector flexed his one hand. He focused on Lynnette, desperately demanding more from himself, more iron, more concentration, more everything; and for a moment, all the pain in his body wasn't numb anymore. Agony hit like a tidal wave. But the iron responded.

Powder materialized on her body, gray spots clustering together, and within seconds, the woman was entirely covered.

Desmond's hand exploded. Lynnette went flying and clattered to the concrete walkway. Hector hit the central fountain, reddening the waters with his blood.

His body in shreds again, he heaved himself out of the pool and clung to the side of the fountain. He saw Lynnette and released the metal. She did not stir.

Desmond and Helen were clashing now. With both arms again and only one hand missing, he was getting the better of her. He smashed her skull open against the ground. Her body went limp.

Desmond turned to Mehlsanz and Garovel."

"169

"Run away!" Hector told the reapers. He pulled himself out of the fountain, soaked and crawling.

"They won't run," said Desmond. "What do you think'll happen if they abandon you here? Eventually, you'll stop coming back to life on your own, and they won't be able to find new servants, because they're still bound to you. I'll put your brains in nice little jars, and then hunt the reapers down at my leisure. And besides--" He pierced his own chest with his hand. "--I've got something for runners." He pulled out his heart. Its pulsing, crimson flesh began to darken.

Mehlsanz and Garovel went underground.

"That won't save you!" Desmond laughed, rearing his arm back.

Hector gritted his teeth and pumped his fist sideways.

Desmond's throw had the force of a cannon. The heart did not leave his grasp, however. He looked at his hand and saw it enveloped in metal. "Aw, you fuck--!"

The metal turned to dust just before the heart exploded. Desmond's body blew apart like a watermelon wrapped in dynamite.

Hector rolled over onto his back. 'I got him...'

'Really?' Garovel poked his head out of the ground. 'Wow, Hector... I thought we were dead for sure.'

He just took a heavy breath. The Queen's head was regenerating, and Lynnette was still motionless.

'Did you kill Ezmortig, though?'

'No.' He saw Ezmortig in the sky. 'And I can't reach him, either...'

'Then we only have a few minutes,' said Garovel. 'We should leave while we can.'

‘Maybe that other guy can reach--’

Roman came tumbling past, bouncing across the walkway and skidding into a tree. So much of his skin and muscle was melted off that half his skeleton was visible. Green and yellow steam hissed around his body. He could still move, however, and wore a scowl on what remained of his face."

"170

‘What the hell are you doing?!’ said Voreese. ‘That guy is beating your ass!’

“Shut up!” Roman’s lungs convulsed in his ribcage. “It’s the acid! It’s really hard to move when I don’t have any fucking muscles!”

‘Don’t be a wuss, Roman!’

“Fuck off!”

The big man stomped toward them. Roman slammed a bony fist to the ground, and the giant sunk through a sudden hole in the concrete. Up to his belly, he struggled a moment, then tore his way out of the ground, preparing another swell of acid in his gut.

Hector covered the man’s mouth in iron.

Acid spewed forth and ate through the metal, but not before splashing back onto his face. His eyes boiled out of his head.

Roman blinked. “Nice one, kid--”

The man lumbered forward anyway and vomited more acid on him.

“Fuckin’ dammit.” Roman struggled to raise a steaming hand as the man drew closer.

Lynnette’s sword exploded out the giant’s forehead. She clung to his back as he hit the ground face-first. Everyone stared at her as she wiped her blade on the dead man’s shirt.

“Where’s the other guy?” said Roman. “If we get both their brains, we can stop them from regenerating.”

“He blew up,” said Hector. “I’m pretty sure his brain isn’t in one piece anymore...”

“Shit. Then his reaper can remake him anywhere.”

‘If Desmond is coming after us again, then we should prepare to receive him in a more favorable location,’ said Garovel.

‘Agreed,’ said Voreese. ‘Roman?’

“Alright, follow me everyone. Carry the Queen, kid.”

‘His name is Hector. And mine is Garovel.’

Hector dragged himself over to the Queen as the last of his broken bones repaired themselves. Lynnette offered assistance, but he was strong enough again to carry Helen on his own.

“Dammit.” Roman stood over the big guy’s corpse. “The acid seeped in and started melting his brain. This guy’s gonna be remade somewhere else, too.”

"171

Roman led them over the ruins of the Belgrant Gatehouse. Abandoned cars lined the street, doors left ajar. No doubt people had fled after seeing the gatehouse fall and hearing the subsequent explosions. Sirens in the distance warned of an imminent police presence.

Roman shambled toward a tour bus at the tail end of the traffic jam. He was still missing a quarter of his flesh. He no longer wore a cap, and his undershirt was gone, save only his left sleeve.

“Oh, I don’t even have to hotwire it,” said Roman. “Keys are still in the ignition. You drive, sword girl. I’ll tell you where to go.”

Lynnette stared at him, perhaps wondering if he was even human. “Why can’t you drive?” was all she asked.

He waved a hand in front of his face. “I don’t have my glasses. They melted.”

The Queen stirred in Hector’s arms, and he set her down in a chair behind the driver's seat. She shook her head, blinking a few times.

'Welcome back,' said Mehlsanz.

Hector took the seat across from her as the engine started.

"What happened?" the Queen said.

"We survived," said Roman. "But the enemy will be back. We're going to my associate's garage. We'll be in better fighting shape with his help."

'Who are you people?' said Garovel. 'Vanguard?'

'No,' said Voreese. 'Are you?'

'No.'

'So we're all independent here.'

'Seems that way.'

The bus hit a curb, and everyone eyed the driver.

"...I've never driven a bus before," she said over the noise.

"Just turn right when you reach Willard Street."

Mehlsanz tilted her head. 'That girl is strangely understanding, considering she can't see the three of us.'

"She is a good soldier," said Helen.

'I'm sure you'll have fun explaining the situation to her later,' said Mehlsanz.

"I am still not sure I understand the situation myself."

"172

The journey was a short one. The tour bus pulled up to a quite well-kept auto body shop, and everyone exited. Fully regenerated, Roman led the group inside.

There were people in the waiting room. They eyed the new arrivals uncomfortably.

Roman rang the bell at the front desk. "Gerald! Get your crusty old ass out here!"

The others all exchanged glances.

The door behind the counter opened, and the elderly mechanic stepped through. He took one look at Roman and sighed. "Alright," said Gerald. "I'm sorry to everyone who was waiting, but we're closed now. I need you all to leave."

"What?" said one man, standing. "But you have my car. I need it tomorrow--"

Roman stepped in, smiling. "I know it's inconvenient, but trust me, pal. This is for your own good." He grabbed a pad and paper off the counter and scribbled a quick note, handing it to the customer. "Here. Go to this address and give this note to the cute blond girl there. She'll provide all of you with new vehicles, free of charge."

The man's expression faltered, and he read the note. "Wha--this address isn't even in Sescoria. This is a hundred kilometers away!"

Roman's smile waned. "Then I guess you'd better get going."

"This is ridiculous!"

Helen intervened, and the stranger did a double take. "Please listen to him," she said. "Some very bad people are coming here. They will kill you if you stay."

It didn't take much more convincing after that. The customers soon filed out of the building.

"So who's coming to kill us?" Gerald asked.

"Abolish," said Roman. "Two members, both pretty strong, but nothing we can't handle."

Gerald's expression darkened, and he looked over the group another time.

Roman scratched his bare chest. "By the way, you got any spare clothes?"

"173 -- XIX.

Chapter Nineteen: 'Come forth, ye jubilant devils...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A line of police officers stood in Geoffrey's path. "Sorry, this area is closed off," one of them said.

Geoffrey's green balloon-hat waggled as he ogled the mass of rubble and abandoned vehicles behind the line. "What happened?"

"We can't disclose that information," the officer said. "Please turn back."

Geoffrey frowned, but obliged.

The prince's advisor, whose name Geoffrey had still not bothered to learn, was waiting for him at the nearest street corner--as was an enormous yellow-and-green boa constrictor. The man was clearly a wreck, and having the snake at his feet was doing him no favors.

"It seems we missed all the fun," Geoffrey said sadly. "Maybe we shouldn't have stopped at that amusement park after all."

The advisor watched the boa slither up Geoffrey's body and coil around the young man's shoulders. "I still don't understand w-why that thing listens to you..."

"Oh, it does not listen. It simply has no will of its own anymore." He scratched the snake's head. "Normally, animals tend to dislike me, you see. I was never very good with pets, but they did provide valuable practice."

Abruptly, a red-haired man turned the corner. "Over here, you said?"

'Yeah. Should be--ah, there it is.'

Geoffrey's brow rose as he spotted the reaper approaching from behind the stranger. "Why, hello."

The stranger returned a wide smile. "Wow, it really is an aberration! Hello there, little fella. How'd you get all the way out here to Atreya? Not lost, are you?"

Geoffrey tilted his head. "Excuse me? Who are you?"

“Ah, I’m Desmond Grantier. This is my friend, Ezmortig. I assume you can see him, yes?”

“I can. Why do you seem to know about me?”

“Oh, we belong to Abolish.”

“Abolish?”

Desmond blinked at him. “Don’t you even know where you come from?””

"173 -- XIX.

Chapter Nineteen: ‘Come forth, ye jubilant devils...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A line of police officers stood in Geoffrey’s path. “Sorry, this area is closed off,” one of them said.

Geoffrey’s green balloon-hat waggled as he ogled the mass of rubble and abandoned vehicles behind the line. “What happened?”

“We can’t disclose that information,” the officer said. “Please turn back.”

Geoffrey frowned, but obliged.

The prince’s advisor, whose name Geoffrey had still not bothered to learn, was waiting for him at the nearest street corner--as was an enormous yellow-and-green boa constrictor. The man was clearly a wreck, and having the snake at his feet was doing him no favors.

“It seems we missed all the fun,” Geoffrey said sadly. “Maybe we shouldn’t have stopped at that amusement park after all.”

The advisor watched the boa slither up Geoffrey’s body and coil around the young man’s shoulders. “I still don’t understand w-why that thing listens to you...”

“Oh, it does not listen. It simply has no will of its own anymore.” He scratched the snake’s head. “Normally, animals tend to dislike me, you see. I was never very good with pets, but they did provide valuable practice.”

Abruptly, a red-haired man turned the corner. “Over here, you said?”

‘Yeah. Should be--ah, there it is.’

Geoffrey’s brow rose as he spotted the reaper approaching from behind the stranger. “Why, hello.”

The stranger returned a wide smile. “Wow, it really is an aberration! Hello there, little fella. How’d you get all the way out here to Atreya? Not lost, are you?”

Geoffrey tilted his head. “Excuse me? Who are you?”

“Ah, I’m Desmond Grantier. This is my friend, Ezmortig. I assume you can see him, yes?”

“I can. Why do you seem to know about me?”

“Oh, we belong to Abolish.”

“Abolish?”

Desmond blinked at him. “Don’t you even know where you come from?””

"174

It was Geoffrey’s turn to blink. “Where I come from?”

‘Oh, Heavens, child! Don’t tell me you think you’re human!’

“No, I know I’m not. But I can’t say I know what I am, exactly, either.”

“You, my delightful friend, are what is known as an aberration. You are the offspring of the Void.”

“The Void? What are you talking about?”

“It’s a place,” Desmond explained. “The Void is what we call the space between this life and the next. It straddles the line between realities. Ezmortig here, he always has one foot in the Void, so to speak.”

‘But it’s also a consciousness,’ said Ezmortig. ‘People might tell you otherwise, but don’t you believe them. The Void has a silent will of its own, and it spawned you and all your kin. With a little help from Abolish, of course.’

“There are others like me?”

“Of course. You thought you were alone this whole time?”

Geoffrey just shrugged, making his balloon-hat bob.

“If you’d been born into Abolish’s care, that never would’ve happened.”

‘Interesting. I didn’t think aberrations could be born in the wild. Perhaps you were simply separated from Abolish by way of some mix up.’

Geoffrey cocked an eyebrow and chuckled. “Are you saying I was switched at birth?”

‘That’s possible, too, but not quite what I meant. While I don’t understand the finer details of the birthing process, I do know that aberrations are created after the fetus has already started growing in the womb. Maybe your mother received the treatment without her knowledge.’

Desmond smirked. “You think the research divisions have taken their work to public hospitals?”

The reaper paused. ‘Actually, now that you say that, I don’t think so. I doubt R&D would have been deployed to this country without a combat division for protection. There must be some other explanation for this boy’s presence here.’”

"175

“Curious.” Desmond eyed him again. “How old are you?”

“Nineteen. Why?”

“Ooh, older than I thought. How many people have you killed?”

“I have not been keeping track, honestly. A couple dozen, perhaps?”

“Not bad,” said Desmond. “Maybe you haven’t realized yet, but your power grows as you consume souls.”

“Oh! That would explain why I feel stronger lately.”

“Yeah, aberrations are great that way. But you should be careful not to kill too many people too quickly, or you’ll end up drawing the attention of the Vanguard.”

“What is that?”

“Our enemies. They know about aberrations. They fear you guys, and rightly so. If they realize you’re here, they won’t hesitate to send one of their strongest people to kill you.”

“Sounds like fun.”

“Oh, it can be, but only when the time is right. Aberrations are all about momentum. You can grow in power much more quickly than we can, but you have to kill a lot of people while still staying hidden. Otherwise, you’ll be stomped into oblivion before you ever get a chance to become a genuine threat to the enemy.”

“Hmm, I see. I suppose killing the Queen of Atreya would be doing exactly that, then.”

Desmond laughed. “You’re here to kill the Queen?”

“Yes.”

“No kidding! We came to kill the Queen, too!”

“Really? Oh! Are you the ones responsible for all that destruction over there?!”

“Yep! Sadly, though, she managed to escape. Some other servants got in our way.”

“Servants?”

“People with reapers. We’re a bit outnumbered, actually. Why don’t you join us in hunting her down? If you stick with us, we’ll keep you hidden from the Vanguard. Or protected, at least.”

“That sounds wonderful!”

“Excellent! I really like your snake by the way.”

“Thank you! They were upset when I took him, but the hat was simply not enough of a prize for me.”

“Entirely understandable.”

-+-+--+

“I wanted to thank you for saving Her Highness’s life,” said Lynnette.
“As well as mine.””

"176

The young man had been given short-sleeved coveralls to wear, which were at least a size too big for him. He’d rolled the legs up around his ankles and tightened the denim around his torso with a strip of metal.

Lynnette had caught him in the midst of restoring the metal of his helm. Just one more thing on her list of questions to ask.

When he looked at her, though, his brown eyes widened, and he averted his gaze.

“I’m Lynn. I didn’t catch your name.”

“I, uh... it’s... I’m... H-Hec...”

Her brow tilted as she waited.

“H-Hector.”

“Nice to meet you.”

“Y-yeah, I-I... I’m, ah... I...” He just gave up this time.

She scratched her cheek. “Um. How are you not dead, anyway? And how are you molding metal with your bare hands?”

“Ah--that... ah... I’m not... uh... agh...”

“Are you alright?”

He turned away and donned his helm before looking back at her.
“Yeah, I’m--I mean... I... fagh... I still... can’t...”

Lynnette just frowned.

The ensuing silence soon grew uncomfortable, and Lynnette decided that Hector probably wanted her to leave him alone, so she went to check on the others.

--you should give Vincent and the others a call, just in case," Roman was saying to Gerald. "If we find somewhere to hole up while they come to Sescoria, then we'll be able to minimize our risks and overwhelm the enemy easily."

As Gerald looked over their group another time, his expression hardened. After a moment, he went into the garage, with everyone following uncertainly. "Hey!" he shouted at his mechanics. "You're all fired!"

They clearly didn't understand.

"I said you're fired! Get the fuck out of here right now! I'm not joking, assholes! Get out!"

"What're you doing?" said Roman. "There's no need to fire anyone. Just send them home while we take care of things."

"177

"Don't be stupid," said Gerald. "The others won't come to your aid. And neither will I."

Roman's eyes narrowed. "What?"

"The opponent is Abolish. You think killing two of their members will make them give up?"

"It will," said Roman. "Think about it, Gerald. They only sent two servants. Atreya obviously isn't a priority for them. They're busy waging, what, three different wars? More? We don't have to win. We just have to make conquering us more trouble than it's worth."

Gerald shook his head. "Foolishness. We don't know how valuable they deem this country. If they believe it could be of real strategic value in winning one of those wars you mentioned, then killing the ones already here will just make them send stronger people to deal with us. Imagine if they send Ivan or Dunhouser or Jercash or any of a dozen others. Forget about causing trouble. We wouldn't even be able to run away."

Roman furrowed his brow. "If we do nothing, they'll destroy Atreya."

"All the more reason to leave the country."

The Queen had been watching quietly. "Please," she said. "I assure you that your assistance would not go unrewarded."

Gerald smirked. "You don't even know who we are, do you, Your Majesty?"

She merely eyed him stolidly.

"I'm a smuggler. The best one you'll ever meet." He pointed to Roman. "This idiot is a thief. Probably the best, also."

Helen folded her arms. "I believe such transgressions are inconsequential at this point."

"Indeed," said Gerald. "But I want you to understand that he and I are greedy bastards and that your offer does not fall on deaf ears. And that I am still not going to help you. If you're as intelligent as I think you are, Your Majesty, then you'll take this chance to flee the country, as well."

"You must not think me very intelligent at all, then.""

"178

Gerald frowned. "Still too young for the crown, I see."

"A thousand years would not be enough to make me agree with you," Helen said. "You are mistaken if you think Atreya is meant to protect me. I am meant to protect it."

The old man just snorted.

There was a pause, and Lynnette noticed Hector had joined them. Everyone seemed to be looking at him--or just above his head, perhaps. She couldn't tell what was happening, but after a moment, Gerald broke the silence.

"There are plenty of places for us to go," he said. "Any neutral territory will suffice. If necessary, we'll throw our support behind Sai-hee. At least she has enough sense to stay out of the others' messes."

Roman scowled. "You fucking coward."

"Don't let sentiment cloud your judgment, Roman. Atreya is already dead."

"So much the better, then," said Roman. "Dead things suit us just fine."

Gerald rolled his eyes. A few of his mechanics lingered behind him, no doubt waiting for a chance to speak to him, but when he saw them there, he flew into a spitting tirade until they fled. He moved to the rear wall and hit a row of buttons. The garage doors all began to close.

The old man took a deep breath. The shelf next to him reached all the way to ceiling, bearing boxes and tires and all manner of tools. He clutched its central pillar with both hands and pulled the whole thing a few paces to the right. A door in the floor was revealed.

Gerald lifted it open. "I'll offer you one small aid only. I suggest you take it." He descended out of view.

Roman and the Queen followed immediately. Lynnette and Hector exchanged glances before pursuing.

--++--++--

It was an underground garage. Bright white lights filled the chamber, and Hector could see grooves in the ceiling where mechanics topside could work beneath cars.

Gerald was already pulling tarps off of the various vehicles parked here."

"179

"The green Porsche is mine," said Gerald, "but you can take any of the others. The keys are all by the stairs."

Roman approached a black pickup truck, eyeing the driver's side door before looking back at Gerald. "We're not going to flee with you."

"I didn't think you would. But you shouldn't stay here. They'll find you before long.”

Helen stood by a blue convertible. “Will they? Did we not escape them well enough?”

“Probably not,” said Roman. “Reapers are annoyingly good scouts. They probably still have a vague idea where we went, at least. And they can search areas very quickly.”

In the driver’s seat, Gerald started his Porsche. The far corner of the ceiling began opening, and it became abruptly apparent that the long ramp there led outside.

Gerald stuck his head out. “Roman. Everyone. Good luck to you.”

Roman gave him the finger.

The old man drove away, his unIntroduced reaper following.

‘What now?’ said Voreese. ‘Our plan’s been shot to hell.’

Roman took a heavy breath. “I hate to say it, but I think the old bastard was right. We shouldn’t stay here.”

Helen’s brow lowered. “You would have me flee, as well?”

“Look, it’s a bit pathetic, but without my glasses, I’m fighting with a disadvantage. You don’t have any combat experience or training yet, and while I’m impressed with the sword girl’s abilities, she’s still just a normal person.” Roman looked at Hector and Garovel. “What do you two think? The bulk of the fight would be in your hands.”

With everyone looking at him again, Hector took a step back.

‘It’s too risky,’ said Garovel. ‘We should leave Sescoria and come up with a new plan.’

The Queen frowned. “If we concede the capital now, we may never be able to retake it. We do outnumber the enemy, and Hector seems capable of--”

Garovel cut her off. ‘With respect, Your Majesty, this is not your decision. It’s mine. Hector has helped you more than enough already.’”

”180

Hector looked at his friend. 'Garovel...'

'We won't abandon you, Your Majesty,' the reaper added. 'But we're not prepared to die for you, either.'

"I was not asking you to die for me," she said.

'Yes, you were,' said Garovel. 'Perhaps you didn't realize it, but you were.'

Annoyance flashed across the Queen's face, but then she closed her eyes a moment and nodded. "Very well." Her gaze passed over Hector. "You know your limits better than I do. I thank you, Hector, for protecting us, and I will ask no more of you. Except, perhaps, might you tell me your full name?"

Hector was a statue. His mouth wouldn't move, and neither would his hands or his feet. 'G-Garovel! I--this is--! Help!'

Garovel broke for a small laugh. 'His name is Hector Goffe.'

"Goffe. I shall remember. But can he not speak for himself?"

'He wants to talk to you, but he's extremely shy.'

Her expression flattened, and she exchanged glances with the others. "You are joking."

'I'm not, no. He's a great kid. He just has trouble talking to people. And seeing as you're the Queen, I imagine that only makes it about a dozen times more difficult for him. Through no fault of your own, of course.'

Hector could feel his face burning so much that he was worried it would show through his helm.

Helen just blinked, unable to come up with words of her own.

Voreese busted out laughing. 'That's great! Roman, why can't you be like him? You'd be way cuter.'

"Great idea. Hey, Garovel, is there any way I can swap with Hector? I'd rather be your servant."

'No, you stupid dick! You're stuck with me!'

‘She’s right. And besides, I’m quite content with Hector.’

Roman looked at Mehlsanz. “How about you? I don’t even know your name, but please save me from this living nightmare.””

"181

Helen and Lynnette were busy observing the keys together.

“I have not driven a car in eighteen years.”

“Then perhaps I should drive, Your Highness.”

Hector waited for them to choose before looking at the board himself. There were two rows, each key hanging below the logo of the accompanying vehicle’s manufacturer.

Garovel pointed at the logo of a smoking, ghostly wheel. ‘Get that one. It’s Revenant.’

‘Revenant?’ said Hector, grabbing the key nonetheless.

‘Have you forgotten? Revenant makes motorcycles.’

‘Oh!’ He bit his lip. ‘And... oh. I just realized... we left that bike behind, didn’t we...?’

‘We sure did. Whoops.’

The key belonged to a motorcycle tucked away at the back of the garage. It was a cruiser, just like the previous bike, though a bit smaller and bearing a steely blue gas tank. It seemed sleeker to Hector’s eyes, perhaps even custom-built, and he noticed that the speedometer went higher than the other one.

Abruptly, the lights flickered, and everyone looked up. The center of the ceiling went black, and a hissing sound filled the silence. Stone and plaster melted away, dripping acid onto the Corvette below.

A darkened arm fell through the hole in the ceiling.

Hector immediately slammed his fists together, trying to coat the severed limb in iron. It exploded halfway through.

The fire lit up the chamber. But it did not spread. Hector squinted through the opening in his helm and saw the explosion being held at bay by apparently nothing. It just floated there in the middle of the room, a boiling bubble of flames and smoke.

Roman's arms gripped the space in front of him, trembling. The strain of it ate away at his flesh, bloodying his arms and face. "Need some help here, Hector!"

Hector breathed deep and refocused. He spread his arms out wide and brought them together again. Iron spots gathered around the bubble, expanding, clustering, and soon became a completely metal orb, as big as any car in the room. It dropped on the Corvette like a wrecking ball."

"182 -- XX.

Roman let go, and the sphere jumped in place. Huge dents distorted its shape, and Hector and Roman both scrambled to keep it suppressed.

'You can't smother an explosion like that,' said Garovel. 'You'll have to try and redirect it.'

'How?!' asked Hector.

'A funnel. Broadside up. Do it now.'

He wasn't sure he could actually pull such a thing off, but there was no time to second guess himself. He did the best he could, twisting his hands between one another as his mind warped the metal sphere, adding crude walls around the top like a misshapen crown. It grew clumsily toward the ceiling, worrying him with its awkward form. But it reached. And that was all that mattered.

Hector annihilated the top of the sphere within the walls and nodded to Roman, who already seemed to understand the goal here.

The explosion was free to rip upward, back through the hole Desmond had dropped it from.

Hector annihilated the rest of the makeshift funnel, releasing a cloud of smoke and dust.

‘Wow, Roman,’ said Garovel. ‘I didn’t realize you could suppress explosions like that.’

Roman rolled his shoulders. “Honestly, I wasn’t too certain, either. Nice work with the--”

A second arm dropped through the hole, but Roman was ready this time. He stamped the floor, and the Corvette flew straight up through the ceiling, taking the arm with it. The explosion shook the building, making the walls crack and shift.

Roman grinned like a maniac. “Time to go, everyone.”

Hector mounted the bike, and everyone else gathered in the black truck with Lynnette at the wheel. She went first up the ramp and disappeared outside, and when Hector rode up the ramp himself and saw the truck again, it was flipped and skidding across the road.

The big man was there. As was Geoffrey.

Chapter Twenty: ‘Thine unyielding aegis...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

He didn’t need time to process or question it. Hector barreled into Geoffrey with complete resolve.

Red tendrils sprung forth, wrapping around the motorcycle and Hector both, slowing them down, and as the force of the impact pushed Geoffrey back, the two young men came face to face.

Geoffrey’s eyes widened, and he grinned as their tangled mess eased to a stop, the bike’s front tire still grinding harmlessly against his red shield. “It’s you!”

“It’s me.” Hector ripped himself free of the shadow and grabbed Geoffrey’s face. Crimson immediately came between them, but Hector just covered the young man’s head with iron.

Geoffrey fell to the ground, scratching at his solid mask. Red poked through the metal, trying to break it apart but only meagerly succeeding.”

"182 -- XX.

Roman let go, and the sphere jumped in place. Huge dents distorted its shape, and Hector and Roman both scrambled to keep it suppressed.

‘You can’t smother an explosion like that,’ said Garovel. ‘You’ll have to try and redirect it.’

‘How?!’ asked Hector.

‘A funnel. Broadside up. Do it now.’

He wasn’t sure he could actually pull such a thing off, but there was no time to second guess himself. He did the best he could, twisting his hands between one another as his mind warped the metal sphere, adding crude walls around the top like a misshapen crown. It grew clumsily toward the ceiling, worrying him with its awkward form. But it reached. And that was all that mattered.

Hector annihilated the top of the sphere within the walls and nodded to Roman, who already seemed to understand the goal here.

The explosion was free to rip upward, back through the hole Desmond had dropped it from.

Hector annihilated the rest of the makeshift funnel, releasing a cloud of smoke and dust.

‘Wow, Roman,’ said Garovel. ‘I didn’t realize you could suppress explosions like that.’

Roman rolled his shoulders. “Honestly, I wasn’t too certain, either. Nice work with the--”

A second arm dropped through the hole, but Roman was ready this time. He stamped the floor, and the Corvette flew straight up through the ceiling, taking the arm with it. The explosion shook the building, making the walls crack and shift.

Roman grinned like a maniac. “Time to go, everyone.”

Hector mounted the bike, and everyone else gathered in the black truck with Lynnette at the wheel. She went first up the ramp and disappeared outside, and when Hector rode up the ramp himself and saw the truck again, it was flipped and skidding across the road.

The big man was there. As was Geoffrey.

Chapter Twenty: 'Thine unyielding aegis...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

He didn't need time to process or question it. Hector barreled into Geoffrey with complete resolve.

Red tendrils sprung forth, wrapping around the motorcycle and Hector both, slowing them down, and as the force of the impact pushed Geoffrey back, the two young men came face to face.

Geoffrey's eyes widened, and he grinned as their tangled mess eased to a stop, the bike's front tire still grinding harmlessly against his red shield. "It's you!"

"It's me." Hector ripped himself free of the shadow and grabbed Geoffrey's face. Crimson immediately came between them, but Hector just covered the young man's head with iron.

Geoffrey fell to the ground, scratching at his solid mask. Red poked through the metal, trying to break it apart but only meagerly succeeding."

"183

Hector gathered his focus and punched Geoffrey in the chest. He broke through the shadow and felt a rib snap. Geoffrey cried out in pain.

The sound of pounding footsteps made Hector turn just in time to see a massive fist pummel into him. He flew and hit the overturned truck, rocking it as the others were still trying to get out. Garovel was there beside him and grabbed his shoulder. Hector felt his creeping fatigue vanish completely.

The big guy helped Geoffrey up and tore the metal off like it was wrapping paper.

Hector stood and saw Roman rounding the vehicle.

"Mr. Roman!" said Geoffrey, holding his chest but still smiling. "A pleasure to see you again!"

Roman squinted. "Voreese, is that who I think it is? I can't see the face very well."

'Yeah, it is,' said Voreese. 'What the fuck are you doing here, you red brat?!'

"I am here to kill the Queen."

Voreese thrashed at the air. 'Agh! I fucking hate aberrations! But no! Leave it alive, he said! Fuck Vincent! We're never listening to that asshole again!'

"Works for me." Roman looked at his palms. They began to tremble and burn.

'What are aberrations?' said Garovel.

And Hector couldn't listen to the other reaper's response. The big man charged at them, spitting acid first. Roman flipped the pavement up as a shield, and when the acid ate through it, he poured fire into the hole, roasting the giant alive. It wasn't enough to stop the man, however, so Hector took his cue to uppercut him in the jaw with an iron fist. The giant tumbled through the air and crashed down onto a parked car.

Geoffrey, however, was no longer in sight.

'He went around!' said Garovel.

There came an agonized scream from the other side of the truck, and Hector knew that it belonged to Lynn. He ran."

"184

A swarm of crimson engulfed both women, holding them in the air. It was a larger shadow than Hector had yet seen from Geoffrey, but he dove into the mass head on regardless. The red coiled around his limbs, slowing him down but not stopping him. Then it started digging into his flesh and lifting him off the ground, taking away all his leverage.

Geoffrey turned away from Lynn to look at Hector. "Why did you bring this normal girl here?" he said. "Is she a friend of yours?" He held up an eyeball, freshly removed. "Please tell me she is."

Blood and shadow obscured Lynn's face. Geoffrey had covered her mouth to muffle her cries, and a meaty gash occupied the place where her right eye should have been.

The Queen acted before Hector could, however. Speared through the gut, she had pulled herself down along the shadow while Geoffrey's attention was held on Hector. She smashed him over the head with her fist. He hit the ground flat, and the entire mass of crimson shuddered and released everyone--but it did not altogether disappear.

Geoffrey was quick to get up, and Hector was there to meet him. He swung for Geoffrey's chest again. The red mass wove around his arm and held it back, struggling.

"I should make her my friend, too," said Geoffrey. And the crimson began to expand again.

Hector used his other fist to clock him in the face. It wasn't focused and didn't break the shadow, but it sent Geoffrey flipping head over foot across the road and into the side of a building.

"Lynn?!" Hector rushed over to her.

She held a hand over her eye socket, cringing. "I'm okay," she growled through gritted teeth.

"Please stay close," said Hector.

She just groaned and nodded, dripping more blood on her uniform."
"185

'Roll it back over!' said Mehlsanz.

Helen obliged, and the battered truck's tires met pavement again.

Roman came flying overhead with Hector's motorcycle on top of him. He hit the ground, and the bike popped his gut open like a balloon, spilling entrails all over the road.

The giant bounded over the truck as well and started stomping toward Roman, but then he spotted Mehlsanz and swatted at her. She ducked under his hand and phased into the ground. Gushing acid followed her, melting through the road.

Hector and Helen double-teamed him. He covered the man's face in iron and gave her the opening to land a punch with all her might. The big guy soared through a lamp post and all the way into Gerald's garage.

'Everyone in the truck now!' said Garovel. Mehlsanz appeared behind him, smoldering slightly but not complaining.

The Queen jumped into the driver's seat while Hector went to retrieve Roman and the bike.

Lynn climbed into the back. A massive, yellow-green boa reared up over the edge of the truck bed, hissing at her.

"You will be my friend!" came Geoffrey's distant shout.

The snake lunged for her, and she hacked its head off.

Geoffrey opened his mouth as if to say something but just ended up frowning instead.

Helen pulled up next to the boys. Roman could barely stand, so Hector helped him into the back with Lynn.

'I see Desmond!' Mehlsanz warned.

Hector climbed in himself, and Helen slammed on the gas. He looked back to keep his eyes on Desmond, but what he saw instead was a red streak, flying toward Garovel. It snagged the reaper and yanked him back.

Hector leapt from the vehicle as it sped away.

"Hector?!" Lynn yelled after him. "What are you doing?!"

"186

Before he even hit the ground, he had Garovel covered in iron. Geoffrey's red blade dug in, but only just, and Hector ran toward them, trying to cover Geoffrey as well.

Metal and shadow competed. Red slashed through gray, both contracting and expanding on top of one another, wrestling for dominance over Geoffrey. The shadow won out just as Hector drew close and stopped his punch cold.

“So your name is Hector, is it?” Geoffrey cut into Hector’s body at multiple points. “I didn’t think we would meet again so soon.”

Hector ripped the red spears out each time they pierced him. He coated his own legs and feet in metal to maintain his foothold and pushed through.

But it was simple for Geoffrey to keep his distance. The shadow couldn’t stop Hector, but it slowed him down enough that Geoffrey could just back away.

And then Desmond was there. “Allow me.” He left an arm clutching the iron that protected Garovel. He pulled Geoffrey away as it darkened.

Hector tore through the remaining crimson and grabbed the arm. There wasn’t time to throw it.

--+-+--+--

Geoffrey watched the explosion leave a crater in the street. He used his shadow to fan the cloud of dust away. Body parts littered the lawns on either side of the road, but Hector’s metal head remained in the crater. “Aww, are they dead?”

“Don’t think so,” Desmond said as they approached. “Yeah, see? The reaper’s barely alive, still. Kid got in the way.”

The sound of a vehicle drew their attention, and they saw the truck returning in reverse. Roman and Lynnette stood together. She glared at them with her one eye.

“They’re actually coming back for him?” said Geoffrey.

Desmond dug into his chest. “I’ll handle--”

A sword flew into his face.”

"187

Geoffrey watched Desmond fall over, dead again. "Wow. No wonder Hector wears a helmet."

The truck screeched to a halt. Geoffrey lashed out with red.

Roman took the cuts and stopped the streaks that went for Lynnette. He gripped two tendrils, one in each hand, and made them tremble. They burst apart, and their remains shrank back to Geoffrey. Roman jumped out of the truck, smashing the pavement with both feet.

The ground flung Geoffrey up. He tumbled through the air.

The big man caught him. He set Geoffrey down and ran for the truck, spitting as it started to drive off. The acid would have reached the girl if Roman hadn't shielded her with his back.

And then they were gone.

Geoffrey walked over to the big man and patted him on the shoulder. "Good effort, Mr. Giant."

He returned a pat of his own on Geoffrey's head.

"What a disappointing day this turned out to be. Lost my balloon-hat. Lost my snake. And I didn't even get to kill the Queen. That advisor-guy will be upset, if we ever see him again. I wanted to feed him to the snake after he paid me, but I suppose that won't be happening, either."

The big guy just kept patting him on the head, and Geoffrey began to feel like some sort of dog.

"You don't talk much, do you?"

The giant looked at him vacantly.

"How about a name, then? Do you have one?"

The man's reaper arrived, descending from the sky along with Ezmortig. 'His name is Moss,' the reaper said. 'And mine is Ozmere. Moss can't speak. And even if he could, he wouldn't have much to say. He's a rather simple fellow, but he's good at following instruction, and that's what matters.'

They waited, and soon, Desmond revived. They started the walk back to Belgrant Castle together."

“Is it really okay to not chase after them?” said Geoffrey.

‘We could,’ said Ozmere, ‘but Ezmortig and I would have to keep track of them over very long distances while you all catch up. And that could be dangerous for us.’

Ezmortig nodded. ‘If we really needed the Queen dead at all costs, then it might be worth the risk, but we don’t. As long as she stays hidden, she won’t be able to hinder us politically.’

“And if she’s stupid enough to try something, then we’ll go hunt her down,” said Desmond. “We might wanna put in a request for reinforcements, though. Bit of insurance wouldn’t hurt.”

‘True,’ said Ezmortig. ‘We did encounter more resistance than expected.’

Desmond rolled his neck, stretching it. “Anyway, Geoffrey, are you alright? You don’t regenerate like we do, and that kid got you pretty good.”

Geoffrey rubbed his chest. “Pain is an interesting feeling. I don’t completely dislike it, though it is a bit distracting, I suppose.”

“That’s not what I meant. Aberrations never seem to mind pain very much. But that doesn’t make you immune to injury. If your body starts becoming sluggish, you should find yourself a new one.”

Geoffrey tilted his head. “A new body?”

“Oh, can you not do that yet? Well, I’m sure you’ll figure it out soon.”

“Really? Do all aberrations have abilities like mine?”

Desmond deferred to Ezmortig.

‘Your shadow powers, yes. Your ability to control things, no. Aberrations have varying kinds of secondary abilities. We call yours Domination. Unfortunately, it’s not terribly useful against servants. At least, not until you develop it to dizzying degrees.’

“What other kinds of abilities can we have?”

‘They always revolve around the consumption of souls. And they can be quite strange. I know of one aberration who can create black fire. And one who can turn people into glass. Oh, and the most famous example is probably the one who could create localized singularities. He’s dead now, though. I think Sermung had to take him down personally.’

“Hmm. I see.”

"189 -- XXI.

“So now you understand why we value aberrations so much,” said Desmond. “Apart from just being so incredibly fun to work with, I mean.”

Geoffrey laughed.

“What do you want to do now? We have a mission to attend to, but if you come with us, we can introduce you to some fun people. They’ll help you grow your powers more quickly and safely than you can on your own. And they’ll definitely keep you entertained.”

“That sounds amazing!” Geoffrey’s grin lessened, however. “But there is something else I want to take care of first.”

“Oh?”

“Perhaps you can help me. How good is Abolish’s information network?”

“You won’t find better. Why?”

“I would very much like to find someone. A man named Colt.”

“Tell me more.”

Chapter Twenty-One: ‘Alliance of calamity, capitulate not...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Roman had been pleasantly surprised to discover a first aid kit in Gerald’s truck. Dressing wounds wasn’t his forte, but Voreese and Mehlsanz were able to provide apt instruction. And when he finished, he thought Lynnette's cotton-white bandage looked quite skillfully applied.

For the first hour or so of driving, Lynnette's questions were unrelenting, but given all she'd been through, he wasn't about to spare her any explanations. And after she seemed to have wrapped her head around imaginary beings and undying people, she started asking why Hector was not regenerating like before.

"Because his reaper is severely wounded," Roman explained. "He won't start regenerating again until Garovel recovers."

Lynnette eyed the half-destroyed helm containing what remained of Hector's head. She couldn't see Garovel's unconscious, shriveled form clinging to the back of it, but Roman could.

To his eyes, reapers looked like ethereal birds. Crows, precisely--but at the moment, Garovel was no more than a dark smudge. He would have to take Voreese's word for it that reapers could still recover from such a state."

"189 -- XXI.

"So now you understand why we value aberrations so much," said Desmond. "Apart from just being so incredibly fun to work with, I mean."

Geoffrey laughed.

"What do you want to do now? We have a mission to attend to, but if you come with us, we can introduce you to some fun people. They'll help you grow your powers more quickly and safely than you can on your own. And they'll definitely keep you entertained."

"That sounds amazing!" Geoffrey's grin lessened, however. "But there is something else I want to take care of first."

"Oh?"

"Perhaps you can help me. How good is Abolish's information network?"

"You won't find better. Why?"

"I would very much like to find someone. A man named Colt."

"Tell me more."

Chapter Twenty-One: 'Alliance of calamity, capitulate not...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Roman had been pleasantly surprised to discover a first aid kit in Gerald's truck. Dressing wounds wasn't his forte, but Voreese and Mehlsanz were able to provide apt instruction. And when he finished, he thought Lynnette's cotton-white bandage looked quite skillfully applied.

For the first hour or so of driving, Lynnette's questions were unrelenting, but given all she'd been through, he wasn't about to spare her any explanations. And after she seemed to have wrapped her head around imaginary beings and undying people, she started asking why Hector was not regenerating like before.

"Because his reaper is severely wounded," Roman explained. "He won't start regenerating again until Garovel recovers."

Lynnette eyed the half-destroyed helm containing what remained of Hector's head. She couldn't see Garovel's unconscious, shriveled form clinging to the back of it, but Roman could.

To his eyes, reapers looked like ethereal birds. Crows, precisely--but at the moment, Garovel was no more than a dark smudge. He would have to take Voreese's word for it that reapers could still recover from such a state."

"190

Mehlsanz and Voreese had both been actively scouting to ensure they were not being followed, which meant flying up extremely high for visibility. They didn't report anything, and after a while, Roman finally began to relax.

'That fight should have gone smoother,' Voreese said privately. 'Maybe we've been avoiding conflicts for too long.'

Eyes closed, Roman rested his head against the window of the truck's cabin. 'You said you wanted to keep a low profile and build an empire.'

'I know. But this country is important to you. And apparently, we picked shitty allies. If I'd known you had something you wanted to protect, I would've pushed you harder to become stronger.'

He peeked at Voreese with one eye. 'I didn't think my feelings mattered to you that much.'

'Then you're an even bigger idiot than I thought.'

He smirked and closed his eyes again.

Soon, they reached the city of Walton. His hometown was a welcome sight, even if it was blurry without his glasses. Voreese gave the Queen directions to Roman's midtown mansion. They exited the vehicle in the underground parking complex and took the elevator up.

"Why don't you two get some rest?" Roman said to the ladies. "Make yourselves at home, and we'll reconvene later to figure out our next move."

"I am ready to discuss it now," said Helen.

Roman looked at Lynnette.

She glanced at the Queen. "I think I'd like to rest, if you don't mind..."

"Of course. And thank you, Lynnette. Your help has been invaluable."

"I'll make a call," said Roman. "I know a good private doctor."

The elevator doors opened, and a petite blond woman was waiting for them. "Master Roman!" she said. "You look like hell! What happened?"

"Lots. We have guests, Gina. Treat them well."

"191

Gina frowned. "Why didn't you call ahead? I would've had everything prepared already."

"Phone was destroyed. Please show Lynnette here to one of the bedrooms."

“Sir, are you--is that a head that you’re carrying?”

“It belongs to an acquaintance. I’m keeping it safe for him. Now, please.”

She stiffened, but nodded. “As you say. Please follow me.”

“Oh, and bring me a new pair of glasses.”

Gina immediately retrieved a pair from her vest pocket.

He took them. “Ah, finally!” He looked around, blinking happily before cocking an eyebrow at Gina. “Why did you have my glasses on you?”

“Because you are very needy, sir.”

He shoed her away, and Lynnette followed. He showed Helen to the kitchen and began scrounging for food.

“I still do not know who you are,” the Queen said. “Or why you decided to help me.”

Roman tossed her a premade sandwich. “My name is Roman Fullister,” he said, biting into his own. “As for why I helped you, eh... I suppose that’d be part national pride and part business.”

“Business,” she said. “You mean thievery?”

Voreese gave a snort. ‘Roman is to thievery what you are to Atreya.’

Roman’s brow lowered. “That’d make me the queen of thieves, Voreese.”

‘Oh, you know what I meant.’

“Please, just let me do the talking.”

‘No, fuck you! Roman only steals from the super wealthy! And nobody knows it, but he takes care of the poor, too! He’s a great guy!’

Roman scratched his head. “I don’t know about that. I do live pretty comfortably, as you can see.”

‘Psh! You’re talking to the fucking Queen, Roman. She’s not impressed by your shiny floors and fancy sinks. This place probably looks like a crack house to her.’

It was Helen's turn to furrow her brow."

"192

Roman sighed and leaned against the refrigerator. "Point is, I have an organized operation here in Atreya. A number of highly-skilled people work under me. And while I might be able to take advantage of the chaos that Abolish's plans will bring, it would only hurt my business in the long run."

'And Roman grew up in Atreya, so he has a soft spot for it.'

"Yeah, I guess I do."

'He was an orphan, too.'

"Well, I don't see how that's relevant..."

'Lived on the streets for a long time, he did. It's a real rags-to-riches story.'

"Voreese, what the hell? They don't care about any of that."

'Well, they should! Our previous allies obviously didn't care, and look at what dicks they turned out to be!'

"We knew they were dicks when we aligned with them."

'Yeah, but we didn't know how much! They were mega-dicks!'

"You'll have to forgive Voreese," said Roman. "She tends to hold grudges. Not that I disagree with her on this one."

Mehlsanz floated behind Helen. 'What should our next move be? We've been run out of the capital. And it doesn't seem like we have the power to take Sescoria back.'

Voreese nodded. 'And we definitely don't have the power to keep Sescoria. Even if we killed the ones already there, more might show up like Gerald said.'

"Then we require more power," said Helen. "Where might we find it?"

A brief silence fell.

Roman's expression soured. "Can anyone think of something that isn't the Vanguard?"

Helen looked over everyone. "I am not sure I understand what this Vanguard group is. They protect people from Abolish, no?"

"They do, yeah. And if we go to them for help, they'll probably give it. But afterwards, they won't just send us on our merry way. They'll want our support, too."

"That only seems fair," said Helen."

"193

"Maybe so," said Roman, "but you should understand, Your Majesty. You might very well lose control of Atreya to them."

"We will see about that."

'And besides, she's already lost it to Abolish,' said Voreese.

'There's another problem,' said Mehlsanz. 'I abandoned the Vanguard. I'm not sure how welcoming they'll be. They may try to kill us.'

'Oh. Delightful.'

"Then maybe we should go to Sai-hee for help," said Roman.

Voreese gave a winged shrug and tilted her bird's head. 'It's worth looking into, but I wouldn't hold my breath. I doubt Sai-hee will break her neutrality and attack Abolish just because we ask her to.'

'Getting in contact with her will not be easy.'

Helen folded her arms. "Why does Abolish want war, exactly? And what kind of war will they try to create?"

"If nothing else, their motives are always easy to understand. They want to cause as much destruction and death as possible. Whatever their plan is, it'll be designed to maximize those things."

'Their plan is obvious enough,' said Mehlsanz. 'They want Atreya to instigate war with another country in such a way that even more countries will be dragged into the fighting.'

‘That’s not an easy thing to do,’ said Voreese. ‘Most countries have learned their lessons about forming dangerously dependent alliances.’

‘But that is what they will aim for,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘In their eyes, even if they fail to pull more combatants, they’ll still have a war like they wanted. And they’ll make it as bloody as possible.’

“I see,” said Helen, and she ventured into the next room and turned on the television. It didn’t take her long to find a channel where a reporter was standing confusedly in front of Belgrant Castle with police and firefighters in the background. “They will try to use this,” she said. “My disappearance will soon be discovered, and they will rally for public support.””

"194

“You really think they’ll be able to blame the attack on some other country?” Roman asked.

“I am not sure. Perhaps there is some video footage of the attack which will exonerate any accused parties.”

‘They’ll wait and see what the media learns before making their move,’ said Voreese.

“Even if they fail to garner public support,” the Queen said, “they can simply go to war anyway, and such a ludicrous act could prompt an armed rebellion.”

‘And then it’d just be a civil war, instead,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘All roads lead to war in some way.’

“Unless we kill those assholes and get you back on the throne,” said Roman.

Helen rubbed her forehead and sat down on the black couch. She closed her eyes. “My husband will undoubtedly try to oppose them...”

Mehlsanz floated closer. ‘They won’t kill him.’

Everyone looked at her, all sharing unconvinced expressions.

‘They won’t,’ she insisted. ‘With you gone, power falls to him. It’s too suspicious if you vanish and he dies at the same time. They want public support, remember? To make their war as large as possible, they'll need him alive.'

The Queen sighed. "I hope you are right."

Roman and Voreese exchanged glances, and everyone was silent for a while, simply listening to the news reporter drone on about how little they knew at this time. Roman sat down and placed Hector's head on the small table next to him.

Voreese spoke first. 'We do have one thing in our favor, at least. They need time to organize their war. Which means we have time to stop them.'

"True enough," said Roman. "How long do you think we have?"

'Hard to say,' said Voreese. 'I can't imagine it taking more than six months, though. What do you think, Queenie?'"

"195

"Coordinating an initial assault would take less than a week," said Helen. "Preparations for a long war would require more time but not likely more than a month. However, if they truly intend to win the people over first, then yes, we do have more time. I would guess four months, if no other complications arise, which is also doubtful."

Roman adjusted his spectacles. "Well, in any case, we shouldn't dawdle here."

'Agreed,' said Voreese. 'We should leave Atreya as soon you're prepared.'

"And go where?" Helen asked.

'As far as I know, the nearest Vanguard forces are in Korgum. They do have their hands full with Dozer, though, so they might not want to spare us any soldiers.'

Mehlsanz hovered around Helen. 'Eh... I'd really prefer not to meet anyone in the Vanguard again.'

"Why did you desert them?" said Roman.

Mehlsanz paused briefly. 'My previous servant, she grew up in conflict. Even before I resurrected her, she had lived through two wars as a child soldier. It was all she had ever known. And then one day, we found out that her sister had become a servant for Abolish.'

Roman's expression darkened. "Let me guess. The sister was mentally ill."

'Yes. Her sister wasn't psychotic, but she didn't really understand the consequences of what she was doing. And her reaper took advantage of that. But of course, the Vanguard had to stop her. She was killing innocent people. And my girl--Valencia was her name--she was just torn to pieces by this knowledge. She wanted to protect her sister, but she couldn't. She didn't want to fight her, either, so the higher-ups moved us to a different battlefield. But it didn't make much difference, at that point. Valencia didn't want to fight at all anymore. She just wanted to go somewhere and live peacefully.'

'Fucking Abolish motherfuckers...'

"196

--donation bonus (day #6, post 1/5)--

Mehlsanz nodded. 'I wouldn't normally agree to such a request, but after all Valencia had been through, I wanted to give her a chance at a quiet life. For a while, at least. I thought maybe she could find someone to fall in love with, and I'd let her grow old with that person, and then afterward, I'd release her and return to fighting Abolish with a new servant. And besides, I sort of wanted a break from the fighting, myself.'

"I'm guessing that didn't go over so well with your bosses."

'They refused. If she wouldn't fight, I had to release her, no exceptions. I protested, and then they imprisoned me and told me that if I didn't release her, they'd have to kill me. So I released her. And at the first opportunity, I fled.'

'And they didn't come after you?'

'I hid for a while, with decreasing levels of success. And now, Helen's status is the only thing protecting me. The Vanguard won't kill the ruler of a nation that's not under Abolish's control.'

"You've had it rough," said Roman.

Helen frowned. "I am sorry for all you have had to endure, Mehlsanz, but I must do whatever I can to protect Atreya--even if it means aligning with people you do not approve of."

'I know.'

Voreese tilted her ghostly, feathered head. 'The Vanguard didn't used to be like that. They've always been self-righteous pricks, but I've never known them to go that far. What changed?'

'I'm not sure, honestly. I first noticed their harsher rules a few years ago. I can't recall a particular incident.'

"I'd always heard the leader of the Vanguard is a pretty decent guy," said Roman. "Is that not the case anymore? Or maybe it never was?"

'I wouldn't know,' said Mehlsanz. 'I only met Sermung once, and that was fifty years ago.'

"197

--donation bonus (day #6, post 2/5)--

"Hmm." Roman looked over everyone and adjusted his glasses again. "Well, we don't have any idea where Sai-hee's people are, so I still think we should try the Vanguard in Korgum, first."

"I agree."

Mehlsanz ruffled her feathers but nodded. 'We must be very cautious.'

'What about Hector and Garovel?' said Voreese. 'They're gonna be out of commission for at least a week. Probably more.'

"We can't wait that long," said Roman. "I wanna be out of here within two days."

'You could just carry Hector's head with us,' said Voreese.

"Eh. I don't think we should take them out of the country without their permission. They might have a reason to stay in Atreya. How much do we even know about them?"

'Not much,' said Mehlsanz. 'I worked with Garovel some thirty years ago, and he seems more or less the same. Which is a good thing. But I know nothing about Hector.'

Helen looked at the helm. "We know that he protected us. That is not nothing."

"We also know that Garovel said they weren't prepared to die for you," said Roman. "And then they were both nearly killed."

Helen gave a slow nod.

"They can stay here. Gina will take care of them. And besides, I really don't wanna try to smuggle a severed head into a foreign country. I hear people frown upon that sort of thing."

"Very well."

"What about your sword girl? Should we take her?"

"I cannot send Lynnette back to Sescoria. Abolish will kill her."

"Oh yeah."

"If she wishes it, then I would have her accompany us."

"Alright." Roman stood and stretched his arms. "I already have plenty of spare identities for myself, so we'll only need two more."

'You have someone who can provide fake documentation?' Mehlsanz asked."

"198 -- XXII.

--donation bonus (day #6, post 3/5)--

"Have someone?" said Roman. "Please. I do all my forgeries myself."

'Ah, of course.'

"That's why I said two days. I need time to work."

‘Make me one, too!’

“Not this again. Voreese, I swear--”

‘C’mon. Just the ID. You can skip all the other stuff.’

“No!”

‘Tch.’ She turned to Helen and Mehlsanz. ‘He refuses to make me a fake ID, even as a joke. It wouldn’t even be that much work for him. He’s so lazy. Doesn’t care about my happiness at all.’

“Y’know what? Fine. One day, when the entire country isn’t in danger, I’ll do that for you. Okay? Happy now?”

‘Yes!’

“And for your photo, I’ll use a picture of an actual bitch.”

‘Maybe you should change yours to a picture of an actual cock!’

Chapter Twenty-Two: ‘Quiet guardian, take respite...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

First, the chin regrew. Bone cracked into existence, followed by arteries and muscles, then tendons, cartilage, meager fat, and dark brown skin. His neck drew out, down to the shoulders, then the chest and arms. And soon enough, Hector’s body was restored in full.

He did not wake immediately, however. He lay lifeless for several days more before his eyes finally opened again.

He sat up. He was in a bed, he saw, and a rather large one at that. The room held an air of wealth and comfort, but he didn’t spare it much attention as he saw Garovel there next to him.

The image of the reaper was weak, almost transparent, like a cloth stretched thin enough that light shone through the weaves.

‘There are clothes on the chair behind you.’

It wasn’t exactly his typical wardrobe. The black jeans felt soft and expensive, but they were too broad, so he had to use the accompanying belt with its flashy silver buckle.

‘Thank you for protecting me. I certainly would have died if you hadn’t shielded me the way you did.’”

"198 -- XXII.

--donation bonus (day #6, post 3/5)--

“Have someone?” said Roman. “Please. I do all my forgeries myself.”

‘Ah, of course.’

“That’s why I said two days. I need time to work.”

‘Make me one, too!’

“Not this again. Voreese, I swear--”

‘C’mon. Just the ID. You can skip all the other stuff.’

“No!”

‘Tch.’ She turned to Helen and Mehlsanz. ‘He refuses to make me a fake ID, even as a joke. It wouldn’t even be that much work for him. He’s so lazy. Doesn’t care about my happiness at all.’

“Y’know what? Fine. One day, when the entire country isn’t in danger, I’ll do that for you. Okay? Happy now?”

‘Yes!’

“And for your photo, I’ll use a picture of an actual bitch.”

‘Maybe you should change yours to a picture of an actual cock!’

Chapter Twenty-Two: ‘Quiet guardian, take respite...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

First, the chin regrew. Bone cracked into existence, followed by arteries and muscles, then tendons, cartilage, meager fat, and dark brown skin. His neck drew out, down to the shoulders, then the chest and arms. And soon enough, Hector’s body was restored in full.

He did not wake immediately, however. He lay lifeless for several days more before his eyes finally opened again.

He sat up. He was in a bed, he saw, and a rather large one at that. The room held an air of wealth and comfort, but he didn't spare it much attention as he saw Garovel there next to him.

The image of the reaper was weak, almost transparent, like a cloth stretched thin enough that light shone through the weaves.

'There are clothes on the chair behind you.'

It wasn't exactly his typical wardrobe. The black jeans felt soft and expensive, but they were too broad, so he had to use the accompanying belt with its flashy silver buckle.

'Thank you for protecting me. I certainly would have died if you hadn't shielded me the way you did.'

"199

--donation bonus (day #6, post 4/5)--

"Y-you're, ah... you're welcome..." The silky white shirt fit him better, though the sleeves were a bit long, so he rolled them up to his wrists. "It couldn't have been enough, though. They saved us, I guess?"

'Seems that way. I'm not sure where they are. I've been in and out of consciousness.'

He wasn't sure if he wanted to wear the dark gray waistcoat as well, but after a moment, he opted to, and then started on the socks and shoes. "You don't look so great, by the way."

'I'm just tired.'

Abruptly, a blond woman entered the room. She jumped when she saw him. "Ah! Whoa! Okay, then! Hi there!"

"H-hello."

"You are Hector, yes?"

"Ye-yeah..."

"I'm Gina. It's a pleasure to meet you. I believe you met my employer, Master Roman."

"I, ah... yeah."

"Are you hungry?"

He nodded hesitantly.

"Please follow me, then."

He grabbed his battered helm, and she escorted him through a series of hallways.

'Ask her how long we've been here.'

He tried to speak but faltered, achieving no words at all.

'Oh, come on, Hector. She can't see me. You have to be the one to ask.'

"Um... h-how, ah..."

She stopped and turned. "Yes?"

He flinched at her sudden gaze. "H-how long have I, uh... I mean..."

She tilted her brow at him. "Um. You've been here for two weeks. Well, your head has, anyway."

'Ask where the others are.'

"W-where, uh..."

"You're in Walton. You came from Sescoria, right? It's east of there, if you didn't already know."

"Ah. But. Where are the others? Roman and..."

"Oh, they left the country."

'What?'

"W-why?"

"Ah." Gina reached into her vest and pulled out a small notepad. She handed it to him. "Master Roman left this for you. I believe it will answer your questions."

--donation bonus (day #6, post 5/5)--

He flipped through and noticed quite a few pages full of text. Gina led him to the kitchen and began whipping up a meal while he sat down to read.

The first few pages said that they believed Atreya would go to war in a matter of months and elaborated upon their decision to seek the Vanguard's help. Roman advised Hector not to follow, as they apparently didn't know where their travels might lead them.

The later pages were in different handwriting, more feminine, and it soon identified itself as Voreese's words through the Queen's pen. It offered details on aberrations.

'Ah,' said Garovel upon reading it from over Hector's shoulder. 'Voreese remembered my inquiry. She's more thoughtful than I would have expected. I'll have to thank her the next time we meet.'

'Aberrations grow stronger the more people they kill,' Hector summarized.

'I suppose that explains why Geoffrey seemed more powerful.'

Hector's mouth twisted as he scowled. 'He's been killing even more people... and he's not going to stop.'

'With everything that's happened, you may be the only person in Atreya who can kill Geoffrey right now.'

'I'm not so sure I can. It's been two weeks. He's probably even stronger now.'

'It doesn't really matter as long as Abolish is protecting him.'

'I need to train...'

'Let's go back to Brighton first. You've been gone too long, as it is.'

Gina placed a plate full of pancakes in front of him. Then came eggs, sausage, waffles, hash browns, toast, strawberries, cantaloupe, wheat cereal, and a single banana.

He watched her as if she were bringing him solid gold bars.

“Master Roman said you’d be hungry.”

“You... are amazing...”

“I know.”

He dove into his meal.

Gina sat down to eat with him. “So what’s your deal, anyway?” she said, biting into a waffle.”

"201

--donation bonus (day #7, post 1/5)--

“W-what do you mean?”

“Master Roman didn’t seem to know much about you, but he still wanted me to treat you like an honored guest.”

“Ah, uh... well... I don’t know much about him, either.”

“Hmm. Where are you from?”

He glanced past her at Garovel.

‘You should tell her. Roman and the Queen may need a means of contacting us when they return to Atreya. Gina may be able to help us with that.’

“I live in Brighton,” he said.

“Pretty far away. Why were you in Sescoria?”

“I just... wanted to help...”

She paused to tilt her head at him. “How old are you?”

“Sixteen...”

“And how long have you been undead?”

He blinked at the question.

'Tell her five months,' said Garovel.

"Uh, five months or so..."

"I see."

'Why'd you make me lie? It's only been a few weeks...'

'You're stronger than you should be. And it's better if people don't know.'

'I... uh--'

"Well, Master Roman said you're welcome to stay as long as you like."

"Ah, I should actually get going soon..."

"You have business in Brighton?"

"S-sorta, yeah..."

"What do you do there?"

"N-nothing special..."

She pursed her lips at him.

He poked a pancake with his fork and let it linger there. "But, ah... do you have a pen?"

She gave him one.

He scribbled his phone number onto a page of the notepad and ripped it out for her. "In case, uh, Mr. Roman wants my help..."

She took it and then wrote a phone number of her own. "Same goes for you, then."

He tried not to blush and failed.

They finished their meal, and Gina showed him to the garage beneath the house. She handed him a key.

"Master Roman said you're a motorcycle guy." She motioned to a red cruiser with black and white flames painted on it."

--donation bonus (day #7, post 2/5)--

Hector looked at Gina. "Mr. Roman is just giving this to me?"

"Yep."

"Ah--wow..."

"There should be some gas money in your clothes, by the way."

He felt his waistcoat and found a small roll of bills in the inside pocket.

"Th-thank you."

"Sure."

'I didn't realize that guy was so generous,' said Garovel. 'Hope he doesn't care about this bike too much.'

'Um. Third time's the charm?'

'Chyeah, right.'

'This one's not a Revenant.'

'I don't think the manufacturer was the problem, Hector.'

'I'll just blame you, then.'

'Delude yourself all you like.'

Gina opened the garage door for him.

He favored the riding helmet over his helm and mounted the bike. He kickstarted it, and the sound of the engine filled the chamber. Gina gave him a wave. He returned his own and rode out.

He stopped just short of the first intersection, before riding out into traffic, and blinked. 'I just realized something,' he said. 'I'm not in pain.'

'I restored your body long before waking you up,' said Garovel. 'I needed extra rest, so I used the opportunity to let your pain be relieved, too.'

He turned his hands over in front of his face. 'My body feels so light...' He smiled inside his helmet. 'This is fucking great! Oh, man! I forgot what this was even like!'

'Ha. You're welcome.'

He went to turn onto the road but stopped himself again. 'By the way, uh... where the hell do I go?'

Garovel gave him instructions, and he soon found the highway leading south.

Mountains lay across the horizon, the very same ones he passed on the way to Sescoria. At this distance, however, he could see the occasional snow-capped peak.

'Let's go around those,' said Garovel. 'I'd rather not see you ride off a cliff.' A beat passed. 'Okay, yes, I would like to see that, but it'd still be really inconvenient.'

"203

--donation bonus (day #7, post 3/5)--

Hector roared down the highway. Traffic was a bit heavier than before but still nowhere near as uncomfortable as the city. After a while, he remembered another question.

'Desmond's ability,' said Hector. 'Didn't you say you'd explain?'

'Ah, yes. Desmond's ability falls under the category of transfiguration. I think the big guy's did, too.'

'Which means...?'

'Transfiguration abilities allow the user to replace body parts with a particular element. In Desmond's case, I would guess that element was sodium.'

'Sodium? That doesn't explode... does it?'

'When mixed with water, it does.'

‘Oh. So he was using... hmm.’

‘Technically, it’s not the sodium itself that’s responsible. Heat from the chemical reaction ignites the hydrogen that is expelled as a result.’

‘I... okay.’

‘Sodium and water can explode quite violently, but even so, Desmond’s explosions seemed more powerful. I assume he was also employing a soul-strengthening technique to give them an extra punch.’

‘Soul-strengthening... That sounds... useful.’

‘It’s basically just enhancing physical qualities through the application of mental force. It’s something you can only do when your imaginary power grows stronger.’

‘I’m guessing it’s not as easy as that first step was.’

‘It’s not easy or hard, actually. And unlike your iron ability, it can’t grow in sudden bursts through mental stress. Imaginary power is based upon the manipulation of your soul.’

‘So, what? More meditation, then?’

‘No. After the first step is taken, the only way to increase your imaginary power is time.’

‘Wha?’

‘See, I have control of your soul. In order for you to manipulate it, too, you and I have to spend more time together. Gradually, your soul and mine will become more synchronized.’

‘You mean, like... through the power of friendship or some shit?’

Garovel laughed. ‘No. Friendship doesn’t really factor in, unfortunately. It’s just a kind of natural osmosis that happens over time.’”

"204

‘Huh. So... no training, then?’

‘Nope. It’ll just sorta happen on its own.’

‘I guess that’s one less thing to worry about, anyway.’

‘Yeah.’

‘But, um. What about Roman’s ability? Do you know what that was?’

‘I believe his was an alteration type ability. Transfiguration and materialization are similar in that they revolve around elements, but alteration abilities are different. Rather than creating something or replacing something, alteration merely applies some force in order to change the physical state of existing matter. A real force, that is. Not an imaginary one. And the force varies between users. Roman’s force, I think, is particle vibrations.’

‘That, uh... sounds... complicated.’

‘Well, judging from how he was able to both create shockwaves and generate heat, it seems like the only explanation. And if I’m right, then that is an incredibly powerful ability.’

‘Really?’

‘Oh yeah. If he were stronger with it, he’d be fucking terrifying.’

‘I guess it’s a good thing he’s not our enemy...’

‘Indeed. Hmm. Hey, pull over for a bit.’

Hector slowed down and eased into the road’s shoulder. ‘What’s the matter?’ he asked as the bike stopped.

Garovel floated off to the right, and Hector watched him, squinting. ‘There you are,’ the reaper said softly. ‘It’s okay. I’ve got you now.’

‘Who are you talking to?’

‘A wandering soul,’ said Garovel. ‘Someone died out here.’

Hector blinked. ‘What? Way out here? How?’

Garovel pointed behind him. ‘Look back there.’

‘Where? I don’t--’ And then he saw the skid marks on the road. Two sets. Intersecting.

‘Happened a few days ago, judging by the state that this soul is in.’

Hector just frowned.

‘Let’s take a break at the next gas station. I need a couple hours to ferry this one across the void. You can use the time to meditate.’

‘Okay...’

They proceeded on, and it wasn’t long before a gas station came into view. Hector stopped, and Garovel disappeared into thin air after assuring Hector of his return."

"205

--donation bonus (day #7, post 5/5)--

He refueled and then wheeled the bike around the side of the building where no one else was. He sat down on the sidewalk and closed his eyes, letting the sound of cars on the highway bleed into background noise.

He focused on iron shapes. He wasn’t sure what else to think about. Apart from merely coating things, nothing else came to mind, and he found himself wondering to what other degrees his power might develop. He shook the thoughts away and concentrated.

After a while, he opened his eyes again, and Garovel had still not returned, so he tried making iron. A silver lump materialized in his palm. It was almost spherical, surprisingly, but still smaller than he had imagined. He went back to meditating, and when he opened his eyes again, he saw Garovel there.

They set out again, and it wasn’t long before a new topic arrived.

‘There’s something I’d like to know,’ said Hector.

‘Yeah?’

‘Back when, um... when we first met... I know you said that you didn’t know, but... do you believe that an afterlife exists? I mean, like, any kind at all?’

Garovel was slow to answer. 'No,' he said, 'I don't.'

'Why not?'

'I've never found anything that convinced me. Do you believe one does?'

'W-well, uh, not really, uh... I mean, I don't know. Aren't you kinda... experiencing an afterlife? You died, right? But you're still alive, sort of...'

'Ha. I suppose it depends on your definition of the afterlife, then. I certainly don't believe in heaven or hell. Reincarnation seems more appealing at least, but I don't see any reason to believe it's true.'

'So then... after we die, you think there's just... nothingness?'

'Yeah.'

'Then why, um... why do you bother reaping? If you think you're just carrying souls into oblivion, then... why not just leave them alone?'

'Because that would be a great cruelty.'

'What do you mean?'

"206

'On its own, a soul will soon decay,' said Garovel. 'Within a day, it will become a confused mass of semi-consciousness. Within two, it will become a prison of raw agony.'

'Oh.'

'Ferrying souls is a task we take upon ourselves not because a higher power has ordained us to, but just because it's the right thing to do.'

'I see.'

'And besides, what the fuck else are we gonna do with our time? It's a good way to relieve boredom.'

'Wow, Garovel...'

‘Hey, it’s true.’

The sun drew up higher in the sky as Hector sped across the landscape. The journey was quiet for a while longer until Garovel initiated the next topic.

‘I’m sorry this trip turned out so chaotic,’ the reaper said. ‘I certainly didn’t mean for you to be gone so long. I’m not sure how we should explain your absence to your parents and your school.’

Hector hesitated. ‘I’m... not so sure my parents will notice...’

‘Oh, come on. It’s been two weeks. How could they have not noticed?’

For a while, he merely listened to the motorcycle and the wind roaring together. ‘When I was younger, uh... my parents both struggled to find work. They’d often have to take jobs in separate cities--I guess because the bills were piling up or something. They were always trying to readjust things so that they could both get a job in the same place. So, ah... we ended up moving around a lot. And there was this one time... when I was about ten... and, um... ah... b-basically, they, uh... they left me behind.’

Silence drew out, and Garovel waited for Hector to continue.

‘I spent, like, almost a month in foster care, I think... and then the police found me. My parents thought they’d lost me somewhere in the new city. They didn’t, uh... they didn’t realize I was missing until like a week after the move...’

"207 -- XXIII.

--donation bonus (day #8, post 1/5)--

‘A week is rather specific,’ said Garovel. ‘How do you know it took them that long?’

‘Well, on the way back, the cops were really happy. Um... they told me it was amazing, because I’d been missing for three weeks... and I knew it had been longer.’

Garovel was briefly quiet again. ‘Well, shit, Hector. I’m sorry. I didn’t realize it was that bad.’

'I... it's not, I mean... if I'd been able to explain to the foster care people, then maybe... but I... I just--'

'No. Stop that. It's definitely not your fault. What I want to know is how Child Services never took you away from your parents.'

'Ch-Child Services? I, uh... I don't, ah...'

'Bah. How did they not realize it was a case of neglect? Was the incident reported as a child abduction? Or maybe they just thought you ran away?'

'I don't know about any of that, um... I mean, n-neglect? R-really, it's not like... uh...'

'Hector. It's one thing for your parents to be a bit distant from you or not really take an interest in your life as a teenager. It's sure-as-fuck something else for them to forget about their ten-year-old son in another city.'

The bike started drifting toward the shoulder, and he had to correct its path. 'It-it's fine, though. I mean, I've never thought of it like that, so...'

'Of course you haven't. It's how you've grown up. But that doesn't make it okay.'

Hector had no response.

Chapter Twenty-Three: 'Thy beloved kinship...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The remainder of the journey was quiet. Garovel took the chance to rest, with the advisement that Hector should wake him should he get lost, but it was a straight shot the rest of the way, so Hector wasn't too concerned.

Rather, he was more worried about Garovel's obvious disdain for his parents. Even as he saw Brighton's towers appearing over the horizon, it was still bothering him."

"207 -- XXIII.

--donation bonus (day #8, post 1/5)--

'A week is rather specific,' said Garovel. 'How do you know it took them that long?'

'Well, on the way back, the cops were really happy. Um... they told me it was amazing, because I'd been missing for three weeks... and I knew it had been longer.'

Garovel was briefly quiet again. 'Well, shit, Hector. I'm sorry. I didn't realize it was that bad.'

'I... it's not, I mean... if I'd been able to explain to the foster care people, then maybe... but I... I just--'

'No. Stop that. It's definitely not your fault. What I want to know is how Child Services never took you away from your parents.'

'Ch-Child Services? I, uh... I don't, ah...'

'Bah. How did they not realize it was a case of neglect? Was the incident reported as a child abduction? Or maybe they just thought you ran away?'

'I don't know about any of that, um... I mean, n-neglect? R-really, it's not like... uh...'

'Hector. It's one thing for your parents to be a bit distant from you or not really take an interest in your life as a teenager. It's sure-as-fuck something else for them to forget about their ten-year-old son in another city.'

The bike started drifting toward the shoulder, and he had to correct its path. 'It-it's fine, though. I mean, I've never thought of it like that, so...'

'Of course you haven't. It's how you've grown up. But that doesn't make it okay.'

Hector had no response.

Chapter Twenty-Three: 'Thy beloved kinship...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The remainder of the journey was quiet. Garovel took the chance to rest, with the advisement that Hector should wake him should he get lost, but it was a straight shot the rest of the way, so Hector wasn't too concerned.

Rather, he was more worried about Garovel's obvious disdain for his parents. Even as he saw Brighton's towers appearing over the horizon, it was still bothering him."

"208

--donation bonus (day #8, post 2/5)--

Hector couldn't make the thoughts explicit, for fear of waking up Garovel, but the ideas still brewed quietly in his mind, never forming conscious words but still unsettling him nonetheless.

He didn't want to think ill of his parents. They'd taken care of him his entire life. They'd kept a roof over his head, clothes on his back, food in his stomach. They'd given him toys and games and books, his own television, his own computer. Maybe that wasn't much to some people, but he knew that to others, that was a lot.

And they had never been abusive, which was more than could be said of other people's parents. He'd seen kids with parents like that. Those were the kids who had it rough, not him, and they endured their pain much better than he did. Surely, they'd love to have parents like his.

He rode the bike to a cemetery and parked it behind a mausoleum, under the shade of a line of trees. He checked inside the building, its stony walls encasing two chambers across, and was a bit surprised to still find the money that he had stolen from Rofal. He fully expected someone to have taken it after two whole weeks, but he supposed this place was an even better hiding spot than he thought. It was dark and peaceful inside, but Garovel had previously given him grief for choosing it, as if he had been trying to make some morbid joke, even though, really, it was a very convenient location.

From here, he made the short walk back to Cedar Street. Seeing his house again, under the amber pull of the evening sun, brought a sense of relief. If nothing else, he was at least glad to have finally made it.

He entered and found his father sitting alone in the den, watching television."

"209

--donation bonus (day #8, post 3/5)--

His father looked at him. The man did not get up. "Hey, son," he said, utterly flat and casual. "Haven't seen you around the past couple days."

Hector waited a moment longer, wondering if there was more, but his father had finished talking. He was suddenly glad that Garovel wasn't awake to hear. "...I found a job."

"Oh. That's good."

Hector tried not to frown. The temptation to let the conversation die was strong, and perhaps it was even the wisest course of action, but that previous worry was still there like an itch. "...Where's mom?" he tried.

"Sleeping. She had a long day at work."

"D-did something happen?"

"Just the usual, I'm sure. Clients being prima donnas and so forth."

Hector's expression strained as he struggled for another topic. It felt almost physically painful, as if his body wanted to leave but his brain wouldn't allow it. "D-do you wanna... um... do something together sometime? The three of us, I mean."

"Like what?"

"I don't know... maybe we could... go see a movie?"

He spared Hector an odd glance. "Wouldn't you rather go with your friends?"

"N-no..."

"Really? I know when I was your age, I didn't want anything to do with my parents."

Hector had no clue how to respond to that. His father's wry smile did nothing to comfort him.

The man shrugged and looked back at the television. "I'll see what your mother thinks about it."

"Okay..." And with that, the conversation seemed well and truly beyond revival. He gave up and went to his room.

He lay on his bed for a bit before deciding to practice creating iron again. Soon, he felt Garovel stir.

'Ah,' the reaper said, detaching himself from Hector. 'We're already here.'

"Yeah. You look a little better."

'I feel a little better. And you're already training, I see.'"

"210

--donation bonus (day #8, post 4/5)--

"Yeah... so, uh... we're back in Brighton, but... what the hell do we do now?"

'Well. Roman's note said we have a few months before Atreya goes to war. So. I think the only logical thing to do is to focus on increasing your ability with iron until our allies return to retake Sescoria.'

"We just leave Abolish and Geoffrey to run wild? They're going to be slaughtering people..."

'What's the alternative? Rush in to stop them on our own? We'll die, and then there really won't be anyone to protect the civilians here.'

"I guess so..."

'But in a way, you're correct. We can't just sit here and have you try to meditate your way to victory. That's not going to work. Meditation is okay for steady growth, but it's not fast enough. To stand a chance, we need to press you harder.'

"And how do we do that?"

'Simple,' said Garovel. 'We go looking for trouble.'

Geoffrey's return to the Rofal mansion had been a decidedly quiet one. Desmond had wanted him to stay in Sescoria, but Geoffrey thought he should be in Brighton in order to continue the family business. To his great disappointment, however, no one was here to meet him. For the past few days, he'd had the entire house to himself.

So he fixed that.

Dozens of living puppets wandered the corridors. He made a game of it, controlling them all from his office, seeing through their eyes, rifling through their minds, and putting on a veritable play by having them interact with each other in various ways--sometimes peaceably, most times not.

It amused him while he waited for the phone to ring, but then there came a delightful surprise when one of his puppets saw someone venture through the front entrance, someone not under his control."

"211

--donation bonus (day #8, post 5/5)--

The stranger was an elderly gent, shriveled and gray but wearing bright eyes and a big smile. And he had a reaper with him.

Geoffrey immediately forgot about his human toys and went to greet them.

"Hello and welcome!" Geoffrey said cheerily. "Might I ask what brings you here?"

The old man looked at him eagerly. "Boo!" he said, shaking both hands in front of him.

Geoffrey just blinked. And then realized that he couldn't move his body. He struggled, but an invisible force held him fast.

The old man laughed. "Just kidding!" He released him, and Geoffrey stumbled back a step.

'Sorry,' the reaper said. 'He's just excited to meet you. You are Geoffrey Rofal, yes?'

“Yes. Who are you?”

‘I am Feromas, and this is Damian Rofal. He is your grandfather.’

Geoffrey blinked again. Then a few more times.

“Howdy, Grandson! How’s the business?! Not so great, by the looks of things! Aha! Did you kill all your subordinates?! That’s not a very smart thing to do, you little scamp!”

“You are truly my grandfather?”

“Of course!”

‘I hope you’ll forgive us for not attending Joseph’s funeral. The family doesn’t usually tell Damian things anymore. They think he doesn’t know what they’re saying.’

“They think I’m a lunatic! Aha!”

‘Which is only half-right.’

“Shut your hole, Feromas! I’m sharp as a tack, I am!”

The reaper eyed Geoffrey. ‘We figured you’d need some help running things. The family doesn’t have any other willing participants who aren’t also scared shitless of you, and Damian’s been restless lately, anyway.’

“I’m like a caterpillar!”

‘Oh, he’s gone again. Don’t mind anything he says for the next twenty minutes or so.’

“Would you like to see a magic trick, young man?! Bring me ten rabbits, ten hats, and one machete!”

Geoffrey smiled. “I like your style, Grandpa.””

"212

--donation bonus (day #9, post 1/5)--

Damian returned a quizzical expression. “I like your style, too, Grandma. Your eyebrows are pointier than I remember.”

‘Seriously. Don’t mind him. Please.’

Damian looked at Feromas. “So who do you want me to kill?”

‘No one, right now, Damian. Please just relax.’

“Okay, Boss. You’re the boss, Boss.” And he stood next to the reaper, rigid as a wooden plank.

“You want him to run the family business?” said Geoffrey. “Is he capable of such a thing?”

‘...Please don’t ask me such difficult questions. Do you want our help or not?’

Geoffrey scrunched his mouth together, thinking a moment, and then shrugged. “Sure, okay. Everyone else already ran away, though, so I’m not sure what you plan on doing.”

Feromas stared at him for a long moment, then just gave a massive sigh.

“It’s okay!” said Damian. “I know all sorts of great people!”

“Is he lucid again?”

‘Not sure...’

“Like the Tooth Fairy!”

‘Ah, there it is.’

“We’ll build a tooth-fortress! No one’ll be able to get in! Unless we want them to, of course. We’ll need a tooth-drawbridge. And maybe some tooth-horses.”

Geoffrey cocked an eyebrow. “How often does he get like this, exactly?”

‘Once or twice a day, perhaps. It varies.’

Abruptly, Geoffrey heard the phone ring. He rushed back to his office to pick it up. “Yes, hello? Desmond?”

<“Heya, Geoffrey. Got some info you might like. In a little town out west, we got a report of a man going around with two babies.”>

“Excellent!”

<“Town’s called Battonburg. Info’s a bit old, so he’s probably not there anymore, but you might be able to get a lead on him if you pay the place a visit.”>

“Thank you, Desmond! I will do just that.”

<“Have fun out there. And give me a call if you need anymore help, yeah?”>

“Of course. You are too kind.” He hung up and looked at Feromas and Damian. “Okay. I have to go. Um. Enjoy building your tooth-fortress or whatever.”

“Will do!””

"213

--donation bonus (day #9, post 2/5)--

‘Hey, hold on a minute,’ said Feromas. ‘Don’t you have questions for us?’

Geoffrey paused. “Mm, not particularly.”

‘But... aren’t you curious about what I am? Or why you’re so different from normal people?’

“I already know both of those things. You are a reaper, and I am an aberration.”

Feromas furrowed his brow. ‘How the hell do you know that, already?’

“I met some people from Abolish. And they--”

Damian snapped back. “Abolish is here in Atreya? Ah, were they behind the incident in Sescoria a couple weeks back?”

“Yeah. I was there with them. It was a lot of fun.” Geoffrey tilted his head. “Though, I suppose I am curious as to why I am only meeting you just now. If you knew I was an aberration all this time, then why did you not tell me when I was younger?"

Feromas nodded. 'That's because of this asshole. He created you without me knowing and then completely forgot about you. It wasn't until your aunt visited him a couple days ago to inform him of Joseph's death that your name came up.'

"And I suddenly remembered!" said Damian. "How is your mother, by the way? I haven't seen her in ages."

"Neither have I," said Geoffrey. "But wait a minute. You created me? How?"

"Oh, did your friends in Abolish not tell you?" said Damian. "It's a delightful process, see. First, you have to capture a reaper. And make sure they don't have a servant's soul attached to them, or it just complicates things. Then, you need a man and a woman, and they both need to possess the reapers' genetic trait. And then, after the woman becomes pregnant, you perform a soul-transfusion, carving out the emerging soul of the child and replacing it with the reaper's soul you captured earlier. If all goes well, the resulting soul will be reborn with a new mind and a new body, and you will be rewarded with a wonderful little aberration baby.'"

"214

--donation bonus (day #9, post 3/5)--

Geoffrey raised an eyebrow. "Reapers' genetic trait?"

'The trait that makes us live on after death,' said Feromas.

"Yes, it's a recessive gene and terribly rare these days," said Damian. "Luckily, I'm a carrier myself, as are some of my children, including your mother. The real trick was getting her to have a child with someone who was also a carrier. She's rather headstrong, you know, and was determined to marry for love. I had to orchestrate events extensively so that she fell in love with just the right man."

'That's what you were doing? Why didn't you ever tell me? I thought you were just being a dick when you sabotaged her relationships.'

"I wanted to surprise you!" said Damian, grinning.

Feromas sighed again. ‘Of course. For a second, you made me forget that you’re a fucking idiot.’

“Huh,” said Geoffrey. “So, if you had not performed this soul-transfusion on my mother, I would have been born as a normal human?”

“Seemingly, yes. But you wouldn’t just be a carrier of the reaper trait like your parents. It would actually manifest in you. So when you died, you would have become a reaper like Feromas here.”

“Oh!”

“Unfortunately, with two parents who are only carriers of the trait, the success rate is about twenty-five percent. If the child is merely a carrier as well, then the transfusion will simply kill the subject. You might have had a couple of older siblings, otherwise.”

‘No wonder she never comes to visit you.’

“Hmm,” said Geoffrey. “I am not sure what to think. Is being a reaper more fun than being an aberration?”

‘I doubt it. Boredom is a real problem for a lot of us.’

“Then I must thank you, Grandpa.”

“No problem.”

‘By the way, I’m Damian’s great grandfather. So you should thank me for your genetics, too.’

“I see! Thank you both, then!”

"215 -- XXIV.

--donation bonus (day #9, post 4/5)--

Chapter Twenty-Four: ‘Be not troubled...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector’s eyes drooped as he listened to his mathematics teacher talk about something he didn’t understand in the slightest. Garovel was resting on his shoulders, so there was no one to stop Hector from drifting off.

It had been an eventful night. It was the first time they had patrolled the city without a specific purpose. And finding trouble at random was not as easy as Hector thought it would be. Garovel found a building fire, but by the time Hector reached it, firefighters already had it under control. They followed a police car around for a while, but it only led them to places where people had called in noise complaints or some such thing.

After a while, however, they switched tactics. Garovel haunted a series of seedy bars and strip clubs until he heard rumors of some river operation on the east side of town. And by the end of the night, Hector had trounced three dozen thugs, sunken a boat full of illegal weapons, and fled from the police. His motorcycle had earned a few bullets holes, which he patched with iron. There was no saving the paint job, though.

He'd argued with Garovel briefly about attending school. Hector thought it was a waste of time with everything else going on, but the reaper seemed adamant that he at least make an appearance, if for no other reason than to abate worry from people who hadn't seen him in two weeks. Hector agreed, but only on the condition that Garovel use the opportunity to rest.

So far, Hector had yet to see Micah or any of the others, but the day was still young. And as soon his first class let out, Sheryl came up to him."

"215 -- XXIV.

--donation bonus (day #9, post 4/5)--

Chapter Twenty-Four: 'Be not troubled...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's eyes drooped as he listened to his mathematics teacher talk about something he didn't understand in the slightest. Garovel was resting on his shoulders, so there was no one to stop Hector from drifting off.

It had been an eventful night. It was the first time they had patrolled the city without a specific purpose. And finding trouble at random was not as easy as Hector thought it would be. Garovel found a building fire, but by the time Hector reached it, firefighters already had it under control. They followed a police car around for a while, but it only led them to places where people had called in noise complaints or some such thing.

After a while, however, they switched tactics. Garovel haunted a series of seedy bars and strip clubs until he heard rumors of some river operation on the east side of town. And by the end of the night, Hector had trounced three dozen thugs, sunken a boat full of illegal weapons, and fled from the police. His motorcycle had earned a few bullets holes, which he patched with iron. There was no saving the paint job, though.

He'd argued with Garovel briefly about attending school. Hector thought it was a waste of time with everything else going on, but the reaper seemed adamant that he at least make an appearance, if for no other reason than to abate worry from people who hadn't seen him in two weeks. Hector agreed, but only on the condition that Garovel use the opportunity to rest.

So far, Hector had yet to see Micah or any of the others, but the day was still young. And as soon his first class let out, Sheryl came up to him."

"216

--donation bonus (day #9, post 5/5)--

"Hector!" said Sheryl, smiling. "How have you been?! We were starting to think you moved away or something!"

He averted his gaze as she cornered him against a wall and a line of lockers. "I, uh..." Garovel wasn't awake to help him. He froze up.

"Is everything okay? Am I making you uncomfortable again?"

He definitely did not want to answer that.

She frowned after a moment. "I'm sorry," she said. "I get it. Don't worry. I'll just leave you alone from now on." She started walking away.

“N-no,” he said, gritting his teeth. “Please don’t... um...”

She turned. “What?”

“You’re not, uh... I mean... I don’t want you to leave.” He tried to look at her face, but her renewed smile was too much for him.

“So why haven’t you been around school, then? Were you sick or something?”

That would be a serviceable lie, of course, but he decided to stick with one story. “I got a job. It’s been, uh... very demanding.”

“What sort of job requires you to miss school? Like a family business type of thing?”

“N-no, it’s, um... well, it’s difficult to explain.”

“Oh yeah?” She looked at her watch. “Well, I do actually have to go. I’ve got tennis. Um. Tell me more about it at lunch, okay? I’m sure everyone else is curious, too.”

“Ah--okay...”

And she was gone again, disappeared into the passing stream of students.

‘Smooth,’ said Garovel.

Hector’s brow lowered. ‘You’re supposed to be asleep.’

‘I was awoken by the sound of you lying yourself into a corner. What the hell are you going to tell them, exactly?’

‘I have an idea... I think.’

‘Is that so? Don’t tell me, then. I want to be surprised.’

‘Go back to sleep, already.’

‘Fine. But wake me up at lunchtime.’

Hector smirked faintly. ‘Okay, I will.’”

He waited for lunch to arrive, barely staying awake for his next class and giving up entirely for the one after. None of the teachers mentioned his absence at all, but he supposed he should have expected that, given how overcrowded each class was. They surely had more important things to worry about than the whereabouts of a single student.

When lunch arrived, he found himself seated at the table with everyone, receiving their questions and intrigued faces. After all that had happened to him, he had to remind himself of their names. Nathan, Janine, Gregory, and then of course Sheryl and Micah.

“...I got a job in private security,” Hector explained.

‘Really? I was guessing you’d go with metalworking.’

“Security?” said Sheryl. “You mean like a bodyguard?”

“Kinda, yeah...”

“I didn’t think people under eighteen could get work like that,” said Micah.

‘Oho. What now, genius?’

“It’s... an unusual arrangement, um... just... It’s difficult to explain.”

‘What a cop-out! Boooo!’

“What do you mean ‘unusual’?” Gregory asked.

‘Ha!’

Hector looked between everyone. “Um. Well, uh. This wealthy guy... he hired me. D-don’t ask me why. I don’t really know. But um. It’s pretty rewarding work. I mean, I enjoy it.”

‘Wow, Hector.’

“There’s just one problem,” Hector added. “My boss. He’s kind of a jackass.”

‘Oh, you dick.’

Micah’s brow rose. “Has your boss been making you miss school? That’s not legal, is it?”

"N-no, I've been choosing to miss school..."

"That's no good!" said Sheryl. "You shouldn't skip so much. What if you aren't able to graduate?"

Hector frowned. "Ah, uh... I-I think that ship may've already sailed, actually..."

Her eyes bulged. "What?! You're kidding!"

Hector flushed with shame and looked down at his food. It was some kind of meat-like blob covered in sauce, and the sight of it didn't do much to make him feel better.

"Do you need a tutor?" Micah asked.

"Yeah, do you need a tutor?" Sheryl echoed.

"Um, I, ah..."

'Uh-oh. Where is this going?'

"218

"What do you need help with?" said Sheryl. "I'm pretty good with geography. Gregory's a math nerd."

"Hey, I'm not--"

"Yes, you are, shut up. Micah, you're good at something, aren't you?"

"Hell no."

"Yeah, you are! Biology! You're good at biology!"

"No, I'm not! I cheat, I swear I do!"

"Yeah, right, you goodie-good! Nathan, Janine, what are your best subjects?"

'Hector, what have you done?'

'I don't know, but I'm scared...'

“Hector!” said Sheryl, making him flinch. “C’mon! Give us your address, and we’ll take turns tutoring you!”

--+-+--+--

Battonburg was a quiet little town. Buildings were architecturally ornate but never more than three stories. The small roads remained quiet, even in the middle of the day, and as Geoffrey looked for a place to park, he spotted a familiar reaper waving him down. He pulled into a diner and got out of his sleek, white sports car.

Ozmere floated over to him, with Moss lumbering not far behind. ‘Hello again,’ the reaper said.

“Hello. What are you doing here?”

‘We wanted to make sure you didn’t wipe out the entire town.’

Geoffrey pouted. “Aww, but that is the easiest way. I do not need to ask around about Colt if I just consume all their souls and read their minds.”

‘Geoffrey, please. That sort of thing will attract the attention of the Vanguard’s aberration hunters. And trust me when I say that would not be fun for you.’

“Bah.”

‘Don’t be like that. We’ll make a game of it. We’ll talk to various people and if someone seems like they know something useful, THEN you can eat their soul. Agreed?’

“Oh, very well.”

‘Good.’

“Is Desmond here, too?”

‘No, he and Ezmortig are still in Sescoria. There is still much that needs overseeing. Our reinforcements arrived the other day, and Desmond’s been trying to help everyone get situated without drawing too much attention.’”

"219

“How is your plan going, by the way?” Geoffrey asked.

‘Well, Prince Gabriel has been cooperative, though he doesn’t know the full extent of our plans, of course. The King, though, has been resistant. To his credit, he didn’t concede any ground until Desmond ripped his arm off.’

“Ooh! Can I have the arm?!”

‘Um. I’m not sure what we did with it. Sorry.’

“Aww.”

‘If you’d stayed, you could’ve torn it off yourself.’

“There is no need to rub it in.”

‘I’m pretty sure we’ll have to kill the King sooner or later. You can still come back and be a part of that, you know.’

“Hmm. Let us find Mr. Colt quickly, then.”

They visited the diner first but found no useful information. Geoffrey immediately wanted to kill the last person they talked to out of sheer disappointment, but Moss hoisted him over his shoulder and left the diner.

It would be some hours before they finally found a candidate. The elderly receptionist of a ratty motel paused to think a moment when Geoffrey asked about a man with two babies.

“Hmm.” The man smirked. “Perhaps if I had something to refresh my memory...” He tapped the wooden counter in front of him.

“That will not be necessary.” Geoffrey looked at Ozmere, who nodded. He grinned as the red shade poured forth.

The man’s scream died in his mouth, and his eyes hollowed out into flaming shadows.

Geoffrey could see the memories. An entire life--dimensioned and complicated, sad and happy, regretful and grateful.

It bored him.

He searched for the face he wanted to see, as simple as if the memories had been his own. "Ah!" said Geoffrey. "Hello, Mr. Colt."

'Do you know where he went?'

"I know who to ask next."

'Lead on, then.'

--+-+--+--

Hector made it to the end of the school day. He was anxious about carpentry club, as he figured it to be the only other place where his absence might have been noticed."

"220

To Hector's surprise, he was not hounded with questions from the other club members as soon as he entered the room. He received an occasional glance and nothing more, which stirred a mixture of emotion in him. On the one hand, he was all too glad to not be the center of attention again; but on the other, it reminded him of lonelier days, of that old feeling in his chest, as if his heart were being slowly squeezed.

'This shit again,' said Garovel, shaking Hector out of his morass. 'They were worried about you when they thought you'd been injured, but I guess that's worn off now.'

'It's fine. In fact, it's probably better this way.'

'Okay, Hector, it's time to tell me why the hell they're ignoring you like this. It's annoying me, and I want to know.'

'Ugh...'

Lance entered the clubroom, saw Hector, and immediately started walking over.

'Aw, dammit, c'mon!' Garovel pointed a bony finger at Hector. 'You're gonna tell me before we leave here today!'

'Okay, fine...'

"Hey, Hector," said Lance. "I was starting to think you'd quit the club again.”

“No, I’ve... just been, ah, busy.”

“Mm.” Lance smiled. He put his backpack on the table and rummaged through it. “Have a look.” He pulled out a pair of gauntlets.

Hector’s eyes widened. The ornate lines along the interlocking finger parts were particularly impressive, he felt. The fingertips were all pointed, almost like claws, and he could see that Lance had used more than one type of metal to achieve the varying tones of gray. “Wow...”

“Told you I could do it.”

“You sure did...” He went to pick one up, then confirmed Lance’s nod before inspecting it more closely. “How’d you get the metal so smooth? You couldn’t have just used a hammer.”

“No, I used my uncle’s furnace and molded all the big pieces from a melted state.”

“That’s really awesome...”

“Thanks. What about you? Did you ever finish your helm?”

"221

A bit hesitant, Hector retrieved the helm from his bag and put it on the table.

“Whoa,” said Lance. “This is really smooth, too. Cast iron, isn’t it? You have access to a furnace, too?”

He wasn’t sure how else to explain it, so he just said, “Y-yeah.”

“Are you gonna add some ornamental lines to it?”

“Uh... m-maybe.”

“What do you think about making a full suit of armor?” said Lance, and Hector blinked. “It’d be a pretty big project for just one person, but between the two of us, I think it’d be manageable. Maybe enter it into a competition or something.”

“Uh... that, uh...”

“If you don’t want to, that’s fine. I was just thinking of making some greaves next and got to wondering.”

“Ah, no... I mean, uh, sure. That sounds... pretty cool.”

“Yeah? Awesome. I was thinking we’d make various parts independently and then piece them together later.”

“Hmm.” Hector scratched his forehead. “But, uh... well, that could be a problem if we don’t, um... correlate our measurements or whatever.”

“Ah, you’re right. Maybe we should make the breastplate together, then. Once that is done, we can take proper measurements and then split up to make the smaller stuff like the gorget and pauldrons and such.”

“Gorget is for the neck, right? What’re pauldrons for?”

“Shoulders. There are lots of other parts to choose from, too. Vambraces for the forearms. Couters for the elbows. And tons of others. We could probably spend the rest of the school year making all the different things.”

“I see.” Hector eyed the gauntlets again as a quiet thought struck him.

“We can get started tomorrow, if you like. Just come over to my uncle’s place after school. He’s got lots of scrap metal we can melt down and use.”

“Ah, o-okay...”

"222

Lance gave Hector the address and then ventured off again.

Garovel floated over his shoulder. ‘Looks like you’re going to be a busy man from now on.’

‘I, ah...’

‘This is basically what you’ve always wanted, isn’t it? Having friends to spend time with and so forth?’

Hector glanced at the reaper, then back down at the address. 'Y-yeah...' He couldn't help smiling. 'I just never thought it could actually happen...'

'Heh.'

Ms. Trent poked her head out of her office. "Hector," she called out. And he thought he was in trouble until she added, "Glad to see you're back."

He gave a blushing nod.

And then he was alone again. He looked across the other club members, wondering if any of them were going to approach him, but when none did, he decided that he had satisfactorily fulfilled Garovel's request to make an appearance. He started for the exit.

'Hector,' said Garovel. 'You said you'd tell me your history with these people.'

'Fine...' He took a breath as he entered the hall. 'Basically, ah... well, one thing you have to understand about the kids in the club is that, uh... they're very... well, they're very close-knit. They, um. I mean, I wouldn't call them a clique, exactly, but... they have some of those qualities, I guess.'

'Go on.'

'And, uh... there's this couple. Katrina and Jamal. They're sort of like the group's leaders. The alpha couple. And, um. One day, I, uh... I kinda... I mean, I... ah, man, this is... just...'

'Hector, c'mon. Spit it out.'

'I, uh... I saw them having sex in the clubroom.'

Garovel stared at him a moment. 'Uh. Huh.'

'Yeah... I mean, I just walked in on them and... yeah...'

'What did you do?'

'I ran away. Which... probably wasn't the right thing to do. They'd seen me. So... maybe I shoulda just talked to them, but... I... that... there was just no way...'

'I can imagine.'

"223

Hector proceeded outside through the front of the school. 'But, um... anyhow, to make a long story short, uh... I mean, I wasn't going to tell anyone about what I saw... but I kinda... ended up telling Ms. Trent.'

'Ah. Damn, Hector.'

'Yeah... I-I tried not to tell her, but... uh... Ms. Trent already had her suspicions, I guess... and... she sorta cornered me... and I just... I don't know. I couldn't lie about it. And I should have...' He shook his head. 'I really fucking should have...'

Garovel gave a sympathetic shrug. 'You just told the truth. Why does everyone in the club hold that against you?'

'Because... Katrina and Jamal were both expelled, and now they have to repeat a year.'

'Oh. Yikes.'

'I hadn't, uh... I hadn't actually done anything wrong, so... they couldn't kick me out of the club, but...'

'They ignored you until you just left on your own.'

'Pretty much...'

'Is that when you decided to kill yourself?'

Hector sighed. 'When you put it like that... it sounds even more pathetic...'

'Sorry.'

'It's fine...'

'Well. They sound like the kind of friends you're better off without, anyway.'

He shook his head again. 'Garovel, no offense, but... you don't know what the fuck you're talking about.'

The reaper raised an eyebrow at him. 'What?'

'I'm sorry, but... that's the sort of thing that people only say when they already have friends that they're comfortable with. It's not the same when you're rejected and completely on your own... "Just find new friends," people say. "Friends who will treat you better." Yeah. Right. As if that's so fucking easy. I mean, that's the whole problem to begin with...'

'Hmm. I see your point.'

'And besides... isn't it still better to, y'know... try to accept your friends for who they are? Faults and all? I mean... it's not like I'm perfect, either...'"

"224 -- XXV.

'You're surprisingly opinionated about this,' said Garovel.

'S-sorry.'

'No, it's fine. I understand. But those club people still seem like a bunch of dicks to me. And having sex in the clubroom was a stupid thing to do, anyway.'

'They're not dicks,' said Hector. 'They're just... very protective of each other. A lot of the kids in that club have pretty rough home lives. So they rely on each other a lot. And the two people I got expelled... from what I'd overheard, um... they were having sex at school because their families didn't want them seeing each other anywhere else.'

'You learned that much about them just from listening?'

'Y-yeah. I mean, I could kinda... infer some stuff, but yeah.'

'Hmm. Well. I'm sorry you weren't able to become friends with them. But if you had, then you and I probably wouldn't have met.'

Hector paused a moment. 'If only.'

'Fucking cheap shot.'

Chapter Twenty-Five: 'A maelstrom doth brew...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Between school, metalwork, getting tutored, meditation, and beating the tar out of criminals, the next few days were a juggling mess. School tended to take the worst of it, as Hector would show up in the mornings and then employ doctors' notes to skip out on the rest of his classes. After the events in Sescoria, he had nearly forgotten about the box of excuses that his mother had given him, but now he was quite thankful for it.

He was also relieved that the first tutoring session was with Gregory. Hector wasn't sure he could've handled it if Sheryl or Janine had shown up. Having someone else in his room was terrifying enough, but having that someone be a girl was an impossible notion to him--and realizing this after the first session, he arranged for the second to be at a burger shop instead."

"224 -- XXV.

'You're surprisingly opinionated about this,' said Garovel.

'S-sorry.'

'No, it's fine. I understand. But those club people still seem like a bunch of dicks to me. And having sex in the clubroom was a stupid thing to do, anyway.'

'They're not dicks,' said Hector. 'They're just... very protective of each other. A lot of the kids in that club have pretty rough home lives. So they rely on each other a lot. And the two people I got expelled... from what I'd overheard, um... they were having sex at school because their families didn't want them seeing each other anywhere else.'

'You learned that much about them just from listening?'

'Y-yeah. I mean, I could kinda... infer some stuff, but yeah.'

'Hmm. Well. I'm sorry you weren't able to become friends with them. But if you had, then you and I probably wouldn't have met.'

Hector paused a moment. 'If only.'

'Fucking cheap shot.'

Chapter Twenty-Five: 'A maelstrom doth brew...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Between school, metalwork, getting tutored, meditation, and beating the tar out of criminals, the next few days were a juggling mess. School tended to take the worst of it, as Hector would show up in the mornings and then employ doctors' notes to skip out on the rest of his classes. After the events in Sescoria, he had nearly forgotten about the box of excuses that his mother had given him, but now he was quite thankful for it.

He was also relieved that the first tutoring session was with Gregory. Hector wasn't sure he could've handled it if Sheryl or Janine had shown up. Having someone else in his room was terrifying enough, but having that someone be a girl was an impossible notion to him--and realizing this after the first session, he arranged for the second to be at a burger shop instead."

"225

Hector's time with Lance was decidedly less nerve-wracking, however. Working with metal somehow made things easier, perhaps because Hector felt it was more immediately useful. He couldn't simply take the armor that he worked on with Lance, of course, but there was something about the process of making it. Ideas arose almost involuntarily.

Even before getting started, he took inspiration from Lance's gauntlets. Replicating them from scratch was still beyond him, but he realized that he didn't have to do that. Instead, he ventured to a hardware store and purchased a pair of thin, well-fitting gloves. From there, he created an iron framework for them. Rather than making a simple coating, he began by materializing multiple rings around each finger. Then he filled in the gaps, excepting the joints, and suddenly, all of his fingers were covered with iron, yet he could still move them, just like real gauntlets. Nothing held the metal together, however, so the pieces slid right off when he put his hands to his sides.

And that was the trickiest part. He had to form tiny spikes in each piece, all with corresponding holes, so that they would interlock and stay in place.

Then, it was only a matter of covering the forearms and the backs of his hands with metal. The palms were left bare so that he could still make a proper fist, but at that point, he looked at his work and smiled. He had actual gauntlets. They might not have been as intricate as the ones Lance made, but they were probably more comfortable thanks to the gloves. And they were functional. Mostly. Coating the forearms in iron rendered him unable to remove his hands from the gloves.

He annihilated his work and started over. Garovel told him to use it as a form of practice, to concentrate and see how quickly he could correctly form all the individual pieces. And it was far more difficult when he pressed himself for speed. Interlocking all the pieces was of course the most agonizing part. Even after hours of practice, he was still taking upwards of fifteen minutes to form everything correctly."

"226

The most valuable ideas, however, came from the actual work--seeing and experiencing the process of melting metal down and making casts for the armor. Apart from simply enjoying himself, Hector began to conceptualize the creation of his iron differently. He tried making it into a process as well. Rather than merely visualizing some iron shape in his mind, he instead visualized it being melted down from a powder and then reformed and cooled into the desired shape.

And to an extent, it actually worked. It took longer to form something, but when the iron appeared in his hand, it was a quite passable cube. He did it again with a sphere, then a pyramid, then a rectangular prism. Garovel made him try for an icosahedron, and after finding out what it looked like, Hector struggled for about half an hour before Garovel started laughing at him, at which point he gave up and flipped the reaper off.

Practical experience also seemed to help. Hector made a concentrated effort to take criminals down using mainly iron. If firearms were a factor, he made them into iron bricks first, and then went about binding the attackers' limbs. If a victim or witness was involved, then Hector escorted them to the nearest police station along with the subdued perpetrator.

Unfortunately, it did not always go smoothly. More than once, he accidentally broke a criminal's arm or leg, even when all they had done wrong was a bit of burglary. Garovel tried to only focus on murderers, but those were not nearly as easy to find, even with the reaper's ability to see deathly auras.

'Most murders are crimes of passion after all,' said Garovel. 'And in those cases, I won't see an aura of death around the victim until maybe a minute before they die.'

'That kinda sucks, Garovel...'

'Hey, it's the best I've got.'

"227

They spent considerable time near the local police station. Garovel wanted to scour for information, and after a while, they learned of an apparent resurgence of activity in the Rofal family.

'I doubt they're talking about Geoffrey,' said Garovel. 'He doesn't seem like the very organized type.'

'Who do you think could've stepped in, then?'

'No idea. Perhaps we should follow up. I heard someone mention there being a suspected drug den a few kilometers from here.'

'Tell me where to go.'

Soon, Hector had another ten thousand troas in small bills. He considered dropping it off at a homeless shelter or some such place, but Garovel told him that stolen drug money would attract dangerous attention to whomever he gave it.

Part of him expected to see Geoffrey pop up out of nowhere again, but even after a few days of attacking various Rofal cash houses and business fronts, Hector never saw the aberration.

He did not enjoy wondering where Geoffrey was.

--++--++--

Jeremiah Colt looked over the wall of baby food another time. His cap and sunglasses hid his face pretty well, and his dark beard was finally starting to come in.

He'd already bought diapers, baby powder, and a fresh bottle for Stephanie. Some guy with a mohawk had smacked her old one out of Colt's hand when he asked about the nearest place to find milk. Perhaps the guy was just trying to impress his friends, but when Colt saw the bottle land in a pile of dog shit, he made the guy swallow his own teeth. The guy's friends weren't very forthcoming with information, either, but Colt eventually found the local grocery store on his own, anyway.

Baby food was perhaps the trickiest part. Stephanie seemed to like applesauce, but only certain brands, and Thomas' preference still seemed completely inconsistent. Compounded with varied pricing and purported nutritional value, Colt always ended up spending a good twenty minutes trying to decide."

"228

Colt picked up a carton of milk last. He had been trying to wean the twins off baby formula and onto normal milk, as they were already thirteen months old. All the parenting message boards suggested mixing formula and milk together in order to ease the transition.

He made his way to check-out. The clerk commented on him wearing sunglasses indoors, and Colt ignored him. As he exited the building, a brisk afternoon wind caught him across the face, and he pulled up his coat's tall collar. He started walking to his motel.

The city of Delroy was not known for its impeccable weather, and the past few days had only furthered its reputation for gray, drizzling skies. Colt had come to this coastal town in hopes of finding someone who would sneak him out of the country via watercraft. So far, he had found no prospects.

Trying to get out of the country had been one problem after another. With the bounty on his head, keeping his identity a secret was almost impossible; whenever he brought out the two infants, all attempts at secrecy flew out the window. And at that point, the people whom he had approached would either refuse to help him or try to take the bounty for themselves.

And as if that wasn't bad enough, the recent chaos in the capital had only made border patrols even stricter. Colt was starting to wonder if he would have to just stow away on a freighter or some such thing. Certainly, if he had been by himself, he would have done that already.

He reached the edge of the alley that led into the motel's rear parking lot and stopped. He peeked out from behind the corner's black-and-red brick, checking the area. Caution had kept him alive these past three weeks, and he wasn't about to forget it."

"229

Colt saw the idiots from earlier, gathered around his car and looking up at the motel.

"Hey," said Colt, a bag in each hand. "Get the fuck away from my car."

They all turned at once. Their expressions were utterly vacant and lifeless. "Aha," said the one on the right. "You look different, Mr. Colt."

This was, abruptly, much too familiar. Colt remembered these expressions from that night in the Rofal mansion, the faces of mindless puppets. And of the few people who knew his name, only two called him 'Mr. Colt.' The first was Geoffrey, and the second was Hector. And this was most definitely not Hector.

Colt scowled. "You look much more different than I do," he said.

An unnatural smile crossed the puppet's lips. "Just wait there for me," said Geoffrey. "We will have a proper reunion in a few minutes."

Colt slowly set his bags down on the wet pavement. There were three of them. Reaching his gun would require two swift motions--unzipping his coat and pulling the weapon out of its holster. This was why he didn't like underarm carrying, but these days, he couldn't very well keep it holstered at his hip for everyone to see.

He unzipped his coat, and they all lunged for him. He rolled to his right. The gun came free. The safety switched off.

One of them had Colt's leg. "Go ahead and try to run!" he said for Geoffrey. "It'll be more fun for me that way!"

Colt smashed his face in with the butt of his gun. The other two fell to a bullet each, one in the neck, one in the forehead.

He stood. There were buildings all around. No way to tell who--or what--had seen that just now. He threw the baby supplies in the back of his car and ran for the motel."

"230

Colt bounded up the outdoor staircase and unlocked the door to his room. He barged in and grabbed his sleeping children. They both awoke and stared at him curiously as he wrapped them together in the same blanket and heaved them into his arms. Combined, the children were actually quite awkward and heavy, but Colt had ample strength for the task. He shifted most of their weight onto one arm in order to free up the other for his gun.

Everything else in the room was abandoned. He hurried back down to the parking lot.

The one puppet whom Colt had not killed was back up, his smashed-in face still just as vacant amidst all the blood.

At this distance, Colt wasn't confident that he could get a headshot with only one hand, so he shot him in the chest instead. And when the guy dropped, Colt walked up and blew his brains out.

Stephanie and Thomas both started crying.

"Sorry about the noise, kiddos." He fastened them into the backseats of the car before jumping behind the wheel and driving out of the parking lot.

He got on the highway. It didn't really matter where he went, as long as it led out of the city, so he chose west. After a minute, however, he had to slow down.

Traffic was deadlocked ahead. He could see a massive pileup of vehicles and an overturned 18-wheeler.

Colt growled. He doubted the coincidence. He backed up, cars honking at him as he pushed them out of his way. Then he drove over the median in the road and started back the other direction. He exited the highway, searching for a small street out of town. Before long, he had to stop again.

A line of three police vehicles blocked the road. Six uniformed officers exited their cars in perfect unison.

Colt switched to reverse and slammed his foot on the gas pedal. Gunfire pierced the windshield, making him duck his head and squint as he turned backwards onto a side street."
"231

A car was coming from the other direction, and Colt swerved up onto the sidewalk. He hit the brakes and pulled the wheel hard to the right. The vehicle spun back onto the street as Colt shifted to neutral and hit the gas again. He could hear the kids crying their lungs out, but he was glad for it. He didn't have time to glance back at them, and silence would've been far more worrying.

He kept going straight for several blocks. He could see people on the street who seemed normal, at least insofar as not staring blankly at him as he passed, but he could also see flashing lights in his rear-view mirror. He turned right and soon saw more flashing lights bearing down on him, so he quickly turned left again.

They were building a net around him, he knew. Or maybe they already had one. There was no telling how many people Geoffrey had after him, but the bastard had obviously come prepared.

Colt decided it was time to change tactics. A clothing outlet came up on his right, and he turned into the parking lot. He stopped in front of the entrance, exited the car, and looked over the small crowd of people. He couldn't tell if they were possessed or just confused, so he raised his gun and shot the store's giant neon sign. When they shrieked and started fleeing, he figured they were normal enough.

His pursuers entered the parking lot as Colt popped the trunk of his car. A long, black case lay inside, and he lifted it open to pull out his emergency fallback--an assault rifle mounted with an under-barrel grenade launcher, already prepped for immediate use.

The first police car stopped in front of him, and he saw Geoffrey's minions stupidly pointing their weapons at him instead of exiting first. A grenade ripped through the cabin before they could fire."
"232 -- XXVI.

The other officers pulled up next to the smoldering vehicle, and Colt mowed them down without hesitation, giving them no chance to retaliate. In a matter of seconds, the last two cars were both riddled with bullet holes.

He paused with a smoking gun barrel, waiting to see if the puppets were really dead. After a moment, he was satisfied.

Colt slung his rifle over his shoulder and grabbed his kids. He knew this victory wouldn't last. As long as Geoffrey was alive, the minions would keep coming; or worse, Geoffrey would show up himself. In fact, the latter seemed far more likely. No doubt, this was a game to Geoffrey--it always was. Geoffrey would want to kill him personally, but not without tormenting him first.

To Colt's mind, all options were bad. Fleeing, fighting, hiding--they all ended with him and the children dead. All except one, perhaps.

He entered the clothing store, ignoring the screaming people. He shed his cap and glasses and started searching for a new coat. And then he pulled out his cellphone.

Chapter Twenty-Six: 'Thy desperado's heart...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector shambled into his room and collapsed onto his bed. It had been a long night, and the following morning had not been much better.

Garovel had found him a triple homicide in progress, and while Hector did manage to successfully prevent any deaths, the intended victims never realized they were in danger to begin with. So instead of being grateful, they thought Hector was some kind of blood-soaked monster, and thus, he had to spend a few extra hours evading and hiding from the police.

By the time he made it home, he had already missed the school bus. He intended to just skip, but one of his friends decided to pay him a morning visit. Apparently, Nathan lived quite close by and wanted to offer Hector a ride."

"232 -- XXVI.

The other officers pulled up next to the smoldering vehicle, and Colt mowed them down without hesitation, giving them no chance to retaliate. In a matter of seconds, the last two cars were both riddled with bullet holes.

He paused with a smoking gun barrel, waiting to see if the puppets were really dead. After a moment, he was satisfied.

Colt slung his rifle over his shoulder and grabbed his kids. He knew this victory wouldn't last. As long as Geoffrey was alive, the minions would keep coming; or worse, Geoffrey would show up himself. In fact, the latter seemed far more likely. No doubt, this was a game to Geoffrey--it always was. Geoffrey would want to kill him personally, but not without tormenting him first.

To Colt's mind, all options were bad. Fleeing, fighting, hiding--they all ended with him and the children dead. All except one, perhaps.

He entered the clothing store, ignoring the screaming people. He shed his cap and glasses and started searching for a new coat. And then he pulled out his cellphone.

Chapter Twenty-Six: 'Thy desperado's heart...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector shambled into his room and collapsed onto his bed. It had been a long night, and the following morning had not been much better.

Garovel had found him a triple homicide in progress, and while Hector did manage to successfully prevent any deaths, the intended victims never realized they were in danger to begin with. So instead of being grateful, they thought Hector was some kind of blood-soaked monster, and thus, he had to spend a few extra hours evading and hiding from the police.

By the time he made it home, he had already missed the school bus. He intended to just skip, but one of his friends decided to pay him a morning visit. Apparently, Nathan lived quite close by and wanted to offer Hector a ride."

"233

Hector thought about simply refusing Nathan's offer--Garovel even gave permission--but he couldn't bring himself to. He worried what his new group of friends thought of him, what with how he always made it difficult for them to help him with anything. So he went to school.

But before even his first class finished, Hector had to leave again. Garovel had found him a nice, heaping plate of early morning gang violence--and not even that far away from Calman High, either.

It was a group of ten or so guys, all pretty young, and masked with scarves and hoodies. They'd been raiding a rundown apartment complex, terrorizing the residents with knives and handguns. Without incurring injury, Hector bound them all in iron and stole their weapons. An elderly tenant offered him an apple pie. He quietly refused, of course.

Garovel was quick to find more people in distress. There had been a spike in violent crime over the past couple days. The police largely attributed it to the Rofals, but they also seemed keen to blame Hector, even if they couldn't determine how just yet.

And now, having not slept more than a total of four hours in the past three days, Hector finally lay in bed again. It was the middle of the day, but the nights tended to need him more, anyway.

Through the growing fog that was his fatigue, he could still feel faintly wondrous at the lack of pain throughout his body. It was a welcome change, to say the least, though he did not expect it to remain that way for very long.

Sleep was a warm cloud, unconscious bliss. And then a voice broke through.

‘Hector, wake up. Your cellphone is beeping.’

His eyes slit open. “Cellphone...? Who would be--?” He sat up.”
"234

Hector rummaged through his bag until he found it--the burner phone Colt had given him. At Garovel’s behest, he hadn’t taken it with him to Sescoria. The reaper had posited that if Colt were to call while they were in the capital, then there would be nothing Hector could do about it; therefore, it was better to leave it here in Brighton, where it would not get destroyed if things went badly. Certainly, one of the reaper’s more prophetic suggestions. Garovel had to remind him to recharge it as soon as he had returned home.

There was a single text message, received less than two minutes ago. Hector read it.

He immediately grabbed his bag and bolted out the door.

--++--++--

Another row of cars blocked the way, and Colt was forced to turn again. Nearly an hour had passed since the clothing store, and he had been drawn into a losing game of cat and mouse. Much as he tried to find a way around, the minions were slowly forcing him toward the port.

He knew their plan, but there wasn’t much to be done about it. They obviously wanted to corner him against the water, where he would have nowhere left to run unless he intended to commandeer a boat; but if that were even an option, it would probably just be an even worse trap.

Colt just wanted to buy time for Hector. Delroy was nearly two hours away from Brighton. The kid had texted him back, but Colt hadn't found the opportunity to stop and read it, much less reply. His hands were busy trying to prevent a car crash as he weaved his way through the streets.

He could often see a silver-white car in the rear-view mirror, along with a big, red hand waving hello from out of the driver's side window. Colt would lose him, only to see the car reappear a few minutes later.

At length, he ran out of road. The Gulf of Emerson filled the horizon, and only a long shipyard lay between Colt and the turbulent waters."

"235

Colt drove onto a footpath. Dock workers lined the water, hoisting crates and tanks up via pulley. They yelled at him as he passed, and he spared them a couple gunshots--not hitting them, just getting them to flee.

He looked for an area without people. He saw an empty cruise liner and decided to abandon his car in front of it. Hopping the rope and running up the stepped path, he found the entrance shut, so he riddled it with bullet holes and kicked it open.

"Mr. Colt!" came Geoffrey's not-so-distant voice. "Where are you running, Mr. Colt?! Isn't it about time we brought this little chase to an end?!"

Colt knew Geoffrey was right. He was out of options. Even if he could somehow steal the boat, it sounded like Geoffrey was already on board. Colt ran for the bow of the ship.

Rows of chairs and small tables surrounded a covered pool. Colt approached the edge of the ship and climbed up over the guard rail. The waters must've been a good ten meters below him, and the way they crashed against the hull certainly did not look inviting.

He gathered his courage and jumped.

And he stopped in midair. Pain exploded throughout his body. The red shadow had pierced his chest and leg, holding him in place.

“No, no,” said Geoffrey, turning Colt around to face him. “Let’s not turn this into a swimming competition, Mr. Colt. That would be so tedious.”

The pain was worst in his chest. Colt could feel the shadow there, tearing through muscle and bone, coiling around his heart. He screamed, and the shadow wrapped around his mouth, too.

“Shh. Come on, Mr. Colt. I need you to listen. You can still hear me, can’t you?”

He struggled, tasting blood in his mouth. The pain was maddening, but he was determined to keep his focus until the end. With his right hand, he could still feel his rifle.”

”236

“By the way--” The red shadow expanded out, much larger than Colt had ever seen, and shot back behind Geoffrey, disappearing over the side of the ship. After a moment, it returned. With Colt’s car. “I believe you forgot this.”

Colt’s eyes widened at the sight of the vehicle there, held in place as if stuck in a crimson tree.

Geoffrey smiled. “And I must say, Mr. Colt. I am surprised at you. Pleasantly surprised. You left your children in your car, didn’t you? Were you hoping they would distract me long enough to let you get away?”

The red broke through the car door and filled the backseat. It pulled out the bundled blanket, holding it up to see. The blanket flapped open. There were no children inside.

It took Geoffrey a moment to process, confused blinking turning to abrupt rage. He glared at Colt. “What did you do with them?!”

And Geoffrey caught a grenade with his face. The explosion knocked him back, making him release both Colt and the car at once.

A gaping hole in his chest, Colt still managed a bloody smile as he fell into the rolling waves.

--++--++--

Geoffrey scowled through the smoke as it cleared. He ran up to the guard rail and looked out. He couldn't see the man in the water.

Ozmere and Moss approached from behind.

'What happened?' the reaper asked. 'Did you get him?'

The anger dissipated from Geoffrey's face and became a frown. "I did get him, yes." He brought down one of the red tendrils. Colt's coat hung from it, dripping with blood. Geoffrey peeled back the cloth to reveal the man's still-beating heart. "But he was not supposed to die that quickly. I wanted to torture him much more, first."

'Aww. I'm sorry.'

"And he hid his children from me, too! How did he do that?! I was going to make him watch them die! But no! Mr. Colt, you were a real bastard!"

"237

'Well, at least you got to kill him,' said Ozmere. 'He was a wanted man, right? Imagine if someone else had gotten him before you.'

Geoffrey just pouted.

Ozmere frowned as well. 'I suppose I could go find the body, if you want, but we really should be leaving now. You've made quite the stir here. We need to get you back to Sescoria where Abolish can protect you.'

"Really? But I was holding back. I only killed a few dozen people."

'Yes, but that is more than enough to make national news. And if it makes international news, then the Vanguard's aberration hunters will definitely come to investigate.'

"Well, if that is the case, then I might as well just devour the entire city before they get here. There are at least a hundred thousand people in this city, right? That should make me quite strong, yes?"

'No! If you do that, they'll send their very best warriors! Which would ruin all of our plans for Atreya!'

“Bah. Fine then.”

‘If you want to eat an entire city, then we’ll arrange that for you somewhere safer.’

“Mm, okay. Oh, but before that, I need to go back to Brighton and tell my grandpa that I will be leaving with you.”

‘Your grandfather, huh? What’s he like?’

“He has a reaper, too, actually. Why don’t you come with me to meet him? He is a lot of fun. I am sure you would like him.”

‘Hmm. Alright. Lead the way.’

--++--++--

Hector pulled into the parking lot and hopped off the bike. He eyed the address on the far corner of the building and double-checked Colt’s text message:

delroy. 8133 sampson st. life/death. keep them safe

He left the engine running and ran inside the outlet store. Garovel followed."

"238

The place was a mess. Toppled shelves and scattered clothing riddled the floor. Hector stopped in the center aisle, looking around. ‘I don’t see anyone.’

Garovel floated ahead of him. ‘There was obviously a struggle here. Did everyone run away? You’d think there’d at least be police officers here.’

“Wait...” Hector heard a faint squeal. A baby. He followed the sound to the back of the store.

Two shelves had been pushed together, leaving only a small crack between them. Hector pulled them apart to see the twins there.

‘He really left them here for you...’

"I'm afraid of what that could mean..." Hector took them in his arms. They started crying louder as he carried them back out to the motorcycle.

'What do you want to do with them?'

"Uh..." Hector eyed the bike again. "First things first... how the hell do I carry them both on a motorcycle?"

'Make yourself an iron carriage around your chest.'

He sat on the bike with both arms full, and then did as Garovel suggested. The metal formed from his back, grew around his torso, and gradually enveloped the children, freeing up Hector's arms.

They didn't like it and kicked against the metal, so he expanded it out a bit, giving them slightly more space. They had enough room to move their arms and legs a bit, but their bodies fit snugly into place. Then he added a pair of tiny iron helmets, as well as caps for their knees and elbows.

He pulled out of the parking lot again and started back the way he had come.

'You're going to take them home with you?'

'What else can I do?'

'Hmm.' Garovel paused. 'I suppose that will be fine for a few days. But is that a long-term solution? We don't know if Colt will be coming back for them.'

'Well... I don't know... but he asked me to keep them safe, so...'"

"239 -- XXVII.

Garovel gave a nod. 'I suppose that's all that matters at the moment.'

Hector didn't get on the highway yet. It had been blocked on the way into the city, and he doubted it had been cleared already. Instead, he followed the street beyond the city limits and waited until he saw the open country before getting on the larger road.

The kids took a while to adjust to the ride, crying for a good half hour before settling down.

‘Do you, um... do you think this was Geoffrey’s doing?’

Garovel was slow to answer. ‘That might explain why we haven’t seen him in Brighton. But you’d think Colt would have mentioned Geoffrey in his text.’

‘I don’t think he had much time, seeing as he never replied. And... if it was Geoffrey, then Colt might’ve been worried that I’d go after him instead of getting the kids to safety...’

‘Hmm.’

With a clear, open road ahead of him and a setting sun over the horizon, Hector eyed the children another time. They both stared back at him, chubby-cheeked and curious.

Hector frowned inside his riding helmet. ‘Garovel... what the hell are we gonna do...?’

--++--++--

“Hello.”

“...Agh? Hmm? What’s happening?”

“Easy there. You’ve had a rough day.”

“Where am I? Who are you?”

“You’re dead. My name is Bohwanox. And there’s something I’d like to ask you.”

Chapter Twenty-Seven: ‘O, implacable father...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Colt opened his eyes. Dark waters greeted him. As did a shark, its teeth already digging into his chest.

‘Oh yeah,’ said Bohwanox, touching Colt’s shoulder. ‘The current carried you into shark-infested waters, by the way.’

Colt would have yelled at the reaper if he could. Burning aches shot through his body, regrowing muscle, restoring flesh faster than the shark could tear it away. He punched the fish in the nose. It released him but didn't flee, and after a moment, it lunged for him again. He kicked the beast with all the strength he could muster, and it torpedoed into the murky blackness."

"239 -- XXVII.

Garovel gave a nod. 'I suppose that's all that matters at the moment.'

Hector didn't get on the highway yet. It had been blocked on the way into the city, and he doubted it had been cleared already. Instead, he followed the street beyond the city limits and waited until he saw the open country before getting on the larger road.

The kids took a while to adjust to the ride, crying for a good half hour before settling down.

'Do you, um... do you think this was Geoffrey's doing?'

Garovel was slow to answer. 'That might explain why we haven't seen him in Brighton. But you'd think Colt would have mentioned Geoffrey in his text.'

'I don't think he had much time, seeing as he never replied. And... if it was Geoffrey, then Colt might've been worried that I'd go after him instead of getting the kids to safety...'

'Hmm.'

With a clear, open road ahead of him and a setting sun over the horizon, Hector eyed the children another time. They both stared back at him, chubby-cheeked and curious.

Hector frowned inside his riding helmet. 'Garovel... what the hell are we gonna do...?'

--++--++--

"Hello."

"...Agh? Hmm? What's happening?"

"Easy there. You've had a rough day."

“Where am I? Who are you?”

“You’re dead. My name is Bohwanox. And there’s something I’d like to ask you.”

Chapter Twenty-Seven: ‘O, implacable father...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Colt opened his eyes. Dark waters greeted him. As did a shark, its teeth already digging into his chest.

‘Oh yeah,’ said Bohwanox, touching Colt’s shoulder. ‘The current carried you into shark-infested waters, by the way.’

Colt would have yelled at the reaper if he could. Burning aches shot through his body, regrowing muscle, restoring flesh faster than the shark could tear it away. He punched the fish in the nose. It released him but didn’t flee, and after a moment, it lunged for him again. He kicked the beast with all the strength he could muster, and it torpedoed into the murky blackness."

"240

Colt swam up to the water’s surface, where things were no calmer. Waves kicked him up and tossed him around like a pool toy.

‘If you want to talk to me, then just think the words inside your head,’ said Bohwanox.

‘Gah! Fuck you!’

‘Good job. Also, there’s another shark behind you.’

Colt could barely turn in time to see the dorsal fin disappear. He couldn’t feel the jaws clamp down on his leg, but getting dragged back under was informative enough.

He sent the shark flying out of the water. ‘I don’t have time for this shit!’

‘Are your children still safe?’

‘Hopefully, yeah. They should be with Hector, unless something went wrong.'

'Ah! Hector, huh? That's good, then. I had to keep my distance while Geoffrey was chasing you, but Hector is the reason I was keeping tabs on you in the first place.'

'Hey, which way's the shore?'

Bohwanox pointed.

The reaper was clear as day to him, even in the nightly waters. Light seemed to make no difference, despite the fact that Bohwanox was an already dark figure. To Colt's eyes, the reaper seemed not to have a face, being entirely obscured by a pitch black cloak. Even the hands and feet were hidden.

Colt started swimming, staying under the waves. The current fought him, but he plowed through. 'So Hector is your servant, too, is that it?'

'No, no. Reapers can only have one servant. Hector's reaper is named Garovel.'

'Hmm. I guess now I know where the kid's inhuman power comes from.'

'Indeed. And you're quite fortunate, by the way. If Geoffrey had consumed your soul, I wouldn't have been able to resurrect you. I was just going to leave and tell Hector what happened until I saw that your soul was still intact.'

"241

Yet another shark drew close, and Colt punched it back into the darkness. 'Well. I am grateful to you, just so it's clear.'

'Don't be,' said Bohwanox. 'That's not why I revived you.'

--++--++--

'Nice place you got here,' said Ozmere. Moss followed close behind as usual, marveling silently at the mansion's spacious corridors and ornate woodwork.

"Thank you." Geoffrey had kept Colt's heart and coat both. Even if the whole affair had proved a disappointment, he could at least expand his collection of souvenirs.

He was a bit surprised to see the mansion's halls full of people again. He hadn't even been gone a week, but apparently, his grandfather had been busy. Most of the people were obviously new hires, as they did not scurry out of his way whenever they saw him coming. One of the lackeys even bumped into him. The guy made a face, as if about to say something quite rude, but when he saw Moss's hulking form stop behind Geoffrey, the mook seemed to think better of it and apologized instead.

The three of them found Damian and Feromas in the main study.

"Hello, Grandpa!"

"Hello, Grandson!" Damian returned a smile, which waned as he saw Geoffrey's guests. "And who are they?"

"My friends! Ozmere and Moss. They're from Abolish! Neat, huh? I am going to go with them so that they can help me get stronger. There are a lot more members in Sescoria, too! Ozmere said they would feed an entire town to me. Can you imagine that? An entire town!"

Abruptly, Geoffrey noticed the tension in the room. Damian's face held none of its earlier mirth, and Ozmere's expression was one of confusion. Even Moss had become attentive, and for a time, no one said anything.

Feromas broke the silence. 'Dozer or Morgunov?'

Ozmere hesitated. 'Morgunov.'

More silence."

"242

Geoffrey looked between everyone again. "Why did you all go quiet?"

'Because your friend Ozmere recognizes me,' said Feromas. 'Isn't that right?'

'You are Feromas...'

'I am.'

‘And is this...?’

‘His name is Damian Rofal, now. But he is the same servant, yes.’

Ozmere floated back toward the door, and Moss stepped in front of him. ‘L-look,’ the reaper said, ‘I have nothing but the greatest respect for someone of your caliber. We have no quarrel with you.’

“That’s too bad,” said Damian.

‘No, please! St--!’

Damian raised a hand. There came a sudden flash and a great crunch as Ozmere and Moss were both obliterated.

Wide-eyed, Geoffrey could see the air visibly distorted in the spaces where their bodies used to be. A shockwave passed over Geoffrey as the air refilled the vacuum, and all that remained was a thin vapor. After a moment, that too disappeared.

It took Geoffrey a second to even begin understanding what had happened. “Grandpa, what the hell?!”

“I’m sorry, Geoffrey. I know they were your friends. I should have told you before not to bring any members of Abolish here.”

“Why did you kill them?!”

‘Because no one can know that Damian and I are still alive,’ said Feromas.

Geoffrey eyed the empty space again. “But! What did you even do to them?!”

“I reduced them to little more than dust particles,” said Damian.

“Though, I suppose in the reaper’s case, there is genuinely no trace left, as there was no body mass in the first place.”

Geoffrey just stared at him.

“If you like, I don’t mind you going to Sescoria to play with the other members of Abolish,” the old man said, “but they can never know of what happened here. In fact, don’t even tell them that you have a grandfather.””

‘But it may be difficult to explain why those two never returned,’ said Feromas. ‘Perhaps it would be better if Geoffrey simply stayed in Brighton with us.’

Damian gave a shrug. “Eh. Geoffrey can do what he likes. He’s old enough to make his own decisions now.”

“Grandpa, who are you, exactly? Why were they so afraid of you?”

Feromas answered before Damian could. ‘No offense, Geoffrey, but you don’t seem very good at keeping secrets. I think you already know more than enough.’

“And besides,” Damian added, “the porcupines would be upset if I told you their baking recipes. Very stingy creatures, they are.”

Geoffrey blinked dully.

‘Well, at least he’s lucid when it matters.’

Sour-faced, Geoffrey left them alone. He returned to his room and tossed his keepsakes of Colt on a bedside table. When the coat hit wood, however, it made a hard sound, harder than mere cloth should have made. He rifled through its deep pockets and soon found a variety of objects. A few coins, some spare bullets, bubblegum, a handkerchief, a granola bar, a flick knife.

And a cellphone.

--++--++--

Hector ended up getting pulled over by a highway trooper on the way back to Brighton. After taking a moment to absorb the sight of the motorcycle and helmeted person with two babies wrapped in metal, the uniformed officer seemed to have difficulty explaining precisely how illegal and stupid the whole thing was.

Hector, of course, was even worse at explaining his circumstances--not that there was any way he could have talked his way out of it. At length, he made the officer’s gun an iron paperweight, broke through his handcuffs, and apologetically destroyed the radio in the trooper’s car.

Garovel suggested he slash the vehicle's tires as well and then call a tow truck for the guy, but Hector thought that would be overkill. Disarmed and without backup, the trooper did not seem particularly interested in pursuing him any farther, so Hector let him be and rode off toward Brighton again."

"244

As he neared his house, Hector kept trying to think of how he would explain the children to his parents. He considered trying to sneak them in, but that didn't strike him as very practical, considering the kids could simply cry and alert his parents at any time.

He left the motorcycle in the cemetery again and carried the children to the house in his arms.

When he entered, he found his parents in the den. His mother was sleeping against his father's shoulder. The man saw him and the children, and Hector could see the thought process taking place on his father's face.

The man gently woke his wife. They stood and approached him together. "Hector," his father said, "why do you have two babies in your arms?"

'You got this under control?' Garovel asked.

'We'll see,' thought Hector. "A friend of mine is having, uh... kind of a... a family emergency. He needed someone to look after his kids. And, um. I'm sorta the only person he could rely on..."

His mother cocked an eyebrow. "Who is this friend?"

"He's a cop..."

"A cop?" she said. "How did you become friends with a cop?"

"Ah... a school program thing. He and some others were doing... like a... seminar type thing..."

His father folded his arms. "And that was enough for him to entrust you with his children, was it?"

"I, uh... well, I sorta got more involved than the other kids did. Visited the police station and... yeah.”

“Uh-huh,” she said. “And what sort of family emergency are we talking about here?”

“I’m not completely sure about that, myself... but he needed my help, so...”

“How long does he want you to look after them?” his father asked.

“Uh... a few days, maybe? That’s sorta unclear, too...”

Samuel and Vanessa Goffe exchanged looks. Then they both eyed the children another time.”

"245

His mother frowned. “Are you sure this friend of yours didn’t just abandon these children?”

“...He’d die before doing that.”

She raised a doubtful eyebrow. She put her hand up to the baby girl, who grabbed it. Smirking, she looked at Hector again. “Where are the supplies?”

“What?”

“The baby supplies. Surely, your friend gave you a bag. Bottles? Powder? Diapers, at least?”

“Uh... um...”

“Ugh, wow. Okay. Looks like I’m making a trip to the store tonight.”

Hector blinked. “Ah--I’ll take care of it... It’s my responsibility.”

“Pfft,” said Vanessa. “What does a sixteen-year-old know about taking care of a baby?” She grabbed her coat by the door. “I’ll go get the essentials. Back in a jiffy.” She kissed her husband and was out the door.

“I’ll make some little beds for them,” his father said. “Won’t exactly be a crib, but it should suffice for the time being.”

“Uh, but--you don’t have to do that--”

“Oh, they’re still sleeping in your room. Don’t you worry about that. You can handle the midnight crying and feeding, thanks.”

Hector followed him to a hallway closet, where the man retrieved a set of fresh blankets. And with a pair of large laundry baskets, the beds were complete.

“This cop friend of yours must trust you a lot.”

“Y-yeah.”

“There’s really no one else, huh?”

“No...”

In his room, they found a nice spot by the foot of the bed. And as they placed the children in their new beds, Hector saw a gentler expression on his father’s face than he could ever recall.

“...Dad?”

“Yeah?”

“Um... w-what was I like? As a baby, I mean.”

“Oh, you were horrible,” he said. “Cried all the time. Couldn’t take you anywhere without making a scene. Really picky eater, too. Annoyed the hell out of your mother.”

“Oh... s-sorry.””

"246

“Eh, don’t be,” said Samuel. “Bothersome as you were, it was still kind of fun, in a strange way. And besides, you really mellowed out after you turned two or so. It got a bit boring then, actually.”

“Boring?”

“Yeah. Potty training you was a breeze. Same with teaching you to dress yourself and tie your shoes. Never made a fuss about your food anymore.”

“Y-you wanted me to be more difficult...?”

“I don’t know about that. Boring can be a good thing.” He started back for the door.

Hector frowned. He had another question, and he had to struggle to get it out. “Dad, uh... why didn’t you and mom have any other kids?”

He turned and tilted his head. “What’s with all the sudden questions?”

“I, ah... just... I don’t know, uh...”

The man took a moment to scratch his cheek. He eyed Hector again. “No big reason. Neither of us loved the idea of having more kids, and your mother really hated being pregnant.”

“But... you both... I mean, just now, with the babies... you both seemed like you were kinda... enjoying yourselves.”

“Not sure what gave you that impression.”

“I... ah...”

“You shouldn’t try to read so much into things, Hector. You’ll drive yourself crazy.”

And his father left.

Hector gave a quiet sigh. He exchanged glances with Garovel, who looked as if he had something to say but remained silent.

Alone again, he watched the kids sleep for a bit before deciding that he should make use of his downtime. He wasn’t about to leave the children unattended, but there was something he had been meaning to practice with his iron.

He sat in the middle of the floor and made an elongated chunk of metal. He gave it a pointed tip, and suddenly it was a dagger, though still very primitive. But that wasn’t his goal.”

"247

Hector focused his mind, felt his soul there, and pushed it into the iron. “Garovel,” he said. “Come here for a second.”

The reaper floated over, and Hector poked him with the tip of the blade. Garovel flinched. 'Hey. Careful with that thing.'

"Aha. It really works..."

'Congratulations. Now stop stabbing me.'

"Stay there for a minute. There's something else I need to try." He scooted away and sat on his bed.

'How did I become your guinea pig?'

"Just don't move..."

'I liked it better when you were terrified of hurting me.'

He tossed the dagger. It phased through the reaper with no effect. "Bah..."

'Hmm.'

"So... I can focus the iron with imaginary strength like it's an extension of my body... but only if I'm touching it, apparently..."

'I see. You wanna be able to focus iron at a distance, the same way that you can create it at a distance.'

"Yeah. Then I could throw things that'll hurt reapers. Or trap them in cages, maybe."

'You and I aren't synced enough, but that's definitely possible.'

"Good to know at least... because if I can't do that, then... I don't know how I'll ever manage to catch an enemy reaper. You guys always stay out of reach... and even when you do get close, you're so damn quick..."

'True. That was the whole problem in Sescoria. But it'll be a while before you can pull that off. Projecting your soul will require significantly more control than you currently have.'

"And you said before... there's no way to speed up the syncing process?"

'Correct.'

He practiced with iron a while longer, until he heard his mother return. She showed him how to change a diaper, and he made sure the children were fed before putting them back to bed."

"248

Hector thought about asking his mother the same questions that he'd asked his father, but that seemed wrong, somehow, like subjecting them to some kind of secret test. Then again, it was also frightening, the idea that she might answer differently. He honestly wasn't sure he wanted to know if his father had been lying in some way.

So he stayed quiet. And soon enough, his mother was gone again.

His eyes fell upon the children another time. "Garovel... what do you think I should do with them?"

'Tough to say, really. We don't know if it's even safe to put them into foster care. Presumably, Colt would've done that if he thought it was best for them, but who knows?'

Hector frowned. "We're lacking in information again..."

'Yes, we are. I suppose that means we shouldn't make any hasty decisions, then.'

"But... sooner or later..."

'Yeah. You've bought yourself a few days, as far as your parents are concerned. For now, I think the only thing we can really do is wait. Hopefully, Colt will get back to you soon.'

"I guess so..."

'But it's worth thinking about what we'll do if Colt never comes for them.'

"Hmm..."

'The way I see it, we will essentially have three options. Option one: we put them into foster care. Obviously, that could be dangerous, but even if we can't eliminate the danger, then we could at least mitigate it by placing them in different homes.'

“Wha? Separate them?”

‘I know it’s not exactly ideal. But twins suddenly showing up in the system is a dead give away to anyone who’s looking. It would be far safer for them if we split them up.’

“I don’t like that option at all...”

‘Fair enough. Option two: we find them a new family on our own.’

Hector gave the reaper a slanted look. “How the hell...? That sounds impossible.””

"249 -- XXVIII.

‘Maybe it IS impossible,’ said Garovel. ‘Obviously, a good family wouldn’t just take them without asking any questions. Maybe we could explain somehow or find some other way to pull it off, but... at the moment, nothing springs to mind.’

“Ugh, geez... and what’s the third option?”

As Garovel was about to answer, however, Hector’s phone began beeping. It sat inside the coat on his desk, and they both turned to look at it there.

Chapter Twenty-Eight: ‘Beware thy shadow...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector checked the messages. The conversation read:

unknown_sender: delroy. 8133 sampson st. life/death. keep them safe

user: r u ok?

user: what happened?

unknown_sender: im fine do u have the kids?

“He actually answered,” said Hector.

‘That’s a relief. Ask him what happened again.’

Hector did so. They didn’t have to wait long for the reply.

a lot. easier to explain in person. lets meet up asap

“Hmm.” He showed the message to Garovel.

‘There’s no reason to tell him where you live. Pick somewhere else.’

“The cemetery?”

‘Eh, that’s too close. You know that park west of here? About two kilometers or so?’

“Uh... Nelson Park, right?”

‘Yeah.’

“Okay...” He sent the message.

ok heading there now

Hector’s brow receded. “In the middle of the night...? Geez. I guess he’s eager to get his kids back. I suppose I would be, too, if I were him...”

He wasn’t sure if he should sneak out through the window. It seemed like a bad idea with two babies in his arms. He knew his parents both had early starts in the morning, especially his mother, so he checked downstairs and was relieved to find that they had both gone to bed already.

He slipped out through the front door with the children, bringing the baby supplies just in case. As he approached the motorcycle, he made a fresh iron carriage for them."

"249 -- XXVIII.

‘Maybe it IS impossible,’ said Garovel. ‘Obviously, a good family wouldn’t just take them without asking any questions. Maybe we could explain somehow or find some other way to pull it off, but... at the moment, nothing springs to mind.’

“Ugh, geez... and what’s the third option?”

As Garovel was about to answer, however, Hector’s phone began beeping. It sat inside the coat on his desk, and they both turned to look at it there.

Chapter Twenty-Eight: ‘Beware thy shadow...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector checked the messages. The conversation read:

unknown_sender: delroy. 8133 sampson st. life/death. keep them safe

user: r u ok?

user: what happened?

unknown_sender: im fine do u have the kids?

“He actually answered,” said Hector.

‘That’s a relief. Ask him what happened again.’

Hector did so. They didn’t have to wait long for the reply.

a lot. easier to explain in person. lets meet up asap

“Hmm.” He showed the message to Garovel.

‘There’s no reason to tell him where you live. Pick somewhere else.’

“The cemetery?”

‘Eh, that’s too close. You know that park west of here? About two kilometers or so?’

“Uh... Nelson Park, right?”

‘Yeah.’

“Okay...” He sent the message.

ok heading there now

Hector's brow receded. "In the middle of the night...? Geez. I guess he's eager to get his kids back. I suppose I would be, too, if I were him..."

He wasn't sure if he should sneak out through the window. It seemed like a bad idea with two babies in his arms. He knew his parents both had early starts in the morning, especially his mother, so he checked downstairs and was relieved to find that they had both gone to bed already.

He slipped out through the front door with the children, bringing the baby supplies just in case. As he approached the motorcycle, he made a fresh iron carriage for them."

"250

Hector soon arrived at Nelson Park. He saw no one immediately around, save a young couple walking by the entrance and an occasional passing car.

"It's pretty dark," said Hector. "You mind helping me find him from the sky?"

'Sure thing.' Garovel flew above the trees, which were dense enough that Hector had trouble following where the reaper had gone.

'But, uh... stay in my line of sight, please...'

'Yes, Mother.'

Hector moved toward the center of the park, where there was a manmade pond with a small fountain. He stopped under a tall lamp along the main footpath, but he decided not to sit on the bench there.

'Hmm,' Garovel said after a few minutes. 'I don't see him. Do you?'

'No. Guess we're waiting...'

--++--++--

Nestled behind a tall air vent on the roof of an apartment complex, Geoffrey found his spot. It was rather far, but he could see practically the whole park from here. He pointed his binoculars at the moving glimmer in the sky, and he saw the reaper. Hector's reaper.

Geoffrey grinned. "Aha. I thought it might be you two who helped Mr. Colt." He panned down across the park. "Now where is Hector...?"

He saw the dark figure below a streetlamp. Geoffrey touched the sore lump on his chest. It was no more than an occasional nuisance, so he had never bothered to get it looked at by a doctor, contrary to Desmond's wishes. Rather, Geoffrey enjoyed the feeling, enjoyed how it reminded him of Hector--his very special friend.

Honestly, he wasn't sure if he even wanted to kill Hector. Thinking about all the potential hostilities that they could have, the violent clashes and innocent casualties and long sessions of torture, Geoffrey couldn't help but smile. Hector seemed like someone who could amuse him for a very long time."

"251

But at the same time, Geoffrey knew that he could not let things draw out too much. There was one insurmountable obstacle that would surely end all the fun sooner or later. His grandfather.

Damian was rebuilding the family business. Hector was an active hindrance to that effort. Their clash seemed inevitable. And obviously, stopping Damian was no kind of option. So the more he thought about it, the more Geoffrey realized that even if he didn't exactly want Hector dead, he certainly didn't want someone else to get the kill. That was, after all, why he had told Feromas and Damian nothing before coming here. If Hector had to die, then Geoffrey had to be the one responsible for it. Simple as that.

He saw Hector pull out a cellphone and begin texting. Colt's phone started beeping soon after. The message read:

where r u?

Geoffrey thought a moment and then wrote back:

sry. cant make it. reschedule for tmrw?

There was a long pause. He returned to watching the reaper as his patience began to wear thin, and then Hector's next message read:

fine. but tell me what happened

Geoffrey pursed his lips as he considered what to write next. "Ah, here we go..." He wrote:

geoffrey attacked me but i got away. hiding from cops now

He laughed to himself. "And people think I'm not smart."

Hector sent one more text, suggesting they meet back up in the afternoon, to which Geoffrey agreed, and then Geoffrey watched them leave the park. Hector was too difficult to follow in the darkness, but the reaper was clear as day.

Geoffrey kept his distance, bounding between rooftops, splashes of red carrying him along as he maintained his view. And it wasn't long before he saw the reaper slow. He looked through his binoculars again and watched the reaper disappear into a two-story house.

"So that is where you live," said Geoffrey. "Interesting."
"252

For a while, Geoffrey merely sat and watched the house.

"What should I do?" he mused. "Hmm. I do not want to just rush right to the good part. It has to be something special. Obviously, I need to make him watch his reaper die, but what else? Umm... oh! The children! Of course the children! I couldn't make Mr. Colt watch them die, so I can make Hector watch, instead!"

Geoffrey furrowed his brow and folded his arms. "But wait. He is much stronger than Mr. Colt. Removing the children from his possession without killing him first could prove difficult... Maybe if I lure him away from the house...? Well, let me think. It is the middle of the night... and he is rather protective... How can I get him to leave without taking the children with him? Hmm..."

-+-+--+

Back in his room, Hector sat practicing with metal, trying to improve his speed in the creation of gauntlets again. He'd found an old stopwatch and decided to time himself. After a few attempts, he discovered that he had managed to shave a whole second off the process.

"Only another fourteen and a half minutes to go," he mumbled.

He was about to give it another try when a distant pop interrupted him. A small tremor passed through the room, and the light from his desk lamp flickered and died.

"What was that?"

'An explosion, if I'm not mistaken.' Garovel flew up through the ceiling.

Hector waited in the dark. 'The power isn't coming back on...'

'It's not just your house. Several blocks just went completely dark. I think we can assume the blast came from the power plant.'

'What do you want me to do? Should I go check it out?'

'I'm thinking so, yeah.'"

"253

Hector looked at the twins in the darkness, still asleep in their makeshift beds. 'But... what about the children?'

'Do you think you should stay?'

His expression strained. 'I don't know... people could be hurt out there, right? Trapped under rubble or something?'

'That they could.'

He stood and ran a hand across his face as he started pacing across the room. 'What do I do? If someone's dying over there, and I could-- agh--but I just--!'

'Take the kids with you.'

He watched Garovel float back down through the ceiling. 'What?!'

'You could be gone for hours, depending on how things go. Shouldn't leave babies unattended for that long.'

'But it's fucking dangerous!'

'You'll keep them safe.'

He was incredulous. 'You can't know that! What if I fuck things up again?!'

'Hector,' said Garovel. 'I know you still lack confidence, but there is no doubt in my mind that you will protect them. Need I remind you of all the people you've already saved?'

He looked at the floor and frowned.

'I do need to? Okay, well, let's see. There's Bohwanox, me, Colt, these same children, me again, those people from the apartment complex the other day, Lynn, Roman, Mehlsanz, the fucking Queen of Atreya, me a third time--oh, and that girl from your first night as my servant, remember her? Come on, there are so many that I can't even remember them all. And guess what? You're stronger now than you've ever been.'

'I... ah... but if they get hurt...'

'They'll always be in danger of getting hurt. But right now, one of the safest places they can be is by your side. Just don't use them to reflect bullets, and I think they'll be fine.'

Hector was silent.

Garovel waited, and then said, 'How about I go scout out the situation first, then?'

He looked up. 'N-no. I don't want you going anywhere without me, either.'

'I'll be careful.' The reaper moved toward the wall.

'No, you're right. I'll... I'll keep the kids safe... and I'll keep you safe, too.'"

'Then let's hurry,' said Garovel.

Hector gathered up the children.

--++--++--

Walking all the way back to the motel from the port had been irritatingly slow. He'd wanted to just steal a car--as apparently Geoffrey had thrown Colt's into the water--but Bohwanox wouldn't allow it.

Yellow tape lined the parking lot, but after waiting for the last squad car to leave for the night, Colt was relieved to discover that his room had not been ransacked by the police. His money, clothes, and travel supplies were all safe.

'I suppose this means the cops weren't able to identify you,' said Bohwanox.

"Could be that someone heard gunshots but no one actually saw me." Colt exchanged his torn shirt and pants for fresh ones, finding a lone shark tooth in the collar as he threw the old clothes away. "That, or the cops here are just stupid--which is honestly more probable."

'I thought you'd think more highly of the police.'

"Not in this fucking country." He gathered his things and headed back outside.

'Then why did you even bother becoming a police officer in the first place?'

'Because I thought I could be useful,' said Colt. It was the dead of night, so almost no one else was on the street, but he decided to keep their conversation quiet anyway. 'Tried the military for a while, but it was all training and bullshit. Had to spend all my time with a bunch of dumbasses, and we never even left the country. Got back to Brighton, which was up to its eyeballs in criminal shit, and the law was doing absolutely everything it could to help the assholes get away with it. So I started using the law to fuck them over every chance I got.'

'And that's when the Rofals took notice?'"

Colt raised an eyebrow. 'You know about that, huh? How long have you been following me, anyway?'

'Since Hector helped you and your kids escape from that underground mansion.'

'I see.'

The reaper tilted his shadowed face at him. 'You don't strike me as the type of person who wants to improve society. No offense.'

'I am not a good man,' said Colt. 'A good man would regret a lot of the things I've done, I think. But I've known good people. Or at least, people who deserved a lot better than what they got. And I figured that I could do things that good people can't.'

'Things, huh? Care to elaborate?' said Bohwanox.

'No.'

'We are going to be spending a lot of time together. It would be best if we learned to get along.'

'I think we'll get along just fine without knowing every little thing about each other.'

'You're not curious about me, then?'

'Tell me whatever you want. I'm not stopping you.'

'Hmm. So you'd prefer a business-like relationship.'

'Hell yes.'

Bohwanox paused. 'I'm okay with that. As long as you don't disobey me.'

'Fine.' Colt stopped, looked around the open street, and then eyed Bohwanox another time. 'Look, I know you're against it, but I really need to steal a car if I wanna make it all the way back to Brighton by morning. How about if I steal it from someone who deserves it?'

'I suppose that would be okay. But can you actually find someone like that?’

An hour later, he had a car. Annoyingly, Bohwanox made him drive the drunken idiot home first.

Next, Colt found a pay phone.

‘Calling Hector?’

‘Yeah. I memorized his number in case of emergencies.’

‘Quite prepared, aren’t you?’

‘Not enough, obviously.’ He listened to it ring.

A few beats passed. ‘He’s not picking up,’ said Bohwanox.”
"256 -- XXIX.

‘The kid’s probably just busy.’ Colt hung up and scratched his beard, eyeing the phone up and down. ‘Bah. This thing doesn’t have SMS. I gotta find another cellphone so I can text him.’

‘How long is that going to take?’

Colt abruptly noticed the mobile phone store at the far end of the street. ‘Couple minutes, I’m guessing.’

Chapter Twenty-Nine: ‘Forth unto ruin...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector pulled the motorcycle around a corner and shut the engine off. From afar, he could see floodlights lining the street, trying to light up the otherwise pitch dark rubble. Teams of emergency services already surrounded the collapsed building.

Garovel proceeded on while Hector waited beyond the police officers’ line of sight.

‘Maybe I should go with you,’ said Hector. ‘For all we know, Geoffrey could be in there.’

‘He’s not,’ said Garovel. ‘If he were that close, I’d be able to sense his presence.’

'You're sure?'

'Sure as I can be. If I scream for help, come save me.'

'Gah...'

'Relax. I'll be cautious.'

Before silence could return, however, he realized that his phone was beeping. He reached around the children attached to his torso and read the message:

r they safe?

"What the...?" He squinted through his helm. The ID of the sender was different from the one earlier. Hector asked why and waited for the response.

new phone. r they safe? lets meet

Hector's face scrunched up. He could chalk the repeated safety question up to fatherly concern, but he couldn't understand why Colt suddenly wanted to reschedule again. Garovel interrupted his train of thought, however.

'Hector, there's someone trapped in here.'

'Shit.' He forewent his questions for Colt and simply typed the address of the power station into the phone.

And Garovel was suddenly there in front of him again, reaching for his shoulder. 'Follow me. I don't think the rescue team will find him in time.'

He started running as he hit send. 'Okay.'

"256 -- XXIX.

‘The kid’s probably just busy.’ Colt hung up and scratched his beard, eyeing the phone up and down. ‘Bah. This thing doesn’t have SMS. I gotta find another cellphone so I can text him.’

‘How long is that going to take?’

Colt abruptly noticed the mobile phone store at the far end of the street. ‘Couple minutes, I’m guessing.’

Chapter Twenty-Nine: ‘Forth unto ruin...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector pulled the motorcycle around a corner and shut the engine off. From afar, he could see floodlights lining the street, trying to light up the otherwise pitch dark rubble. Teams of emergency services already surrounded the collapsed building.

Garovel proceeded on while Hector waited beyond the police officers’ line of sight.

‘Maybe I should go with you,’ said Hector. ‘For all we know, Geoffrey could be in there.’

‘He’s not,’ said Garovel. ‘If he were that close, I’d be able to sense his presence.’

‘You’re sure?’

‘Sure as I can be. If I scream for help, come save me.’

‘Gah...’

‘Relax. I’ll be cautious.’

Before silence could return, however, he realized that his phone was beeping. He reached around the children attached to his torso and read the message:

r they safe?

“What the...?” He squinted through his helm. The ID of the sender was different from the one earlier. Hector asked why and waited for the response.

new phone. r they safe? lets meet

Hector's face scrunched up. He could chalk the repeated safety question up to fatherly concern, but he couldn't understand why Colt suddenly wanted to reschedule again. Garovel interrupted his train of thought, however.

'Hector, there's someone trapped in here.'

'Shit.' He forewent his questions for Colt and simply typed the address of the power station into the phone.

And Garovel was suddenly there in front of him again, reaching for his shoulder. 'Follow me. I don't think the rescue team will find him in time.'

He started running as he hit send. 'Okay.'"
"257

The kids fit tightly enough into their iron carriage that they did not jostle as Hector headed toward the police line. The uniformed officers saw him spring out of the darkness and bound over the hood of a vehicle. He could hear them radioing it in but paid them no mind.

Aside from a few blown out windows, the front of the building was still more or less intact, but the inside was another story. A team of rescuers with shovels and hatchets spotted Hector immediately. They shouted at him, but he didn't stop to chat. He followed Garovel through a side room and down a flight of concrete stairs.

Halfway to the basement, however, he found the narrow staircase blocked.

'It's safe to punch your way through,' Garovel said from the other side.

Hector made an iron bubble around his torso, ensuring the children were completely enveloped. He reached into the rubble with metal hands and ripped open a path for himself. Splintered wood, crushed plaster, and torn metal all tumbled down the steps, and he kicked it out of his way as he reached the basement floor. He opened the iron bubble again to make sure the children had air.

‘This way.’

He passed through a corridor and then two more rooms, seeing holes in the ceiling and huge cracks in the walls. The floor trembled, and he had to stop running for a moment to keep his balance.

‘There he is.’ The reaper pointed toward the next room over, where Hector could see the entire ceiling had caved in.

“Help!” came a yell from beneath the pile of wood and concrete.
“Someone!”

A network of metal beams hung above the man, all torn and bent, some even dangling as if ready to fall on top of him.

‘Both his arm and leg are pinned,’ Garovel explained. ‘Hurry and lift those blocks there.’”

"258

Hector went to move a block, but the others all shifted as soon as he touched it. The pinned man winced in pain. Hector took a step back.

‘Hmm.’ Garovel floated around the scene. ‘It’s more of a mess than I thought. You’ll have to take it slowly. Follow my directions carefully.’

The reaper pointed out each individual block to move in sequence. Hector tried to be both gentle and quick, but it still took upwards of ten minutes before he reached the last chunk of concrete. Hector lifted it off the man’s leg, allowing him to crawl free.

Before the victim could thank him, however, another tremor shook the room, and all the metal beams overhead shuddered. One fell straight for the man. Hector leapt up and swatted it away, feeling his own arm snap in the process.

“Can you walk?” said Hector, hearing more beams creaking and bending.

The man scrambled out of the room instead of answering.

Two more beams fell at once, and Hector caught them both on iron shoulders. The floor cracked under his feet.

And for a moment, as he struggled under the weight, he could see the twins' faces. "I can't believe you're not crying." He shrugged the beams off and sprinted for the open doorway. The rest of the room collapsed behind him. He shielded the children from the flying debris.

Through the dust, he saw them again. They both just stared at him, more curious than upset. He looked for Garovel, but the reaper had already disappeared in search of more survivors.

Hector couldn't help smirking at the kids. "Not impressed by loud, dangerous things anymore, is that it?"

The girl started crying, and the boy soon joined in.

"...I jinxed it."

'Found two more people,' said Garovel.

'Show me where.' He frowned at the kids. "Just a little longer, you two. I know it's scary."

"259

The next two people were trapped in a broom closet. They'd presumably tried to take shelter there, only to have a massive line of shelves fall and block the door. Hector cleared it easily enough. One of them couldn't walk, so Hector hoisted the man over his shoulder and carried him all the way out of the building.

Police officers were waiting for him at the entrance, and Hector was briefly afraid they would try to get in his way. Instead, they took the injured man off his hands, carrying the guy to an ambulance.

Another officer offered to take the twins away as well, making Hector deliberate a moment before deciding to run away with them. He leapt over the police line and ducked into a narrow side street.

Under cover of darkness, he listened for Garovel's next orders. When none came, he asked the obvious. 'See anyone else trapped?'

'I'm double-checking, but I think that's everyone.'

‘Really? I thought there’d be more...’

‘I imagine the power station doesn’t have a large night crew. And I bet a lot of the place is automated.’

‘So... all the people made it out safely?’

‘Well. No, unfortunately not. There’s a fire near the far end of the building. Looks like some poor guy burned to death.’

Hector frowned and sighed. ‘I could’ve... if I’d...’

‘I don’t think it was possible to save everyone here, shitty as that sounds. You’d need to have been ridiculously powerful, and you’re already stronger than normal, given your age as a servant.’

Hector had no response. He waited for Garovel to finish up searching. The reaper made a third pass to ensure no one had been missed.

‘Looks like there was only one casualty,’ said Garovel. ‘Firefighters got a couple people out, too.’

‘I guess that’s... something...’

"260

‘I need a couple hours to take care of this soul,’ said Garovel. ‘You should head back home. The sun will be up soon, and you’ve got school.’

‘Alright...’ Before starting the motorcycle, however, he stopped himself. ‘Actually, I think I’ll see if Colt shows up first.’

The reaper did not answer.

‘...Garovel? Okay. See you later, I guess.’

After a few minutes, he decided to circle the block a couple times. After an hour, he was about to text Colt again when a familiar voice caught his attention.

‘Found him.’

Hector turned and blinked at the long-faced reaper there. “Bohwanox!

What are you doing here?"

'Helping someone find you.'

"Wha?"

Colt rounded the corner. "There you are."

Hector looked between them, struggling to ask the necessary question.

Bohwanox got there first. 'Yes, Colt can see me. I resurrected him after Geoffrey killed him.'

Colt cocked an eyebrow at Hector. "What the hell kind of baby carriage is that?"

"Ah--uh--" Hector released the iron around the children, taking them both into his arms. He immediately handed them over to their father.

Colt looked even more confused as he took them. "Where'd the metal go?"

"It's, uh..." Hector scratched his helm as if it were his head. He looked to the reaper for help.

'I'll explain later,' said Bohwanox.

Hector gave a grateful nod and eyed Colt again. "Why'd you reschedule the meet again, anyway?" he asked. "I thought you were hiding from the police."

"Reschedule? What are you talking about?"

"Your text. We agreed to meet at noon tomorrow, but then, uh... you, uh..."

Colt's brow lowered. "I don't follow."

Hector exhaled a curt breath and pulled out his phone. He showed the conversation to both of them.

"...I didn't send any of those first texts there," said Colt. "I'm not sure what--" And the realization hit him. It left his mouth hanging open, and for a moment, he merely stared at Hector, speechless."

"261

“What’s the matter?” said Hector.

“When Geoffrey killed me, I lost my phone,” said Colt. “And I think he must have taken it and sent you those text messages.”

Hector squinted, still confused and looking between Colt and Bohwanox. “What’re you...? But then...”

Colt reread the messages. “Did Geoffrey not attack you?”

“N-no, I...” And then he, too, understood. The sudden horror was a lightning bolt through his chest. He could only whisper his next words. “He followed me home...!”

Hector ran for the bike.

“I’ll go with you,” said Colt.

“No!” Hector yelled as the engine roared to life. “Geoffrey would kill all of you!”

“I can help--”

“No, you can’t!” Hector had no patience for the man. “Just! Get out of the city! I’ll call you when it’s safe!” He punched the throttle, and the bike tore down the street with screeching tires.

The sun had already risen. Traffic was growing, but he still had enough room to weave between cars without much trouble.

‘Garovel, if you can hear me... I think Geoffrey knows where I live. I think he might be there right now.’

He reached the house. He let the bike fall on its side and ran through the front door.

His father was in the kitchen, washing his hands in the sink. The man stood facing the small window, whistling calmly, as if nothing were wrong at all.

Hector looked around. Everything seemed normal. He’d expected the worst--blood, destruction, hostages or even dead bodies--but there was none of that. No sign of violence that he could see. No sign of Geoffrey, either.

Hesitant, uncertain, he slowly approached his father. "...Dad?"

The man turned and saw him. "Whoa there. Um. Hector? You're..." He dried his hands with a towel. "Hmm. What's that on your head?"

He decided to ignore that question for now. "Dad, is... is everything okay?"

"What do you mean?"

He stared at his father's face. It wasn't vacant and lifeless like one of Geoffrey's puppets, and Hector was silently relieved. "Did, uh... did anyone come to the house?"

"Just your friend."

He stiffened. "Which friend?"
"262

"Oh, you know the one," said his father. "The kid who's been taking you to school in the morning."

"...Did he tell you his name?"

"I don't know."

"Dad, this is important. Was it Nathan? Or Geoffrey?"

The man smirked. "Son, I honestly couldn't tell you."

Hector's jaw clenched.

"I think he went up to your room."

He eyed the staircase just beyond the kitchen door.

His father walked around him. "I have to go to work now, but I will be stopping by your school today."

"What?"

"You have been skipping class, haven't you? Your school has called several times, already, and I think I should follow up."

"Uh, that's not, ah... I mean--"

"Anyway, I will see you later."

"Dad, wait--uh."

The man stopped and turned.

"Please, just. Stay there for a minute." He moved toward the staircase. "I gotta check on something in my room first, but... just... give me one minute, okay? D-don't go anywhere."

He folded his arms. "Fine. Just don't keep me waiting."

Hector scaled the steps in a hurry, making iron around his forearms as soon as his father was out of sight.

And there was the door to his room. It was closed. He had not left it that way. He opened it.

The first thing he noticed was the stench. And then he saw the body. It was human, limp and mounted on the wall. It had been eviscerated. Blood and entrails spilled onto Hector's bed.

And perhaps it was because he was too appalled and disgusted, but at first, he didn't realize who it was. It just looked like a mutilated corpse. But then the face registered.

It was Geoffrey.

He didn't understand. Geoffrey was already dead? Hector's head spun, trying to figure out how. Or why. Or anything at all. What the hell had happened here?

And then he noticed the message scrawled next to the body in blood. It read:

~For Hector~

I finally got myself a new body. You can have my old one. ~Love, Dad"
"263 -- XXX.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector was in shock.

He wanted to run from the room, but his legs refused to work. For a time, he could only stare at the red words in disbelief. It didn't feel real. It couldn't be.

But there was more. Horrifically, he saw another bloody message, this time on the sliding doors to his closet. Simply:

open -->

He didn't want to. He dreaded what he would see in there. But he had to look. He had to know what Geoffrey had done. And when he slid the door back, he saw a second dead body.

This one was Nathan. The young man had surely come to offer Hector a ride to school. And Geoffrey had torn him to pieces.

And still another message was scrawled onto the rear wall of the closet:

See you at school, son.

Hector could hardly breathe. He wanted to cry. He wanted to vomit. He wanted to scream. But more than anything else--he wanted to kill Geoffrey. As the seconds passed, as he regained his mind, his breath, Hector soon decided that the only thing that mattered now was ensuring Geoffrey never hurt anyone ever again. All other concerns came second. His grief and disgust and shock, it would all have to wait.

Tears in his eyes, he bolted back downstairs. Geoffrey had already left, of course, but Hector checked the rest of the house to be sure. He still saw no sign of his mother.

Back on the motorcycle, he pressed the machine for all the speed it could give him. He tried to think. What would Garovel do? Probably try to assess the situation calmly. Hector didn't know if he could do that right now. He'd never felt this kind of mind-numbing anger before, this unfiltered hatred. But Garovel wasn't here to talk sense into him. And he could not afford to be stupid about this, or even more people would end up dead."

"263 -- XXX.

Chapter Thirty: 'No quarter...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was in shock.

He wanted to run from the room, but his legs refused to work. For a time, he could only stare at the red words in disbelief. It didn't feel real. It couldn't be.

But there was more. Horrifically, he saw another bloody message, this time on the sliding doors to his closet. Simply:

open -->

He didn't want to. He dreaded what he would see in there. But he had to look. He had to know what Geoffrey had done. And when he slid the door back, he saw a second dead body.

This one was Nathan. The young man had surely come to offer Hector a ride to school. And Geoffrey had torn him to pieces.

And still another message was scrawled onto the rear wall of the closet:

See you at school, son.

Hector could hardly breathe. He wanted to cry. He wanted to vomit. He wanted to scream. But more than anything else--he wanted to kill Geoffrey. As the seconds passed, as he regained his mind, his breath, Hector soon decided that the only thing that mattered now was ensuring Geoffrey never hurt anyone ever again. All other concerns came second. His grief and disgust and shock, it would all have to wait.

Tears in his eyes, he bolted back downstairs. Geoffrey had already left, of course, but Hector checked the rest of the house to be sure. He still saw no sign of his mother.

Back on the motorcycle, he pressed the machine for all the speed it could give him. He tried to think. What would Garovel do? Probably try to assess the situation calmly. Hector didn't know if he could do that right now. He'd never felt this kind of mind-numbing anger before, this unfiltered hatred. But Garovel wasn't here to talk sense into him. And he could not afford to be stupid about this, or even more people would end up dead."

"264

What's more, Hector feared himself when he was this angry. Most of all, he feared that he might accidentally hurt someone innocent.

So he suppressed the fury, smothered it in his mind until it was only a vague heat, a passenger to his thoughts instead of the driver. And he focused. All that meditation had not just been for imaginary power. At the very least, he knew how to clear his mind.

Hector knew Geoffrey's power had grown. That was simple enough to deduce. And without Garovel, Hector had no access to regeneration or enhanced strength. But he still had his iron. And he sure as fuck wasn't about to run away. Iron alone would have to do.

He arrived at the school, taking the side entrance into the building. His helm drew strange looks as he rushed through the halls. There were not as many students as usual, but searching was still a chore. He tried to be both quick and thorough, eyeing people carefully, searching for the vacant expression of a puppet.

Then he heard a series of shrieks and ran toward them. A group of students were fleeing from a long streak of blood that snaked into the boy's bathroom.

He walked in on a scene of three people crouching over another. Crimson stains were everywhere. Hector recognized the dead body on the floor. Micah Chamberlain. The three people on top of him looked up in unison. All obviously puppets. Bloodied, ripped flesh hung from their lips.

"There you are," one of them said for Geoffrey, spitting out a red gob.

"I'm in the teacher's lounge. Come meet me, and then we can--"

And they were completely encased in iron, all three at once, thick enough to render them entirely immobilized.

Hector left them there to suffocate."

"265

He paused as he came out of the bathroom. A crowd of students was staring at him, and he briefly lost concentration again. And Micah's face flashed in his mind. 'No,' he told himself, squinting inside his helm. 'Not yet...! Don't think about it yet!'

He took a wavering breath and stepped forward. The crowd shied away from him, and he saw their terrified faces. They were scared of him, he suddenly realized. Of course they were.

But there was no time. Hector ran for the teacher's lounge, as fast as his unenhanced legs would allow. He soon grew winded, but that wasn't enough to slow him down. The sight of Sheryl, however, made him stop.

She was still alive. Geoffrey hadn't gotten to her yet. Hector ran toward her. She seemed frightened of him, too--or of the helm at least--but she couldn't see the puppets stalking her from behind.

Four of them. The closest one leapt at her. Hector tackled it to the ground.

He tried to encase the other three in iron, but he was only able to seal their legs. The one below bit him above the elbow and tore out a chunk of flesh. Hector grit his teeth and made a metal knife. The puppet flailed, trying to throw him off, and he buried the blade into its eye socket. Blood spurted onto Hector's helm and gloves as he held it there until the puppet stopped thrashing.

The other three had all fallen over without the use of their legs, but they still crawled toward the fleeing Sheryl. Hector finished encasing them and then ran after her.

"Wait!" he yelled. "Sheryl! It's not safe!"

"Stay the fuck away from me!"

"It's me! Hector! Please stop running!"

She did not seem interested in listening."

"266

Another puppet sprung out at Sheryl as she passed an intersection. It grabbed her and dragged her to the ground as she shrieked and tried to pull herself away.

Hector coated the attacker's face. The groove for its mouth bumped harmlessly against Sheryl's neck, but the puppet still thrashed. Hector completed the coating and then shoved the iron statue off of her.

She tried to get up and flee again, but he grabbed her hand.

"Don't touch me!" she screamed.

"It's okay!" He pulled up the jaw of his helm, revealing his face. "Sheryl, look at me!"

Her glance turned to a stare. "H-Hector!"

"That's right."

"But you! Y-you killed that other guy! And--and--"

"He would have killed you," Hector said. "Or someone else."

"Why?! Who was he?! What the fuck is going on here?!"

"It's--agh--it's really hard to explain," he said. "Please, you have to stay close to me. I have to--" And he realized that he wasn't sure what to do with her. Just getting her out of the building didn't seem like it would be enough. As long as Geoffrey was alive, she would be in danger. And so would the others. "Where are Gregory and Janine?" he asked.

"W-why? Are they in danger, too?"

"Yes." He tried to keep his voice calm, for her sake as much as his own. "Do you know where they are?"

"Well, I--ah--" Trembling, she took a moment, squinting as she thought. "We usually come to school together, but uh--today it was just me and Micah. I, uh--I figured it was because of the power outage last night. A lot of people d-didn't come to school today, because, b-because of that. Or I th-thought that was why, but m-maybe--"

"That's good," said Hector. "They're safer at home."

"Oh, that won't make much difference," said another voice, belonging to yet another of Geoffrey's minions as it approached them from the rear corridor."

"267

Hector placed Sheryl behind him and pulled the helm's jaw back down. He tried not to acknowledge the face of Geoffrey's puppet, but he had known Jenny Friedman for years. He had never been friends with her, scarcely even acquaintances, but still. Seeing her like this, blank-faced and mindless, was enough to make his stomach turn.

"I already know where Gregory and Janine live," she said for Geoffrey. "And you will not be able to reach them before my fetchers do."

"You're lying," said Hector.

"How do you think I know who your friends are? Everything Nathan knew, I know. And Micah. And Samuel. Everyone I have taken has provided me with a wealth of knowledge."

Sheryl flinched. "Nathan and Micah? What's he talking about?"

Geoffrey ignored her. "I have learned some delightful things about you, Hector. And I would quite like to share. So please. Let us not drag this out any further. Come to the teacher's lounge."

"Stop attacking people, and I will."

"Oh, very well. But bring Sheryl with you."

"No. Let her go."

"Honestly, Hector. Even if I agreed to do that, would you actually trust me to follow through? I would like to see her reactions, as well, so just make this easy and bring her with you. Refuse, and Ms. Trent will be dead before you get here."

Hector scowled. "Fine."

"Excellent. Follow me."

They started walking, Jenny's lifeless body leading the way.

"Hector," Sheryl whispered. "What happened to Nathan and Micah?"

He couldn't answer that. He couldn't even look at her.

"A-are they... dead?"

His silence was answer enough.

"Oh, goddess...!" She started shaking even more violently than before.

"I..." He had to say it with confidence or she wouldn't believe him. And he needed her to believe him. "I won't let that happen to you."

Geoffrey overheard. "Oh, Hector. Don't lie to the poor girl."

"Shut the fuck up."

"268

They soon arrived. Jenny entered first and joined Geoffrey by his side.

As soon as he saw the aberration's face--his father's face--Hector had to hold himself back. The urge to attack immediately was so strong that it made every muscle in his body go taut. If it hadn't been for Sheryl's presence, for the notion that her safety trumped killing Geoffrey, then the fight would have already begun.

"You are bleeding," Geoffrey observed. "Why have you not healed yet?"

He could hardly feel the wound on his arm, even though he was sure that it must've been throbbing like crazy. But instead of answering Geoffrey's question, Hector chose to reassess the situation. Ms. Trent was pinned to the wall, covered from neck to toe in crimson shadow. Her mouth was covered, but according to her wide, panicked eyes, she was still herself.

Geoffrey smirked after a moment. "You have always been a difficult person to read, haven't you? Even your father--well, your previous father--even he never really felt like he understood you. But then, he did not take a very active role in your life, did he? I am honestly curious as to what you thought of him. The whole reason I took his body was because I thought the two of you were close, but according to his memories, that does not seem to be the case. And yes, I know I said we should not drag things out, but I think we need to have a nice father-son chat before we finally settle matters here. Don't you?"

Hector had no intention of responding. All he wanted was an opening.

"Ever the quiet one. Hmm. Then perhaps you will be interested in what I have to say. For instance, did you know that your father suffered from quite vivid hallucinations? Your parents never told you, right?"

"269

Hector felt the fury bubbling up to the surface again. He didn't even try to put it into words. That was probably what Geoffrey wanted him to do.

Geoffrey just kept talking. "They could be quite scary, these hallucinations. One time, when you were just a baby, he saw a bomb. Strange, right? Just this simple canister with a digital timer on it--very obviously reminiscent of his days spent defusing such things, not that he ever told you about that, either. The point, however, is that not only was it not a bomb, but it was actually you!" Geoffrey laughed. "He almost threw you out of a window! If you hadn't started crying, he might not have snapped out of it in time. And he never told your mother about it."

"...Why are you doing all this?" Hector finally asked. "Why do you enjoy seeing people suffer?"

"Hold on, I'm not finished with my story. See, your father used this condition of his as an excuse to keep you at arm's length, under the pretense that he was afraid of hurting you or some such nonsense. He convinced himself that this was the case. But really, the truth of the matter--the thing he would never admit--was that you simply did not interest him. Because he didn't love you. Isn't that something?"

Hector's chest trembled. "...Why would I believe anything you say?"

“Because it’s so surprising! I may not be human, but even I know what love feels like. And your father never felt it. Well, not for you, at least. Your mother, sure. He was fiercely in love with her. But you. You were always just. Sort of. There.”

Hector fell silent again. He tried to think. How to save Ms. Trent. How to keep Sheryl safe. Anger got in the way of every burgeoning idea.

“So that is why I’m curious. Was this mutual? Did I just waste my time? Or did you actually love him?” He laughed again. “Or maybe you hated him! Perhaps I did you a favor in killing him! How fantastic would that be?!”

"270

Hector turned his head toward Sheryl, just enough so that he could still keep an eye on Geoffrey. “Please,” he whispered to her, “move to the corner there...”

“W-why?”

“I don’t want anyone sneaking up behind you while I’m... distracted...”

Sheryl nodded, and Hector stayed in front of her while they repositioned themselves away from the open door.

“Still refusing to answer me, I see,” said Geoffrey. “I will take that to mean you really did love your father, after all. Honestly, though, I cannot understand why. You know what the funniest thing is? I actually care more about you than he did.” He grinned with Samuel’s face. “And of course, I will be a much more attentive father.”

Hector clapped his hands together, and a wall of iron sprung up between him and Sheryl, as thick as he could make it from floor to ceiling. He took a step forward and then added a second layer, just as broad as the first.

“Ha. She will suffocate in there, you know.”

“You’d slip through any air holes.”

“I will just have to break it down, then.” The red shade shot toward him.

Hector made a shield--a crude slab of metal over his arm--and the shadow splashed against it, spraying outward before swirling around to Hector's backside. He slashed with a focused dagger, but more red was already on the way. Within seconds, it had him entirely enveloped.

The shadow faltered against the iron wall, however, cutting into it but not nearly deep enough. "Eh. Too much hassle. I am not interested in Sheryl, anyway."

Hector struggled, but without his undead strength, he couldn't even move.

Ms. Trent popped off the wall, suspended in midair. "How about a bargain?" said Geoffrey. "Tell your reaper to show himself, and I will allow this woman to live."

"271

Hector coated his own body, focusing the iron with his soul. From his chest, a metal spike tore through the red shade, but a moment later, the shadow cut it off and filled the hole back in. He could feel it tightening around his body, digging through metal and scratching his flesh.

"How dull," said Geoffrey. "I am so much stronger than you now. But we both know that killing you alone is useless. So come on. Bring your reaper here."

"I can't," he said through clenched teeth.

"You would let this poor woman die to protect someone who is already dead?"

"No... I mean I can't contact him right now."

Geoffrey frowned. "Oh. Well, that is unfortunate. Perhaps we will try again later, then."

Hector tensed, knowing that wasn't all.

"I have had quite enough of waiting, however, so this teacher of yours will have to die in the meantime."

"No!" He thrashed, creating metal frantically, fighting vainly with the red again. "Don't you dare hurt her!"

"Then stop me," said Geoffrey. "Give me a real fight, at least. Amuse me. Fail, and this will not end with Ms. Trent. When we are done here, we will go visit your mother at work and try again. Hopefully, your reaper will be ready by then."

He needed more. Burdened under panic, he could barely keep focus. This feeling, this desperation, he knew it well. He just had to make that same mental leap again. So why was it taking him so long? Why wouldn't it just fucking work already? So many people had died. This stupid metal power. It had to evolve again. There was no other option. With every ounce of pressure in his mind, he demanded more. A growling scream exploded out of his mouth. His throat shredded itself.

And finally. He felt it there. The response.

A metal coat enveloped Hector in a flash. Massive spikes shot out all over his body, ripping dozens of holes into the shadow."

"272

The lacerated crimson sunk back to Geoffrey, and he recoiled away from Hector. The shadow retained its grip on Ms. Trent, however, pulling her closer to his body. He started laughing as he looked at Hector. "Well done! But now I have to kill your teacher, of course."

Ms. Trent let out a muffled scream as the red tightened around her. And then the metal coat was there for her as well. Unlike Hector's, the spikes around Ms. Trent could not tear the shadow. Instead, they merely pushed it out, like taffy stretched across a bed of needles.

Geoffrey's brow lowered. "Now that is just unfair."

Hector had to annihilate his own coating in order to move again, but he kept iron around his chest, shins, and forearms. He put a gloved fist out to his side, and it shook as he concentrated on what he wanted. Around the fist grew fresh metal, but it did not stop with mere coating. It extended out, half a meter, until it reached a sharpened tip, and suddenly, instead of a right hand, he had a thick blade--a full sword with crude, jagged edges. It was heavy, weighing his arm down at first, but adrenaline helped him lift it.

He ran forward, sword held wide, and met the next wave of red with a spiked shield. He tore a path toward Geoffrey, who backed away; and instead of pursuing, Hector diverted toward Ms. Trent and slashed clean through the shadow. Her spiked cage clattered heavily to the floor as the shade retreated to Geoffrey. He freed the teacher from her metal bindings. She rolled over on the floor, gasping for breath.

“Aha, wow! How scary!” And a brief silence fell as the sound of nearby sirens filled the room. Geoffrey’s grin only broadened. “I think we need some more playmates.” He fled into the hallway with Jenny.

Hector freed Sheryl, told her to barricade the door, and then gave chase.”

"273 -- XXXI.

Chapter Thirty-One: ‘The dance of shade and darkness...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had to destroy his metal. It only weighed him down, and Geoffrey was already faster, able to ride the red shadow like a wave through the corridors while carrying Jenny at his side.

They reached the school’s front entrance, and Geoffrey did not hesitate to rush through the sliding doors to meet the police force there.

Still inside, Hector could see the officers scrambling for their firearms at the sight of Geoffrey’s red mass. Their bullets would do nothing, of course. He had to protect them.

Hector slapped the tiled floor with his hand, and an iron wall shot up in front of Geoffrey, curving over his head like an immobile tidal wave. Cut off from the policemen, Geoffrey tried to circumvent the wall, but Hector kept adding to it until the metal met the school’s pale brick. And abruptly, there was nowhere for the aberration left to go, except through Hector.

Geoffrey returned to the entryway, Jenny at the shadow’s heels.

Hector reforged his sword and shield.

“Always trying to spoil other people’s fun,” said Geoffrey. “I thought I raised you better than that." Metal promptly clapped around his face, which the shade immediately burst through; but when Geoffrey could see again, Hector was nearly on top of him. The sword barreled toward Geoffrey's chest. He dodged but not completely.

Hector's blade caught the side of Geoffrey's ribcage, taking flesh with it. The reds mixed, blood and shadow confused.

Geoffrey slinked back and sicced Jenny on him, but Hector encased her in iron before she even took three steps. The red shadow lunged again, breaking upon Hector's shield before being slashed apart by the sword.

"This is not very fun," Geoffrey complained. "I don't think you are being very--" He had to stop and flee when he saw that Hector was not going to wait for him to finish talking."

"273 -- XXXI.

Chapter Thirty-One: 'The dance of shade and darkness...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had to destroy his metal. It only weighed him down, and Geoffrey was already faster, able to ride the red shadow like a wave through the corridors while carrying Jenny at his side.

They reached the school's front entrance, and Geoffrey did not hesitate to rush through the sliding doors to meet the police force there.

Still inside, Hector could see the officers scrambling for their firearms at the sight of Geoffrey's red mass. Their bullets would do nothing, of course. He had to protect them.

Hector slapped the tiled floor with his hand, and an iron wall shot up in front of Geoffrey, curving over his head like an immobile tidal wave. Cut off from the policemen, Geoffrey tried to circumvent the wall, but Hector kept adding to it until the metal met the school's pale brick. And abruptly, there was nowhere for the aberration left to go, except through Hector.

Geoffrey returned to the entryway, Jenny at the shadow's heels.

Hector reforged his sword and shield.

“Always trying to spoil other people’s fun,” said Geoffrey. “I thought I raised you better than that.” Metal promptly clapped around his face, which the shade immediately burst through; but when Geoffrey could see again, Hector was nearly on top of him. The sword barreled toward Geoffrey’s chest. He dodged but not completely.

Hector’s blade caught the side of Geoffrey’s ribcage, taking flesh with it. The reds mixed, blood and shadow confused.

Geoffrey slinked back and sicced Jenny on him, but Hector encased her in iron before she even took three steps. The red shadow lunged again, breaking upon Hector’s shield before being slashed apart by the sword.

“This is not very fun,” Geoffrey complained. “I don’t think you are being very--” He had to stop and flee when he saw that Hector was not going to wait for him to finish talking.”

"274

Before Geoffrey could reach the west hall, a metal wall appeared in his path. He leapt away from Hector’s sword, bounding over the reception desk and rushing for the east hall, but another sudden barrier cut him off. Even the chamber’s windows clapped shut with iron.

“I see you are determined to end this now.” Geoffrey swerved out of Hector’s reach. “Then I might as well oblige.” Metal blocked his vision again, but Geoffrey was prepared. The shadow tore it off while two other streaks shot toward Hector from separate directions.

Hector rolled to the side and took one streak with his shield. The other swirled back around, and he slashed horizontally but missed. The shade caught him under the arm. He had a thin coat of metal there, but the impact still knocked him off his feet, and he felt a rib snap. The shadow coiled around his torso, making him groan as it tightened, and he could see several more red snakes gunning for him.

He again resorted to full defense. Spikes jutted out all across his body, reaching even farther than before and shredding every shadow that got too close. He could hear Geoffrey snickering as they shrunk back to him.

“Good! Don’t make it too easy for me!” The shadow spread out around him, gathering into a swirling cluster like some sort of hydra. He sent them all at once.

Hector made a wall in front of himself. The shadows slammed into it, leaving dents and pushing the whole mass of iron backward. Scowling against the wall, Hector slapped his hand on the largest dent. A pillar shot out from the other side and tore a path straight through the red.

Geoffrey avoided it easily enough and then circled around to Hector’s side.”

"275

--donation bonus (day #10, post 1/5)--

The problem was Geoffrey’s mobility, Hector knew. A mere iron coating had proved useless, but thick barriers had not, so that was what he went for when he saw more red snakes reaching for him. And with another wall in the way, he couldn’t see Geoffrey, but he didn’t need to. He only wanted to limit the aberration’s options. He steadily placed more barriers around the room, soon creating a small maze, and each time the shadows managed to find him again, he hacked them down.

“I see what you are trying to do!” Geoffrey said from beyond a wall. “It will not work!” An iron pillar shot out at him, and he narrowly slid out of the way, going right. Another pillar appeared, this time blocking the path rather than attacking, and Geoffrey ducked under it, only to find still another metal beam there. He turned around, and abruptly, Hector was at his side, replacing the wall that stood there a moment ago.

Geoffrey reeled back and barely avoided the sword. “You will trap yourself before you trap me,” he said, bringing his shadows to bear. A red cluster whirled at his side, forming a spinning drill. It dug into the wall next to him, expanding the hole quickly.

Hector had a different set of shadows to contend with. While ripping through them, he merely tried to keep Geoffrey in sight, eliminating walls as he ran and making new ones for Geoffrey to tunnel through.

"You will grow tired before I do, you know!"

Hector slipped an extra wall in--not in Geoffrey's path, but rather just beside it, seemingly unworthy of attention. And when their chase made a complete circle, Hector was ready. He pulled his fist to his shoulder, and an iron block popped out of the wall as Geoffrey passed. It shoved him straight toward Hector."

"276

--donation bonus (day #10, post 2/5)--

Geoffrey's eyes widened as he watched the sword close in, as he realized that he didn't have his balance, that he couldn't dodge this one. Shadows rushed to his defense. They might as well have been paper.

Hector gored him through the stomach.

Geoffrey was not smiling. Dumbstruck, he tried to speak and only coughed up blood. His shadows all shuddered as Hector ripped the sword back out, taking flesh with it. Geoffrey staggered back.

Hector stared at his work, still tensed to the point of trembling. He almost couldn't believe his eyes.

"How careless..." Geoffrey's shadow caught him stumbling and propped him up. "This body is already done for..."

Hector raised three walls around the aberration, boxing him in. Only the space between the two of them was left open.

Geoffrey spared a glance at the walls. "Ha... you wouldn't be willing to let me find a new body, would you?" A red cloud poured out of Geoffrey's face.

Hector cleaved it in two.

The red shriveled and shrunk back to him, making Geoffrey spasm violently. And even now, he still managed a bloody grin. "Damn... I wanted to see my power grow more. Desmond--" He stopped to hack up more blood. "Desmond told me--he said... that one day, I would be able to turn my slaves into monsters. I was really looking forward to that, you know..."

It was nearly done, Hector knew. Geoffrey was down. The shadow was contained. He wasn't sure if aberrations could die from blood loss like normal humans, but didn't intend to wait that long. And yet, the sight of his father's body, his father's face--it made him hesitant. And even though he knew it had to be done, a small part of him didn't want to deal the finishing blow."

"277

--donation bonus (day #10, post 3/5)--

"You bastard," said Geoffrey. "Are you not even going to say anything? After everything we have been through together?"

He had no desire to respond. It seemed too respectful.

Geoffrey gave a hoarse laugh. "What if I told you... that I wouldn't hurt anyone anymore? In fact, what if I even agreed to help you? I would... I would listen to you--do anything you say."

Hector's eyes bulged, and his mouth twisted beneath the helm. He could hardly believe how much those words angered him. He'd tried to remain calm throughout the fight, to not let anything Geoffrey said get to him, but this--this was ridiculous. An appeal to his better nature? As if there was anything which could convince him. After all the murders. All the lives destroyed. All the families.

The motherfucking arrogance.

Rage came rushing back to him, blindingly strong. He almost couldn't even hear Geoffrey's next words.

"If you just--kagh--just spared my life... I would do that. Yeah? What do you say?"

"Fuck no." Hector raised the wall between them, completing the box. He touched the metal with both hands. He could hear Geoffrey shouting from inside.

Hector skewered the box with a dozen metal pillars, all focused with his soul. Geoffrey's agonized cries still rang out. He added a dozen more. The noise stopped.

He opened the wall. There lay Geoffrey. A crumpled heap with metal bars stuck through it, piercing the chest, neck, skull, stomach, every limb multiple times. The last bit of red shadow shriveled up and evaporated into nothingness.

He stared at the body, waiting, half-expecting it to spring back to life and attack him again. He kept waiting.

Geoffrey was dead. Finally.

Hector breathed. He could only feel so relieved, however. This was not just the proof of Geoffrey's death. It was also the proof of his father's. And as that sunk in, as the urgency and adrenaline of battle wore off, Hector slowly broke down."

"278 -- XXXII.

--donation bonus (day #10, post 4/5)--

Hector destroyed the metal around his father's body and dropped to the floor, unable even to stand. He was exhausted and in pain and nothing made sense. Nothing, except for the fact that everything hurt.

The weight of it all washed over him--a series of horrible waves. His father. His friends. His home. His school. Everything that was supposed to be normal about his life. Everything that was supposed to be safe. He couldn't think of a single thing that had not been destroyed. Obliterated.

He wept. He didn't know what else to do. His brain felt numb. He couldn't sort anything out.

'Garovel?' he tried. 'Are you back yet...? Please be back...' He waited for a response but received none. He sighed. 'I could really use your advice right now...'

At length, he remembered Sheryl and Ms. Trent. If nothing else, he could at least go check on them. Maybe he could figure out what to do after that.

Groaning, covered in blood, and clutching his ribcage, Hector struggled to his feet again.

Chapter Thirty-Two: 'Steadfast heart, expect not refuge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector kept his helm on in front of the ladies. Even if it was splattered with blood, he still preferred that to revealing his haggard, tear-stricken face. He honestly wasn't sure he would be able to talk to them right now without something to hide behind.

"So it's safe now?" Sheryl asked. "It's r-really safe? You're sure?"

"Yeah..."

Sheryl seemed reluctant with her relief. "And the police--where are they?"

"Out front," he said. "I'll take you to them."

"N-no," she said, backing away. "I'll go on my own. It's safe, right?"

"Y-yeah, it is..."

"Don't get me wrong," said Sheryl. "I'm grateful. You saved me. But. But you. Please, just--just stay away from me from now on. I don't--I mean--please..."

"278 -- XXXII.

--donation bonus (day #10, post 4/5)--

Hector destroyed the metal around his father's body and dropped to the floor, unable even to stand. He was exhausted and in pain and nothing made sense. Nothing, except for the fact that everything hurt.

The weight of it all washed over him--a series of horrible waves. His father. His friends. His home. His school. Everything that was supposed to be normal about his life. Everything that was supposed to be safe. He couldn't think of a single thing that had not been destroyed. Obliterated.

He wept. He didn't know what else to do. His brain felt numb. He couldn't sort anything out.

'Garovel?' he tried. 'Are you back yet...? Please be back...' He waited for a response but received none. He sighed. 'I could really use your advice right now...'

At length, he remembered Sheryl and Ms. Trent. If nothing else, he could at least go check on them. Maybe he could figure out what to do after that.

Groaning, covered in blood, and clutching his ribcage, Hector struggled to his feet again.

Chapter Thirty-Two: 'Steadfast heart, expect not refuge...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector kept his helm on in front of the ladies. Even if it was splattered with blood, he still preferred that to revealing his haggard, tear-stricken face. He honestly wasn't sure he would be able to talk to them right now without something to hide behind.

"So it's safe now?" Sheryl asked. "It's r-really safe? You're sure?"

"Yeah..."

Sheryl seemed reluctant with her relief. "And the police--where are they?"

"Out front," he said. "I'll take you to them."

"N-no," she said, backing away. "I'll go on my own. It's safe, right?"

"Y-yeah, it is..."

"Don't get me wrong," said Sheryl. "I'm grateful. You saved me. But. But you. Please, just--just stay away from me from now on. I don't--I mean--please..."

"279

--donation bonus (day #10, post 5/5)--

Hector frowned beneath his helm. He tried to extend a hand toward her, but she flinched.

"No, please! This is all just too much! I don't want anything to do with you!" She ran away from him. "I'm sorry!"

He watched her go. He couldn't really blame her. He was the reason she was in danger to begin with. It was probably better this way, honestly. He just wished it didn't feel so awful.

"She's just traumatized," said Ms. Trent. "Give her some time."

He doubted time would make much difference. He looked at his teacher.

Small cuts riddled her face. Her hair and clothes were all a mess. She didn't look any less traumatized than Sheryl, really.

"H-how are you feeling?" he asked her.

"Alive. Thanks to you."

"Don't be too grateful. I... I'm the reason he was trying to kill you..."

"I don't understand," she said as they began walking. "What was he trying to accomplish, exactly? That was your father, wasn't it?"

"That thing was not my dad. It was... a monster. It killed him and took his body..."

She hesitated. "I wish I couldn't believe you. But after... well... I'm not about to doubt your word."

"It was trying to... hurt me, I guess..." He took a quiet breath. "It's dead now, but... it sure as hell succeeded..."

"Why did it want to hurt you? Because you're the Darksteel Soldier?"

Hector paused at that. "...The what?"

"Oh, come on. I've seen the news. A young, black male in a metal helmet, terrorizing criminals around the city. You can't tell me that's some other guy."

"Yeah, o-okay, that's me, but... the Darksteel Soldier?"

"Isn't that what you call yourself?"

"Uh... no..."

"Well, that's what they're calling you. You didn't know?"

"I, uh... I haven't really... been paying attention to the news lately..."

--donation bonus (day #11, post 1/5)--

"Hmm." Ms. Trent eyed him again. "I started seeing the reports a couple weeks ago, and I had my suspicions about you, y'know. I remembered that helmet you made. And you'd been missing a lot of club meetings. But still. I didn't really think it could be you. You're just. So..."

"Y-yeah, I know... I'm still surprised, myself..."

"Never can tell with the quiet ones, I suppose."

For both their sakes, Hector avoided hallways that he knew would have dead bodies, but they still had to pass his group of four metal statues from earlier. Ms. Trent looked directly at them, and then at him, but she did not ask the obvious question. Perhaps she already knew all she wanted to.

He escorted Ms. Trent out to the side parking lot, where he'd left his motorcycle, and found a large crowd of students and police officers. He was quietly relieved to see that so many people had made it out safely.

A sudden shriek drew his attention, and he saw a group of students pointing at him from behind the line of police officers.

"That's him!" one girl shouted. "I saw him kill someone!"

"Just look at him! He's covered in blood!"

"He killed that boy in the bathroom!"

The police pulled out tasers and started toward him, all seven of them at once.

"No!" yelled Ms. Trent. "He's not the murderer! He protected us!"

The officers exchanged uncertain glances but still persisted. "Please come with us," said the closest one. "We just need to sort all this out."

Hector looked over the crowd another time, across a myriad of angry and terrified faces. He could also see the motorcycle laying on the sidewalk, no more than five meters away from him. Suddenly, he had a decision to make.

Now more than ever, he wished Garovel were here."

"281

--donation bonus (day #11, post 2/5)--

Hector took a long, tired breath. Fleeing from the police right now seemed exhausting. He almost let them arrest him on that impulse alone. But he had not forgotten. He'd killed several "people" today. And explaining that to the police seemed not only tiresome but downright impossible.

He would have liked more time to deliberate, but the cops didn't look prepared to oblige. So he turned their tasers into metal bricks and ran for the bike during the confusion. Ms. Trent yelled something after him, but he couldn't hear what it was.

One of the officers ran toward him with a nightstick as he started the bike. Hector raised a wall before the man reached him, and then peeled off the sidewalk. He circled wide around the crowd, hugging the edge of the parking lot until he found the road.

An unpleasant surprise was waiting for him, however. He passed under a police chopper, and when he looked back, he saw it turning around to pursue him.

He returned wide eyes to the road ahead. "How the fuck do I lose a helicopter?!"

He didn't even know where he was going. It wasn't like he could just go back to his house. And after a few minutes, he heard more sirens and saw flashing lights in his rearview mirror. The police must have also been clearing the streets ahead of him, because traffic soon became nonexistent--which was helpful insofar as ensuring he didn't crash into anyone, but he figured it also meant they'd set up road blocks for him.

Sure enough, within a matter of minutes, he spotted a police barricade dead ahead. Four massive trucks filled the street and sidewalks, lights flashing with uniformed officers waiting, weapons drawn.

He only had one idea. And it felt like one of the stupidest things he'd ever thought of."

"282

--donation bonus (day #11, post 3/5)--

He wanted a bridge, one that would go above the police trucks and then back down. But he had never created such a thing before. He had never materialized an actual structure, let alone one that needed to support the force of a motorcycle hurtling uphill at 150 km/h.

But he did his best, creating iron steadily ahead of the speeding bike. He made it extra wide, expecting the tires to lose traction against the metal, and then he ramped it up, perhaps a bit too steeply as he felt the bike jolt. And as he climbed and the metal began to buckle, he added crisscrossing support beams.

The bridge sagged as he passed over the blockade. He was too afraid to give it proper support, not wanting to accidentally skewer one of the cops below on a sudden pillar. But he reached the other side quickly enough and tried to give it beams again; only, it was too steep now, and the tires started sliding. The bridge crumpled behind him as well, and he annihilated it before it crushed someone.

The bike hit the road, front tire first, and for a second, he thought it would flip over, but then the rear tire met pavement, and he found his balance again. The engine started grinding as he sped away.

He soon saw cars on the road again and had to slow down. Then he noticed an upcoming traffic jam. And the sheer number of pedestrians meant that mounting the curb was also out of the question. He could try to slip between stopped cars with the motorcycle, but he wasn't entirely sure it would fit. Instead, he decided to stop altogether, turning the front tire and placing one foot on asphalt as he looked back toward the helicopter."

"283 -- XXXIII.

--donation bonus (day #11, post 4/5)--

The chopper was certainly persistent. Clearly, as long as it remained in pursuit, police cars would keep finding him. If he couldn't flee from it, then he needed to neutralize it--without harming whoever was inside, of course.

Hector waited for the helicopter to draw closer. Then he attached four metal pillars to its landing skids and looped the other ends around separate streetlights. He added a fifth to the tail and attached it to a fire hydrant. He turned the bike around and rode off in a different direction, this time without his pursuer.

He just went straight. He didn't know what else to do. The more he tried to think, the worse he felt. After a while, he ran out of city. He kept going.

Barren grasslands filled the horizon, save the occasional rise of boulders. He pulled into the road's shoulder, then into the grass and dirt, and finally stopped next to a cluster of rocks.

And it was finally quiet. He finally had space to breathe. To think. He got off the bike. He pulled off the helm and let it drop from his fingers while he looked out, Brighton in the distance.

He collapsed. Unconsciousness embraced him then and there.

When he awoke, his face was in the dirt. Blue sky and white clouds greeted him. The sun had only just begun to wane.

Hector shut his eyes. '...Garovel?'

'Hector! Where are you?! What the fuck happened?!'

He started sobbing.

Chapter Thirty-Three: 'O, solemn child...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

For a time, he couldn't even respond.

'Hector?! I... I went to the house, and I saw Geoffrey's body. And Nathan's. And. I checked the school and--I... Hector, talk to me.'

'Everything went wrong, Garovel... everything is... it's all... I can't...'
"283 -- XXXIII.

--donation bonus (day #11, post 4/5)--

The chopper was certainly persistent. Clearly, as long as it remained in pursuit, police cars would keep finding him. If he couldn't flee from it, then he needed to neutralize it--without harming whoever was inside, of course.

Hector waited for the helicopter to draw closer. Then he attached four metal pillars to its landing skids and looped the other ends around separate streetlights. He added a fifth to the tail and attached it to a fire hydrant. He turned the bike around and rode off in a different direction, this time without his pursuer.

He just went straight. He didn't know what else to do. The more he tried to think, the worse he felt. After a while, he ran out of city. He kept going.

Barren grasslands filled the horizon, save the occasional rise of boulders. He pulled into the road's shoulder, then into the grass and dirt, and finally stopped next to a cluster of rocks.

And it was finally quiet. He finally had space to breathe. To think. He got off the bike. He pulled off the helm and let it drop from his fingers while he looked out, Brighton in the distance.

He collapsed. Unconsciousness embraced him then and there.

When he awoke, his face was in the dirt. Blue sky and white clouds greeted him. The sun had only just begun to wane.

Hector shut his eyes. '...Garovel?'

'Hector! Where are you?! What the fuck happened?!'

He started sobbing.

Chapter Thirty-Three: 'O, solemn child...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

For a time, he couldn't even respond.

‘Hector?! I... I went to the house, and I saw Geoffrey’s body. And Nathan’s. And. I checked the school and--I... Hector, talk to me.’

‘Everything went wrong, Garovel... everything is... it’s all... I can’t...’
"284

--donation bonus (day #11, post 5/5)--

‘Okay, just tell me where you are first,’ said Garovel.

‘I don’t really, uh... I think I went south...’

‘You gotta give me more to go on, Hector.’

‘I’ll... I’ll make you a guidepost.’

‘What do you mean?’

Hector stretched his arms. He took a hard breath and rubbed his hands together. ‘Fly up high and look south.’

‘Er, okay...’

He placed both hands against the ground. A metal beam exploded out of the ground in front of him. He continuously added to it, wider and wider layers at its base, and soon, he had created the tallest needle he’d ever seen. ‘Do you see it?’

‘Um. See what?’

Hector furrowed his brow. He took a step back and added even more. It shot up into the sky, becoming a tower.

‘Holy shit,’ said Garovel. ‘You didn’t just... Did you really just make that gigantic needle there?’

‘Yeah...’

‘Oh, wow... I’m on my way. Now what the hell happened?’

Hector still wasn’t sure where to begin. He closed his eyes and tried to think. ‘The cellphone,’ he thought. ‘The text messages... they were a trap. By Geoffrey.’

‘Not sure I understand...’

Hector elaborated at length. He told the reaper everything. He fumbled over the worst parts. His father. Nathan. Micah. At least a dozen students. His throat swelled up as he talked further. He was practically choking by the end.

And Garovel listened patiently to it all. Perhaps too patiently. The reaper hardly said anything. His skeletal face spoke of abject horror. Evening arrived by the time Garovel spoke again. ‘How could...? I was only gone for three hours... three-and-a-half, at the most...’

Hector leaned against a tall rock and rubbed his swollen eyes. “What do we do now, Garovel? I’m just... I’m so fucking lost...”

For a long while, Garovel had no answer to that. But then he said something that made Hector stare. ‘...Who still needs you?’”

"285

“I...” His gaze hardened and fell to the ground. “I have to go find my mom.”

‘Hector, I’m not sure that’s a good idea.’

He looked up with a furrowed brow. “Why not?”

‘I visited the police station while I was looking for you. I saw your mother there. She was very distraught and confused, but she... agh, I’m not even sure how to put this...’

“Just say it.”

Garovel eyed him heavily. ‘When I saw her, she was under the impression that you murdered your father. I don’t think she wants to see you.’

“The cops told her that I...?” He sighed. “Of course they did...”

‘I’m sorry.’

“But...”

‘Hector. I think it’s time we left Brighton behind.’

He was silent at that.

‘Your life here... it’s been destroyed. Between the crime scene at your house and the crime scene at your school, the police have pieced together your identity. I saw them in the station. They’re not just hunting for some guy in a metal mask. They’re hunting for Hector Goffe.’

“I can’t just leave my mother behind...”

‘Hector...’

“I’m all she has left, Garovel. I have to... try to... make her understand... somehow...” His expression searched for the right words. “I have to see her again. I just. I have to...”

The reaper floated around him. ‘You are easily the most wanted person in the city. Going back there right now is--’

“Do you know where she is?”

The reaper was hesitant to answer.

“Garovel, don’t lie to me...”

‘Yes. I do know. She’s in a hotel with a police detail.’

“Take me to her.”

‘What if you can’t convince her?’

“I don’t know. But I’m not leaving without trying.”

‘And what if you do convince her? What difference will that make? You’ll still be wanted for murder.’”

"286

--donation bonus (day #12, post 1/5)--

Hector’s expression faltered. He shut his eyes and rubbed his forehead. “She... I... I’ve never been sure if she actually, um... if she actually cared about me. But... I’ve always known that she loved my dad. The two of them were--” He shook his head. “--They tried really hard to stay together. Their entire lives revolved around one another. And... now..."

Garovel frowned.

"Mom doesn't have any siblings. And her parents died years ago. So I'm... I mean... I think I'm the only family she has left..."

'You don't want to abandon her. I understand. But even still--'

"It's not just that. I... I get that we shouldn't stay. I do. School is... I can't just... go back there... and I can't go home, either... But I don't want her to think that I... that I... did all those horrible things... If she thinks I killed Dad, then... agh..." He sighed.

'You want a proper goodbye.'

"Y-yeah..."

Garovel was briefly quiet. 'I still think it's a bad idea. But alright. I'll take you to her.'

"Thank you."

Hector destroyed the needle tower, and once night fell, Garovel guided him back into the city. They stopped by the cemetery along the way and picked up the five remaining bags of money. There wasn't much room on the bike, so Hector dropped four of them on the steps of the nearby police precinct. He tried to keep to the shadows as much as possible, prepared to flee again if someone spotted him, but no one did.

They arrived at the hotel next. It stood fifteen stories tall and had no balconies to climb.

'Her room is on the seventh floor,' said Garovel. 'There are four cops in the adjacent rooms and two more in the lobby. If you go through the front door, you'll alert them and have to fight your way to her. So please don't do that.'

"287

Without his helm, he scratched his head. He looked up at the building from the rear parking lot, crouching behind a dumpster. "Can I scale the wall?"

'Maybe. I think a seven-story platform would be quieter, though. Just let me scout the area for prying eyes, first.'

"Okay..."

After a spell, Garovel returned and showed him the exact spot to stand. He created a broad pillar below his feet, raising himself to the window of the reaper's designation. It was shut, of course, and locked as well, but he could see the tiny latch that he needed to move. He pressed a hand to the glass and made a small pillar on the other side, starting from the windowsill, then growing out and pushing against the latch. He heard the shunk, pulled the bug screen off, and slipped inside, disintegrating his metal.

His mother was in the bathroom. He could hear her crying.

He sat on the end of the bed and waited for her.

A hundred thoughts swirled through his mind. He still wasn't sure how to explain everything to her. The truth sounded so ridiculous, but it seemed like the only thing that could vindicate him. And then he just started recounting everything in his head. By the time she came out of the bathroom, Hector was crying again.

Vanessa Goffe stared at him, her own eyes still puffy and red. She looked like she didn't know whether she wanted to scream or not.

Hector just went for it. "I didn't kill Dad."

She did not react.

He tried again. "I didn't kill him. Mom, you have to believe me. I would never hurt him. Or you. I... I w-wouldn't..."

Her face was tear-streaked stone, now. "What do you want from me?" was all she asked.

"I just..." He grit his teeth, angry with himself. Now was not the time to struggle for the right words. "I want to explain what happened... and... and..."

"288

--donation bonus (day #12, post 3/5)--

"Explain, then," she said. "Why do the police think you killed Samuel?"

"Because... uh..." He looked at the floor. 'Garovel, help me...'

'You didn't kill him, but someone made it look like you did.'

He gave a tiny nod and glanced up at his mother again. "Someone made it look like I did it..."

She merely listened.

"S-someone came to the house... after you left for work... and... they took Dad h-hostage and... brought him to my school... which was where he was... killed..."

"Why would they do that?" Her voice trembled. "Who were they?"

"A lunatic... His name was Geoffrey Rofal."

"You knew this person?"

He cringed at the question.

'Don't lie about being a vigilante. She already knows. The police told her.'

"Geoffrey was a... he was a criminal... he and I fought before... a-and, ah... he, uh--"

"During one of your outings, is that it?" Her anger showed through now. "One of your little adventures fighting crime, right? It came back to bite us. You went and got involved in something you shouldn't, and now your father is dead because of it. My husband..." She breathed hard. "Because of you! You got him killed, didn't you?! That's what happened, isn't it?!"

Hector couldn't look at her.

"Answer me! You didn't kill him yourself, but you're still responsible for it, aren't you?! Well?! Just tell me!"

"...Y-y-yes. I... I'm..."

‘Hector, please. It’s not your fault. Don’t let her convince you that it is. That won’t help anyone.’

There came a knock at the door. “Ma’am, is everything alright in there?”

Vanessa settled her breathing. She looked at the door, then back at Hector.

He could see her considering what to do. He stood, preparing to run as her gaze lingered on him.

She answered the door."

"289

--donation bonus (day #12, post 4/5)--

Hector was surprised when she didn’t ask the officers to enter and arrest him. He watched her block the doorway so they didn’t spot him, watched her reassure them of her safety, watched her close the door behind her. He couldn’t understand what she was thinking. “Mom--”

She held a hand up. It clenched into a fist. She put her knuckles to her mouth and closed her eyes. “Just. Go.”

“But... please, just listen--”

She glared at him, furious tears in her eyes. “I don’t care what your reasons were,” she said shakily. “I don’t even care how you got in here. Just leave. And don’t come back. I don’t ever want to see you again.”

His face cracked. “Y-you, you don’t mean that...”

“Get out.”

“Mom, please...!”

“Don’t test me, Hector. If you don’t leave right now, I will turn you in.”

‘Do as she says,’ said Garovel. ‘Just for now, that is.’

He slowly backed away.

‘We’ll see her again, Hector. It might be a long time, but we’ll visit her and sort all this out, one day. I promise. I’m sure she’ll be ready to listen then.’

Hector wasn’t sure he believed the reaper, but he sure wanted to. He stopped in front of the open window and looked at her one last time. “I love you, Mom...” And he jumped out the window.

He raised a pillar up from the parking lot and gave it a sloped edge, expanding it out into a gigantic slide. His landing was a rough tumble, and Garovel started healing his broken leg as he limped the rest of the way to the motorcycle.

‘You’re doing the right thing,’ Garovel told him.

Hector made no response. He still wanted to cry, but the tears had stopped falling a while ago. As he mounted the bike, he pulled out his phone and looked for Colt’s number."

"290 -- XXXIV.

--donation bonus (day #12, post 5/5)--

Chapter Thirty-Four: ‘Blighted warriors, quell thy fury...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector let Garovel do the explaining. He stared vacantly past Colt and Bohwanox, not really listening to the conversation. They'd met up north of Brighton, just off the main road. Colt leaned against his car as he listened, his kids lying right behind him in the backseat.

"So you really killed Geoffrey?" said Colt.

Hector just looked at him. Ice cold.

Colt cocked an eyebrow but seemed to get the hint. He turned back to Garovel. "What do you plan on doing now, then?"

'I think we should travel together,' said Garovel.

'Agreed,' said Bohwanox. 'We'll be safer in a group.'

Hector decided to speak up. "Bohwanox."

'Yes?'

"I thought you said... that you didn't like to get involved."

'I did.'

"So why did you revive Colt, then?"

Bohwanox gave a small nod. 'I suppose you changed my mind about taking on servants. After you protected me--after I realized that there were beings like Geoffrey out there, I started to come around to the idea.'

Hector folded his arms. "So you're not interested in helping people, then. You just wanted someone to protect you."

Bohwanox blinked at him. 'Well, yes. I guess you could say that.'

Garovel eyed Hector. 'There's nothing wrong with that.'

"Fine, sure," said Hector. "But why did it have to be him?"

Colt furrowed his brow. "Excuse me?"

He returned the man's gaze evenly. "Did you think I'd forgotten about Melissa Mallory? And those three cops?" He could feel his irritation steadily growing, becoming genuine anger. He looked at Bohwanox.

“Did you know that this guy murdered innocent people? Hell, you were there at the hospital that night. Did you not realize that Colt was the one who killed them?”

Colt's expression darkened. “You know I had no choice in that.””
"290 -- XXXIV.

--donation bonus (day #12, post 5/5)--

Chapter Thirty-Four: ‘Blighted warriors, quell thy fury...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector let Garovel do the explaining. He stared vacantly past Colt and Bohwanox, not really listening to the conversation. They'd met up north of Brighton, just off the main road. Colt leaned against his car as he listened, his kids lying right behind him in the backseat.

“So you really killed Geoffrey?” said Colt.

Hector just looked at him. Ice cold.

Colt cocked an eyebrow but seemed to get the hint. He turned back to Garovel. “What do you plan on doing now, then?”

‘I think we should travel together,’ said Garovel.

‘Agreed,’ said Bohwanox. ‘We’ll be safer in a group.’

Hector decided to speak up. “Bohwanox.”

‘Yes?’

“I thought you said... that you didn’t like to get involved.”

‘I did.’

“So why did you revive Colt, then?”

Bohwanox gave a small nod. ‘I suppose you changed my mind about taking on servants. After you protected me--after I realized that there were beings like Geoffrey out there, I started to come around to the idea.’

Hector folded his arms. "So you're not interested in helping people, then. You just wanted someone to protect you."

Bohwanox blinked at him. 'Well, yes. I guess you could say that.'

Garovel eyed Hector. 'There's nothing wrong with that.'

"Fine, sure," said Hector. "But why did it have to be him?"

Colt furrowed his brow. "Excuse me?"

He returned the man's gaze evenly. "Did you think I'd forgotten about Melissa Mallory? And those three cops?" He could feel his irritation steadily growing, becoming genuine anger. He looked at Bohwanox. "Did you know that this guy murdered innocent people? Hell, you were there at the hospital that night. Did you not realize that Colt was the one who killed them?"

Colt's expression darkened. "You know I had no choice in that.""
"291

--donation bonus (day #13, post 1/5)--

Bohwanox looked between the two servants. 'I was not aware that Colt had killed innocents. But even so, it hardly matters now.'

"What?" said Hector.

'Colt will not be killing anyone without my permission. As far as I am concerned, his past deeds are of no consequence.'

Hector ground his teeth. "That's not the point!" he said. "You should have revived someone more deserving of it than him! Someone who wasn't a murderer!"

'It makes little difference to me,' said Bohwanox.

"What the fuck is your problem?" said Colt.

'I think Hector has a point,' said Garovel. 'There is no shortage of potential servants. While I don't think you should be too judgmental of how people lived their lives, you really shouldn't resurrect murderers.'

It was Bohwanox's turn to look annoyed. 'Colt is a skilled fighter. He is a very practical choice as a servant. And what of his children? Does depriving them of their father mean nothing to you?'

'Maybe. But then again, they might be better off in someone else's care.'

"You don't know what the fuck you're talking about," said Colt.

"Oh no?" said Hector. "How much danger have they been put in because of you, huh? And then you went and... y-you fucking... dragged me into your shit... and now..."

Everyone fell quiet for a time.

"So that's what this is," said Colt. "You blame me for the deaths of your friends and your father. Is that about right?"

Hector just glared at him.

"Fine." Colt removed his coat and tossed it on the hood of the car.

"Blame me. Get mad at me all you like. I can take it." He walked up a grassy hill, motioning for Hector to follow. "So come on. Come beat the shit out of me. If you can.""

"292

--donation bonus (day #13, post 2/5)--

'Hold on now,' said Garovel. 'Colt, you don't even have an ability yet, do you? Hector would destroy you.'

"So what?" the man said. "It's not like he can kill me, right? If it makes him feel better, then bring it on."

'Even so... what do you think, Hector?'

The thought was admittedly tempting. But he sighed and shook his head. "It wouldn't change anything... and violence doesn't really make me feel better..."

Colt folded his arms. "Come on. Don't be a bitch."

Hector rolled his eyes and turned the man into a statue. "Happy now, jackass?"

Bohwanox floated over and reached through the metal. After a moment, Colt broke out, tearing the iron from his body.

"Just stop," said Hector. "Fighting won't make a difference."

Bohwanox drifted higher. 'Actually, it might. Why don't you let Colt teach you about basic combat?'

Hector lowered his brow, blinking.

'That's not a bad idea,' said Garovel. 'Hector might be able to show Colt a few things, too. Fighting with enhanced strength is quite different, y'know.'

Colt stretched his arms. "Sounds good to me. You up for it?"

He looked between everyone for a moment. "Alright..."

'You have to refrain from using your metal powers,' said Bohwanox. 'At least until Colt develops his own ability.'

"Fine."

They sparred. Even Colt's hand-to-hand techniques were brutal. He broke Hector's bones numerous times, even killing him once by jamming a thumb through the eye socket and reaching all the way to the brain. Hector, on the other hand, was able to demonstrate what new openings could be found when he could ignore body shots and broken limbs. It did not take Colt long to adapt and develop the advantage. After half an hour, however, the enhancements began to wear off, and Colt took the wave of pain and exhaustion much harder than Hector did."

"293

--donation bonus (day #13, post 3/5)--

"What the hell?" said Colt, panting. "I beat the crap out of you, so why am I the only one about to collapse here?"

Hector wiped the blood from under his eye. "I've had a lot worse than this."

'You should both rest,' said Garovel. 'And get something to eat. Hector, you must be starving by now.'

"Ah... yeah..." He looked at Colt another time. Hector had calmed down, but he didn't feel like apologizing for what he said--not when Colt had never apologized for killing Melissa. But for now at least, he decided he would just try not to think about it. "The kids... probably need to be fed, too, right?"

Colt hoisted himself up. "Yeah."

They took to the road together, Colt's car out front with Hector's motorcycle following close behind. It wasn't long before Garovel struck up another conversation.

'How're you holding up?' There was a weak echo to his voice, and Hector recalled that being indicative of the reaper speaking privately.

'I don't know,' said Hector. 'I just... it feels like I'm... like I'm angry at... just... everything.' He squinted hard at the road ahead. 'Am I losing my mind...?'

'On the contrary, I think that makes you quite sane.'

He frowned. 'How did all this happen, Garovel...? Could I have... done something different? Was I careless?'

'Hector. You can't blame yourself.'

'Maybe... those text messages... if I hadn't been so trusting--if I'd been more suspicious of the possibilities--'

'We couldn't have known. We had every reason to think those messages were from Colt.'

'If we'd thought to... work out some sort of... texting code with Colt beforehand... or something...'

Garovel opened his mouth but stopped himself. After a moment, he gave a small sigh. 'Maybe you're right. Maybe we could have been more cautious.'

'We respond... by becoming better.'

'Heh. You remember.'

'Of course...'

--donation bonus (day #13, post 4/5)--

'I'm glad you're able to keep a clear head about things,' said Garovel.

Hector took a long breath and listened to the motorcycle's clanging engine. After a few minutes, a new question occurred to him.
'Garovel...'

'Yeah?'

'My iron ability, um... will it always be able to grow stronger when I'm under stress? Because when I confronted Geoffrey, I was... I was in a really bad spot, and for a minute there, it felt like... like my power wasn't going to grow... like I was just fucked... and everyone was gonna die and...'

'That's precisely the heart of the problem,' said Garovel. 'Your power can grow by leaps and bounds during a moment of extremely high stress. But such moments become increasingly difficult to achieve--and not because the amount of stress needs to increase. Rather, it's because of your own mind. Over time, you become complacent--you begin to expect your power to suddenly grow and save you at the last moment. And guess what happens, then? Those very expectations reduce your level of stress, which in turn means that your power doesn't grow when it otherwise would.'

'Oh, what the--my expectations? What do I even do about that?'

'That is the question, isn't it? It's a nasty psychological cycle, and I've known a lot of servants and reapers who've struggled with it. There's been all sorts of research and experimentation with it, trying to figure out concrete ways around it. Some even believe that such growth can be instigated artificially if a scientific solution is found.'

'Artificially...?'

'Oh yeah. Imagine it. If you could force a servant's ability to grow whenever you wanted, then the possibilities are--well. Personally, I find that prospect terrifying. If it could be done on a large scale, then the war between Abolish and the Vanguard would either finally come to an end, or escalate worse than ever before.'

‘Holy shit...’”

"295

--donation bonus (day #13, post 5/5)--

‘I’ve spent a fair amount of time researching the growth process,’ said Garovel. ‘The study of “emergence,” they call it. There was a time when the prevailing theory was that emergence could be achieved via a strong enough outpouring of emotion, but that’s only part of it. The real key stems from a sense of need--a powerful rejection of the immediate circumstances, as well as a strong desire to change them. The confusion about it being completely dependent on emotion comes from how the initial manifestation of the ability can be hastened by a sudden outburst, but that doesn’t extend to the growth cycle. Which, of course, caused all sorts of essential problems with experimentation, delaying our understanding of emergence for quite--’

‘You’ve lost me, Garovel...’

‘Oh. Ah. Sorry. But it is pretty fascinating, y’know.’

‘Yeah, okay, uh... what can I actually do about it, though? Is there anything?’

‘Well, in theory, the trick is to find a way to manage your expectations so that emergence can occur when you need it to. Ideally, you would have no expectations at all, but that’s easier said than done. Merely acknowledging the possibility of emergence will create some degree of expectation, even if it’s very small. Which might make you think that me even bringing this up in the first place is a bad idea, but on the other hand, NOT acknowledging emergence will definitely build up a subconscious expectation naturally, which is far more--’

‘You’re losing me again...’

The reaper sighed. ‘Well. Okay. In simplest terms, you just can’t rely on your ability to suddenly grow more powerful and save you all the time, because the minute you start relying on it is the minute it stops working.’

‘Yeah, I understood that part. I wanna know how I can manage my expectations or whatever.’

‘Fuck, I don’t know! It’s a subtle art of individual psychology! You have to figure it out for yourself!’

"296

‘What the--?’ Hector blinked. ‘Why didn’t you just say that from the beginning?’

‘And pass up an opportunity to impress you with my wealth of knowledge? No way.’

‘...That was supposed to impress me?’

‘Oh, fuck right off.’

For a moment, Hector was able to crack a meager smile.

--+-+--+-

Damian Rofal picked his nose as he watched the coroner pull back the sheet, revealing Geoffrey’s pallid face.

‘Must you do that right now?’ said Feromas.

‘Do what?’ To Damian’s eyes, the reaper looked like a sour-faced jester. The colorful, motley attire had never matched Feromas’ personality very well.

‘Forget it.’

“Yeah, that’s him,” Damian told the coroner. “Except, it’s not him, is it?”

“Eh--sir?”

Feromas floated over the body. ‘Hmm. Did we ever learn what Geoffrey’s power was?’

“It was Domination,” said Damian, thoughtless of the other person in the room. “Don’t you remember all the puppets he left behind?”

‘Right, of course. So he really could have body jumped, then.’

Damian tilted his head. “How many other bodies arrived yesterday?”

“Oh, um--” The coroner stiffened and adjusted his glasses. “There were quite a few, actually. Would you care to see them, Mr. Rofal?"

"Please."

They entered a much larger room. A good three dozen tables stood from wall to wall, and upon each was a body. Damian and Feromas took separate aisles, searching.

"Most of them appear to have died via suffocation," said the coroner. "But there were also a few cases of dismemberment and disembowelment. Are you, perhaps, looking for one in particular, sir?"

Damian ignored the man. "Ah! Found him!"

Feromas floated over. 'So he really is dead after all.'

"Shame," said Damian. "I had high hopes for him."

'This changes things,' said Feromas.

"Indeed."

"Ah, that one is--umm--" The man flipped the card by the foot to read. "--Samuel Goffe."

"I don't care," said Damian. "Please be quiet."

The coroner backed away without another word."

"297

'Well now,' said Feromas, 'do you intend on avenging our grandson?'

Damian scratched his jowly cheek and shrugged. "Eh. I'd rather not. Unless you feel strongly about it."

'Doesn't matter to me. But without Geoffrey, there is not much reason to stay in Brighton--or in Atreya, for that matter.'

"Perhaps it's a good time to leave the country," he said.

'Abolish has started moving here, too. It'd be annoying if they found us. And at that point, we'd have to leave anyway, as well as cover our tracks.'

“Ho-hum...”

‘What are you thinking?’

“This whole family business thing hasn’t really worked out for us, has it?”

‘That’s because you have trouble sticking to plans. You let your family run wild and do whatever they want. You could have fostered greatness in them, but now they are just normal people whom you barely ever see.’

“You’re right. Of course, you’re right. And I got a bit too comfortable in that community home, didn’t I?”

‘Ugh, don’t remind me. I almost released your soul because of that fucking place.’

“I’m gonna miss that pudding. And the board games. Oh, and that Nurse Beatrix.” He thought a moment. “Hey, you wanna go back there?”

‘No, goddammit! I’ll kill you!’

“Fine...” He stretched his neck. “I guess I’ll go gather the kids up, then.”

‘Really? They are not going to just abandon their lives and leave with you.’

“Who said I’d give them a choice?”

And abruptly, a broad grin split the reaper’s face. ‘Now that is more like it.’ He eyed Samuel Goffe’s body. ‘Don’t forget to scrap Geoffrey for parts, too.’

“Right.” Damian turned to the coroner. “I need a body bag for this one.”

The man blinked at him. “E-excuse me?”

“I’m taking--what was it, Mr. Goffe? I’m taking him with me.””

"298 -- XXXV.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

A pair of waiters scurried between tables, attending to the truck stop diner's morning rush. The place was busier than Hector might have expected. Perhaps being in the middle of nowhere worked in its favor. There were maybe two other places to eat over the next hundred kilometers or so.

Colt sat across the table, his kids right next to him.

"What are their names?" Hector asked.

"Stephanie and Thomas." He poked at the baby girl, and she grabbed his index finger. "Thank you for keeping them safe, by the way. Didn't get the chance to say that before."

A waiter arrived before Hector could respond. The man began to look rather concerned as they told him their orders, scribbling through several pages of his notepad. He advised them that it would be a long wait and disappeared again.

Hector struggled with finding something else to say. Colt wasn't exactly his favorite person right now, but the man was an ally, and Garovel had reminded Hector at length about how important that could be. Yet even still, Hector couldn't come up with anything that wouldn't surely start another argument, so he decided to remain quiet. Colt didn't seem too worried about keeping up a conversation, either.

Thankfully, the reapers soon returned from scouting the area.

'Didn't find any cops,' said Garovel. 'You?'

'I saw a pair of highway troopers a few hundred meters north of here, but nothing else.'

"So we can relax," said Colt.

'Yeah.' A beat passed as Garovel looked between the other reaper and servant. 'I'm curious to know what your long-term plans are.'

Colt and Bohwanox exchanged glances.

'I have none,' said Bohwanox. 'Other than following Colt for my own protection, my only intention is to continue reaping souls as I normally would. Why? What are your plans?'

"298 -- XXXV.

Chapter Thirty-Five: 'Tremulous friends, be wary...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A pair of waiters scurried between tables, attending to the truck stop diner's morning rush. The place was busier than Hector might have expected. Perhaps being in the middle of nowhere worked in its favor. There were maybe two other places to eat over the next hundred kilometers or so.

Colt sat across the table, his kids right next to him.

"What are their names?" Hector asked.

"Stephanie and Thomas." He poked at the baby girl, and she grabbed his index finger. "Thank you for keeping them safe, by the way. Didn't get the chance to say that before."

A waiter arrived before Hector could respond. The man began to look rather concerned as they told him their orders, scribbling through several pages of his notepad. He advised them that it would be a long wait and disappeared again.

Hector struggled with finding something else to say. Colt wasn't exactly his favorite person right now, but the man was an ally, and Garovel had reminded Hector at length about how important that could be. Yet even still, Hector couldn't come up with anything that wouldn't surely start another argument, so he decided to remain quiet. Colt didn't seem too worried about keeping up a conversation, either.

Thankfully, the reapers soon returned from scouting the area.

'Didn't find any cops,' said Garovel. 'You?'

'I saw a pair of highway troopers a few hundred meters north of here, but nothing else.'

"So we can relax," said Colt.

'Yeah.' A beat passed as Garovel looked between the other reaper and servant. 'I'm curious to know what your long-term plans are.'

Colt and Bohwanox exchanged glances.

‘I have none,’ said Bohwanox. ‘Other than following Colt for my own protection, my only intention is to continue reaping souls as I normally would. Why? What are your plans?’”

"299

Garovel floated around Hector. ‘How much do you two know about what’s happening in Sescoria?’

‘Are you referring to that incident a few weeks back?’ said Bohwanox.

‘I know the Queen’s gone missing,’ said Colt. “Why do you ask? Don’t tell me you plan on getting mixed up in all that.”

“We already are,” said Hector.

‘Hector and I were there when Belgrant Castle was attacked. We helped the Queen escape.’

Colt and Bohwanox shared equal surprise.

‘The attack was Abolish’s work, which I’m sure they’ve kept quiet. They’re looking to seize control of Atreya--or rather, I suppose they already have. As far as we know, the Queen has been looking for reinforcements in order to retake the capital.’

“Abolish?” said Colt.

‘A very powerful group of reapers and servants,’ Bohwanox explained. ‘Assholes, the lot of them, but not the kind of people we’re prepared to fight.’

‘Then you’ll have to leave the country, because they plan on destroying this one.’

“What the fuck?” said Colt. “What are you talking about?”

‘You already know, don’t you, Bohwanox? Abolish only wants to cause as much destruction and misery as possible.’

Bohwanox confirmed Colt’s inquiring glance with a nod. ‘You and Hector intend to do, what exactly?’

‘Hector will train while we observe the situation. We don’t know the details of Abolish’s plans, but supposedly, we have a few months before things will really start to get bad. Even if you don’t intend to fight them with us, it could be quite helpful if Colt and Hector trained together.’

‘Ah. I see.’

‘I’m sure you want Colt’s power to grow as quickly as possible, too.’

Bohwanox hesitated. ‘That would be agreeable. And I have never had a servant before. I could benefit from your insight into the matter.’

‘Very well.’

‘But I do not intend to have Colt fight Abolish.’

Hector furrowed his brow at the other reaper."

"300

Bohwanox looked at Hector. ‘If you have something to say, then say it.’

He held his tongue. It didn’t sit well with him, but Hector already knew where their priorities lay. Even if Bohwanox were willing, Colt would surely not want to leave his children behind to go fight in some war with an enemy he’d never met. And for that, at least, Hector could not fault him.

Garovel picked up the conversation, first looking at the children, then at Colt. ‘I’ve been meaning to ask--where is their mother?’

Colt took his time answering. “She’s in an institution for the criminally insane.”

Hector blinked at that. He noticed the reapers exchange glances.

“And now you’re wondering why,” said Colt. “It’s because she tried to kill the children.”

“...W-why would she do that?”

“Doctors said the pregnancy made her snap, but I don’t know. She had always been violent with me. I just put up with it. And that was obviously a mistake, because one night, she decided to grab a knife. Attacked me first, then moved on to the crib. She managed to cut Thomas under the arm here.” Colt pulled the boy’s shirt up, revealing a scar along the right side of his ribcage. It was not a small scar. “I just about killed that bitch.”

Hector could only stare, mouth half-open.

“It went to court. My case didn’t play very well to the jury. I did beat the shit out of her, after all. Wasn’t hard for her to make it look like I was the one who cut Thomas.”

Everyone just listened.

“She was about to get full custody. I was about to go to prison. And that’s when Rofal showed up, telling me he could make sure I won the case.” Colt’s eyes fell to the table, and he scratched his forehead. “I’m still not sure how much of it he’d planned. He had her lawyer and the judge in his pocket. I suspected members of the jury, too.”

‘And then he quietly got a hold of your children?’ Garovel asked.

Colt nodded. He seemed like he was done talking. He merely watched Stephanie play with his thumb.”

"301

Their breakfast began to arrive in increments, the waiter apologizing for additional delays on certain dishes. Hector welcomed the distraction, and apparently so did Colt.

At length, however, Garovel revived the topic. ‘I hate to ask this, but who else knows about your wife?’

“We never married,” said Colt. “And why do you ask?”

‘Because you might make enemies who would use her against you,’ said Garovel. ‘Her mental state would only make her more appealing to Abolish as a potential servant. If they learn about her connection to you, then you could find her trying to kill you one day.’

Colt snorted. “I would enjoy that.”

‘What?’

"It'd give me more than enough of a reason."

A silence fell after that, but Garovel's words began to nag at Hector. He soon turned to meet the reaper's gaze, deciding to keep his next question just between the two of them. 'Abolish will go after people we care about?'

'Yeah.'

'But then... Garovel, I...'

'Your mother will be fine. For now.'

'...And what about later?'

'Depending on how things go, and if she's still unwilling to listen when we return for her, then. Well. You may have to kidnap her for her own safety.'

'Aw, man...'

--+-+--+--

Desmond Grantier scratched his chin, eyeing the checkerboard in front of him. It was not a complicated game, but Desmond liked to take his time in deciding his moves.

The person across from him did not seem interested in playing.

"More of a chess man, huh?" said Desmond. "How's the pain today?"

The King of Atreya merely returned a haggard expression. The man's silky white shirt hung loose over his missing left arm. Most of the shoulder was gone as well.

"We can get you more meds, if you like. Just no hospital. You need to look strong and presentable." At William's continued silence, Desmond shrugged.

Ezmortig had gone off to discuss strategy with the other reapers, leaving Desmond by himself on babysitting duty. It was a dull job and not one he would have chosen for himself, but none of the other reapers wanted to leave their servants alone with the King."

--donation bonus (day #14, post 1/5)--

There were currently eight servants in Sescoria, including himself. Whenever Moss finally returned, it would be nine, but Desmond was starting to wonder if that would even happen. He'd tried calling Geoffrey, as well, but to no end. Normally, he would be tasked with hunting them down and confirming their deaths, but he was told that the mission took precedence this time.

Desmond turned when he heard the door open.

Two men entered, each with a reaper at his back. Stoker was the taller man with a shaved head and swirling tattoo on the side of his face. Karkash had bronzy skin and a thin beard, as well as one of the most penetrating stares Desmond had ever seen. Their female reapers were Nize and Hoyochté, respectively--which, to Desmond's eyes, were wispy, black-cloaked entities with white masks instead of faces.

These four were different from the other reinforcements. They were on loan from the other side of Abolish--the 32nd Anti-Air Division under Dozer, to be precise. They had been added to the mission at the last minute, supposedly as "goodwill ambassadors," but Desmond would have sooner proceeded without them if he could have. The key difference, he had always found, between the Morgunovs and the Dozers, was that the Morgunovs knew how to have a good time, while the Dozers were a bunch of uptight, joyless shitbags. And these ones here had yet to prove themselves as exceptions.

Still, they were allies, so he put on a smile for them. "How are the air defenses?"

"Will be completed soon," said Karkash. His thick accent put a roll in his l's.

"What brings you back here, then?" said Desmond.

Karkash reached into his sashed coat and retrieved a gray folder. He nodded toward the King. "Need stamps and signatures."

Desmond shrugged and made way for them.

Karkash tossed the folder on the King's desk. "Sign."

William opened it slowly and began reading."

--donation bonus (day #14, post 2/5)--

"Don't waste our time," said Stoker. "Hurry up and sign them." His accent was much fainter than Karkash's, and his voice had a rougher base to it.

"I do not sign things without reading them first," said William.

Desmond rolled his eyes. "Don't make this harder than it needs to be, Your Majesty. I can't rip off your other arm, but I'm more than happy to find creative alternatives."

'Please,' said one of the reapers, 'there is no need to hurt him.' It was Nize.

Everyone but the King turned to look at her, even her own servant.

'Look at him,' she said. 'He will do as you say. Just have a bit of patience.'

The King picked up his pen, but a remnant of his stubbornness still lingered. "Please, just tell me what I am signing..."

"No." Karkash placed a hand on the desk's varnished wood. "Sign now, or I will bring your children here. I will torture them in front of your eyes."

The King met his gaze evenly. "I do not have children."

Desmond snorted, earning a glare from Karkash.

"I will find someone else," said Karkash. "Whoever you care for. They will suffer. Until you sign."

Nize left the room on her own. Stoker eyed the others hesitantly before following her.

"What's with them?" said Desmond.

'Do not concern yourself with them,' said Hoyoté.

"Uh. No. That's sorta my job here."

'It is not your place,' she said. 'We will see to the matter ourselves.'

The door opened again, but instead of Stoker and Nize, a little blond serving girl appeared. She paused when she saw the King's guests and then proceeded with the offerings of tea. Desmond took a cup, but Karkash, having now acquired the King's written approval, ignored her and left without another word.

William accepted a cup, as well.

Desmond eyed the girl. Her long bangs hid her face rather well, but he liked what he saw. "You're a cutie."

"304 -- XXXVI.

--donation bonus (day #14, post 3/5)--

The serving girl cast her eyes down to the floor and said nothing.

"Haven't seen you around before," said Desmond.

Still, she persisted in silence.

"What's your name?"

"Leave the poor girl alone," said William. "Go on," he urged her. "You are dismissed."

Desmond frowned but let her go. "Pretty little thing like that should be careful around here."

--++--++--

The serving girl shut the door behind her and leaned with her back against it for a second. She took a long, quiet breath, trying to steady her nerves again. That had been more interaction than she bargained for.

Gina knew that Roman would be upset if he knew she'd come here. She was starting to regret the decision herself. But the bug she had just planted in the King's office would make it all worth it. Roman and the others needed someone to gather information on the enemy, and even though it scared the hell out of her, even though she knew that any one of the servants could kill her in a heartbeat, she was quite certain that there was no one better suited to the task than her.

Regaining herself, she straightened and proceeded down the hallway with her empty tea tray. She tried to avoid eye contact as much as possible. She especially avoided spying on the servants directly. There were beings around which she couldn't see, and if they found her trying to eavesdrop on someone's conversation, that would be the end for her, without a doubt. Which was why she had been putting listening devices around the castle all morning, instead.

Now it was time to get the hell out of this place.

Chapter Thirty-Six: 'O, restless ones...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Over the next few days, Hector and Colt did not stay anywhere for long. Several of the small towns they happened across had police cars waiting by the main road. After a brief confrontation with a beat cop, Hector learned that the police were on the lookout for his motorcycle and ended up having to abandon it."

"304 -- XXXVI.

--donation bonus (day #14, post 3/5)--

The serving girl cast her eyes down to the floor and said nothing.

"Haven't seen you around before," said Desmond.

Still, she persisted in silence.

"What's your name?"

"Leave the poor girl alone," said William. "Go on," he urged her. "You are dismissed."

Desmond frowned but let her go. "Pretty little thing like that should be careful around here."

--++-+-++-

The serving girl shut the door behind her and leaned with her back against it for a second. She took a long, quiet breath, trying to steady her nerves again. That had been more interaction than she bargained for.

Gina knew that Roman would be upset if he knew she'd come here. She was starting to regret the decision herself. But the bug she had just planted in the King's office would make it all worth it. Roman and the others needed someone to gather information on the enemy, and even though it scared the hell out of her, even though she knew that any one of the servants could kill her in a heartbeat, she was quite certain that there was no one better suited to the task than her.

Regaining herself, she straightened and proceeded down the hallway with her empty tea tray. She tried to avoid eye contact as much as possible. She especially avoided spying on the servants directly. There were beings around which she couldn't see, and if they found her trying to eavesdrop on someone's conversation, that would be the end for her, without a doubt. Which was why she had been putting listening devices around the castle all morning, instead.

Now it was time to get the hell out of this place.

Chapter Thirty-Six: 'O, restless ones...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Over the next few days, Hector and Colt did not stay anywhere for long. Several of the small towns they happened across had police cars waiting by the main road. After a brief confrontation with a beat cop, Hector learned that the police were on the lookout for his motorcycle and ended up having to abandon it."

"305

--donation bonus (day #14, post 4/5)--

"This car is stolen by the way," said Colt, eyes on the road. "We'll have to get a replacement soon. Maybe we can find you a new bike, too."

Hector frowned. "I'd, uh... I'd rather not steal anything..."

"Most thieves would probably say the same thing, y'know. And besides--you telling me that bike wasn't stolen?"

“It was a gift.”

“Right.”

They passed through Reese, Norca, and stopped in Rizo for a day, briefly debating crossing the Atreya-Rendon border. Hector and Garovel demonstrated their resolve to stay in Atreya, and Colt and Bohwanox soon acquiesced. They headed toward Klein next, taking their time in Battonburg and Tulma. Colt was adamant about maintaining a full stock of supplies.

All the while, Hector and Colt held thrice daily training sessions--two for sparring, one for meditation, the latter of which Colt absolutely despised. Though in all honesty, Hector wasn't enjoying them as much as before, either. Any long period of silence left him unsettled. Whenever he tried to relax his mind, it became all too easy to remember everything that had happened. Nathan. Micah. Dad. It varied from day to day, which of those three hurt the most. Sometimes, it was difficult to remember if he had even been able to protect anyone at all.

Sleep became difficult, as well. Hector often stayed up with the reapers to watch the kids sleep, catch up on news, or just practice creating metal.

They found a vacant warehouse on the outskirts of Klein and, after exploring the place thoroughly, decided to squat in it for a while. Apart from being a steady drain on funds, motels were always a bit chancy with all the people around.

“Maybe we should get the cops to kill us,” said Colt.

Everyone gave him a look.

“No, listen. We go down in a hail of bullets, let them confirm everything and bury us, and then you two resurrect us. If we do it right, then all this heat will completely die down, yeah?”

"306

--donation bonus (day #14, post 5/5)--

‘What do we do with the kids while you’re dead?’ said Bohwanox.

"We can take turns." Colt looked at Hector. "I can trust you to take care of them for a few days, right?"

"Of course, but..."

"But what?"

'It might make a difference for you and Bohwanox,' said Garovel, 'but for Hector and me, it wouldn't really matter. It's not like we'd go live off the grid somewhere afterward.'

Colt gave a sideways nod. "Hmm."

'Even if we do your plan, Hector's just gonna end up drawing attention to himself again. The police would still come after us. They'd just be really confused about it. In fact, it'd probably draw even more attention to Hector. From truly dangerous people.'

"I see your point."

"And besides, uh... I, ah..."

"Mm?"

Hector scratched his brow. "I don't want my mom to believe I'm dead... unless, y'know... I actually am."

"Fair enough, I suppose."

'But if you two wanna do that, it's your call, of course. I'd ask you to wait until we're ready to part ways, though. Otherwise, we might accidentally ruin your cover by leading the police back to you.'

Bohwanox eyed them both. 'You are going to start fighting crime in Klein, now?'

'Of course. It's also a good way for Hector to train.'

'You will only alert the police to our location again.'

'Probably. Be ready to leave in a hurry when we get back.'

And despite Bohwanox's displeasure, Hector and Garovel soon ventured out into the city. Without a motorcycle, it was slow going. Hector remembered this feeling of having to run everywhere. He didn't mind it terribly, but he could have done without all the sweat.

It was a long night, but Garovel found him plenty to do. Klein's criminal element seemed no less active than Brighton's, but the highlight of the evening was when Garovel stumbled upon an imminent murder--made clear to the reaper by the aura of death surrounding the would-be victim."

"307

--donation bonus (day #15, post 1/5)--

Rather than simply coating the attacker in metal, Hector decided to try something more elaborate. First, he stomped down the door to the apartment and then forced himself between the two. He earned a hatchet in the chest for his trouble. His lack of concern for it, however, brought the altercation to an abrupt standstill, and he seized the opportunity.

Metal gathered around the attacker's torso, accumulating and crawling all over the man's skin like a million fleas before two cylinders took form, one for each arm, with iron rungs binding them together. Gray dust extended down his back and stomach, completing a kind of straitjacket.

It wasn't the most impressive thing in the world, he supposed, but it was certainly one of the more intricate things he had created. And though not altogether intentional, he had added little protrusions from the neck down. They served no function, and for a moment, he wondered why he even put them there. Then he realized that he had unconsciously mimicked a straitjacket's buttons.

After the assaulted woman called the police, Hector turned to leave, but Garovel made him wait around a bit longer.

'Just being diligent,' the reaper said. 'We don't actually know why this guy attacked her.'

'Does it matter?'

Garovel shrugged. 'We're uninformed intruders in this situation. For all we know, she could suddenly decide to kill him after we're gone.'

'You think so?'

'No. But that's not the point. We're making assumptions about the situation which are PROBABLY correct, but let's at least wait until we hear sirens before leaving, eh? Better safe than sorry, y'know.'

'Hmm. Alright.'

Sirens soon arrived as expected, however, and Hector took his leave.

His mind returned to those unintended buttons again. They'd seemed like a minor thing, just a collective error on his part. But as he thought about it, he began to understand; they were not an error. If anything they were the opposite. They were extra. He'd created something which had more to it than expected.

And that had never happened before."
"308

--donation bonus (day #15, post 2/5)--

Hector's creations had always been underachieved approximations. Unless he stopped and concentrated hard for several minutes, he could never make anything more than a crude outline of what was in his head. But this was evidence of a change, evidence that his power had grown stronger than perhaps he thought. A frightening thought, in a way... but honestly, he found it more exciting than anything, as if his iron was now stronger than he was. And if that were true, then he only need catch up to it.

He wanted to try again. More elaborate still. Once they'd returned to the warehouse, he set to work. The rear sandlot provided ample space for just about anything he wanted to try, and the tall fences, weathered as they were, would ensure privacy.

His imagination ran wild with the possibilities. "What should I try to make?"

'I'm not even sure how powerful you've become,' said Garovel. 'Why not try for something really outrageous? Something you don't even think you can do, that is. Establish an upper limit, then work backwards to find where your ability caps out.'

"Hmm... uhh... Oh, how about a catapult? You think?"

'I was gonna suggest an orbital satellite, but whatever.'

He took a deep breath. He imagined a catapult in his head--or at least something that seemed like a catapult--and then pressed his gloves to the sand.

A slew of metal pillars shot up together. They clanged together, trying to connect with one another and failing, and then fell over in a noisy heap.

‘Huh. Well, that was underwhelming.’

“I don’t... think that was my power’s fault...”

‘Hmm?’

“I just... umm... I thought it was simple, but... I don’t really know how a catapult works, to be honest...”

Garovel stared at him a moment. And then burst out laughing. ‘Great! Real smart, Hector!’

He flushed with embarrassment but couldn’t help smiling a little. “I thought if I just imagined a catapult-shaped... thing, then it’d just kind of appear, but--agh, stop laughing!”

"309

--donation bonus (day #18, post 3/5)--

‘I understand what you were thinking,’ said Garovel. ‘But no, that’s not the way it works. If you wanna create a machine--or any complex structure for that matter--then you have to know all the parts of it, as well as where they go. Essentially, a blueprint in your head.’

“Damn...”

‘And you should probably know how each piece functions as part of the whole.’

“Yeah, okay...”

‘Also, a basic understanding of how the fucking thing works in the first place might be helpful.’

"I get it, geez..."

'I can tell you all about catapults, actually. You've got the ballista and the springald and mangonel, but those all need rope or twine to operate. Maybe you could figure a creative solution around that, but you're probably better off going for a trebuchet. Then again, a really good trebuchet would use a sling AND a counterweight, which could be problematic, but hey, if this is just for practice, then what does it matter, right?'

"Uh. Th-that's nice, but I don't, um..."

'Yeah. Not very helpful without diagrams to look at. We can go find a library tomorrow, if you like. I'm sure they'd have plenty of useful reference books, catapults or no.'

"Guess I should..."

'In the meantime, though, why don't you try to make something that you actually have a proper idea about?'

"Right." He decided to go for something he'd practiced before. He held his gloved hands up in front of himself and concentrated. The metal gathered quickly and took form--the exact form, this time--and to his surprise, the gauntlets were completed in a fraction of the previous time.

'Wow,' said Garovel. 'That used to take you fifteen minutes, but just now--that couldn't have been more than thirty seconds.'

Hector waved his arms to see if the metal plates stayed linked together. They did. He added pointed fingertips, stubby metal claws. He grinned.

'I am sufficiently impressed. But also curious. C'mon. What else can you do?'"

"310

--donation bonus (day #15, post 4/5)--

Hector spent the rest of the night and morning practicing--or perhaps, playing--with metal. He made a sphere without any trouble, growing it into a wrecking ball. He hollowed it out, rendering it a mere wireframe, and climbed inside, wondering if he could push it around like some kind of giant hamster ball. The frame was not structurally sound, however, and collapsed on top of him.

He also made a dome over the entire sandlot, which seemed to impress Garovel, especially when Hector demonstrated that he could empower it with his soul so that the reaper couldn't phase through.

After a while, though, he moved on to weapons. He reforged the same sword and shield that he had used against Geoffrey, same jagged edges and spikes. They were so much heavier than he remembered. Garovel helped him out with enhanced strength.

The sword and shield were both very crude, of course. He wondered how he might be able to rework them. The sword's jagged edges seemed somewhat useful, but they gave it more tearing power than cutting. He smoothed the blade out and detached it from his gauntlet. It fell tip-first into the sand. He gave it a metal hilt and picked it back up. 'Hmm. You don't have any training with a blade, do you?'

"Uh, n-no..."

'Want a few pointers?'

--++--++--

Stoker tried to keep his gaze nonchalant as he looked around the room another time. Karkash and Hoyohté were right there next to him. He eyed Nize again. 'You've gotta stop talking like this,' he told her in Vaelish. 'If Karkash hears you...'

'I know,' she said privately, also in Stoker's native tongue. 'But I can't take this anymore. Everything I've done--made my servants do--in the name of the Void. Purposeless brutality. Three hundred years, blindly doing whatever--'

'I get it,' said Stoker 'You're having a crisis of faith. But it will pass if you just relax and follow our orders.'

She stared at him. 'Such promises are a fool's comfort.'

"311

Stoker tried to ignore her remarks, but it was becoming increasingly difficult. She held his life in her hands, after all. If she truly ended up defecting from Abolish, he would have no choice but to follow her, lest she release him and find someone else--not that it would make much difference, if he had to fight Karkash. That was one thing he wanted to avoid at all costs.

Karkash was busy with their guest--a local reporter who had been badmouthing the government's sudden, unexplained increases in military expenditures. Stoker and Karkash had invited the man here to show him precisely where the money was going.

The bunker's old storage facility was a maze of ceiling-high shelves and crates, all containing decommissioned equipment that had been quietly imported from various foreign powers. It was still a work-in-progress by their Morgunov comrades, but Stoker was impressed nonetheless. He'd browsed the wares earlier and spotted a few RPGs and so forth, but the most appealing sight had been the pair of anti-aircraft batteries tucked away in the corner. Of course, such equipment was not strictly needed, given his and Karkash's abilities, but he quite appreciated the extra firepower. And from what he heard, more were on the way, which had not pleased Nize, of course.

To Stoker, Nize and the other reapers were large, hulking dragons--though, in truth, they looked like snakes, but given their propensity for flight, he had come to think of them more as dragons.

"I was surprised when I received your invitation," said the reporter. He gave a curt laugh, though it retained a nervous hint. "I'm still rather curious as to why you've showed me all of this. Are you two trying to blow the whistle on your bosses or...?"

"Not quite," said Stoker. "You are free to write whatever you like about what you see in this place, but we were hoping that you would change your views after this visit."

"312

"I'm sorry, but why would I do that?" said the reporter. "Not to be too blunt, but if anything, this visit has confirmed all of my worst suspicions."

“A moment,” said Karkash. He left the room, then soon returned. With the reporter’s son.

Slowly, the man’s expression became wary.

“You are free to write whatever you like,” Stoker repeated. “But your opinion holds weight with the public. We would appreciate it if your next article spoke fondly of what you have seen here today.”

“This--this is--! You can’t do this!”

Karkash held up the boy’s hand. “Do what?”

The kid looked terrified.

“W-whoa,” said the father. “Just--okay. Please don’t hurt my son. I’ll do as you ask.”

“We ask nothing,” said Karkash. “You do as you like. We do as we like.”

The man nodded shakily. “I understand. Please.”

‘He says he understands,’ said Hoyohté, ‘but that is doubtful. Break the boy’s finger.’

Karkash did so.

The boy shrieked in pain.

“I said I would cooperate!” the man yelled.

‘There was no need for that!’ said Nize.

Karkash ignored her. “I am clumsy.” He released the boy into his father’s arms. “In future, I will be more careful. As should you. Leaving city, for instance. Trying to hide. That would be clumsy.”

The man stood in front of his crying son. “I understand,” he said again. “I do. Believe me.”

A brief silence took hold until Stoker broke it. “We are not keeping you here. You may leave whenever you wish.”

They scurried away. After they were gone, however, the quiet returned, stronger than before while Hoyohté eyed Nize.

‘You are displeased again,’ Hoyóhté said in Vaelish. She floated around Karkash. ‘It seems we have a fundamental disagreement. Perhaps it is time we worked it out.’

Stoker looked at Nize. ‘Don’t.’

‘Your methods are needlessly cruel,’ said Nize for all to hear.

Stoker’s posture stiffened.

“I barely hurt the child,” said Karkash, much more fluent now in Vaelish. “And what difference does it make? Why do you think we came to this country?”

"313

‘Please,’ said Stoker. ‘If you want to leave Abolish, then fine, we’ll do that. But not like this. We have to be smarter.’

Nize let his words sink in. She looked at the others. ‘I suppose you are right,’ she told them.

Hoyóhté’s gaze lingered, however. ‘You have no complaints, then?’

Nize glanced at Stoker. ‘The extra violence didn’t sit well with me, but then, they are all going to die, anyway.’

“Your reluctance has not gone unnoticed,” said Karkash. “Are you truly prepared to act as the Void wills us?”

“Of course we are,” said Stoker.

“She demonstrated no such hesitation before. So why does she now?”

“She doesn’t. She understands perfectly.”

‘Yes,’ said Nize. ‘I was mistaken to speak so unthinkingly.’

It took a bit more silence, followed by more reassurances, but Hoyóhté and Karkash finally dropped the matter, and at length, the four of them exited the bunker together. Atreyan soldiers paid them frequent stares, no doubt because Stoker’s and Karkash’s sherwani coats stood out so prominently from all the blue-and-white uniforms.

‘We will flee at the soonest opportunity,’ Nize said to him.

He nearly sighed. ‘What prompted this change of heart, anyway? We’ve been together for almost two years now, and you didn’t start acting this way until a couple months ago.’

‘It was Germal’s doing,’ she said.

‘Germal? That guy with the horn in his head? Seriously?’

‘He made me doubt the Void--doubt that I can truly feel its presence. And now, I... I’m certain that I can’t. It’s all been a lie. I used to believe it so strongly, but that was only because I wanted to hear it, to know its grandeur. I was pretending--so much so that I even fooled myself. But the Void isn’t real. It’s a mad dream.’

‘Wow. Good thing I never bought into that shit in the first place, then.’

‘What? You didn’t? But you said you did. You took all the oaths and swore your allegiances to me and Abolish.’”

"314 -- XXXVII.

--donation bonus (day #16, post 1/5)--

‘Of course,’ said Stoker. ‘I wanted to live. I’d have said whatever you wanted me to say.’

‘What?’ said Nize. ‘But... but the oaths...’

‘Yeah. Um. You’re incredibly gullible, by the way. Not sure if you knew that about yourself.’

‘I am not!’

‘Uh-huh. Anyway, you do realize what running means, right?’

‘They will hunt us down, yes. But certain groups among the Vanguard might be willing to shelter us. Assuming we can find them.’

‘Don’t get your hopes up. I think we should just go find a place to lie low.’

‘First, we need an opening to escape. It won’t do to have seven servants chasing after us right from the start.'

'Yeah, I'd prefer to avoid that, too.'

Chapter Thirty-Seven: 'Avail thyself...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Colt sat feeding Stephanie by the spoonful. She had only puked on him once in the past few days, so he was wondering if this new baby food agreed with her better.

It had been six days since their arrival in Klein. The nights were cold out here, and the warehouse had no electricity or heating, but between the campfire he made and the mountain of blankets Hector brought back, there was ample warmth to go around.

Hector was gone most of the time, even during the day. It seemed like he only ever returned to train or deliver supplies. Colt wasn't even sure if the kid was sleeping. On the fourth night, he showed up in a bloody shirt with no less than two dozen bullet holes in it and just collapsed in front of the fire. And as soon as he woke up, he went right back out again. On the fifth day, even Garovel was telling him to slow down.

Bohwanox sometimes ventured out with Hector as well, but Colt was quite content to stay with the children around the clock. It wasn't the most exciting thing, but he'd had his fill of excitement lately. And besides, Hector had brought him a portable television to keep updated on events."

"314 -- XXXVII.

--donation bonus (day #16, post 1/5)--

'Of course,' said Stoker. 'I wanted to live. I'd have said whatever you wanted me to say.'

'What?' said Nize. 'But... but the oaths...'

'Yeah. Um. You're incredibly gullible, by the way. Not sure if you knew that about yourself.'

'I am not!'

‘Uh-huh. Anyway, you do realize what running means, right?’

‘They will hunt us down, yes. But certain groups among the Vanguard might be willing to shelter us. Assuming we can find them.’

‘Don’t get your hopes up. I think we should just go find a place to lie low.’

‘First, we need an opening to escape. It won’t do to have seven servants chasing after us right from the start.’

‘Yeah, I’d prefer to avoid that, too.’

Chapter Thirty-Seven: ‘Avail thyself...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Colt sat feeding Stephanie by the spoonful. She had only puked on him once in the past few days, so he was wondering if this new baby food agreed with her better.

It had been six days since their arrival in Klein. The nights were cold out here, and the warehouse had no electricity or heating, but between the campfire he made and the mountain of blankets Hector brought back, there was ample warmth to go around.

Hector was gone most of the time, even during the day. It seemed like he only ever returned to train or deliver supplies. Colt wasn’t even sure if the kid was sleeping. On the fourth night, he showed up in a bloody shirt with no less than two dozen bullet holes in it and just collapsed in front of the fire. And as soon as he woke up, he went right back out again. On the fifth day, even Garovel was telling him to slow down.

Bohwanox sometimes ventured out with Hector as well, but Colt was quite content to stay with the children around the clock. It wasn’t the most exciting thing, but he’d had his fill of excitement lately. And besides, Hector had brought him a portable television to keep updated on events."

"315

--donation bonus (day #16, post 2/5)--

When the news wasn’t talking about the military budget or international tension between Rendon and Kahm, it was talking about the most wanted criminal in the country gallivanting around Klein without being caught. Colt wondered if all those bullet holes had been the police trying to bring him down.

Of course, the news didn't seem to care much about all the other criminals that had turned up in jail cells; but perhaps the police were happy enough to take the credit there.

Colt was impressed that Hector had managed to avoid leading his pursuers back here, but regardless, he figured that wouldn't last much longer. Or he hoped so, because the warehouse didn't have running water or even a bathtub. Instead, he'd managed to rig up a crude shower, of sorts, consisting of an old hand pump, a broad hose, and several jugs of water from the nearby gas station. It worked, but a single pumping motion equated to a single burst of water. He had never experienced a more annoying method of wash.

He could hear Hector stomping around in the sandlot out back. Every now and then, the ground would shake, making him wonder what the hell the kid was doing. But he stayed put. He wasn't feeling his best at the moment, and Stephanie needed to finish eating, anyway.

The day's meditation had left Colt with aching pains in his head and hands both. He wasn't the type to complain and so kept it to himself, but as the evening drew on, he began to find it increasingly bothersome.

Then a sudden tremor spiked through his fingertips. The spoon in his hand snapped in two. He looked at the pieces, confused.

Bohwanox was quick to take notice. 'Colt, put Stephanie down.'

"Why?"

Stephanie's arm began to bleed where Colt was holding her, and she started crying.

'Put her down now!' said Bohwanox.

He set her next to Thomas and stepped away.

'I believe your ability has manifested,' the reaper said."

--donation bonus (day #16, post 3/5)--

Colt looked at the blood on his fingers. It wasn't a lot, thankfully, but the fact that it belonged to his daughter was already too much cause for concern. "I hurt her? What the fuck did I just do?!"

'Wait right there. My knowledge here is limited.' Bohwanox left and soon returned with Garovel and Hector.

Hector went straight for Stephanie.

Garovel floated around Colt. 'Show me your hands, please.'

He held them out.

'Hmm. No trace elements. Not materialization. Hector, how is she?'

"Uh... I think she's okay. It's just a little cut. The bleeding's almost stopped already."

'A cut?' Garovel moved to examine the girl's arm.

Colt was afraid to even get close to her again.

'Ah,' said Garovel after a spell. 'I see. You have a destruction ability.'

'What does that mean, exactly?' said Bohwanox.

'The destruction type is considerably simpler than the other types, because all such abilities are basically the same. Essentially, you have the power to rip space apart.'

Colt cocked an eyebrow. "...'scuse me?"

'At the moment, of course, your power is still quite weak, but it is nonetheless dangerous. You shouldn't hold the children until you're able to get it under control.'

"How long will that be?"

'If you focus on your meditation, it shouldn't be more than a couple days.'

"Um," said Hector, "sorry to interrupt, but... Colt can rip space apart? Ah, is that...? I mean--how the fuck?"

‘Destruction type abilities make a kind of “path.” That is, a path which should not otherwise exist.’ Garovel eyed Colt. ‘Theoretically, no matter how tough or durable something is, you can still destroy it, because you attack the space it occupies, rather than the thing itself.’

Colt eyed his hands again. “Hmm.”

‘This is also called the “geometric” type by some, because the “path” you make always conforms to some two-dimensional pattern. Right now, it’s too early to tell what your shape is, but it doesn’t really make much difference. Whether you destroy things with squares or circles or some crazy polygon with a thousand sides, the end result is the same. It’s still destroyed.’”

"317

--donation bonus (day #16, post 4/5)--

“Destruction, huh?” Colt made two fists. “I can work with that.”

‘There are very few things which can withstand spatial distortions,’ said Garovel. ‘And with sufficient development of your power, there will likely be NOTHING that can.’

“Cool. So I need to get meditating, then?”

‘Yeah.’

“Before that,” said Hector, “there’s, uh... something I’ve been meaning to ask. These, ah, servant abilities... how many different kinds are there?”

‘Six,’ said Garovel. ‘That is, there are six broad categories. As for individual abilities, there’s no set number, as far as I know. But the six categories are called materialization, transfiguration, alteration, destruction, mutation, and integration.’

“I remember you mentioning the first three before,” said Hector. “I’m materialization, right?”

‘Right. You already know people with the first four. Desmond is transfiguration; Roman is alteration; and of course, Colt is destruction. As far as the other two types are concerned, mutation is by far the rarest type, so it’s not surprising that you haven’t met someone with it yet.'

"Why is it so rare?" said Hector. "Is it, like, really powerful or something...?"

'Actually, it's kinda the opposite problem. The mutation type has a reputation for being weaker than the others--which isn't actually true, by the way. But a lot of reapers don't like it, because it's much more of a double-edged sword than any other type. See, mutation abilities allow the user to make PERMANENT changes to their body. Unlike transfiguration, which changes one's body chemistry temporarily, mutation will cause the servant's regeneration power to maintain its changes. This means that even just learning to control the ability is dangerous, because the servant could end up accidentally disfiguring or disabling themselves.'

"Yikes..."

'Yeah. And even if it's a problem that normally could be fixed with surgery, the servant will still just regenerate to its mutated state. The only potential solution is to induce a second change which counters the detrimental effects of the first change--and that can easily end up making the problem worse.'

"Damn," said Colt. "Glad I didn't get saddled with that shit."
"318

--donation bonus (day #16, post 5/5)--

Garovel nodded. 'Sometimes, mutation users screw their bodies up so badly that there's no hope of fixing it anymore. Which can be quite horrific. And at that point, releasing their soul is a mercy. I also know that the general stigma around the mutation type makes it so a lot of reapers won't even bother with a servant who has it. Because like I said, they see it as weaker than all others and not worth the trouble.'

"Gah... but, ah, how do they change themselves? I mean, like, what's an example of a mutation type power?"

'Oh. Um. Admittedly, I'm not too clear on that, myself. Mutation is the one I know the least about. The rarity makes it difficult to study. You'd have to talk to a specialist.'

“Really?” said Hector. “But... you’ve been alive for thousands of years. Not to sound rude, but... you never found the time to learn about it?”

‘Well,’ said Garovel, ‘take materialization, for instance. We know that it’s centered around elements; but of course, before mankind discovered those elements, we had no idea that was the case. That knowledge revealed critical details about the way materialization works. Similar discoveries have been made in relation to all the types. So it’s not like the knowledge has just been sitting around in a book somewhere, waiting for me to read and suddenly understand it all.’

“Oh...”

‘Hell, a thousand years ago, we thought the mutation type was some kind of awful disease. Some reapers might even still believe that.’

“I d-didn’t mean to imply you were lazy or anything...”

‘I know. But I’ll admit, in recent years, I haven’t been quite as studious about the abilities as I used to be.’

‘Hmm,’ said Bohwanox. ‘I remember hearing somewhere that alteration types are typically the strongest. Is that true?’

‘I’ve heard that, too,’ said Garovel. ‘I’m not sure how much truth is in it, though. They’re certainly versatile, but strongest? That seems like a useless generalization. Dangerous, too.’”

"319

--donation bonus (day #17, post 1/5)--

‘Dangerous?’ said Bohwanox. ‘What do you mean?’

‘We shouldn’t try to measure the worth of our servants by the abilities they possess. I despise reapers who discard their servants because they think the ability isn’t good enough.’

“What about the other type mentioned?” said Hector. “What was it? Integration?”

‘Hold on,’ said Bohwanox. ‘I’d still like to know more about why people think alteration is the strongest.’

Garovel hesitated, looking between the two. 'Well, um. Alteration allows the user to employ a specific force to essentially anything. Depending on what that force is, the results can be quite intimidating. As for integration, that involves the combining of materials. People with integration are very highly valued among the big factions, because they tend to provide support as weapon makers and so forth. They're generally protected from having to see combat, but I'm sure their abilities could be useful in a fight, too.'

Hector tilted his head. "So... someone like that could be a really useful ally, then."

'Yep.'

Abruptly, Colt realized that Stephanie had stopped crying a while ago. She just seemed to be looking up at Hector as he cradled her in his arms.

"Hey, kid. You're pretty good at that."

"At what?"

"That. Look how calm she is."

Hector looked at her. He winced as she started screaming again, right into his face this time.

Colt squinted against the noise. "Could be wrong, I s'pose."

They moved on to meditation together. Garovel advised him to focus on imagining a kind of "tunnel," supposedly representative of whatever his "path" of destruction would be.

'It'd be helpful to imagine your geometric shape digging the tunnel,' said Garovel. 'And since we don't know what yours is yet, just go through a variety of them in your head.'

"Spray 'n pray, huh?"

'Pretty much, yeah.'

His hands still throbbed. If anything, they felt even worse. And when he opened his eyes again, he found his palms covered in blood. The skin was practically shredded."

"320 -- XXXVIII.

--donation bonus (day #17, post 2/5)--

Bohwanox invoked the regeneration, relieving the pain as well, and Colt returned to meditating.

It was not long before Hector stopped his own meditation and left. Garovel followed, though not quickly.

Colt could imagine what silent conversation the two were having. "Damn that kid. He's gonna lose his mind if he doesn't fucking relax."

Bohwanox's faceless hood tilted a little. 'Are you worried about him? I thought you only cared about your children.'

Colt just frowned.

Chapter Thirty-Eight: 'O, burgeoning snare...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Stoker followed Karkash into the King's office again. He didn't know what had gotten the other man so upset. He wasn't entirely sure he wanted to find out, either, but Karkash did not seem willing to allow otherwise.

Karkash laid a newspaper out on the desk, and Stoker and Desmond both looked at it. There was an article on the third page, talking about the so-called Darksteel Soldier, now known to be a criminal by the name of Hector Goffe.

"This person is a servant," said Karkash.

"Oh, yeah," said Desmond. "I was meaning to go and kill that guy, but I haven't had the time."

"You know him?" said Stoker.

"I think so. We fought a few weeks back. I didn't catch his name, but I've heard about him using metal, so I'm pretty sure it's the same guy."

"You let him get away?" said Karkash.

Desmond just shrugged.

Karkash's eyes were daggers. Desmond seemed immune to their effects, however.

'You should have hunted him down already,' said Hoyohté. 'What if he returns with reinforcements?'

Desmond laughed, and his eyes widened. "I hope he does! I've been bored out of my skull!"

Ezmortig floated around his servant. 'Come to think of it, this Hector Goffe could be the reason Ozmere and Moss have not returned.'

Desmond's brow receded. "Hmm, you think so? He didn't seem strong enough to take down Moss."

'Perhaps he is more dangerous than we realized,' said Ezmortig. 'It is strange that he is not hiding like the Queen.'

"320 -- XXXVIII.

--donation bonus (day #17, post 2/5)--

Bohwanox invoked the regeneration, relieving the pain as well, and Colt returned to meditating.

It was not long before Hector stopped his own meditation and left. Garovel followed, though not quickly.

Colt could imagine what silent conversation the two were having. "Damn that kid. He's gonna lose his mind if he doesn't fucking relax."

Bohwanox's faceless hood tilted a little. 'Are you worried about him? I thought you only cared about your children.'

Colt just frowned.

Chapter Thirty-Eight: 'O, burgeoning snare...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Stoker followed Karkash into the King's office again. He didn't know what had gotten the other man so upset. He wasn't entirely sure he wanted to find out, either, but Karkash did not seem willing to allow otherwise.

Karkash laid a newspaper out on the desk, and Stoker and Desmond both looked at it. There was an article on the third page, talking about the so-called Darksteel Soldier, now known to be a criminal by the name of Hector Goffe.

"This person is a servant," said Karkash.

"Oh, yeah," said Desmond. "I was meaning to go and kill that guy, but I haven't had the time."

"You know him?" said Stoker.

"I think so. We fought a few weeks back. I didn't catch his name, but I've heard about him using metal, so I'm pretty sure it's the same guy."

"You let him get away?" said Karkash.

Desmond just shrugged.

Karkash's eyes were daggers. Desmond seemed immune to their effects, however.

'You should have hunted him down already,' said Hoyohté. 'What if he returns with reinforcements?'

Desmond laughed, and his eyes widened. "I hope he does! I've been bored out of my skull!"

Ezmortig floated around his servant. 'Come to think of it, this Hector Goffe could be the reason Ozmere and Moss have not returned.'

Desmond's brow receded. "Hmm, you think so? He didn't seem strong enough to take down Moss."

'Perhaps he is more dangerous than we realized,' said Ezmortig. 'It is strange that he is not hiding like the Queen.'

"321

--donation bonus (day #17, post 3/5)--

"Oh!" said Desmond, grinning. "You're right. It's like he's taunting us with all this media coverage, isn't it? Maybe he wants us to come after him, eh? If so, that's pretty damn ballsy."

And suddenly, Stoker saw the opportunity there. On a silver platter. Right in front of his face.

Nize got there before him. 'Stoker and I will go hunt him down.'

Desmond looked at her. "Really? It's not like he's actually important. Even if he is giving us the middle finger, right now."

'No,' said Hoyohté. 'Karkash and I will go.'

Desmond blinked at her, too. "Why are you all raring to go kill someone you've never even seen? I told you he's not important. Don't you have more pressing matters to attend to?"

'That is why we will go by ourselves,' said Hoyohté. She turned to Nize and Stoker. 'We will only be gone a day--two at the most. You can handle matters in the meantime, yes?'

"Of course," said Stoker. 'This works, too,' he thought. 'As long as we don't have Karkash breathing down our necks, sneaking out of the city will be simple. The others won't notice until we're long gone.'

Nize privately concurred.

'You shouldn't go alone,' said Ezmortig. 'We don't know how strong the enemy is.'

"Not necessary," said Karkash. "We know he uses metal."

'...So?'

"So he's already fucked," said Stoker. "Karkash can control electromagnetic fields."

--++--++--

Colt's meditation went surprisingly smoothly. He hated it, but now that it had become the difference between being able to safely hold his children and not, he started taking it much more seriously. Within a day, he was able to not only keep his power subdued, but he could also target an object half a meter away from him. However, its actual destructive power still seemed incredibly weak. He couldn't even break a solid pane of glass on the first try. He took to practicing his aim against a chalk circle he'd drawn on the wall."

--donation bonus (day #17, post 4/5)--

Aiming was also a bit awkward for him. The path of destruction sprung from Colt's hands, but just putting an open palm forward was too clumsy and inaccurate, he felt. He tried putting two fingers forward like a childish pistol, but that wasn't doing it for him, either. In the end, he just used an unloaded gun and adjusted for the slightly off-center firing point for its invisible "bullets." He found it much more comfortable.

After a while, though, he stopped. He did find the power interesting, but at least for now, a regular gun was still much more useful. The only upside he could see to this was that it didn't require ammo. He supposed another plus might be that it didn't have the potential to jam like a normal gun did, but Colt always made sure to take proper care of his firearms and stayed away from models that were prone to operating problems, anyway.

He bathed the kids in a wash basin one at a time, gave them fresh diapers, and then fed them.

'I'm curious,' said Bohwanox. 'What do you intend to do with them when they are older?'

For a time, Colt didn't answer. That was a question he had been dreading. "I'm not sure," he eventually said.

'Have you not given it much thought?'

"No, I have. I just. Haven't come up with a good answer."

'Hmm. If you intend to stay on the run indefinitely, what kind of life could you provide for them?'

Colt only stared at them.

'I'm guessing you don't see a foster home as a viable option.'

"They aren't going to grow up in a place like that. Not as long as I'm still breathing."

'What's wrong with foster homes?'

Colt eyed the reaper. "Go haunt one for a few years and then ask me that question again."

'Is that personal experience I'm hearing or just the jaded view of an ex-cop?'

His mouth twisted distastefully. "Both.""
"323

--donation bonus (day #17, post 5/5)--

'I am sorry to hear that,' said Bowhanox.

"I was fine," said Colt. "Other kids weren't."

'...Because you beat the hell out of them?'

"What? No! Believe it or not, I was actually a pretty good kid."

'Not believing it.'

"I might've had a thicker skin than most kids, and I might've gotten into a few fights, but I wasn't a fucking bully."

'Let me guess. You beat up the bullies, instead.'

"Pfft, no. I was like nine. They kicked the shit out of me."

'But you tried to beat them up, yes?'

"...Yes."

'I knew it.'

"What the fuck happened to keeping this relationship strictly professional?"

'Oh, relax. Tough guy can't even handle a bit of friendly ribbing.'

Colt just grumbled.

'I am sure we could find a much better foster home, you know. Stake it out for a while, make extra sure that the caretakers are not hiding any monstrous secrets or anything.'

“Tch. Even if that were possible, what the fuck would I do without my kids, huh? What would my life become?”

Bohwanox hesitated. ‘Uh... gallantly protecting me from monsters?’

“Go fuck yourself.”

The reaper snorted a laugh. ‘I get it. They are your reason for living. But is that what is honestly best for them?’

“I’ll figure something out.”

‘Hmm. Then I will do my best to help with that.’

Colt cocked an eyebrow at the reaper. Their conversation was interrupted, however, when Garovel’s voice broke in.

‘Hey! You two!’ he said, descending from the roof.

They waited for him to elaborate.

‘So there are three helicopters and an army of cops chasing Hector right now.’

Colt had to snicker.

‘He’s on foot. I’m sure he’d appreciate you and your car.’

“We finally gonna leave this town?” he said, moving to gather their things.

‘Yeah, I’m thinking we should.’

“About damn time.”

--+-+--+-

‘Colt is en route,’ came Garovel’s voice from the other side of the city.

‘That’s nice.’ And not for the first time today, Hector tumbled off the roof of a building with more than twenty floors.”

"324

He pulled a pillar up from the ground to meet him, giving it a curve and turning it into a giant, spiraling slide. He swirled down, rolling over himself and banging against its iron siding until it spit him out onto the open road. He could feel his spine repairing itself as he struggled to his feet again.

He spotted a police chopper ahead, along with a fleet of trucks turning onto the street.

Hector ran up to the adjacent building and pulled a sudden iron tower up beneath his feet. He shot up, reaching the roof in seconds and then destroying both the slide and platform before running off again.

The police had been making it increasingly difficult to protect people--and for that matter, so had the people themselves. All the media coverage about the identity of the Darksteel Soldier and why the police were having so much trouble catching him had of course revealed Hector's usage of metal to the general public; and once details of the Calman High massacre began to circulate, connections were soon made. Geoffrey's puppets had suffocated because of freakish metal encasing, after all, and there wasn't much hope of explaining that they were already dead and being used to kill even more people.

As such, the Darksteel Soldier had been labeled as no longer just a criminal, nor even just a killer. Now, he was a mass murderer. And that was enough attention so that almost anyone who saw him would immediately call the police. Even people he had just saved were quick to lose it and scream for help. Hector wasn't looking for their praise, but it was still frustrating and tiresome all the same.

Garovel asked him for his location, and Hector gave it as best he could. He soon spotted all three helicopters still following him and jumped off the roof--this time intentionally--and landed on a shorter building. From there, he could leap down to the next street over without splattering against the concrete."

"325

Hector dropped right in front of a group of policemen. They already had their weapons drawn and fired a slew of rounds at him before he could render their guns useless with iron. And even without their weapons, they still seemed intent on taking him down, moving to surround him. He didn't want to go back up to the rooftops with the helicopters, so he just ran through the last gap in the police line.

More cops were waiting around the corner, however. And word must have gotten around about the ineffectiveness of bullets, because they were holding tasers instead. Six pairs of charged electrodes flew toward him on conductive wires. He stopped five with iron walls, but the last one found his shoulder.

He dropped to his hands and knees. The electricity didn't hurt, of course, but controlling his limbs was abruptly difficult. He pressed a hand to the ground, and an iron pillar launched him up and over the officers. His landing was rough, but he was back on his feet quickly enough and running away again.

Next, four white-and-black SUVs skidded to a stop in front of him, but Hector just wrapped the vehicles in metal before the tactical teams could exit. He ran past and released the metal after turning the next corner.

Finally, he saw Colt's car and ran toward it.

More cops got in his way, however.

A flash of anger ran through him. Why couldn't they be this persistent about catching actual criminals? He'd delivered a local mob boss to their doorstep the night before, along with a whole cabinet of incriminating documents, but did that matter now? Of course not.

He covered their tasers in metal, then their legs, just enough to incapacitate them. He ran for the car again, but two more cops appeared and jumped on top of him. The anger returned, stronger.

He flung the first cop off, then grabbed the other's arm and broke it. The man screamed out in pain.

Hector stopped, suddenly horrified with himself. That shouldn't have happened. He wasn't supposed to hurt cops."

"326

For a moment, Hector could only stare at the cop writhing on the ground. He'd broken normal people's bones before, but those had at least been violent criminals. This guy was just doing his job.

‘Hector!’ came Garovel’s yell. ‘Hurry up!’

More cops were coming. He knew he couldn’t stay. He threw the injured man a last look. “I’m sorry!” was all he could manage. He ran off and jumped into Colt’s car.

They sped off, but Hector could still see more helicopters and vehicles in pursuit.

“Can you put a barricade behind us?” said Colt.

“I don’t want to make them crash!” said Hector. “That could kill someone!”

Colt grumbled under his breath, and then said, “Fine. I’ll do it the hard way. Climb into the backseat and hold onto the kids for me.”

Hector did as the man said. The babies started whining as he nestled them in his arms, wrapping them in iron along with himself. He could feel the car’s speed climbing rapidly. They soon encountered a police blockade.

“Keep going,” said Hector.

“You sure?” said Colt.

“Yeah.”

Bridge structure was the first thing he studied when he visited the library the other day. Committing a few general designs to memory had been no great feat, and this time, the bridge he constructed was much sturdier. The ramp leading up to it was solid iron all the way through, providing ample support for the extension over the blockade, and the ramp leading back down was just as smooth. Hector annihilated the bridge behind them.

Colt had the reapers scout ahead for him, aiding his efforts to lose the helicopters. The man’s driving was frightening, yet still somehow precise. He could navigate around parked cars in narrow streets without losing much speed, and Hector frequently lost sight of the choppers between the tall buildings, which likely meant that they were having the same problem.

“You’re really good at driving...”

“This car’s a piece of shit.””

Bohwanox found them a tight intersection with a small underground tunnel, no doubt meant to let cars pass below the train tracks at ground level. Colt went into the tunnel, stopped the car when they were out of view, and then doubled back and turned down a different street.

The reapers soon confirmed that there was no one following.

Colt headed northeast. "So where the hell do we go now?" he said as they reached the city's outer limits. "Still think we shouldn't leave the country?"

The two reapers kept pace with the vehicle on either side.

'Garovel, what do you think?'

'I vote for Zeke.'

'Why?'

'It's on the way to Walton, where we might have a friend.' He looked at Hector. 'Perhaps it's time we gave Gina a call.'

"Who's Gina?" said Colt.

'Admittedly,' said Garovel, 'we don't know all that much about her. But she and her boss helped us out before. She might not be so welcoming with all the attention Hector's gotten, but it's worth trying.'

Hector found her number in his cellphone, but the call didn't go through. "I don't have reception..."

'Try again when we get to Zeke.'

"Right."

The cabin grew quiet for a while. Hector removed his helm and watched the long stretches of tawny grassland pass by the window, flat as far as the eye could see with only the occasional tree to break the pattern.

‘How are you feeling?’ Garovel said privately.

Hector frowned. ‘Garovel, I hurt a cop...’

‘I saw.’

His frown only deepened.

‘It was an unfortunate accident,’ said Garovel. ‘Don’t get hung up on--’

‘No, I... I mean, that’s just it... I did it on purpose.’

The reaper was quiet a moment. ‘What?’

‘For a second there, I... I was just so pissed off... because of... because of everything, I guess.’ He rubbed his forehead and took a long breath. ‘The guy was like the hundredth person to get in my way, and I just... I lost my head... I wanted to hurt him. And I did.’”
"328

‘What are you saying?’ said Garovel, abruptly more seriously. ‘Hector, are you saying you don’t regret hurting that man?’

‘What? No! Of course I regret it! That’s what I was trying to say!’

‘Good. That’s the way it should be. Shit, you really had me worried for a second.’

‘What’re you--?’

‘Hector, listen to me. You’ve been through a lot. You made a mistake. You’ve acknowledged it. Now just don’t do it again.’

He furrowed his brow, blinking. ‘I mean, ah... of course, I’ll try, but what if I can’t? That’s what I’m worried about.’ He looked at his hands. ‘Honestly, I’m kinda scared of myself right now...’

‘You’ve been far too high-strung, lately. You know you have. Are you so surprised that it ended up affecting you?’

‘But... I didn’t think I’d hurt an innocent person...’

‘Well, you did. And don’t forget it. Remember this as a lesson. You have to take care of yourself, too. You’re not invincible. I know sometimes it might seem like you are, but you're not. You have to keep a clear head.'

He gave a slow nod. 'Is this... because I've been neglecting my meditation?'

'I wouldn't blame it all on that, but I do think meditation would certainly help you relax. As would some fucking rest.'

'I, ah... I guess you're right.'

'Duh. Don't you know by now how ridiculously wise I am?'

Hector tried to get some sleep. It did not go smoothly. Even after the enhancements wore off and the exhaustion kicked in, his brain still wanted to stubbornly hold on to consciousness. With nothing else to do, he just started to meditate right there in the backseat. And after a time of forcing himself to empty his head, he was finally able to fall asleep.

When he awoke, Stephanie and Thomas were both fidgeting in his arms. Then the smell hit him, hard enough to make his eyes water. Someone needed their diaper changed. Perhaps two someones."

"329

Thankfully, they'd already stopped at a gas station, and Hector was quick to seek refuge in the air outside the car.

Colt was filling up the tank. The man smirked when he saw Hector. "Was wondering if you'd be able to sleep through that."

Hector enjoyed another gulp of fresh air before responding. "Where are we?"

"Nearly to Maxwell," said Colt. "Maybe you should try to call your friend again."

"Ah... I could help you change the kids, if you want."

"You know how to change a diaper?"

"Yeah. My, uh..." He frowned. "Yeah, I know how."

"Mm. Still, you should call your friend. I'm fine changing them both."

Hector nodded and pulled out his phone. To his surprise, he already had several missed calls from Gina. She'd sent a few texts, as well, all warning him that she thought someone might be coming to kill him. Not exactly news, generally-speaking, but she had details. Karkash. A man who could control electromagnetic fields.

Garovel floated over his shoulder, reading. 'Looks like Gina's been busy.'

He decided to give her a call.

She picked up after a single ring. <"Hector!">

"Uh, h-hi."

<"You got my messages?">

"Y-yeah."

<"I'm not completely sure that they're coming after you, to be honest. It sounded like they were talking to reapers, so I only caught half the conversation, but they mentioned someone who uses metal being in trouble because of Karkash--who, by the way, does not sound like a very nice person. After seeing you in the news, I figured the metal guy was you. What the hell happened to you, anyway? You didn't actually kill all those people, right?">

Hector blinked a few times. "N-no, of course I didn't. How do you know about this Karkash, anyway? It sounds like you bugged someone or--"

<"Yeah, I planted bugs all over Belgrant Castle. The people who are holding the King hostage--I've been listening to their conversations.">

"What?!"

"330

<"I know,"> said Gina. <"I risked my life for this intel. You're welcome, by the way.">

"Er, thanks, but--agh, you shouldn't have done that. It's way too dangerous."

<“I’m being careful. Got myself a cozy little underground lair. Anyhow, it’s you who should be careful.”>

‘Ask her what she’s learned about their plans,’ said Garovel. ‘And put her on speaker so Colt and Bohwanox can listen, too.’

Hector held the phone out as Garovel invited the other two over.

<“I’ve only been listening for a few days, but I know that there are eight servants in Sescoria right now. And they’ve been torturing King William, but you probably guessed that by now.”>

Hector clenched his jaw. The King’s sudden loss of a limb had of course been major news. The media attributed it to a freak infection, whereupon the arm had to be amputated in order to save his life. Hector and Garovel hadn’t bought that pile of horseshit for a second. “Do you know which one of them took his arm?”

<“It was definitely the guy called Desmond. He really likes to talk about it.”>

“I’ve met him,” Hector said lowly.

<“But that’s not the juiciest thing I’ve learned. In two weeks, they’re planning to destroy an entire town and make it look like Rendon is responsible. Right now, they’re still trying to prepare public opinion. You’ve probably seen some of the media coverage about how hostile Rendon and Kahm are, supposedly. Or maybe they ARE that hostile. It sounds like Abolish might have agents in those countries, too.”>

‘A multinational conflict,’ said Garovel, eyeing the others. ‘Ask her which town they intend to destroy.’

“Which town?”

<“It’s called Harold. Northwest of Sescoria. It’s not very big. Hopefully, I can find out who they’re sending and what their abilities are.”>

Colt tilted his head. “Why Harold? Why don’t they just stage the attack in the capital?”

<“Who’s that talking?”>

“Sorry, this is Colt. He’s... an ally. You can trust him.””

<“Hmm. Well, anyway, to answer your question, I’m pretty sure they want to use Sescoria as their base of operations. They’ve been stockpiling weapons and building a perimeter around the city. It wouldn’t make much sense to attack it.”>

‘At least not yet,’ added Garovel. ‘Ask her about Roman.’

“Is there any news from Roman?” said Hector.

<“He contacted me a couple weeks ago, but only to say that their leads in Korgum didn’t pan out.”>

“Ah--are they okay?”

<“He didn’t go into detail, but it sounded like they’ve had a rough time of it, as well. I’ll let you know if Master Roman contacts me again. I’m sure he’ll be interested to hear about your situation, too.”>

“Th-thanks.”

<“Is there anything else I can do for you?”>

“Ah--we were just on our way to Walton, actually. We were, uh, hoping for a place to stay. Temporarily, I mean.”

<“I would take you in, but I’m not in Walton, right now. I’m in Sescoria. And I doubt you want to come here.”>

“Right...”

<“If you want, I could make some calls and find you a different place.”>

Hector eyed the others. Garovel shook his head, and Hector said, “No, that’s okay. We’ll figure something else out.”

<“Alrighty.”>

“Thank you for the information,” he said. “And please, um. Be careful.”

<“Same to you. I’ll call you whenever I learn anything useful.”>

“And if you, uh--if you--ah...”

<“What?”>

"I-if you get into trouble, then please call me. I'll come help you."

She paused for a giggle. <"You'd never reach me in time, but thanks.">
And she hung up.

"Pretty brave friend you got there," said Colt.

"Yeah..."

--+-+--+--

Stoker concealed the tattoo on his face under a gray hood as he drove. There weren't many ways out of Sescoria, at the moment. All the major roads were being watched, and the smaller ones had been closed off. It was fortunate, then, that Stoker was supposed to be the one watching the southern gate.

Or at least, it seemed fortunate--right up until Nize informed him that Karkash was standing in the middle of the road straight ahead. Arms folded. Waiting."

"332 -- XXXIX.

Stoker evaluated his options. Traffic was rather heavy. A high speed chase would be difficult, at best, and Karkash's magnetism had a range of thirty meters. Any car within that distance would not be going anywhere unless Karkash allowed it. And if Nize abandoned Stoker to flee on her own, Karkash would surely kill her with soul-infused lightning; or, supposing she fled straight downward, Karkash would still be able to reach her underground with a soul-strengthened magnetic field.

However, given that Karkash had not already attacked them, perhaps a fight was yet avoidable.

Stoker pulled over and exited the vehicle. He stepped onto the grassy median with Karkash. The noise from the cars all around them meant he had to get closer to the man than he would have liked in order to exchange words.

"What are you doing out here?" Stoker said in Vaelish. "You were supposed to be hunting down the servant with metal."

‘Have you truly not realized, even now?’ said Hoyóhté, floating behind her servant. ‘We were never going to hunt that person down. He is unimportant. This was only ever a trap for the two of you.’

Stoker eyed them both carefully. He decided to feign innocence until there was no other option. “A trap? Why would you need to set a trap for us?” In the meantime, however, he took note of the cool afternoon air. That could prove helpful.

Karkash ignored the question and asked his own. “Where were you going?”

‘We received new orders while you were gone,’ lied Nize. ‘Our presence was requested in Kahm.’

‘Then I am sure you will not mind returning to the castle and having the others confirm that for us.’

‘Of course.’

‘After you, then.’

No one moved.

Chapter Thirty-Nine: ‘O, turbulent cloud...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Stoker met Karkash’s stare evenly. In truth, he was afraid of the man, but there was no room for fear now. And he wasn’t weak, either. He could fight. If he played smart, he might even win. So that’s what he did.

Stoker slowly put both arms up as if to surrender."
"332 -- XXXIX.

Stoker evaluated his options. Traffic was rather heavy. A high speed chase would be difficult, at best, and Karkash’s magnetism had a range of thirty meters. Any car within that distance would not be going anywhere unless Karkash allowed it. And if Nize abandoned Stoker to flee on her own, Karkash would surely kill her with soul-infused lightning; or, supposing she fled straight downward, Karkash would still be able to reach her underground with a soul-strengthened magnetic field.

However, given that Karkash had not already attacked them, perhaps a fight was yet avoidable.

Stoker pulled over and exited the vehicle. He stepped onto the grassy median with Karkash. The noise from the cars all around them meant he had to get closer to the man than he would have liked in order to exchange words.

“What are you doing out here?” Stoker said in Vaelish. “You were supposed to be hunting down the servant with metal.”

‘Have you truly not realized, even now?’ said Hoyochté, floating behind her servant. ‘We were never going to hunt that person down. He is unimportant. This was only ever a trap for the two of you.’

Stoker eyed them both carefully. He decided to feign innocence until there was no other option. “A trap? Why would you need to set a trap for us?” In the meantime, however, he took note of the cool afternoon air. That could prove helpful.

Karkash ignored the question and asked his own. “Where were you going?”

‘We received new orders while you were gone,’ lied Nize. ‘Our presence was requested in Kahm.’

‘Then I am sure you will not mind returning to the castle and having the others confirm that for us.’

‘Of course.’

‘After you, then.’

No one moved.

Chapter Thirty-Nine: ‘O, turbulent cloud...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Stoker met Karkash's stare evenly. In truth, he was afraid of the man, but there was no room for fear now. And he wasn't weak, either. He could fight. If he played smart, he might even win. So that's what he did.

Stoker slowly put both arms up as if to surrender."
"333

Karkash did not take the bait. Electricity gathered in his fist, and Stoker only had a moment to shield Nize from the attack.

The current ripped through his body, explosions of pain everywhere, but Stoker was no stranger to such agony. He used transfiguration, after all, arguably the most painful class of servant abilities.

Transfiguration was a power for the thinking man. It required practice, precision, and chemistry. Its true strength was lost on the simple-minded.

Stoker could replace any part of his body with hydrogen--not so threatening a power as Karkash's, to be sure, but like most transfiguration abilities, it was prone to being underestimated, as others had learned to their cost.

Stoker's back and arms sizzled beneath his clothes. Hydrogen bonded with the oxygen in his blood and skin to create water en masse, which vaporized immediately; and when it hit the cool air, the result was a sudden fog, expanding quickly out from Stoker's flesh. He retreated into its pure white cover and added his soul to the cloud in order to prevent Hoyohté from sensing him.

Nize, on the other hand, could still sense Karkash and Hoyohté perfectly. Stoker's soul permeated the mist in a confused mass, but their souls remained clear beacons.

Stoker's missing flesh left a lingering burn, like being set on fire, but it did not last. Nize initiated the regeneration and enhanced his strength, then attached herself to his back to conceal her soul within his.

He needed an answer from her. 'It's only Karkash here, right? No other servants?'

'Yes,' she said privately.

Fleeing was perhaps still an option, he realized. He merely needed to leave Karkash's range, preferably with a new car. It would have been nice if letting Nize go deep underground were an option, but he knew that even if she managed to escape Karkash's reach, Abolish's subterranean net had already been completed. Just as Stoker and Karkash provided aerial defenses, another team specialized in below ground tactics. A gigantic, soul-empowered net was often used to prevent enemy reapers from infiltrating cities and regenerating their servants from scratch. Of course, it also prevented friendly reapers from leaving cities by the same means."

"334

'Karkash is lashing out,' said Nize. 'Careful on your right.'

A car flew toward him, and Stoker ducked under it. The cracking boom of lightning made the fog shudder and swirl. Magnetic waves shifted the air and flipped more vehicles, making traffic in both directions come screeching to a halt.

Stoker ran left, widening and deepening the fog. Sparks flew through the cloud, stirring the air, brewing up a storm. This was, after all, why Stoker and Karkash were anti-air specialists. Given time, their combined abilities could create weather more ferocious than any conventional aircraft could withstand.

A silver pickup truck appeared through the fog much too suddenly. It slammed into Stoker, knocking him clear off the road and through the wall of a grocery store. Debris and produce left people fleeing in all directions.

Stoker's fog subsided as his concentration did, as he was more concerned with struggling back to his feet while half the bones in his body shifted back into place and repaired themselves. He shoved the truck out of the way, its bearded driver either dead or unconscious at the wheel. He made his way outside again.

The violent changes in air pressure had already kicked up a small wind, and he knew that his cloud would soon be pushed away. He decided it would be wiser to attack before making more.

The miniscule amount of acid in his stomach would be of no great use alone, but he could tunnel through his own body with hydrogen in order to reach the extra chlorine in his kidneys and the oxygen in his blood and lungs; and when strengthened with imaginary power, his acid would be both strong enough and voluminous enough to eat through even concrete within seconds.

‘Where is he?’ Stoker asked.

‘Straight ahead five meters, left two more, and you will be behind him.’

The acid swelled up as he ran, eating him from the inside, and as soon as he saw Karkash, he spat out a sizzling, bloody glob.”

"335

Hoyohté must have warned him, because Karkash was able to avoid the brunt of the acid. It splashed the side of his face only, and when Stoker threw a punch with all his strength, Karkash simply caught it. With his one unmelted eye, Karkash turned to look at Stoker.

He spat more acid. A bolt of electricity cut through it, igniting the hydrogen. Both men’s clothes caught fire, but Stoker took the worst of it as the flames relished the chance to spread throughout the hydrogen in his body. He dropped and rolled until the fire extinguished. He climbed to one knee as flesh all over his body was returning.

‘Nize,’ he said, running again, ‘are you alright?’

‘Y-yes...’

‘Where’s Hoyohté?’

‘She’s staying in front of him where he can protect her. I’m sure she’s also watching his back for him.’

Stoker growled. He was hoping they would have split up, but they apparently knew better. Their formation was ideal for low-visibility combat, because if Hoyohté had gone above the fog or below, she wouldn’t have been able to eliminate Karkash’s blind spots, which would have meant the advantage for Stoker. Wishful thinking, it seemed.

Another car came reeling through the fog, and Stoker had to sidestep it. He ran south, making more fog behind him. He knew that he could take Karkash down with a simple bath of hydrogen gas, as the sparks in the air would make it explode immediately; but the problem was avoiding the explosion himself. A double-down scenario was certainly not ideal. He decided it was time to flee again.

He passed an overturned police car, and for a mad moment, considered stealing the officer's firearm before remembering the reason he hadn't brought his own to this fight.

Finally, he reached a part of the road where none of the vehicles were tumbling through the air. He picked a big blue truck and yanked the hapless civilian out.

Before he could jump in the driver's seat, however, a lightning bolt pierced his chest. His entire body spasmed violently, and he looked back to see Karkash in the distance, risen above the fog, hovering toward them."

"336

It was no great surprise to see the man flying. Karkash always kept enough metal under his clothes to support his own weight, and from there, it was merely a matter of manipulating magnetic fields around himself. Stoker spared it no thought, just like the hole in his chest.

In the driver's seat, he backed the truck up against oncoming traffic. He cut over the median and spun the wheel around until the truck was facing the open road. He floored it.

Karkash dwindled in the mirror. But he didn't disappear. And after a moment, Stoker saw lightning leap toward the truck and crash just behind it.

He stuck his arm out the window and left a trail of fog. It wasn't much, but at least it would make his giant metal deathtrap more difficult to hit.

'Nize?' he thought while his ribcage filled back in.

'I... agh...'

He couldn't exactly look back to check on her. 'Talk to me, Nize. Are you wounded?'

'Losing consciousness... just keep going...'

A wall of white filled the rearview mirror, but from what Stoker knew of Karkash's flying prowess, this truck probably wouldn't be enough to lose him.

-+--+--+-

Hector had to wait in the trunk while Colt booked a room at the Sunny Days Motel--a name which, by the look of the place, was perhaps more fitting ten years ago. No longer planning to go to Walton, they'd stayed on the outskirts of Maxwell, in want of a better destination.

Hector knew that he must have looked like hell, because there was only one bed in the room, and Colt conceded it to him straight away.

He managed to get some more sleep, letting the aches and fatigue wash over him again, but he was soon awoken by his phone. It was Gina.

<"Are you watching this?"> she said. <"Or are you already there?">

Hector glanced across the others. "What are you talking about?"

<"Are you near a television?">

"Yeah. Hold on..."

"337

Colt switched the TV on and found the live news broadcast almost immediately.

Hector stood. "What the hell is this...?"

Freak weather moving south of Sescoria, it said. Reports of deadly, ground-level thunderstorms. And of a flying man. And of numerous casualties.

'It's them,' said Garovel. 'No doubt.'

'Are they already making their move?' said Bohwanox. 'Your friend said we had two weeks.'

"Gina?" said Hector. "What do you know about this?"

<“Nothing. Sorry. If they planned this attack, then they did it somewhere I couldn’t overhear them.”>

He watched the helicopter footage. A giant trail of fog followed the highway, cutting through suburban towns south of Sescoria. He could see overturned vehicles on the side of the road, even lodged into the sides of buildings. The reporters were warning people in the vicinity to remain in their homes.

“That’s not very far from here,” said Hector.

‘You still need rest,’ said Garovel.

“Garovel, we both know I’m going. Let’s not waste time arguing.” He looked at Colt. “Let me borrow your car.”

‘You don’t even know how to drive,’ said Garovel.

“I’ll figure it out.”

Colt stood as well. “I’ll drive you.”

“Are you kidding? The kids--”

“We’ll keep our distance,” he said, gathering them in his arms. “But if it comes down to it, I will abandon you. Understood?”

“Of course.”

They left.

--++--++--

The small town traffic made the highway easier to navigate until he felt the truck start to slow. There was plenty of gas. His foot was all the way down. It wasn’t a problem with the vehicle. Karkash had finally gotten within range again. Soon, the truck was barely even moving forward, tires smoking against the pavement.

Then the flash of lightning came. Stoker was only partway out the door before the electricity ignited the gas tank, and the truck exploded. He went flying in one direction; his legs went in another."

"338

Stoker toppled through a fence, gaining a plank of wood through the neck, and crashed into a children's playground, mangling the jungle gym's metal frame with the force of his broken body.

Not looking so great, he had to admit. He could see Karkash in the distance, closing in for the kill.

His legs needed time to return, but he still had his arms. He removed the wooden spear from his esophagus and eyed it a moment. He grabbed the jungle gym's blue frame and ripped out a long chunk, which he then broke into two pieces. Three objects now: one wood, two metal. He gathered all the strength he could muster into his throwing arm.

The two metal pieces went first, one after another, flying toward Karkash at cannonball speed. Each time, they slowed and stopped in the air, ineffectual before being ripped apart by the invisible magnetic field. The third piece, however, flew straight and true, and gored Karkash through the chest. Stoker had conditioned him to expect metal, and even though the attack was certainly not enough to stop the other servant, the surprise made the magnetic field falter, and Karkash dropped out of the sky, cracking the asphalt as he landed.

And that bought Stoker precious time.

He grabbed a handful of gravel. There was one aspect of his transfiguration ability which he had only recently developed: control over the physical state in which his hydrogen appeared. Specifically, temperature. Heated hydrogen easily melted the tiny rocks in his hand into a solid, flaming mass.

Hoyohté was simply impossible to hit at this distance, so he again launched at Karkash. And then another. And then continuously, several more times, until Karkash flung a cement truck at him.

Stoker's legs were back, however, so he dove out of its path, leaving the jungle gym to be obliterated completely.

It was time for fog again, he decided. He had another trick up his sleeve, one that he hadn't wanted to try earlier because it was perhaps too volatile. But now, circumstances seemed appropriately dire."

Liquid hydrogen was a curious substance, Stoker had discovered. It was even colder than its more famous cousin, liquid nitrogen, and could likewise freeze objects in mere seconds, including his own flesh if he wasn't careful; and yet despite its temperature, hydrogen in this state was still incredibly reactive to oxygen. As soon as it touched the air, it would ignite with a colorless flame--which, in other words, rendered the flame nearly invisible.

Before he could put it to use, however, there was something else he needed to do. His muscles were growing heavy again. He was slowing down, and he could feel faint pain throughout his body. 'Nize, can you hear me?'

There was no answer.

'The enhancements are expiring,' he said.

Still nothing.

He could feel her presence there. He concentrated and flexed his soul--an imaginary muscle, pressing against her.

'Ah... Stoker?'

'I need you to renew the enhancements.' She didn't answer, but after a moment, Stoker felt the vigor resurge through him. All pain vanished again, and he took a deep breath. 'Can you tell me where Karkash is?'

'...Other side of the building on your left...'

'Okay.' He darted through the alley ahead of him. He could hear crashing booms nearby--perhaps a building being demolished. He tried the next door he found. It was a small restaurant with numerous people huddled together, all deathly silent as they stared at him. This would do fine, he decided, ceasing his fog production. 'I need you to detach yourself from me now.'

'What? But I can't move on my own...'

'My next attack will hurt you if you stay on my back.'

'But your fog only hides your soul from Hoyoté... It won't hide mine if I'm not attached to you...'

'I know. But we're low on options, and these people's souls should hide yours for a little while. I'll kill Karkash before he reaches you.'

She hesitated, but then said, 'I trust you.' She removed herself from him."

"340

Stoker could see the chunks missing from Nize's elongated body. She simply floated in place, her snake eyes looking at him briefly before easing shut.

He couldn't dawdle. There was no telling how long the ruse would last. He had to be the one to engage. He ran back outside.

Liquid hydrogen required more concentration than any other aspect of his ability. He held his hands up in front of him and flexed both arms hard enough to make them tremble. After a moment, his skin disappeared, and even though the hydrogen was invisible to the naked eye, he knew he had succeeded. That combination of freezing heat was unique: warmth against his face while his bones felt like ice.

The flash freezing element was the trump card here. If he could bathe Karkash's head in this liquid hydrogen, the man's brain function would cease, and Stoker would be instantly victorious. He would keep Karkash's brain frozen indefinitely--something no amount of regeneration would fix. If he wasn't able to kill Hoyohté at that point, it would make no difference.

The problem, of course, was getting close enough. His best hope was to catch Karkash from behind. As he drew close to the location Nize had specified, Stoker crouched as low as he could.

He had to stop abruptly as the cement truck from before passed right in front of his face. Then a bank vault. Then a refrigerator. And more, he saw. Cars, lamp posts, pipes, mailboxes, they all swirled together with increasing speed, and Stoker understood what Karkash was doing. It was a metal tornado. The vortex was pulling Stoker's fog in and dispersing it elsewhere. Soon, there would be no hiding.

He took his chance and leapt through the moving wall of objects, landing safely. He looked up and saw Karkash directly above the tornado.

And Karkash saw him, as well.

Not the confrontation he had wanted. But it was too late to complain. Every object in the tornado was already sailing toward him. The moment was now."

"341

Stoker gathered strength in his legs and jumped, rocketing up toward Karkash.

He would bet it all on this. Not just his arms. His torso, too. Beneath his skin, there was an icy core, waiting to be released. It was so much hydrogen that if Karkash chose to detonate it with lightning at this range, the explosion would certainly blow both servants to pieces; and if Karkash chose otherwise, the freezing would take effect.

Karkash chose the latter. He caught Stoker with one arm, held by the neck. The arm froze immediately, and Stoker reached out, replacing his hand entirely with liquid hydrogen. Not even bone remained. The invisible hand scraped Karkash's face, and Stoker saw it freeze instantly.

But that was as far as it went, because before the hydrogen could douse his skull completely, Karkash cut off his own arm--the arm which was holding Stoker in the air. And that decided everything.

Stoker fell. Both feet hit the pavement. He tried to flee, and a bolt of lightning cut through his right leg, lopping it clean off. Hydrogen escaped all around him, some of it liquid, some of it gas.

So much of his body was gone now. He lay on the road in a heap, half-bloody, half-frozen.

Karkash descended, peeling the icy flesh from his face and letting it regrow anew. The metal vortex slowed, and the objects therein all crashed into the ground and surrounding buildings, invoking civilian shrieks.

It was over, Stoker knew. He couldn't even run anymore--not that it would have made much difference now that the fog had dissipated. And with so much of his body converted to hydrogen, Karkash could detonate him at any moment with a simple spark.

‘I found Nize,’ said Hoyohaté.

Karkash deliberated a moment, and then forewent the explosive deathblow. Instead, he made his way toward the building Hoyohaté pointed to. Through the large window, he saw Nize among the group of terrified people. He raised a hand.

Before the lightning could flash forth, however, a sudden spire appeared and drew the electricity to it, dispersing it harmlessly into the ground.

And Stoker saw the person responsible--a young black man staring down at them from the adjacent rooftop.

“If you two want to kill each other, that’s fine... but please leave other people out of it.”

"342 -- XL.

Chapter Forty: ‘A treacherous clash...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was not wearing his helm--or any metal for that matter. It was obvious enough that the dark-skinned man down there was the one Gina had warned him about. Wearing armor would only be to Karkash’s advantage.

It had certainly been a surprise to see the two men fighting. Hector had expected to find someone merely laying waste to the town for no other reason than enjoyment, but now, he wasn’t sure what to make of the situation. Garovel had wanted him to wait for an opening before intervening, but that idea had been sufficiently squashed as soon as he saw Karkash about to fry that restaurant full of people.

“Please help!” yelled Stoker.

Hector didn’t know who the man was, but he was surprised to hear such a plea. Was this guy really Abolish? Karkash certainly was, but maybe this other servant was Vanguard.

He didn’t have much time to think about it. He saw Karkash’s hand move toward Stoker, and Hector made another spire. Again, it caught the lightning and dispersed it.

The lightning itself was a mere flash--much too quick to react to. So instead, Garovel had advised him to watch Karkash's hands. At the moment, Hector couldn't imagine a more valuable piece of information.

Garovel had stayed close, floating just behind him. 'Good. That man could be an ally.'

'He could also be an enemy,' said Hector.

'That he could. Be very cautious.'

Abruptly, Karkash seized both of Hector's spires and launched them at Stoker. Hector barely annihilated them in time.

'As expected,' said Garovel, 'he can use your own metal against you.'

'This fucking sucks...'

Karkash glared at Hector now, granting his full attention.

He half-expected Karkash to stop and say something, to tell him how irritating he was being or ask him why he was here, maybe. But the man did no such thing.

Lightning came for Hector and was diverted with a rooftop spire. And once the electricity subsided, he could see Karkash already flying toward him."

"342 -- XL.

Chapter Forty: 'A treacherous clash...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was not wearing his helm--or any metal for that matter. It was obvious enough that the dark-skinned man down there was the one Gina had warned him about. Wearing armor would only be to Karkash's advantage.

It had certainly been a surprise to see the two men fighting. Hector had expected to find someone merely laying waste to the town for no other reason than enjoyment, but now, he wasn't sure what to make of the situation. Garovel had wanted him to wait for an opening before intervening, but that idea had been sufficiently squashed as soon as he saw Karkash about to fry that restaurant full of people.

"Please help!" yelled Stoker.

Hector didn't know who the man was, but he was surprised to hear such a plea. Was this guy really Abolish? Karkash certainly was, but maybe this other servant was Vanguard.

He didn't have much time to think about it. He saw Karkash's hand move toward Stoker, and Hector made another spire. Again, it caught the lightning and dispersed it.

The lightning itself was a mere flash--much too quick to react to. So instead, Garovel had advised him to watch Karkash's hands. At the moment, Hector couldn't imagine a more valuable piece of information.

Garovel had stayed close, floating just behind him. 'Good. That man could be an ally.'

'He could also be an enemy,' said Hector.

'That he could. Be very cautious.'

Abruptly, Karkash seized both of Hector's spires and launched them at Stoker. Hector barely annihilated them in time.

'As expected,' said Garovel, 'he can use your own metal against you.'

'This fucking sucks...'

Karkash glared at Hector now, granting his full attention.

He half-expected Karkash to stop and say something, to tell him how irritating he was being or ask him why he was here, maybe. But the man did no such thing.

Lightning came for Hector and was diverted with a rooftop spire. And once the electricity subsided, he could see Karkash already flying toward him."

"343

Hector ducked under the electric fist and pulled up a bed of iron spikes. The metal distorted away from Karkash, bending around an invisible bubble. So Hector just added more--spikes upon spikes, all branching out, each one bending against the magnetic field. They quickly formed a metal sphere, and rather than becoming trapped, Karkash merely tore open a hole to continue attacking.

Hector expected as much, however; he caught the man's arm and tore it off.

Karkash burst backward and shoved the metal sphere into Hector, knocking him off the roof along with a slew of shingles.

Hector hit the pavement of the adjacent road--which meant Stoker and Karkash were alone. He launched himself up with a sudden metal platform, up and over the building, and sure enough, he saw Karkash already tearing into the other man with lightning.

As he fell, Hector tried to coat Karkash in iron, but the metal dust wouldn't accumulate against the man's skin. It was little more than a nuisance as he decapitated Stoker.

A metal box was Hector's next choice. Four walls shot up around Karkash, far enough from him that they didn't immediately distort, but Karkash just shoved them into the surrounding buildings, crashing through windows and doors.

He had the man's attention again. Karkash soared toward him, and Hector made another wall, double his own height. He expected Karkash to seize control of it and was not disappointed. The wall moved straight back toward Hector, and he annihilated it, because he'd already gotten what he wanted: a moment where Karkash couldn't see him. And when the iron wall turned to dust, Karkash was clearly surprised to see Hector already right there in his face.

Full strength, Hector landed a crushing punch, enough to shatter his own fist along with the man's face.

Karkash rocketed through a line of buildings.

Hector's arm was absolutely wrecked from the impact, even crackling with sparks from a last second electric surge. He could see Hoyohité fleeing toward Karkash but couldn't do much to stop her. That wouldn't be the end of this fight, he knew.

He glanced at Garovel, who was merely staring at him, eye sockets even wider than usual. Hector took a ragged breath and went to check on Stoker."

"344

It was a strange sight. Stoker's head had been removed from his body, and Stoker was clearly still conscious. He didn't seem capable of speech quite yet, but his body was regenerating--which was the oddest thing, Hector felt. Stoker's body wasn't growing a new head. His head was growing a new body. After a moment, Hector figured that it only made sense that the regeneration should work that way, considering how important the brain was to servants, but even so--it was almost like there would be two Stokers now. Except one was dead. And headless.

"Someone help!" came a sudden plea from the rubble of a nearby ice cream parlor.

"Help!" came another.

And still another. Several more. All around him.

There were too many. Hector knew he didn't have time to help all of them before Karkash showed up again. But he could at least get to a few.

First was a little girl trapped under a staircase. Then a man in an overturned delivery truck.

"What are you doing?!" came a man's voice. It was Stoker, fully regenerated and clothed. "Just leave them! We have to go kill Karkash!"

Hector ignored him.

Garovel spoke up in his place. 'Where is your reaper?'

At that, Stoker ran off toward the restaurant from before.

Garovel remained close to Hector. 'He does have a point, though. Rescue crews should be here soon. The priority is still Karkash.'

An iron dome formed over a couple of battered teenagers, shielding them from a collapsing roof. Enough space was left for them to escape safely.

"I know," said Hector, "but if I can just--"

Colt rolled up in his car, the twins in the backseat and Bohwanox on his tail. "Need some help?"

"What're you doing?" said Hector. "You said you'd keep your distance!"

'You just worry about keeping that electric asshole occupied,' said Bohwanox.

"But--!"

"Just shut up and take my help," said Colt. "I already owe you way too much, as it is.""

"345

'Colt will look after the people here until emergency services arrive,' said Bohwanox. 'Then I'll have him provide long range support.'

'Long range support?' said Garovel.

"Found a gun store while you were busy," said Colt. "Owner wasn't very cooperative, but I got my hands on something nice."

'Bullets won't be much use against Karkash.'

"Even if all they provide is a distraction, you'll be better off." Colt looked at Hector. "Remember our sparring. Fight smart. Dirty, if you have to. Make him think you're doing one thing, and then do something else."

'I don't think he's forgotten,' said Garovel. 'Let's go, Hector.'

They left Colt and Bohwanox behind in order to find Stoker. It was not a long search; Stoker found them first, holding his half-destroyed reaper in his hands.

'You can't stir her awake?' said Garovel.

"Won't matter," said Stoker. "She's too wounded to move on her own, anyway."

'Why were you fighting Karkash?' said Garovel.

Stoker was reluctant to answer that.

"Are you Vanguard?" Hector asked. And he noticed Garovel frown.

"Yes," said Stoker. "Are you?"

'No.' And then privately to Hector, the reaper added, 'Please let me ask the questions.'

Hector didn't bother replying. He had no problem remaining quiet.

'I can sense Karkash approaching,' said Garovel, pointing north. 'Let's move west. We need an open area, away from civilians.'

They started running.

"An open area will leave us exposed," said Stoker.

'Hector will provide you with cover. What's your ability?'

"Hydrogen transfiguration."

'Try not to blow us up, please.'

"I'll do my best."

--++--++--

Colt could hear the crack of thunder again. No more than a kilometer away, he figured. Sirens were close by as well, but this town was tiny. He was sure it wouldn't have more than a handful of emergency personnel.

Bohwanox had found him a house with a car sticking through the second floor wall. An elderly woman was either dead or unconscious at the wheel, while a young girl, perhaps her granddaughter, screamed for help from the backseat.

Colt wasn't entirely sure how to get them out safely. He was starting to regret his earlier confidence. Surely this would be no trouble for Hector. The kid would've just made a metal staircase or something."

"346

From inside the building, Colt approached the vehicle slowly. It was wedged nose-first through the wall, and as he stepped closer, he could hear the floor boards groaning under its weight.

The girl yelled out as soon as she saw him. "Help! Please!"

Colt held both hands up in front of him. "Quit moving around," he said, perhaps a bit too firmly, because she immediately froze up.

Bohwanox circled around. 'Nice one. Try to be a bit more reassuring, will you? The poor girl's terrified.'

The doors wouldn't be able to open unless he broke through the wall to make more room, but given how precarious the car's position already seemed, Colt didn't know if that would be the best method. A shock like that could make the floor collapse.

'Use your ability to break the windshield,' said Bohwanox. 'You won't jostle the car that way.'

Colt pressed his hand to the shatterproof glass. He concentrated, and a moment later, a small crack appeared. He kept it going, tracing all along the edge of the windshield, as far as his arm would reach, until the glass sunk inward. Then he pushed on it lightly, and it gave way, falling against the dashboard and then into the passenger seat.

He reached through, extending his hand to the girl. "Alright, now," he said, trying to be gentler than before. "Slowly, take my hand and come over the front seat."

"How did you--?!" She broke herself off and grabbed his hand with both of hers. Gingerly, she started to climb over.

The car dipped forward against the floor, making the wood moan, and Colt grabbed the car's front bumper with his free hand. Bohwanox gave him the strength to support it. And as his life force was converted into raw strength, his dark beard began to turn gray and bristly. His flesh started eating away at itself, skin peeling off and blood drying up in his non-essential muscles.

The girl saw him and went even paler than before. "What's wrong with your face?!"

Colt raised a deteriorating eyebrow. "What?"

'Oh, whoops.' Bohwanox invoked the regeneration as well, and Colt's face quickly restored itself. 'Sorry. I'm still a little new to this.'

"347

"It's okay," said Colt. "I've got you."

The girl hesitated. "No, but--what was that just now?"

"Not important. I'll tell you later if you want. Now come on."

"Wh-what about my grandma?"

"I'll get her out, too," he said. "But I'm gonna have to go in after her, so I need you to come out of there first."

She gave a shaky nod but did not seem ready to move.

"Anytime now," said Colt.

"I-ah... are you really trying to help me?"

Colt's face tightened. "Yes. I am."

"But--"

"Look, I can't be waiting out here all day for you. I've got shit to do."

'Colt, what the hell? You're a father. What if that was your daughter in there?'

'My daughter wouldn't be taking this long.'

'But what if she was? What if that was Stephanie and she was too scared to move?'

Colt looked at the girl again. No more than eleven years old, surely. And that look on her face--about ready to cry. He took a silent breath. "I gotta get you outta there, kiddo. And to do that, I need you to trust me. Okay?"

She nodded again and started moving.

"That's it. You're almost there."

And she was out, sliding along the hood and grabbing onto his arm.

He lowered her down. "Now. I need you to go downstairs and outside. You'll see a black car in front of the house. Go stand next to it. You'll be safe there, so go and wait for me while I get your grandma out. And shout to me when you get there. Understand?"

"Yeah," she said, nodding and scurrying off.

"Careful down the steps!" he called after her. He waited for her to get clear, exchanging looks with Bohwanox in the meantime.

'You're really just a big softie, aren't you?'

Colt returned a flat stare. He couldn't see the reaper's face through the dark hood, but he could practically feel the smug grin hidden there.

"Make yourself useful and tell me how to get the old lady out."

'Use your love for all mankind.'

"I fuckin' hate you."

"I'm by the car!" came the girl's yell."

"348

'You'll have to unbuckle her seatbelt before you can get her out of there,' said Bohwanox.

Colt made his way over to the driver's side door, careful with each step as he maintained his grip on the vehicle. Whenever he felt a floor board give too much under his foot, he retreated and tried to step farther.

He reached the door. With one hand placed firmly above the front tire, he pressed the other hand to the side window and began breaking it. He pulled the glass out instead of letting it fall against her.

She was a stout woman, not likely to fit through the unobstructed half of the window. Colt checked her pulse. She was alive, at least.

His arm could just barely reach the belt buckle. It clicked free, and he slowly removed the belt from around her body.

"Now what?" he said. "The wall's still blocking the door."

'You're going to have to break the wall in order to open it, and then get her out as fast as you can.'

"That could bring down the roof," said Colt, "which could make the floor go, as well."

‘That’s why you’ll have to be quick.’

He deliberated for a few moments but saw no better options. He took a deep breath and prepared himself, tensing up, feeling the strength course through his body.

He hit the wall. It crumbled. The ceiling began to give way, and he ripped the car door clean off. He could feel the floor shaking as he wrapped his arms around the old woman and pulled her out. He leapt away as the roof caved in, wood and plaster clattering against the car’s hood.

They’d made it to the staircase. The car was going through the floor now, kicking up a storm of rubble. Colt hoisted the woman under one arm and caught a busted plank with the other, immediately crushing it in his hand. From everything else, he just shielded her with his body.”

”349

Colt waited for the house to settle, for the sound of breaking wood to cease. He cleared the dust away with his free hand and tried to assess the damage.

The bottom half of the stairs was gone. Oddly enough, the upside-down car had made a path through the rubble. He could hear the little girl yelling outside.

“Oh no!” she said. “Grandma!”

Colt took the grandmother in both arms again. With a few smooth hops, he made it out through the gaping hole in the front of the house.

The girl came running.

Colt rested the woman on the ground.

“I saw an ambulance down the street!” said the girl. “We gotta take her to it!”

“No,” said Colt. “We shouldn’t move her any more than necessary. Listen, I’ve gotta go help someone else now, so you have to run over there and tell the people in uniforms about your grandma.”

“Ah--okay!”

“Make sure they hear you. Bite their ankles, if you have to. Got that?”

“Got it!” She ran off toward the flashing lights.

‘I’m not so sure about that last piece of advice.’

“Eh, she’ll do fine.”

He returned to his car and checked on the twins. They both stared at him quietly from their rear-facing car seats when he poked his head through the back door. He squinted at them, uncertain. He was glad they didn’t seem terribly stressed by the situation, but at the same time, he was beginning to wonder why they looked so calm. They hadn’t made much of a fuss about getting into the car, either.

‘We don’t have time to linger,’ said Bohwanox.

Colt popped the trunk and grabbed the new rifle there. The man at the gun store hadn’t been so keen about letting him leave with it immediately, but Colt had been rather insistent. He needed something with more range and a scope.

Before he could even take a step, however, another cry for help caught his ear.”

”350

Colt paused, exchanging looks with Bohwanox, and for a moment they both merely listened to the plea.

“Anyone!” it said, faint and muffled, as if through a distant wall. “Help me!”

Colt growled and put his gun back in the trunk. “This better not take as long as the last one.”

--+-+--+--

The fight was not going very well. Out here on the open ground, away from the buildings and civilians, Karkash’s superior mobility was a much greater threat. Just providing cover from lightning strikes was enough to keep Hector completely occupied.

It soon became a game of feints. Karkash was clearly no fool and began to make the hand motions for his lightning, only to produce none, throwing Hector off and choosing instead to fling the metal into Stoker. Hector was constantly creating and destroying his iron while Stoker tried to close the distance and attack, but Karkash's unimpeded flight made that task nearly impossible. Twice already, Stoker's hydrogen had been detonated by a spark that Hector couldn't catch in time, leaving Stoker to regenerate huge chunks of his body.

Of course, Nize also required Hector's constant protection. She was unable to move, and Stoker couldn't carry her around with as much fire as he was drawing.

'We have to shift this momentum,' said Garovel.

Hector couldn't even spare the reaper a glance. 'Great! How?!'

'Circle around and use the fog.'

'What about the hydrogen guy?!'

'He's a servant. He can take a beating.'

Stoker kept his fog away from Hector and Garovel, no doubt to avoid hindering their view. Nize would be safe for the moment with two lightning rods protecting her, so Hector moved across the battlefield, putting the fog between himself and Karkash.

'Stop here,' said Garovel. 'Straight ahead of you, aim slightly upward. Wait for my word.'

Hector made a javelin, two-and-a-half meters of sharpened iron.

'Now.'

His form was far from perfect, but the throw had more than enough power to compensate."

"351

The spear pierced the fog and came out the other side. The magnetic field made it careen away from Karkash completely. The next javelin came closer, and the third, Karkash had to stop before it reached him.

Stoker chose that moment to leap out of the fog and attack, but Karkash merely launched the javelin at him. Stoker caught the spear with both hands just before it cut through his face. And the magnetic force was still there, carrying him all the way back down to the ground until a lightning bolt sent Stoker toppling through the dirt and grass.

Hector threw one more javelin according to Garovel's direction and then launched himself with a platform. But Karkash was prepared this time, and when Hector broke through the fog, he was greeted with a fist wreathed in electricity. Hector barely avoided taking the hit with his skull, and it instead pummeled into his chest. Several bones snapped at once, and Hector flew straight into the ground, leaving a crater.

He was exposed and didn't have time to worry about recovering, so he immediately constructed a dome over himself. Before it was even half-done, it absorbed the lightning strike that had surely been intended for his head.

Karkash lost interest in him, more concerned with going after Stoker.

'Make as much metal as you can,' said Garovel. 'And drop it on him.'

'I'm not sure how much I can make,' said Hector.

'Then it's a good time to find out.'

He hesitated no further. Hector's hands crashed together, demanding all the concentration he could muster. He constructed his largest object ever, placing it as high up as he could force it.

The sky above Karkash darkened.

Metal accumulated and grew quickly, shooting outward. Mass was all it was--all Hector could make it be. A rough orb at best, fifty meters deep of solid metal.

And Karkash caught it. Strained, weighing him down--but all the same, the man stopped its freefall in mid-air."

"352

The magnetic force that kept the orb aloft required two hands from Karkash. Hector and Stoker both saw the opportunity and jumped at him. Karkash was forced to bring one hand down to make lightning.

He correctly chose to zap Stoker down first, giving Hector the time to get close. And for an instant, they met one another's gaze.

The man's face was an angry wall--stern and attentive with gritted teeth.

Karkash reeled back, avoiding a cranial blow, and took Hector's punch square in the chest. He went flying backwards and bounced off the orb. Karkash spun toward the ground before stabilizing himself in the air, and when he saw the orb falling down again, instead of trying to stop it, he merely flew out of its path.

Hector was the only one in its way. It was so large that he couldn't annihilate it all instantly. Instead, the mass disintegrated in giant swathes, swirling around its body, taking a few seconds to finally destroy the last bit at the center.

After that, the three combatants were all on the ground together, and a silent intermission passed. Battle conditions were reset, each servant fully regenerated.

Karkash returned to the air, no doubt thinking he had the advantage at a distance, and Stoker took the opportunity to make his way toward Hector.

"Can you not trap his reaper with your metal?" Stoker asked.

"I'd have to get close to her," said Hector.

"That's not going to happen."

Lightning interrupted them, but Hector had a spire waiting to absorb it.

"Do it again," Stoker told him. "The giant sphere."

'You have a plan?' said Garovel.

Stoker gave a nod. "Force him into my fog, and I will take him down."

Karkash gave them no more time to discuss the matter, deciding to seize the two spires that had been protecting Nize. Stoker immediately bolted toward her. Hector first had to construct new spires to absorb the imminent lightning, which left Stoker alone to deal with the two flying at him. And to the man's credit, he did so admirably, somersaulting over the first one and melting the second with a glob of acid."

"353

Stoker reached Nize, as well as the momentary safety of Hector's spires. He spat at the ground, making a large ring with his acid, and then jammed his hands into the melted cracks. He yanked a mound of rock and dirt out, bigger than his own torso. He broke it into two pieces, then three, then four, and Hector kept him covered as he started firing them off.

Karkash avoided the rocks simply enough, but it bought Hector the time he needed.

The iron asteroid took form, quicker now, and Karkash was not pleased to see it again, forcing him to stop what he was doing.

Stoker moved below, creating a stream of fog as he ran, readying its white grasp for Karkash.

Hector tried to maintain the shape. He could see giant ripples washing through the metal--waves from Karkash's magnetism, attempting to tear it apart. It was a competition, Hector trying to fill in the cracks faster than Karkash could make them.

And Hector was winning. It was all Karkash could do to keep the mass afloat.

A rock flew up from the fog, and Karkash had to move. The mass shifted, pushing him down a dozen meters before he could stop it again. Then another rock. Even closer to the fog now, which was also rising up to meet him.

"No!" came Karkash's hoarse yell. It was the first time Hector had heard the man say a single word, and it cut across the entire battlefield--not with desperation, but with authority. With refusal.

And then, after a terrible moment, it happened.

Sparks flew out of Karkash's arms in huge clusters, climbing up the metal orb and spreading all the way across it.

'Oh no!' said Garovel.

And the asteroid moved up. Cracks formed all along its iron body, shifting the metal, breaking it. Lightning tore across the surface, rending the metal and then leaping off into the sky, making the very air shudder with each thunderous boom.

Hector stared, horrified. 'What the fuck is happening?!

'Emergence,' Garovel said gravely. 'Karkash's ability has grown stronger.'"

"354 -- XLI.

Chapter Forty-One: 'When the Thunder doth roll...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector watched his metal break apart. Truck-sized chunks of iron circulated around Karkash, all connected by a web of lightning, crackling with emergent energy.

They went spiraling toward Stoker's fog.

Hector rushed to annihilate everything, but he couldn't get to it all fast enough, and Stoker was forced out of his cloud by a tumbling iron boulder.

Stoker kept making more fog, but it was an obvious stream behind him now, no longer obscuring his position. Everyone knew what was coming next. Hector raised two spires in Stoker's defense, and when the lightning struck through the air, it was undoubtedly more powerful in every way--brighter, thicker, certainly louder. It crashed into the spires, making the dirt around them explode into dust, and the ensuing sonic boom nearly ruptured Hector's eardrums.

The force of the impact sent Stoker toppling head over foot through the dirt, away from the supposed safety of the spires. So Hector made more, and he made them larger, sturdier. They took a half-second longer, which was precious time in this fight, but they absorbed the electricity better.

Karkash shot up into the air and rained lightning down from above. The sparking branches were so numerous that they formed a kind of cage around the spires, and Karkash increased the voltage even further. Stoker was trapped, and the electricity closed in, lashing against his body, making him convulse and sending him to his knees as his flesh began to smolder and burn.

Hector made to increase the size of the spires even more, but Karkash apparently predicted as much and abruptly ceased his attack on Stoker in order to focus on Hector instead.

He barely made half a spire before the lightning smashed through it, making the ground explode directly in front of him. He went flying. His hearing was gone, ears bleeding from the deafening boom, and he hit the dirt again with a numb thud."

"354 -- XLI.

Chapter Forty-One: 'When the Thunder doth roll...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector watched his metal break apart. Truck-sized chunks of iron circulated around Karkash, all connected by a web of lightning, crackling with emergent energy.

They went spiraling toward Stoker's fog.

Hector rushed to annihilate everything, but he couldn't get to it all fast enough, and Stoker was forced out of his cloud by a tumbling iron boulder.

Stoker kept making more fog, but it was an obvious stream behind him now, no longer obscuring his position. Everyone knew what was coming next. Hector raised two spires in Stoker's defense, and when the lightning struck through the air, it was undoubtedly more powerful in every way--brighter, thicker, certainly louder. It crashed into the spires, making the dirt around them explode into dust, and the ensuing sonic boom nearly ruptured Hector's eardrums.

The force of the impact sent Stoker toppling head over foot through the dirt, away from the supposed safety of the spires. So Hector made more, and he made them larger, sturdier. They took a half-second longer, which was precious time in this fight, but they absorbed the electricity better.

Karkash shot up into the air and rained lightning down from above. The sparking branches were so numerous that they formed a kind of cage around the spires, and Karkash increased the voltage even further. Stoker was trapped, and the electricity closed in, lashing against his body, making him convulse and sending him to his knees as his flesh began to smolder and burn.

Hector made to increase the size of the spires even more, but Karkash apparently predicted as much and abruptly ceased his attack on Stoker in order to focus on Hector instead.

He barely made half a spire before the lightning smashed through it, making the ground explode directly in front of him. He went flying. His hearing was gone, ears bleeding from the deafening boom, and he hit the dirt again with a numb thud."

"355

Hector looked up immediately, expecting another attack from Karkash, one he wouldn't be able to mitigate at all, but that was not what he saw.

Instead, Karkash was going for Nize, yanking away the spires that protected her. And he saw Stoker, charred and battered, but standing in front of her, ready to take more lightning.

--++--++--

Stoker knew he was outmatched--if not from the start, then certainly now.

He had the idea in his head, a chance at how to improve his odds. And he knew his power was lacking. He had never accomplished this particular feat with his hydrogen before. He'd never had enough control.

It began with selfishness. The instinct to survive. A kind of personal and glorious greed. He knew it well, even before becoming a servant. And of course, he knew how easily that instinct could fail. Before meeting Nize for the first time, he remembered being so determined to go on living, to make it through that battle--only to be killed anyway. Terrible luck, it had been. An ill stroke of fate, as his supposed comrades might say.

So he knew this desperation, this helplessness. And likewise, he knew the desire to do more, to be more.

Emergence was no complicated thing in itself. It was at once acceptance and rejection: acceptance of one's helplessness, and rejection of the notion that this helplessness should warrant quitting. It was a perfect concoction in one's mind, to know an imminent demise and to still refuse to go quietly.

And that was what he had now. That was how he achieved counter-emergence.

Controlled combustion was the idea. Stoker set his back ablaze, hydrogen mixing violently with the oxygen in his cells, heated with precision. And his flesh exploded, just as desired--not enough to destroy anything unwanted, but just enough to propel him forward. It gave him speed, and he did it again, more this time, and he kept doing it, until he was hurtling over the ground so quickly that his legs couldn't keep up."

"356

He barreled toward Karkash at rocket-speed, giving up on running to simply flying across the ground. But it was not exactly a surprise attack. Karkash dodged smoothly and flew away. And Stoker followed.

He leapt up and made the soles of his feet explode. Bone and flesh blew apart, and the force carried him higher, as if he'd jumped a second time in mid-air. And he did it again, destroying the rest of his feet. And after climbing all the way up to Karkash, everything below Stoker's knees was gone.

He sacrificed a forearm next, converting it entirely to liquid hydrogen and reaching out. Karkash jolted left, losing an arm of his own to the freezing temperature, and swung an electric fist, detonating Stoker's hydrogen and sending them both reeling in opposite directions.

Stoker fell back toward the ground in a bloody heap. He needed time to regenerate, and Hector was busy trying to provide it. Karkash couldn't yet use the left side of his body, but even without it, he could still tear Hector's metal apart before it even finished forming.

Stoker could see Hector struggling to maintain the protection on Nize, but it wasn't long before Karkash regained enough use of his arm that Hector had to withstand two-handed lightning. Another dirt explosion, and Hector went flying. But most of Stoker's flesh had returned now. That would have to do.

With jets of hydrogen exploding out of his shoulder blades, Stoker accelerated back into the fight. Karkash soared up. Stoker kept pace with him, zigzagging as each explosion corrected Stoker's course. Karkash spun and knocked him back, and Stoker regained his momentum with an explosion from his elbow. And before he could start falling again, Stoker sacrificed the rest of his legs and launched himself the remaining distance. He caught both of Karkash's forearms and squeezed, snapping bones.

"Enough!" Karkash roared. Sparks gathered around his eyes, then flashed across his skin, and lightning shot out, everywhere at once.

Electricity cut through Stoker's body like a dozen blades, leaving holes in his chest and arms, even his face."

"357

He couldn't tell if Karkash had purposely avoided his brain or if it was purely coincidence, but with his body in tatters, Stoker plummeted back to the ground. He could see Hector struggling on his own now, but the kid could barely protect himself. The lightning ripped the metal apart on impact.

Stoker put a ruined arm forward, scratching at the dirt and trying to crawl toward Nize.

But it was too late.

The last of Hector's defense was stripped away from her, and Karkash thrust two fingers toward Nize.

Stoker watched the lightning tear into her.

She vaporized.

He just stared, wide-eyed. His hearing was already shot, eardrums in the midst of repairing themselves, so it was all a numb sight, making it somehow harder to believe.

He'd failed. She was dead. His body was still regenerating, but he could already feel the shift taking place in his mind. Stoker blinked, eyes blurring and then refocusing. And he saw Karkash and Hoyóhté there, both looking back at him.

He wondered if they would even bother to finish him off. It would make little difference, so he doubted it. For all this chaos, Stoker knew that Karkash took no pleasure in killing him. This had all been Karkash's duty, nothing more.

Sure enough, after a few moments of their silent deliberation, Karkash leapt into the sky with booming force, and they flew off together. They soon vanished beyond the horizon.

Stoker climbed onto his knees and elbows. The reverberations in his chest were growing stronger, stealing his breath away in increments, and his whole body flashed between sweltering warmth and shivering cold.

His muscles convulsed. Everything went dark. And he saw a life.

--++--++--

A boy. Growing up in Vaeland. A country of water. More sea than land. The city of his birth floats more than it stands. He learns to swim. He learns to fish.

It was once a prosperous nation, he hears, back when his parents were young."

"358

Life is hard here. But not for the boy. He is lucky to belong to one of the wealthiest fisher families in the city. And he knows his fortune. He sees his schoolmates. He sees their patched clothes, their skinny arms and legs. Childishly, he thinks fortune makes him better than them. It is difficult to make friends. He is not sure he even wants them.

The boy is eight years old when his parents remove him from school. He has a private tutor now. It is rather boring. He wants to go outside, but he is rarely allowed to. Only in the company of his parents.

The boy is ten years old when the riots start. He sees them through the window. People in masks, burning cars, looting buildings. More than once, they break into his house. They steal. They destroy. They terrify him. But they do not hurt him.

His parents consider leaving. This city is dangerous and frightening. But there is nowhere to go. And the military is here now. He likes the soldiers. They keep him safe. They make the scary people go away.

His parents say the riots will stop soon, that it will be safe to go outside again. And they are right. He gets to go play outside again. But the soldiers stay. He does not mind.

The boy is twelve when civil war breaks out. The soldiers force them to leave the city. They have nothing now. His parents do not know where to go. They spend a long time talking about it.

They find a refugee camp. Everyone here looks sad, save the very young children. But that is only because they do not understand anything. They annoy him.

The boy is thirteen when the camp is attacked. It is utter chaos. Gunfire. People running everywhere. Blood and dead bodies. He is told to flee, and he does.

He makes it to the forest. There are many children with him. He does not know where his parents are. There is only one adult here. And she is wounded."

"359

The children are all panicking. The boy is no exception. The only adult is too injured to move and bleeding profusely, but she tries to direct them. She tells them to find help but to also stay hidden. The boy is the oldest of the group. She appoints him to look after everyone. He is to lead a search. He is more terrified than he has ever been. She tells him to be strong for the others.

They set out. Hours pass without results. The others are complaining. They are tired and hungry. He leads them back. When they return, they find the woman dead. The children who remained with her are now missing. The others are losing it.

Four more children appear. They had been hiding. Soldiers came and took everyone else, they say. After killing the woman.

Including himself, there are eleven children. They look to him for guidance. He has no idea what to do. The fear does not go away. But neither does the hunger. He has everyone split up and look for food. When they reconvene, there are only ten. They look for the eleventh and find his body.

A week later, there are nine. A month later, there are eight. That one was not lost to the wilderness. That one was killed by a stranger. They had found the edge of the forest, found a ransacked town, thought the lone man there would help them. That was not the case.

They flee back into the forest.

Four years pass.

There are five of them now. Mira, Loren, Kaul, Trill, and the boy. Sickness took the others, but these five have survived. The boy has taught them to fish. Loren has taught them to hunt. Mira has taught them to climb. Together, they have learned to build shelters. Together, they have also learned to steal. And to kill.

There is a road along the western edge of the forest. Asking travelers for help has never gone well. They have learned not to trust outsiders. They are bandits now."
"360 -- XLII.

They acquire a few comforts of their previous lives. Food, clothing, books and baubles. And a few weapons. Knives, mainly, not much better than the wood and stone shanks Loren has already fashioned for them, but they are appreciated.

Another year passes. They occasionally loot newspapers. Vaeland has been at war all these years. No longer civil. Now the country is caught in a different fight. It is the battleground for Intar and Dozer. Warnings of immortal soldiers afoot. People of terrifying strength. The young forest bandits soon see for themselves.

The young man is eighteen when they try to rob the wrong vehicle.

It is only an old man, they think. All by himself. Easy.

Mira feigns injuries and waves him down. When he stops, the rest of them descend upon him. Loren goes in for the kill. He is stopped by a monstrous creature, appearing as if from nowhere. It is humanoid, perhaps, yet still a thing like nothing they have ever seen. Black scales cover its body instead of flesh.

They make to turn and flee, but four more people arrive, blocking their paths and pinning them down.

"It is okay," says the old man. "They are but children. Not the prey we were looking for."

And the monster speaks. "What shall we do with them?" Its voice is low and vibrating.

The old man looks over the young bandits. "You are homeless, no?"

No one dares answer.

"They can come with us," the old man says.

Loren is braver than anyone else when he asks, "Who are you?"

The old man eyes him. "My name is Dozer."

Chapter Forty-Two: 'Thy forgotten history...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Abolish encampment is full of frightening people. The monster's name, they soon learn, is Gohvis. And he is not a monster, but a man. All the same, even the scary people seem scared of him.

"There is no need to do this yourself," says Gohvis. "This is why we have initiators."

"Yes, but I want to," says Dozer. "I find these children amusing.""
"360 -- XLII.

They acquire a few comforts of their previous lives. Food, clothing, books and baubles. And a few weapons. Knives, mainly, not much better than the wood and stone shanks Loren has already fashioned for them, but they are appreciated.

Another year passes. They occasionally loot newspapers. Vaeland has been at war all these years. No longer civil. Now the country is caught in a different fight. It is the battleground for Intar and Dozer. Warnings of immortal soldiers afoot. People of terrifying strength. The young forest bandits soon see for themselves.

The young man is eighteen when they try to rob the wrong vehicle.

It is only an old man, they think. All by himself. Easy.

Mira feigns injuries and waves him down. When he stops, the rest of them descend upon him. Loren goes in for the kill. He is stopped by a monstrous creature, appearing as if from nowhere. It is humanoid, perhaps, yet still a thing like nothing they have ever seen. Black scales cover its body instead of flesh.

They make to turn and flee, but four more people arrive, blocking their paths and pinning them down.

"It is okay," says the old man. "They are but children. Not the prey we were looking for."

And the monster speaks. "What shall we do with them?" Its voice is low and vibrating.

The old man looks over the young bandits. "You are homeless, no?"

No one dares answer.

"They can come with us," the old man says.

Loren is braver than anyone else when he asks, "Who are you?"

The old man eyes him. "My name is Dozer."

Chapter Forty-Two: 'Thy forgotten history...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Abolish encampment is full of frightening people. The monster's name, they soon learn, is Gohvis. And he is not a monster, but a man. All the same, even the scary people seem scared of him.

"There is no need to do this yourself," says Gohvis. "This is why we have initiators."

"Yes, but I want to," says Dozer. "I find these children amusing."
"361

The encampment is filled with hulking machinery. He does not know their exact functions with their varied sizes and shapes, but the large wheels and long cannons are common enough fixtures that he can guess their general purpose.

The largest tent in the encampment belongs to Dozer. It is spacious and furnished like a rather plain bedroom, excepting the far corner, which is littered with metal and computer parts.

"Tell me why you are alive," says Dozer. The way he presents himself is suddenly very different. His attire is featureless and unassuming, but his expression is sharp and clear. He seems somehow larger than before, more imposing. The air in the room is heavier. Breathing is harder. It felt strange before, why a monster like Gohvis should be subservient to this person. It does not feel that way now.

Mira speaks for their group, though her voice shakes. "What do you mean?"

"Why do you want to live?" says Dozer.

Everyone hesitates.

"Answer me."

It is Loren who speaks this time. "Why do we need a reason?"

Dozer stares at him again. "Because only insects do not have a reason."

"Then maybe we are insects," says Loren.

The old man smiles faintly. "Insects do not have your willpower, boy." He steps closer.

Loren pulls back, but Gohvis is suddenly there behind him, holding him in place.

Dozer places a hand on Loren's shoulder. "You have a reason. A very simple one." He reaches back. "You want to live only because you fear death. There is no shame in this. In fact, you are very wise to think so.” His arm flashes and cuts into Loren’s chest. Blood splatters against the old man.

Loren crumples to the ground. Dead.

The four of them stare at the body. Then at one another. The young man sees horror on all of their faces, but after a moment, their expressions slowly change. Silent agreement runs between everyone. Collectively, they leap to attack the old man.

Dozer catches Mira by the throat. Gohvis pins the other three down instantly, a limb for each.

“Calm yourselves,” says Dozer. “Your friend will be reborn.””
”362

“There are only two spare reapers here,” says Gohvis.

Dozer is silent. He and Gohvis both look at nothing.

At length, Loren stands back up. They each stare at him, and he returns a similar expression of disbelief. They are not given long to understand what has happened.

“Now, your first test,” says Dozer. He allows Mira to return to the others and then motions to Loren’s four companions. “Kill one of them.”

Loren’s eyes widen, and he looks at the old man.

“They will not remain dead,” Dozer clarifies. “Just as you have been resurrected, so will they be. You have my word.”

That is not enough to convince Loren. He does not move.

“Test not my patience, boy. If you refuse, then I will choose for you. And I will not have them return. They will remain dead forever.”

Loren grows angry. “Why?! What is the point in making me do this?!”

“As I said, it is your first test.”

“How is this a test?!”

“A test of faith. Have faith in me--in my word--and all will be well. No harm will come to your friends.” Dozer folds his arms. “It is a very simple task, unless you make it otherwise.”

Loren looks between them all again. Pain crosses his face as he deliberates.

Dozer takes a step forward.

“Stop!” says Loren. He moves toward Mira. “I’ll do it!”

Dozer waits.

And the young man sees their exchange.

Loren apologizes to her. She tells him that it is okay, that he is right to choose her, that she does not mind. And Loren kills her. He is quick and precise. She falls into his arms.

The following silence is agony. He watches Loren’s frantic stare, locked on something invisible.

And Mira revives. Her return is met with relief and confusion.

Dozer divides their group now. The forest bandits are no more. Mira and Loren remain behind, and the other three leave on a boat to the northern town of Rohit.

The boat is a slaver ship, but they are not slaves."

"363

Kaul, Trill, and the young man are treated as guests, unlike the people kept in the underbelly of the ship.

In the next few days, he sees more of Vaeland than he has seen in all of his life. Long stretches of sea. Lush tropical islands. Open blue skies. And smoldering wreckage. Ruined towns. Bodies in the water.

Northern Vaeland is in chaos. Thrice, the ship is attacked, but there is an immortal warrior aboard who annihilates the enemy each time. She is the captain, and though she is ferocious to the slaves and even to her own crew, she takes a shine to the young bandits--to him in particular. He decides not to resist her advances, fearing the consequences. She marks his face with a tattoo much like the several she has herself. She tells him not to forget her. When they reach Rohit, he is not sad to see her go.

Rohit is a fortress town, half-destroyed and in the midst of rebuilding. Within hours of their arrival, it comes under attack. He witnesses much of the battle, but it makes little sense to his eyes.

Bombs fall from the sky, as do a few planes. Buildings catch fire, then immediately go out. Water rises up from the middle of the forest, only to evaporate before reaching the town's walls.

Then comes the explosion that kills him. He is caught in its blast radius but does not die right away. Scorched and in agony, he must spend his last hours trapped under debris.

Nize finds him. She wants him to join Abolish. He wants to live again.

He awakes and pulls himself from the rubble. He finds himself in a crater where twenty buildings used to be. Soon, he learns that Kaul and Trill have both perished. He expects them to revive, but they never do. It seems the reapers meant for them were killed. He buries them. It is more than most who have died today receive."

"364

Abolish is rather light on the training regimen and rather heavy on the propaganda. Only now does he realize just how important old man Dozer is. The name is never uttered without reverence, and yet, when he mentions having met Dozer personally, almost no one believes him.

Apparently, the country of the same name was founded by Dozer.

Three hundred years ago, that was.

The old man was its original dictator, and though the public believes he died more than two centuries ago, he has continued to rule in secret all this time. His great grandson serves as the country's public face.

From there, the legends surrounding the old man grow even more ridiculous. Tales of his invincibility, of his masterful strategies, of his cataclysmic clashes with someone named Sermung. It is all rather difficult to buy into, he feels, but this is not a common sentiment. Some of these people even seem to think the old man is not of this world, that he is a god of the Void made flesh.

And this "Void" is also puzzling. It is supposedly a realm of nothingness, yet everyone speaks of its "will" or of its "consciousness." He does not understand how nothingness could "be" anything, let alone sentient. But they take it very seriously. There are numerous ceremonies he has to endure in order to be accepted. He would sooner not bother, but Nize seems adamant about the whole endeavor, and he is not about to argue with her.

After nine months with Abolish, he meets Karkash. They work many missions together, but they do not speak much, which is fine by him. He does learn, however, that Karkash is four years his elder and a native of Vaeland's northern isles. And after seeing the scars on the other man's chest, he understands that Karkash has lived no easy life, either. In this way, at least, he comes to know a small sense of camaraderie...

--++--++--

Hector sat up and waved at the cloud of dust. His ears were still ringing and his eyes still burning from that last flash of lightning, but he could feel his senses repairing themselves.

'Karkash is gone,' said Garovel, appearing out of the ground next to him.

'What?'

"365

'He killed the other reaper,' said Garovel. 'You'd better get up, Hector. Karkash may be gone, but this fight isn't over yet.'

Hector stood. 'What do you mean?'

But Garovel didn't have to answer. Through the settling dust, Hector saw the other man appear. It was Stoker, and yet, perhaps not so.

Stoker was on his feet again and fully regenerated, but his shoulders were slumped forward, his arms hanging limp in front of him. His mouth was half-open, his eyes half-drawn, and his head twitched from moment to moment, looking one direction, then another, as if searching for something.

Hector edged in front of Garovel. 'What the fuck is wrong with him?'

'This is what happens when the reaper dies while the servant still lives. His body works just fine, but his consciousness is broken.'

'Agh...'

'Be extremely careful. It will die on its own within the next hour, but if we just let it go, then it will seek out people to kill.'

'But... why? If he's mindless, then why would he...?'

'It's only driven by a sense of self-preservation now. Its soul is destroyed, so it will try to take someone else's in order to repair it. Which won't work. But that won't stop it from trying.'

'Isn't there, uh... I mean, there's no way to help him?'

'No. Listen to me, Hector. It's not even "him" anymore. That thing is a monster now. And if you don't destroy its brain, it's going to go over to that town and slaughter dozens of people.'

Hector gave a painful frown as he watched the man. 'But he's just... standing there... I can't just kill him.'

'Then watch it closely, and you'll see.'

Stoker's breathing was increasingly erratic. His body flexed, small chunks converting into hydrogen gas and leaving bloody gashes behind, which soon regenerated. He looked toward the town, then toward Hector and Garovel.

'Oh right,' said Garovel. 'We're a lot closer to it than the town is, aren't we? It'll want to kill us first.'

Hector's brow lowered. 'Exactly how dangerous is this thing?'

"366

'I'm not sure how strong it is,' said Garovel. 'You should armor up while you can.'

'Right.' Hector held both fists in front of him and concentrated. He had yet to recreate his helm from scratch, but he was sure it was possible-- he'd designed the thing himself, after all. It was just a matter of imagining it precisely enough in his mind.

The metal accumulated around his head, fitting a bit more snugly than he anticipated. He forewent the movable jaw entirely, letting the metal cover his mouth and extend partway down his neck. The rest was roughly correct: smooth, dark metal with one large slit for both eyes, allowing himself a wide field of view. Next, he began crafting his gauntlets.

'Try to keep your distance, if you can,' said Garovel. 'It will be fast and unpredictable. Be wary of the hydrogen, especially. Consider every part of its body dangerous and go for the brain.'

As the gauntlets completed themselves, he went to work on an iron breastplate, but by now, he had piqued Stoker's curiosity. He saw the man moving closer, shambling toward him.

But only at first.

Stoker shot forward, accelerating with hydrogen jets. Hector made a wall. Stoker leapt cleanly over it, then rocketed back down to the ground.

He tried to coat it in metal, but the creature was much too fast. And just like that, there it was, right in Hector's face. It lunged for his neck, biting and drooling. Its teeth hit metal and chewed ineffectually.

He pulled back, and Stoker grabbed him by the gauntlet, trying to bite through that, too. He could feel its beastly strength, but as he looked at the man, Hector couldn't help frowning. "Please don't make me hurt you..."

'Stop hesitating.'

Stoker looked up at the reaper and made to swat at him, but Hector caught the man's wrist.

Garovel backed off and flew up to observe from above. 'This isn't a game, Hector. You have to kill it. Letting it live on like this is not a mercy.'

Stoker's hand converted to hydrogen and exploded, tearing through the gauntlet and taking most of Hector's arm with it."

Hector staggered back before regaining his footing and saw Stoker gunning for him again. He created another wall for the creature to leap over, but this time added a platform beneath himself and rose up to meet the man with his fist.

It saw him at the last moment, however, and jetted to the side. Hector's punch missed completely, and Stoker zigzagged through the air, coming back around toward him. But before it could even reach Hector again, a hydrogen jet from its shoulder misfired, exploding and sending the creature spiraling into the dirt.

Hector watched from atop his platform. 'What the hell?'

'Transfiguration is difficult to control,' said Garovel. 'It's running purely on reflexive memories now, so it won't be able to make adjustments like a conscious mind can.'

'Ugh... this is just... horrible...'

'I know.'

It was back on its feet. It looked up at Hector, the expression on its face still half-asleep.

'Don't underestimate its reflexes. They're much faster now that it doesn't have any normal thought processes slowing it down.'

Then came the fog. White clouds erupted from Stoker's back, expanding quickly across the battlefield.

'Uh-oh,' said Garovel.

'Keep your distance,' said Hector, deciding to finish his breastplate instead of remaking his gauntlet.

The reaper flew up even higher. 'I can't sense it at all. It shouldn't be able to sense you either, but just. Uh. Be careful, Hector.'

'You don't have to keep telling me...' Hector let the fog envelop him as well. He looked around, barely able to see arm's length in front of him, so he tried listening for the sound of footsteps, but the churning fog muffled everything.

‘Still don’t see it,’ said Garovel. ‘Can you flush it out?’

Hector clasped his hands together--one gauntleted, one bare--and created a metal slab above the fog. Two meters thick, fifteen meters both wide and long. It fell, pressing into the fog like bread on a sandwich, and Hector made just enough of a gap for himself--a cylindrical hole where he could stand safely. The metal slammed down and made the ground shake."

"368

Hector filled in his cylinder with a platform and was soon atop the slab. Fog roiled violently around the edges of the metal, but for the moment, he had a perfectly clear view of the sky and Garovel.

‘It fled on your right,’ said the reaper. ‘Oh joy. It’s coming after me now.’

From outside the fog, Stoker came rocketing up toward Garovel. The reaper started back down toward Hector, and when Stoker’s swiping hands caught up with him, Garovel smoothly dodged a string of attacks. Then the creature had to back off when a javelin sailed between them.

Hector pressed his hands to the slab, and a curving wall leapt out of it. Garovel phased through the metal half-dome, and Hector expected Stoker to come flying over the top. He was proved correct and threw another javelin as soon as he saw the man. But even still, Stoker jetted out of its path, zigzagging to safety.

Hector growled. ‘How do I hit this damn thing?!’

‘You need to trap it,’ said Garovel. ‘If it can avoid your attack, then it almost certainly will. So come up with something unavoidable.’

He only had a moment to consider his options before Stoker barreled into him, carrying him away from the slab and fog both. Stoker bit into his arm, and Hector just ignored it, instead taking the opportunity to encase the man in metal.

They hit the dirt together, and Hector rolled away from the iron statue. And for a moment, when he saw Stoker again, he thought that might have been enough. But the coating didn’t last. Stoker broke out with brute force. Chunks of busted metal scattered around the creature as it returned to its feet.

Once again, Hector met its hollow gaze.

Then, without warning, there came a distant crack, and the creature's body jerked backward as something tiny whizzed past its head.

Hector blinked. 'What was that?'

'A gunshot?' said Garovel. 'I think it came from the town.'

'That was--? But it--wait. So this thing just dodged a fucking bullet?!'

Another gunshot, again avoided. Stoker looked in the direction of the town and then promptly sped off toward it.

'What the--?' And Hector realized. 'Colt!' He bolted after Stoker."
"369 -- XLIII.

Chapter Forty-Three: 'O, creator and destroyer...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Through the scope of his rifle, Colt saw the creature turn to look directly at him, as if the distance made no difference. He didn't hesitate to continue firing, but Stoker was moving far too quickly to track with the zoom on the lens, so Colt stood up from his rooftop perch and prepared for its arrival.

It didn't take long.

Colt unloaded his handgun, and even at close range, Stoker dodged every last bullet and tackled Colt through a brick chimney. They rolled off the roof together, Stoker biting bloodily into Colt's arm. The pain was non-existent of course, so he tried to bash the thing's skull in with the butt of his gun, but that too proved fruitless. Stoker's head bobbed out of the way of each strike, returning only to rip another chunk of flesh out of Colt's neck or shoulder or chin. And Colt soon grew irritated enough to change tactics.

He resorted to a grapple hold, repositioning himself to its side and wrapping his half-eaten arm around its neck. The enhanced strength coursed through his body, and Colt yanked. But Stoker's neck resisted and, in fact, turned the other direction to look at Colt. It gnashed at him, perhaps trying to bite his nose off. Colt buried a thumb into Stoker's eye socket, jamming and twisting enough to make blood spurt out.

Liquid hydrogen replaced the creature's face, and Colt's hand froze instantly. Stoker bit into the icy flesh and shattered it, and Colt could see Stoker's skull through missing flesh and eyes. No doubt, it had blinded itself, but its hand still found Colt's cranium. He could feel the force of its grip beginning to crack his own skull.

Metal gathered over Stoker's face and body, courtesy of a still-distant Hector. Stoker thrashed free of the iron, but it had been slowed enough for Colt to land a quick punch, throwing the beast off of him."
"369 -- XLIII.

Chapter Forty-Three: 'O, creator and destroyer...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Through the scope of his rifle, Colt saw the creature turn to look directly at him, as if the distance made no difference. He didn't hesitate to continue firing, but Stoker was moving far too quickly to track with the zoom on the lens, so Colt stood up from his rooftop perch and prepared for its arrival.

It didn't take long.

Colt unloaded his handgun, and even at close range, Stoker dodged every last bullet and tackled Colt through a brick chimney. They rolled off the roof together, Stoker biting bloodily into Colt's arm. The pain was non-existent of course, so he tried to bash the thing's skull in with the butt of his gun, but that too proved fruitless. Stoker's head bobbed out of the way of each strike, returning only to rip another chunk of flesh out of Colt's neck or shoulder or chin. And Colt soon grew irritated enough to change tactics.

He resorted to a grapple hold, repositioning himself to its side and wrapping his half-eaten arm around its neck. The enhanced strength coursed through his body, and Colt yanked. But Stoker's neck resisted and, in fact, turned the other direction to look at Colt. It gnashed at him, perhaps trying to bite his nose off. Colt buried a thumb into Stoker's eye socket, jamming and twisting enough to make blood spurt out.

Liquid hydrogen replaced the creature's face, and Colt's hand froze instantly. Stoker bit into the icy flesh and shattered it, and Colt could see Stoker's skull through missing flesh and eyes. No doubt, it had blinded itself, but its hand still found Colt's cranium. He could feel the force of its grip beginning to crack his own skull.

Metal gathered over Stoker's face and body, courtesy of a still-distant Hector. Stoker thrashed free of the iron, but it had been slowed enough for Colt to land a quick punch, throwing the beast off of him."
"370

Colt wanted to ask who this guy was, or perhaps what, but it didn't seem like the best time. Stoker's eyes were quick to regenerate, and they fell upon Bohwanox next. The creature's body was still in tatters, but that didn't stop it from pressing after the reaper. Bohwanox flew back as Colt and Hector both intercepted.

Hector swung an iron fist, which was of course avoided, and Colt just tried to grab hold of the monster, but Stoker simply rocketed away from his grip at the last moment.

"Slow him down for me," said Colt, "and I'll kill him."

Hector nodded. A flurry of metal gathered around Stoker's regenerating skin. Iron dust left a trailing path as it zagged across the open road, slowing him hardly at all, but then the metal walls started shooting up all around it. The sudden obstacle course forced Stoker to adjust and gave the metal coating precious time to accumulate. The coating broke almost as soon as it formed, but Hector just kept at it, and Colt was able to close the distance.

He just needed one punch. One good, concentrated punch. To land it, though, Colt knew he would have to suppress the opponent's movement, so he tackled Stoker to the ground first. Stoker thrashed, nearly throwing him off, but Hector's metal clapped around the thing's head and arms. And that was the moment he needed.

Colt focused the ability into his hand, the spatial destruction power adding to his already enhanced muscle strength. And when his fist hit the metal around Stoker's head, it went right through the iron and obliterated everything. Blood, bone, and brain matter all splattered across the road.

His eyes widened, and he blinked at his red-soaked knuckles. He hadn't expected it to be quite so effective as that.

He could see a deep impression in the bloody asphalt and, after a moment, realized that it had a particular shape to it. A clear rhombus, it was. And a very strange sight, he felt, but he supposed now he knew what the shape of his path was."

"371

Hector joined Colt by his side, and they both lingered on the sight of Stoker's headless body.

"He's really dead, right?" asked Colt as the reapers floated over to them. "I never can tell anymore."

'Yeah,' said Garovel. 'You can tell because the body has stopped regenerating.'

Colt stood up from his messy work, wiping the blood on his pants. "Who was this guy, even?" He started for the nearby alley where he'd parked the car.

Hector followed, annihilating his helmet and frowning at Garovel. "Ah... we never learned his name..."

'We only know he was fighting with Karkash.'

"He did say he was Vanguard," Hector added.

'He was probably lying,' said Garovel.

Hector raised an eyebrow. "What makes you think that?"

'When Abolish and the Vanguard clash, it's a big deal. One-on-one fights are extremely rare. I'm guessing he told us that because he figured we'd be more likely to help him.'

Colt checked on the twins in the backseat of the car. Stephanie was standing at the window with her little hands pressed to the glass, and he opened the door to meet her. Thomas was sat contentedly on the other side, and they both looked at Colt, just as calm as earlier. He patted their heads and bellies, tickling them while he double-checked for anything to be worried about. They giggled at him, babbling a few half-words but nothing more.

Hector and Garovel were still occupied with their conversation. "I wish we could have helped him... Because that was just... agh..."

'Yeah. Assuming he was being hunted down because he and his reaper were traitors to Abolish, then I'm sure he would've been able to provide us with valuable information.'

"I don't understand why, um... well, I mean... if they really were Abolish, then I get why Karkash was after them, but... I don't get why Karkash just kinda... left. Why didn't he come after us, too?"

"372

'That's what makes me think they were traitors,' said Garovel. 'That fight wasn't about trying to eliminate all opposition. If it was, then Karkash definitely would have stayed to continue fighting us. But he didn't. And given his advantageous position at the time, the only way that decision makes sense is if he had already achieved his goal. Or, I suppose, if he received new orders that instructed him to leave, but I didn't see any evidence of that.'

"But still... I mean... not that I'm complaining, but... it was kinda sloppy to leave without killing us, too, wasn't it? Somehow, I doubt he was just being merciful..."

'Actually, leaving was tactically the wisest decision.'

"H-how do you mean?" said Hector.

'There was no guarantee that he would've been able to win against you. Continuing the fight meant running the risk of allowing you to achieve emergence as well--or otherwise turning the tide of battle back in your favor. So unless the objective was specifically to kill us, then fighting you was an unnecessary risk. Karkash understood that. Or his reaper did.'

“Hmm...”

‘Clearly, they don’t have the same bloodlust as some of our previous enemies. Which might sound like a good thing, but in a way, it’s worse, because it means they’ll make more intelligent decisions. They’re less likely to go on random killing sprees, but at the same time, they’ll be smarter when it comes to real strategy. Against us, that is.’

“Ugh... but I guess that’s... kinda good. I’d prefer that to the other way around, at least.”

Colt sensed the opportunity to interject. “We should probably leave now.”

Hector looked at him. “Oh! What about the civilians? Is there anyone who still needs help?”

‘They’re receiving it,’ said Bohwanox. ‘We saw an entourage of emergency vehicles arriving from the north of town. Sescoria sent lots of people.’

Garovel flew up a few meters to look over the town. ‘Ah. I see flashing lights all over the place.’”

"373

“That’s good, but, uh... er, we might still be able to help a little, right?”

Garovel floated back down. ‘I know your heart’s in the right place, but we’re a little too famous right now. With all the police around, we’d probably just create chaos if we tried to get involved any further.’

“Agreed,” said Colt. He opened the driver’s side door and stuck one foot inside. “C’m on, Hector. We’ve done all we can.”

Hector glanced over everyone, then gave a nod and took a seat in the back with the twins. The car’s seatbelts didn’t fit the kids properly, so Hector had gotten into the habit of keeping his arms around them. They didn’t seem to mind terribly, though Stephanie occasionally tried to pick his nose for him.

It wouldn’t be a very long trip back to the motel in Maxwell, but Colt saw Hector pull out his phone. It only had to ring once, and Hector put it on speaker for everyone.

<“So you’re on the news again,”> said Gina. <“They’re already blaming the Darksteel Soldier for what happened.”>

Hector took a heavy breath. “Seriously? How did they even... I mean, so soon?”

<“Eye witnesses, so far. I saw one guy defending you, but the reporter just kinda dismissed him. They’re also saying they’ve got footage of you from someone’s camera phone, but they haven’t shown it yet.”>

“No mention of Karkash?” Hector asked.

<“Oh, they’re talking about him, too. I’m assuming he’s the ‘flying lightning man’ they’re referring to, yeah?”>

“Yeah.”

<“He’s gotten some attention, but they don’t know who he is, so they’re focusing on you. In fact, they’re speculating right now that he was trying to stop you from hurting people.”>

Hector shut his eyes and rubbed his forehead. “You gotta be kidding me...”

Colt just kind of snickered, and when he saw Hector giving him a look in the rearview mirror, he returned a blithe shrug.

‘That might be to our advantage, actually,’ said Garovel.

Gina interrupted before anyone could ask what he meant. <“So what really happened?”>

"374

“Uh, well... a lot happened, so, uh... I’m not sure what you wanna know...”

<“You got into a fight, didn’t you? Is everyone okay? What was the fight even about?”>

And suddenly, Colt found himself listening to Hector stumble his way through an explanation of events. To say that it took longer than necessary would be an understatement, but after several agonizing minutes, Gina was up to speed. More or less.

<“Okay. So. The guy who was fighting Karkash is dead, and you don’t know who he was?”>

“Y-yeah. But we think that, um... that he, uh... was, ah... er, well, uh--”

“Hector, I swear by the goddess’s tits, if you don’t finish that sentence in the next five seconds, I’m gonna drive this car into a fucking tree.”

Shockingly, that didn’t seem to do much for Hector’s composure. He merely flushed red and fell painfully silent.

Colt instantly felt like a piece of shit. That was decidedly not the reaction from Hector he had been going for.

Garovel floated in front of the windshield and glared at him. The reaper’s face wasn’t visible, but somehow, that didn’t seem to matter.

‘Great,’ said Bohwanox privately. ‘Amazingly helpful, Colt. Not like the kid’s been through anything traumatic lately. Not like he’s helped us out at all or could use any kind of encouragement from perhaps his only living friend in the entire world right now. I’m sure there’s nothing you could--’

‘I get it! Fuck!’ He looked at Hector in the mirror, who was nowhere close to making eye contact again. “Look, um. I didn’t mean to, um. Uh. I’m--mm. S-sorry, I wasn’t...”

‘You’re killing me with this irony right now,’ said Bohwanox.

‘Aw, fuck! I’m an asshole!’

‘At least you acknowledge it.’

<“Hello?”> said Gina. <“Uh. You still there?”>

Colt decided to just fill in for Hector. “Yeah, we’re here. The guy from earlier, we suspect he was a member of Abolish. A traitor.”

"375

<“Ah, well, if he was a traitor, then I’ll probably be hearing more about it. I know Desmond wasn’t happy to see Karkash on the news.”>

“Let us know if you find anything out,” said Colt.

<“Of course. But what are you guys going to do in the meantime?”>

Colt eyed the reapers briefly. “We’ll probably just lay low for a while.”

<“Hmm. You sure I can’t help with that? I know what you said before, but I don’t mind making a few calls.”>

“No offense, but I’d rather not trust some random friend of yours unless I have to.”

<“Fair enough.”> There was a pause, and then she said, <“Well, if that’s all, then I’ll leave you to it.”>

‘Ask her about a new motorcycle,’ said Garovel.

“Can you help us find some new transportation? Hector could do with a new bike, and a car with fresh license plates wouldn’t hurt, either.”

<“Aha. That, I can do. Master Roman has a few different garages you can use.”>

Colt raised an eyebrow. “Just how rich is this Roman guy, anyway?”

<“I’m not sure he would want me to answer that.”>

“Right. Where’s the closest one, then?”

<“Let’s see, um. You’re somewhere around Maxwell, right?”>

“Yeah.”

<“Then go to Walton. There are three there, but you probably want the one that’s just east of the city limits. Let me know when you get close and I’ll give you the exact coordinates.”>

“Will do. Thanks.”

<“Sure. Anything else you need?”>

Colt stared at the winding road ahead as he thought, watching the frequent curves among the grassy foothills. “There’s one other thing,” he said, “but it might be difficult to find.”

<“What is it?”>

"I'd like to consult a doctor. And obviously, I can't go to a hospital."

<"I can find you a very discreet doctor easily enough, but why would you need to see one? You don't get hurt, right?">

"Not that kind of doctor," said Colt. "I wanna see one who specializes in child care."

There came another pause, longer this time. <"...You have a child with you?">"

"376

"I have two," said Colt. "Twins. Little over a year old."

<"You didn't... kidnap them, did you?">

"What? No! They're my children!"

<"That was going to be my second guess.">

Colt shook his head. "Kidnap... what kind of people do you think we are?"

<"Well, y'know. Kidnap, rescue--who can tell the differences these days?">

"I'm pretty sure I can."

<"Anyways, why do you want a doctor? Is something wrong with them?">

"I'm not sure. And that's the problem."

<"I see. Hmm. Admittedly, I don't have a child doctor on standby. Not exactly the kind of personnel I was expecting to need. And I can't imagine that black market pediatrics is a booming industry, either. I'll look into it for you, though. Give me a couple days.">

"Alright. Thanks."

The conversation soon ended, and Colt hung up the phone. He abruptly realized that Hector hadn't even said goodbye to Gina, and when he looked in the mirror again, he saw Hector sleeping while the twins prodded his face.

Colt was starting to feel his own enhancements wearing off as well, muscles growing stiff with sharp and aching pains alike. He could only imagine how bad it was for Hector. The kid had already been exhausted even before fighting Karkash.

Bohwanox hovered outside the driver's side window, keeping pace with the car as it sped across the highway. 'What makes you think something might be wrong with the twins?'

"I don't know. They're just very... calm, I guess."

'Hmm.'

"Maybe it's nothing. Maybe they're just little weirdoes and it's perfectly normal. I just want to consult someone who knows about this sort of thing." He glanced between the two reapers. "Do either of you know anything about child development?"

'Not really,' said Garovel.

'Sorry,' said Bohwanox.

"Figures."

After a few more minutes, they arrived back at the motel. Garovel offered to wake Hector up, but Colt just made a second trip and carried him into the room, too."

"377

By now, Colt was dead tired as well, but he couldn't allow himself to pass out just yet. He changed the twins' diapers, then laid a plastic sheet down before feeding them. As expected, they made a mess of their simple juice and hash meal. He cleaned up after them and left the television on for the reapers while he finally drifted off to sleep.

Bohwanox woke him up in the middle of the night.

"Ugh--what is it?" Colt rubbed his face and sat up. "Are we about to be attacked or something?"

'Nah, we just wanted you to change the channel,' said Garovel.

His face flattened. "What."

'We're really sick of watching the news,' said Bohwanox.

"Don't--you--" It took him a moment of deliberation, but Colt decided against killing them. "What the hell did you do before television was invented?"

'Follow people around,' said Garovel. 'Or read. If you've got any interesting books on you, then feel free to stay up all night and turn the pages for us.'

"Pass. Why don't you do some scouting? Make sure we're safe here?"

'We did,' said Bohwanox. 'Five times. There's nothing around here. This town is way too peaceful.'

"Share your life stories with each other, then."

'Shut up and change the channel,' said Bohwanox.

"I'm tempted to refuse on principle alone."

Bohwanox bobbed his head at him. 'Okay. Then no sleep for you.'

'You can stay up and entertain us.'

Colt grabbed the remote control and flipped through channels until the reapers stopped complaining. It took a while. There wasn't much on at two in the morning. They settled on a program about the kilometers of underground caves near Gray Rock.

He checked on the kids again, but they were asleep as well, so he drifted off again.

In the morning, Colt was the first to wake. Still feeling yesterday's soreness, he fetched some breakfast for everyone from the nearby gas station."

"378

Garovel had to wake Hector up in order to eat and get changed. Colt watched the young black man shuffle stiltedly into the bathroom as if his limbs were made of wood.

Soon, they were in the car again. Hector went right back to sleep, and Colt stared at an open road as they headed for Walton. At length, Bohwanox had a few private words for him.

‘When I asked you before about how you intend to raise Stephanie and Thomas, you said you’d figure something out.’

‘I remember.’

‘We both know that’s not much of an answer. We have time, so I didn’t press you on it. But if this child doctor doesn’t have good news, then we might have to answer that question a lot sooner than we expected. You understand?’

Colt glanced at Hector and the twins in the mirror. ‘...Yeah. I understand.’

--++--++--

It was a snug fit, to be sure. There was barely room to move around, but Gina had everything she needed in this modest basement. She had a checker-print bed, a bathroom with a shower, a mini-fridge, an air conditioner, a heater, and even a kitchenette. Computer equipment took up most of the available floor space, and everywhere else lay scores of boxes, all filled with food that would last a very long time, if she needed it to. Hopefully, she wouldn’t need it to.

She figured that most people would hate having to live in a place like this for very long, but for her, it mostly just brought back memories. Nowadays, she preferred more fresh air and physical activity in her life, but she didn’t mind falling back into old habits. As long as she had internet access, she could survive just fine down here.

She gnawed on a stick of beef jerky with her hair in a half-combed tangle when, abruptly, her phone rang. She checked the number, but it wasn’t one she’d seen before. She answered it. “Hello?”

<“Hey, Gina,”> came Roman’s voice."

"379 -- XLIV.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Gina sat up in her chair. "Master Roman! Where are you? You haven't contacted me for weeks."

<"Yeah, my phone kind of blew up. It's no big deal. I've got a new one now.">

"How did your phone get destroyed?"

<"Oh, um. I dropped it.">

Gina squinted. "You dropped your phone, and it exploded."

<"Yeah. That's a thing that can happen. I don't see what's weird about it.">

"Master Roman, why are you lying to me? And moreover, why are you sucking at it?"

<"I have other things on my mind right now, okay? Dammit, Voreese! Shut up! I'm trying to talk to Gina! Agh--she can't hear you! You know she can't hear you, so you're just being annoying for no fucking reason! Stop already or--"> There was a pause, then a sigh of exasperation. <"Voreese says hi.">

"Hi, Voreese."

<"Gina says hi. Yeah. Great. Now shut up. Yes, I know you can't let go of me right now! Just be quiet!"> Another pause, and Roman cleared his throat. <"Sorry about that. It's been a stressful week.">

"Did something happen?"

<"We met up with some more Vanguard forces, but they weren't very forthcoming. They were giving us the run around and just generally being unhelpful pricks.">

"And?"

<"And Lynnette stole something from them, and they got all pissed. Then I stole a bigger something. An airplane-shaped something.">

"You stole a plane from the Vanguard?!"

<"Yeah!"> laughed Roman. <"Stole the pilot, too. Pretty nice guy. Bit jumpy, but nice.">

“Wait.” Gina’s brow lowered. “What happened to your private jet?”

<“Oh, um. Yeah, don’t worry about the private jet. It’s fine.”>

“It’s not fine at all, is it?”

<“It’s at the bottom of a swamp.”>

“How did that happen?!”

<“That’s not important.”>

“I think it is!”

<“Everything is under control. I only called to let you know that we haven’t died horribly yet.”>

“Fantastic. In that case, I have news for you, too. You remember Hector, yes?”

<“Yeah?”>

"379 -- XLIV.

Chapter Forty-Four: ‘Hark! Thy distant troubles...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Gina sat up in her chair. “Master Roman! Where are you? You haven’t contacted me for weeks.”

<“Yeah, my phone kind of blew up. It’s no big deal. I’ve got a new one now.”>

“How did your phone get destroyed?”

<“Oh, um. I dropped it.”>

Gina squinted. “You dropped your phone, and it exploded.”

<“Yeah. That’s a thing that can happen. I don’t see what’s weird about it.”>

“Master Roman, why are you lying to me? And moreover, why are you sucking at it?"

<"I have other things on my mind right now, okay? Dammit, Voreese! Shut up! I'm trying to talk to Gina! Agh--she can't hear you! You know she can't hear you, so you're just being annoying for no fucking reason! Stop already or--"> There was a pause, then a sigh of exasperation. <"Voreese says hi.">

"Hi, Voreese."

<"Gina says hi. Yeah. Great. Now shut up. Yes, I know you can't let go of me right now! Just be quiet!"> Another pause, and Roman cleared his throat. <"Sorry about that. It's been a stressful week.">

"Did something happen?"

<"We met up with some more Vanguard forces, but they weren't very forthcoming. They were giving us the run around and just generally being unhelpful pricks.">

"And?"

<"And Lynnette stole something from them, and they got all pissed. Then I stole a bigger something. An airplane-shaped something.">

"You stole a plane from the Vanguard?!"

<"Yeah!"> laughed Roman. <"Stole the pilot, too. Pretty nice guy. Bit jumpy, but nice.">

"Wait." Gina's brow lowered. "What happened to your private jet?"

<"Oh, um. Yeah, don't worry about the private jet. It's fine.">

"It's not fine at all, is it?"

<"It's at the bottom of a swamp.">

"How did that happen?!"

<"That's not important.">

"I think it is!"

<"Everything is under control. I only called to let you know that we haven't died horribly yet.">

“Fantastic. In that case, I have news for you, too. You remember Hector, yes?”

<“Yeah?”>
"380

“Everyone in Atreya thinks he’s a mass murderer,” said Gina. “He’s gotten pretty infamous. And Abolish may or may not be trying to kill him now.”

Again, there came a pause. <“Huh,”> was all Roman said.

“He got into a fight with them just yesterday.”

<“Is he okay?”>

“I think so. He’s not alone, anyway. There’s another servant with him.”

<“Oh? Who?”>

“A man named Colt. He has two young children with him.”

<“Hmm. Does he seem trustworthy?”>

“Hard to say. Hector seems to trust him, though. I’ve been trying to help them as best I can.”

<“Good. Don’t let them do anything crazy. They could be valuable allies.”>

“Also, more importantly, I’ve learned that Abolish intends to destroy a small town called Harold and blame the attack on Rendon.”

<“Mm. That’s about what Mehlsanz predicted.”>

“They’re going to do it thirteen days from now. I thought the events from yesterday might’ve changed their minds, but that doesn’t seem to be the case. Desmond’s been yelling at Karkash but not to much effect.”

<“Who are Desmond and Karkash?”>

“Two of the Abolish guys. I believe there are now seven Abolish servants in Sescoria.”

<“Ugh. Seven. That will be problematic.”>

“Where are you heading next? Do you have a plan?”

<“We’re flying to Intar right now. We’re hoping to find a more reasonable faction of the Vanguard there.”>

“One which won’t mind that you stole a plane from their allies?”

<“We might have to leave that part out of the discussion.”>

“Then you’ll have to ditch the plane or hide it somehow.”

<“Yeah, I know.”>

“How is the Queen doing?”

<“Good, as far as I can tell. She was the first one to see through the Vanguard’s bullshit. Would’ve been nice if she warned me a little earlier about her plan to have Lynnette rip them off, but I suppose it would’ve turned into a clusterfuck either way.”>

“They attacked you?”

<“No.”>

“Master Roman…”

<“Okay, maybe a little.”>

"381

Gina’s brow furrowed. “Sir, how much danger are you in?”

<“Oh, not much. Don’t worry.”>

“Stop telling me not to worry. I know you’re lying. Just tell me the truth.”

<“Sorry, I can’t hear you very well. I’m going into a tunnel.”>

“Your plane is going into a tunnel?”

<“It’s a very tunnel-like cloud. You’re--kerrghh--breaking up--kerrghh. Sorry--kerrghh.”>

“You’re pathetic, Master Roman.”

<“Kerrghh--talk to you later--kerrghh.”> He hung up.

She shook her head and set her phone down. After a few moments, however, it started ringing again, and she picked it back up.

<“How did you find out so much about Abolish’s plan?”>

It was her turn to hesitate. “I inferred it from watching the news.”

<“Bullshit! You named names and gave me a timeline!”>

“The reporters were very thorough.”

<“Fuck! You went to Sescoria to spy on them, didn’t you?! Don’t you know how dangerous that is?!”>

“Don’t worry, sir. Hector is here with me.”

<“Oh yeah? Let me talk to him, then.”>

“He’s busy with something. I don’t want to bother him.”

<“Gina, you--!”>

“Oh, look at that. I seem to be going into a tunnel now, too. Bye.” She hung up.

Roman called back immediately, and Gina just let it ring. Then it fell quiet for a minute, and just when she was getting back into her work, it started beeping. She checked the text messages.

i forgot to tell u sumthing important

She called him back. “Now what?”

<“It’s about Lynnette. She’s probably headed back to Atreya.”>

“Huh? By herself?”

<“She got separated from us. We don’t know where she is, and she doesn’t know where we’re going, so the Queen figures that Lynnette will go back to Atreya. Which sounds about right.”>

“You want me to track her down?”

<“No need. I gave her your contact details a while back as a precaution. I’m betting you’ll get a call from her as soon she gets hold of a phone. Help her out if you can.”>

“Yes, sir.”

"382

<“And look, I understand why you went to Sescoria. And I’m grateful for your information. But you’ve accomplished your goal now, so go back to Walton.”>

“I’m sorry, sir. I can’t do that.”

<“Gina, that’s an order. Go back to Walton.”>

“What, are you going to fire me?”

<“Gina.”>

“Master Roman, the information I’ve gathered isn’t enough. We need the names and powers of all the enemy servants, along with any kind of actionable details about their plans. Just knowing that they intend to destroy Harold doesn’t help us. As things stand, we can’t beat them in a straight fight, especially without knowing what they’re capable of.”

There was a long pause. <“You’re not wrong,”> he admitted. <“And we probably won’t find reinforcements in time to save that town, either.”>

“By the way, I recorded yesterday’s news footage of Karkash. It’s not much, but it might help you convince the Vanguard of Abolish’s presence in Atreya.”

<“You only now remembered?”>

“I would have sent it to you later.”

<“You’ll have to hold off. This phone can’t play video, much less receive it from another country.”>

“Let me know when you get your hands on a better device, then.”

<“Right.”> Roman gave a sigh. <“You’re really not going to leave Sescoria, are you?">

"No, sir."

<"Bah. You're at least being careful, aren't you?">

"Actually, sir, I intend to let them kill me for no reason."

<"That's not funny.">

-+--+--+-

'Wake up,' said Garovel.

Hector's eyes popped open, and he looked around. The twins were with him in the backseat, and when he locked eyes with Stephanie, he saw her face scrunch up and knew she would start crying if he lingered. He decided to exit the vehicle.

He met a harsh sun and a barren landscape. Not a single tree could be seen in any direction, though the waves of heat over the horizon made him wonder if his eyes could be trusted.

"Over here," said Colt."

"383

Hector turned to see Colt reach into the dirt and pull. A huge door rose out of the ground. Dust kicked up all around the man as he revealed a manmade hole in the ground. They both looked down at the ramp leading into the darkness.

Still groggy and aching all over his body, Hector scratched under his eye. "W-where are we, exactly?"

Colt thumbed behind himself. "East of Walton."

Hector squinted, only then noticing the buildings in the distance. They fluctuated on the horizon, seeming almost a mirage against the heat.

Colt fetched the children from the car, along with a flashlight, the latter of which he handed off to Hector. And all together, they ventured underground, Hector leading the way while the reapers brought up the rear.

The ramp curved gradually right as they descended, and soon, they discovered an even floor. Hector found a switch on the wall and flipped it. Incrementally, flood lights in the ceiling illuminated a much larger chamber than Hector had expected.

There had to be upwards of fifty vehicles in this place.

"Damn," said Colt. "Some friend you got here."

The reapers began browsing.

Hector looked at Colt again. "So I guess... you talked to Gina while I was asleep?"

"Not for very long. Only to get the coordinates to this place. She did say to call her back when you were awake, though."

He raised an eyebrow. "Why didn't you just wake me up, then?"

"She said it wasn't urgent."

Bohwanox floated up behind Colt. 'He's lying. He told Gina all about how you needed your rest.'

Colt's glare only seemed to make the reaper happier.

'It was very touching,' said Bohwanox. 'He cried.'

The man rolled his eyes and walked away.

Bohwanox lingered with Hector. 'Alright, so maybe he didn't cry.'

Hector tried to reply but found no words available. He wasn't sure he understood Colt and Bohwanox's relationship. He wasn't sure they did, either."

"384

As he wandered toward Garovel, Hector pulled out his cellphone, but he was interrupted before he could find Gina's number.

'Hector, look,' said Garovel, pointing. 'A Revenant cruiser. And look! A wall you can crash it into!'

Hector shook his head, fighting a grin and losing. "Hey, I didn't wreck the last bike. Um. Much.”

‘I’m convinced that was only because it wasn’t a Revenant.’

“Then by that logic, I shouldn’t choose this one.”

‘No, by that logic, you definitely should.’

He just laughed.

‘You have to pick it. It’s so shiny and silver. And it’s got knives painted on the gas tank.’

He had to admit, it was an attractive machine. It seemed more beastly than the previous bikes, both wider and longer to his eyes. Twin exhaust pipes curved smoothly out from below the engine and reached all the way past the rear tire, and judging from the digital instruments below the handlebars, the bike was a newer model.

He nodded at the reaper and turned away to call Gina, putting her on speaker again as soon as she picked up.

<“Hello,”> she said cheerfully.

“H-hi.” He glanced at the others as they gathered around to listen.

“We, uh. W-we found the garage.”

<“Oh, good. Before that, though, I wanted to tell you that I spoke with Master Roman.”>

Hector’s brow perked up. “Oh, what’d he say?”

<“I told him about the attack on Harold, but he isn’t very hopeful that he and the Queen will make it back to Atreya in time with reinforcements.”>

He frowned. “Hmm.”

<“So if you intend to save that town, then you should expect to be on your own.”>

“Shit...”

<“Give me time to find out more details before you commit to anything. I can’t have you going off and getting yourselves killed.”>

“Yeah, we’d, uh... we’d like to avoid that as well...”

<“Anyway, that garage is part of a bunker. There should be some rooms in the back with beds, along with a bathroom and a stocked kitchen.”>
"385

“Why, um... ah... why is this place, uh... um...?”

<“...Yes?”>

Blushing again, Hector looked to the others, partly for help, partly to see if they were annoyed with him. Their faces seemed more pitying than irritated. He wasn't sure that was any better, honestly.

Colt intervened. “I think Hector's wondering why your boss has a bunker full of cars way out here.”

Hector breathed deep and nodded thankfully.

<“Ah.”> Gina paused. <“I suppose if Master Roman doesn't mind you using the facility, then he won't mind me telling you what it's for. My understanding is that these bunkers were Voreese's idea. She wanted places to go in the event of an attack on the mansion in Walton.”>

“Voreese is...?” Colt shifted his grip on Stephanie, trying to prevent her from grabbing onto his lower lip. He succeeded, and she tugged on his beard instead.

“Voreese is Roman's reaper,” said Hector.

<“Voreese was also planning to use the bunkers for certain business ventures.”>

“Business ventures?” said Hector.

<“Underground delivery and rebranding services, I believe.”>

Colt snorted. “So a black market, basically.”

<“I wouldn't know anything about that.”>

“Hector never told you that I used to be a cop, did he?”

Gina was quiet a moment. <“So like I was saying, those bunkers are for emergency shelter only.”>

“Nice. You know, it’s not like I’m in any position to arrest you.”

<“Right, so. Anyway, you can stay there, if you like. In fact, please do stay there, even if it’s only for the next few days. It’ll be easier for me if I know where you are.”>

Colt raised an eyebrow. “Easier for you, how?”

<“I’m expecting a call from Lynnette. She’s apparently on her way back to Atreya, and I’m thinking it would be good to have her meet up with you.”>

“Who’s Lynnette?”

“Oh!” said Hector. “Lynn, you mean? She’s--wait a minute. She’s coming back on her own?”

<“That’s what Master Roman said. She might need a ride, or she might already have her own. I have no idea how she’ll be getting back into the country.”>

"386

“Uhh. W-why is Lynn on her own?”

<“I’m not too clear on the details. You should probably just ask her yourself.”>

“I, uh... mgh...”

<“Or have Colt ask her. Whatever works.”>

“Any progress with that child doctor?” said Colt.

<“Sorry, not yet. I should get back to that, actually. Give me a ring if I can help with anything else.”>

“Roger that,” said Colt.

The conversation ended there. Colt and Bohwanox went off to explore the rest of the bunker. Hector, on the other hand, wanted to get some training in. He was sure he’d fall back asleep if he did practically anything else. He went up above ground again with Garovel, and the first thing he did was make a giant half-dome to shield himself from the sun. Then he began some simple sword practice.

As his thoughts drifted back to his battle with Karkash, Hector soon began thinking about his own ability, about some of the things he still wasn't sure he fully understood.

"I've got a question..."

'Yeah?'

"If, um... well, for instance, if I make a metal box or something--" He paused to do just that, materializing a large iron cube directly in front of him. "--what happens to it if I just... like... leave it there?"

Garovel tilted his head. 'What do you mean?'

"Ah, like... if I don't destroy this cube here, and then I just go somewhere else, um... somewhere really far away, I mean... then will the cube, um... stay? Or will it destroy itself when I get too far away?"

'Oh. It'll stay. You didn't know that, already? Even after all those criminals you left coated in metal for the police?'

"Well, I kinda figured that's what happens, but I just... uh... wanted to be sure, 'cuz... now I have a follow-up question."

'Alright.'

"So I can go like a hundred kilometers away from this cube, and it'll stay here, but... what if I try to destroy it WHILE I'm that far away from it? Would that work?"

'Ah! No, that wouldn't work, but you bring up an important point.'

"I do?"

"387

'It's a matter of proximity,' said Garovel. 'The distance over which you can create your iron is exactly the same as the distance over which you can destroy it. Obviously, you can't create something from a hundred kilometers away, so you wouldn't be able to destroy it from that distance, either.'

"Hmm..."

'Think of it as if you're always standing at the center of a giant bubble. That bubble is your "sphere of influence," so to speak. Anywhere within that space, you can create and subsequently destroy your iron.'

"Okay..." Hector annihilated the crude sword he had been using and crossed his arms. "So then... if someone is standing within my range, could I create metal inside their body?"

'Ah. You're thinking if you could materialize iron directly into a servant's brain, you could kill them instantly, right?'

"...Yeah, pretty much."

'As far as I know, that's not possible. I definitely would've told you to do it earlier if I thought it was.'

"Why isn't it possible? Er, why don't you think it is?"

'Because the mass that you're creating has to accumulate before taking form. And it can't do that within a space already occupied by a solid object. There's too much physical resistance for the atoms and molecules to gather properly. Within a gas or a liquid, though, it's fine. There's not enough resistance there to cause a problem.'

"Mm..." He wiped his brow. Even in the shade, he'd been sweating for a while.

'That's the idea, anyway. Emergence is always a bit of a wild card, but I've never heard of a materialization user who could do that.'

"But, umm... haven't I already done that, kind of?"

'What're you talking about?'

"I've cut into flesh with my metal before. I know I have. I mean, it didn't start inside the body, but once the metal went through, it kept going and came out the other side. Doesn't that sort of count? Or...?"

"388

‘Cutting into flesh isn’t the same,’ said Garovel, ‘because I’m sure you were growing the metal from the back.’

“From the back?”

‘Yeah, you make the tip of a blade, for instance, and then add onto it from the back. Because the tip is already formed, it can cut through the body, and it can keep cutting through because you then keep adding to the metal from outside the person’s body, where it can form properly.’

“Eh... I’m still not sure I follow...”

‘You can test it on yourself, if you like. You won’t be able to make a blade grow OUT of, say, your brachioradialis muscle, but you WILL be able to grow a blade INTO the muscle.’

“Brachio... radialis muscle?”

‘It’s in your forearm. Primarily allows you to flex your elbow.’

“R-right. Uh...” He eyed his forearm. “Maybe I’ll test that out later. Or maybe I’ll just... trust you.”

‘You mean you don’t wanna stab yourself for the sake of science?’

He exhaled a curt laugh.

Garovel scratched his bare skull. ‘I don’t remember you ever doing that before, though. Growing your metal into someone’s flesh, that is.’

Hector’s eyes drew down, and he looked at his hand, closing it into a fist and then opening it again. “It’s how I killed Geoffrey.”

‘Oh.’

Hector lingered on the memory a moment before brushing it away and looking at Garovel again. “What about, um... what if I tried to flood a person’s blood vessels with metal? Blood’s a liquid, so it would work, right?”

‘Gruesome thought. It might be possible, but it would require a hell of a lot of precision on your part. And even if you could make such a complicated network of iron, I don’t think it would be very useful. It definitely wouldn’t be enough to stop a servant.’

“It wouldn’t? Even if I flooded the blood vessels in their brain?”

‘It’s good that you’re thinking creatively about how to use your ability, but remember, a servant’s brain doesn’t require blood to function. As long as the brain is more or less in one piece, it should work just fine.’ The reaper thought a moment and then added, ‘Unless you freeze it or something, I suppose.’”
"389 -- XLV.

--donation bonus (day #18, post 1/5)--

“Hmm. Then what else...?” Hector rubbed his face, trying not to focus on how tired he still was or how everything still ached. He took a deep breath and thought back. “I already know that there’s a limit to the amount of iron I can make, so... well, how does that work, exactly? I mean, I know the limit can increase as my, uh, as my proficiency does, but... uh...”

‘The volume limit is also reliant upon proximity. Anything you create is counted towards that volume limit as long as it’s within your range.’

Hector tilted his head. “So... if I’ve maxed out on the amount of iron I can create, then... to make more stuff, I have to either destroy something or... move away from what I already created?”

‘Correct.’

“Interesting...” He looked out across the wavering horizon. “Maybe I should figure out what my range is.”

‘Not a bad idea. Your range will grow over time, but it could still be useful to know what it is currently. And there’s plenty of space out here to work with.’

“Time for some tests, then...”

Chapter Forty-Five: ‘O, noble men of the Crown...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

King William Belgrant was simultaneously restless and exhausted. Sleep had been a fleeting rarity of late. The best he could hope for was the numb, groggy feeling that accompanied his meds.

He had a host of doctors checking up on him regularly. He didn't look his best, but his pallor was nothing that a few cosmetics couldn't fix.

Mostly, the King's presence had become a façade for the public. Prince Gabriel had assumed the vast majority of Helen's responsibilities, which William knew to be far from ideal, but he was in no position to do anything about it. It was difficult enough just trying to understand what was going on. These monstrous people of Abolish rarely bothered to explain anything to him. It was always a choice between doing what they said or being tortured. Or watching someone else be tortured."

"389 -- XLV.

--donation bonus (day #18, post 1/5)--

"Hmm. Then what else...?" Hector rubbed his face, trying not to focus on how tired he still was or how everything still ached. He took a deep breath and thought back. "I already know that there's a limit to the amount of iron I can make, so... well, how does that work, exactly? I mean, I know the limit can increase as my, uh, as my proficiency does, but... uh..."

'The volume limit is also reliant upon proximity. Anything you create is counted towards that volume limit as long as it's within your range.'

Hector tilted his head. "So... if I've maxed out on the amount of iron I can create, then... to make more stuff, I have to either destroy something or... move away from what I already created?"

'Correct.'

"Interesting..." He looked out across the wavering horizon. "Maybe I should figure out what my range is."

'Not a bad idea. Your range will grow over time, but it could still be useful to know what it is currently. And there's plenty of space out here to work with.'

"Time for some tests, then..."

Chapter Forty-Five: 'O, noble men of the Crown...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

King William Belgrant was simultaneously restless and exhausted. Sleep had been a fleeting rarity of late. The best he could hope for was the numb, groggy feeling that accompanied his meds.

He had a host of doctors checking up on him regularly. He didn't look his best, but his pallor was nothing that a few cosmetics couldn't fix.

Mostly, the King's presence had become a façade for the public. Prince Gabriel had assumed the vast majority of Helen's responsibilities, which William knew to be far from ideal, but he was in no position to do anything about it. It was difficult enough just trying to understand what was going on. These monstrous people of Abolish rarely bothered to explain anything to him. It was always a choice between doing what they said or being tortured. Or watching someone else be tortured."

"390

--donation bonus (day #18, post 2/5)--

Abolish had established quite quickly that there was no standing against them. The three guard captains of Belgrant Castle were all dead now. One of the first things Desmond did was bring their heads to William.

Appalling as it was, the King expected it to attract attention. Surely, three well-known individuals with the same job suddenly disappearing would not go unnoticed. And yet, here he was, over a month later, and he had seen not a single word of their deaths mentioned on the news. He didn't understand how these people could have achieved such a hold over the media in so short a time.

He had not left Belgrant Castle, either. Despite all the rubble from Abolish's attack on the building, Desmond insisted that the King stay here. It seemed odd at first, but then he noticed that among the construction workers who arrived to repair the castle were more of Desmond's comrades. And since then, the repairs to the castle had provided them with an easy excuse to keep the public out. No tours, no reporters, no prying eyes.

Desmond never left the King's side, despite clearly wishing to. About the only privacy he found was in the lavatory, but Desmond would wait just outside the door. Even when William saw Desmond sleeping, if he tried to sneak away, Desmond would immediately wake up and follow him every time. And the way that these people tended to stare at or even talk to apparently thin air was more than a little unsettling. Moreover, William still wasn't sure what they were even trying to accomplish with all this. It was obviously some type of coup, but they clearly had designs beyond those of Gabriel's. And as chatty as Desmond tended to be, the man had a strangely guarded tongue, rarely revealing anything of importance.

Each day seemed to bring some fresh horror with it. Perhaps the only piece of potentially good news he encountered was when he saw Karkash on the news."

"391

--donation bonus (day #18, post 3/5)--

He'd certainly heard tell of this Darksteel Soldier already, of the horrible crimes attributed to the young Hector Goffe, so William couldn't speak to the boy's character, but even so, it was enough just knowing that someone out there was able to actually fight these monsters.

Beyond that, there wasn't much to do. William didn't get many visitors. If they weren't staff, medical consultant, or Abolish, then they were generally forbidden from seeing him. The only exceptions were the princes. Abolish allowed them to roam freely and do as they pleased, which was telling enough on its own. Only one prince ever bothered to come see the King, however. Prince David, it was. And of Helen's seven brothers, David was perhaps the last one William would have expected, but admittedly, William didn't know the man very well. It was mainly David's reputation that informed the King's opinion of him.

"So how are you, Your Highness?" David pulled up a chair next to Desmond and joined them for their midday meal. He was quite the portly gentleman, almost too wide for his seat, even. Always full of smiles, he seemed, and often able to earn them in return, if begrudgingly.

"What do you want?" said William, trying not to sigh.

“Only to check on the health of my dear brother-in-law,” said David. “Why? Are you unable to say? Perhaps you can tell me in code, then. Clap once for good and twice for bad.”

Desmond snorted so hard that he spilled tea all over himself.

William was not nearly so amused. “I appreciate your concern,” he said flatly.

David flashed teeth through his full beard. “I do hope you are cooperating with our fine guests,” he said, and he reached across the table to take William’s lone hand in both of his own. “It would be such a shame if they had to kill you.”

The King was about to give an irritated response when he felt the piece of paper in his hand.”

"392

--donation bonus (day #18, post 4/5)--

David pulled back, still smiling as he glanced at Desmond, who was busy wiping himself off.

William’s palm turned, and his eyes went to the paper. It read simply:

Ignore my tone. Listen to my words.

The King blinked. His hand closed around the note again.

“I’m sure Helen would be upset if anything happened to you,” said David. “In fact, so would I. You may be a softhearted dolt, but you are my brother. It would grieve me to learn that our friend Desmond here was forced to kill you. You understand, yes?”

He looked at Prince David with fresh eyes. “I believe I do.” This was not David’s first visit, and suddenly, William was thinking back to each one prior. How long had David been waiting for an opportunity to slip this note to him? He tried to remember everything David had told him in those conversations, but there wasn’t much. He’d mostly ignored David’s visits, finding only depression therein.

"Your aunt agrees with me," David added. "I spoke to her earlier, you see. We spent most of our time talking about more important matters, but she briefly expressed her concern for you."

So he was working with Aunt Jezebel, then. Good to know. "I have already given up on resisting," said William.

"Oh," said Desmond with a mouthful of grilled lamb chop, "I suppose I can just leave then." He shared a laugh with David.

After a moment, the fat prince addressed William again. "By the way, have you heard about Jezebel's niece?"

William tried not to sound too eager as he said, "No, I have not."

"She went abroad for school, as you know, and apparently, she has made quite a splash there. When she returns to Atreya, I'm sure she'll have become a fine woman. Jezebel is already thinking about having a husband ready for her when she gets home."

"I see." He stiffened in his seat, concealing the sense of cautious relief that washed through him. It hardly qualified as news, but it was more than he had heard all month long."

"393

--donation bonus (day #18, post 5/5)--

Helen had been at the back of William's mind every minute of every day. He tried his best not to worry about her too much, but he wasn't particularly successful. Strangely, despite how sudden her disappearance had been, it wasn't exactly difficult to figure out why she'd fled. The red-haired foreigner sitting in front of him was obviously the cause.

"How old is this niece?" said Desmond. "Is she hot?" The fresh tea stain on his suit was quite obvious, but he didn't seem to care anymore. He still took the appearance of a butler, but by now, everyone in the castle knew he wasn't one.

"I'm not sure we would be the best judges of that," said David. "She is family, after all."

"Mm." Desmond chewed loudly as he thought. "But I thought you royal types fucked each other all the time.”

William couldn't tell if David's laugh was genuine. If it wasn't, then the man should've been an actor.

“You're thinking of ancient royalty,” said David.

“Nah, I'm pretty sure there are some modern royals who fuck each other, too.”

“Heh. Well, I assure you, we're not among them.”

“If you say so.”

David eyed his golden watch. “Ah. Gentlemen, I must go.” He stood.

“Aww, already? You're gonna leave me here with this sad sack?”

“Alas, I have a meeting to attend. Important princely business.”

“Tch.”

After he was gone, it was just Desmond and the King again. An interval of silence passed as they continued eating.

“Seriously, though, is she hot?”

--+-+--+--

David was the last to arrive. He took his designated seat at a long table in a closed room.

The seven brothers of House Lumenbel were all here. In order of age, they were Gabriel IV, Nathaniel II, Charles III, David III, Martin V, Luther, and Meriwether.

David remembered asking his mother why the two youngest had such different names.

“Because mercifully, your grandmother was dead by then, and I no longer had to listen to her.”

That was perhaps when he began to understand what kind of family he had been born into.”

“Brothers, welcome,” said Gabriel. Whatever else could be said of the man and of his kingly ambitions, he certainly looked the part. His black hair was offset by the occasional streak of gray, and he always kept his broad chin cleanly shaven. He filled his scarlet vest quite well, and a golden trim along his white sleeves traced his shoulders perfectly.

“Why are we here?” said Meriwether. He was the smallest man in the room, yet somehow still the loudest. His voice had no trouble carrying across the table. “Our last meeting was a mere five days ago. Must you constantly seek our approval like some uncertain rube?”

“There is news of Helen Belgrant,” said Gabriel.

That last name was a particularly sore point for everyone, David knew. To him, it was a mere formality, but to his brothers, and indeed, to most members of the House Lumenbel, the name Belgrant was the one that stole the title of the Royal House of Atreya. Which wasn’t even the Belgrants’ doing, really. Helen and William had been married long before she became Queen, and the Belgrants surely never expected the marriage to make their son a king.

David remembered Helen’s ascension fondly, though he suspected no one else in this room shared that sentiment. As often as he’d been at odds with their father, appointing Helen was one of the wisest things the man had ever done, as far as David was concerned. It was also, without a doubt, the most hilarious. Gabriel had always been the pretentious, overeager fool he was to this day, and seeing him suddenly lose his right to the crown was one of David’s most cherished and satisfying memories.

So when he learned that Gabriel was responsible for the assassination attempt and subsequent departure of the Queen, David had been far from pleased. But by that point, the wheels were already in motion, and he realized that the only thing left to do was to climb aboard. And perhaps see about sabotage later.”

"395

--donation bonus (day #19, post 1/5)--

“I have received word that Helen was spotted in Korgum,” Gabriel explained. "She was seen consorting with the local militia, which leads me to believe that she intends to return here with an army."

Silence fell across the table. David gauged the others' expressions. Most were calm, if a bit unsettled, but Nathaniel's mousy face was horrified. David always thought the man to be rather slow-witted but ultimately goodhearted. He wasn't so sure about the latter anymore.

"From the report," Gabriel went on, "it seems she did not acquire their assistance. But she is most probably looking elsewhere now."

"This would not be a problem if those fools did not let her escape," said Charles.

"Bah." Martin glared at Nathaniel. "That would not have been a problem if this fool had killed her properly."

"There is no use casting blame now," said Gabriel. "We are where we are. I propose we shore up our defenses and deploy more of the AFA to find her."

Nathaniel nodded furiously. "Agreed!"

"Agreed," added Charles.

Nine years ago, the Agency of Foreign Affairs secretly cannibalized the RIB (His Majesty's Royal Intelligence Bureau). David recalled it being the result of a particularly bad scandal involving the bribery of a Rendon ambassador. Rendon demanded that the RIB be shut down, even threatening military action. He also recalled the incident being largely Gabriel's doing.

David wasn't sure what the AFA had been up to under Helen's rule, but he wondered if it also had some role in the attempt on her life. It certainly had been quick to follow Gabriel's orders as soon as she was gone. He'd have to consult Duchess Jezebel about that later.

At the moment, however, David wanted to interject. "Why do you all sound so worried?" he laughed. "What is there to fear? You've all witnessed the power of our delightful guests from Abolish. Army or not, they will doubtlessly crush anyone Helen returns with."

That sent a mumbling ripple across the table."

--donation bonus (day #19, post 2/5)--

"I do not trust these guests," said Meriwether. "You should not have involved them in our affairs. It has become a needless complication."

"So you keep saying," said Gabriel. "But they have cleaned up our mess. David is correct to trust in their strength, but we must not become indolent in their presence."

Meriwether scoffed. "They obviously have plans they are not telling us about."

"They are a means to an end," said Gabriel.

David took note of Luther, who had thus far said nothing. The bespectacled man was not so pristinely groomed as the others, and though he was by no means thin, neither was he as portly as David.

Luther's quietude was expected. Even before all this chaos, he was a man of few words. David wanted to take extra care to not forget about him, and he could see that Luther was not forgetting about him, either. Luther returned David's gaze evenly, but the man's face was as indecipherable as ever. David wished he knew whether to be unsettled or hopeful.

"We should do more than just send the AFA," said Nathaniel. "We should send assassins, preferably from Abolish."

"Idiot," said Martin. "They will not leave Atreya just because we ask them to. We have no control over their actions."

Nathaniel frowned. "But if we explain the danger she poses, then surely--"

"Martin is right," said Gabriel. "I already requested they send someone after her. They refused outright. I would not have called this meeting if they agreed."

"Why would they refuse?!" said Nathaniel.

"Resources," David offered. "No?"

Gabriel nodded.

"A problem we too face," David continued. "If we expend resources tracking Helen down and attempting to kill her again, then that leaves fewer tools at our disposal for this war of conquest you have planned. Not to mention that whomever we send after her will probably fail anyway.”

“What makes you think that?” said Gabriel. “She is only a woman.”

David smiled for everyone. “Yes, well, that woman has survived two assassination attempts.””

”397 -- XLVI.

--donation bonus (day #19, post 3/5)--

“Third time is the charm,” said Charles.

David’s smile waned. “You might disregard Nathaniel’s bumbling work, but don’t forget that she also escaped from Desmond and that big fellow whose name I forget. If they could not kill her, then do you honestly believe some grunt you send after her will?”

Nathaniel furrowed his thin brow. “So what then? Are you truly suggesting that we ignore her until she returns for our heads?”

“You misunderstand,” said David. “I’m merely saying that, perhaps, we should have more thought for the future. Helen surely intends to bring a war to our doorstep in order to reclaim her throne, but we also plan to start our own. My dear brothers, if we are to fight two wars at once, then let us not waste our time, money, and skilled personnel on pitiful assassination attempts.”

Again, a low rumble ran across the table.

Ideally, of course, Atreya would not go to war with anyone, but that was looking less and less likely every day.

“I must agree with David,” said Luther, and everyone turned to look at him. “Conservation is the wisest course of action.”

David caught Luther’s gaze again. It still told him nothing. He had been rather convincing, after all. Even he’d started to believe his own bullshit.

Gabriel folded his arms. “I do not agree. We must do everything we can to prevent her from returning.”

“Agreed!”

“Agreed.”

“Agreed here, as well.”

“I have no opinion on the matter,” said Meriwether.

David relinquished a shrug, admitting defeat. But after the discussion began to move forward again, his eyes returned to Luther, who was already looking back at him.

Chapter Forty-Six: ‘Devoted protector, choose well...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Over the next day, Hector trained as much as Garovel would let him. And it took a while of measuring, but he eventually discovered that his materialization ability currently held a range of eighty-eight meters.

Give or take one or two.”

”397 -- XLVI.

--donation bonus (day #19, post 3/5)--

“Third time is the charm,” said Charles.

David’s smile waned. “You might disregard Nathaniel’s bumbling work, but don’t forget that she also escaped from Desmond and that big fellow whose name I forget. If they could not kill her, then do you honestly believe some grunt you send after her will?”

Nathaniel furrowed his thin brow. “So what then? Are you truly suggesting that we ignore her until she returns for our heads?”

“You misunderstand,” said David. “I’m merely saying that, perhaps, we should have more thought for the future. Helen surely intends to bring a war to our doorstep in order to reclaim her throne, but we also plan to start our own. My dear brothers, if we are to fight two wars at once, then let us not waste our time, money, and skilled personnel on pitiful assassination attempts.”

Again, a low rumble ran across the table.

Ideally, of course, Atreya would not go to war with anyone, but that was looking less and less likely every day.

"I must agree with David," said Luther, and everyone turned to look at him. "Conservation is the wisest course of action."

David caught Luther's gaze again. It still told him nothing. He had been rather convincing, after all. Even he'd started to believe his own bullshit.

Gabriel folded his arms. "I do not agree. We must do everything we can to prevent her from returning."

"Agreed!"

"Agreed."

"Agreed here, as well."

"I have no opinion on the matter," said Meriwether.

David relinquished a shrug, admitting defeat. But after the discussion began to move forward again, his eyes returned to Luther, who was already looking back at him.

Chapter Forty-Six: 'Devoted protector, choose well...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Over the next day, Hector trained as much as Garovel would let him. And it took a while of measuring, but he eventually discovered that his materialization ability currently held a range of eighty-eight meters. Give or take one or two."

"398

--donation bonus (day #19, post 4/5)--

Still, it was pretty incredible, Hector felt, being able to create something from nearly a football field away. He noticed, however, that close to the edge of his range, precision became more difficult.

‘That’s to be expected,’ Garovel told him. ‘To an extent, your ability is also dependent on your sight. When you can’t clearly see what you’re making, it’ll probably end up less like you wanted.’

Hector closed his eyes and materialized a cube in his hand. When he looked at it, he found a perfect box, just as desired. He smirked at the reaper.

‘Hey, that’s too simple. Try something more difficult. Like an animal. Oh, make a tiny giraffe. I like giraffes.’

He destroyed the cube and did his best. When he opened his eyes again, he found that his work still looked very much like a giraffe. Maybe the spots were a bit off, but he wasn’t entirely sure how to picture those in his head anyway.

‘I see how it is. You’re trying to make me look stupid.’

Hector snickered, letting the knickknack disintegrate between his fingers.

‘Make a baby monkey playing a banjo while riding a dinosaur.’

“Oh, come on, I wouldn’t be able to do that even with my eyes open.”

‘Fine, then just make something big. Like a giant dildo.’

“I’m not gonna make a giant dildo...”

‘A cock and balls, then?’

“Garovel...”

‘What?’

“You’re... you’re way too old to be laughing at penis jokes.”

‘Hector, please. One can never be too old to laugh at penis jokes. And I don’t think you appreciate how valuable the materialization ability is for pulling pranks.’

Hector ignored him and closed his eyes again. He chose to make a wide chamber around himself, four walls with a door and a window for each. He added a pointed ceiling with four different support beams. Abruptly, however, he heard the metal groan.

‘Look out,’ came Garovel’s lazy warning.

The ceiling caved in on top of him.

‘A cock and balls would’ve been a lot safer, you know.’”

"399

--donation bonus (day #19, post 5/5)--

Hector annihilated his metal and stood. He brushed the dirt off his coat as the bones in his neck and shoulders realigned themselves. “Okay,” he said. “I guess you were right.”

‘Indeed.’

“By the way, um... I was wondering about Colt’s ability...”

‘Yeah?’

“He can really destroy, like... anything?”

‘I believe so, yeah. Once he develops it more, that is.’

“But, uh... I mean, don’t servants in Abolish have that power, too?”

‘I’m sure some do, yeah. Why?’

“They wanna destroy the entire planet, don’t they? And if one of them has the destruction power and they develop it enough, wouldn’t they be able to, y’know, actually pull it off?”

‘Oh. Well, first off, the destruction ability has a range limit as well. I think the strongest destruction user I’ve ever heard of could make a path about... I wanna say, two kilometers. Length-wise, that is. Increasing the width of the path is much more difficult. I think the max width was only about two meters.’

“Really? That’s such a huge difference...”

‘The path projects outward from the user, kind of like a drill. It’s easier for it to move forward and backward than horizontally. Positioning and direction are both very important for destruction users.’

“Hmm. But they could still use that to, like... drill to the planet’s core, couldn’t they?”

‘That’s actually happened before,’ said Garovel, smirking. ‘It requires a special kind of nutjob, though, even by Abolish’s standards. Most servants--even the maniacal, murdering bastards--DO still want to live. So they understand that destroying the planet might not be the wisest course of action. But occasionally, the stars will align, and just the right idiot will acquire the destruction power and get just the right opportunity to develop it. Most of them don’t realize, however, how gigantic or how hot Eleg’s core is.’

“Oh...”

‘I do recall one incident, though--an actually organized effort to get down there and cause problems before being vaporized.’

“Yeah?”

"400

‘You have to understand,’ said Garovel. ‘The planet’s core is thousands of degrees Celsius and larger than most continents. Even if you somehow managed to drill into it, that’s not gonna do very much. At most, you might cause an earthquake, but it’d still be so far underground that it wouldn’t affect anyone on the surface. You certainly wouldn’t cause the entire planet to explode or collapse or anything so cataclysmic. That is, unless you spent weeks or months down there, carving out a large enough chunk of the core to actually have an impact.’

Hector scratched his head. “And someone tried to do that?”

‘Yeah. Abolish conducted an expedition. I don’t know how they intended to make it through the extreme temperatures. We’re talking four or five times hotter than a fucking volcano here. It seems utterly impossible to me. If they had some kind of technology to protect against that, then I’ve never heard of it. And a servant’s body is NOT going to regenerate in temperatures like that. Your flesh will burn or melt much more quickly than it will grow back.’

“Huh.”

‘But the Vanguard intercepted them anyway, so it didn’t even matter in the end.’

“How would the Vanguard even know what Abolish was doing...?”

Garovel opened his mouth to answer but stopped himself. And after a moment, he gave a skeletal smirk. ‘Oh, that’s right. You wouldn’t know, would you?’

“Know what?”

‘Hmm.’

“Garovel...?”

‘Eh. I don’t feel like telling you.’

Hector’s brow lowered. “What? Why not?”

The reaper’s smirk only grew. ‘Because it’ll make for a nice surprise one day.’

“But... aww, c’mon. W-what if we die before I get a chance to find out?”

‘Gee. I guess we better not die, then.’

“Bullshit... I bet you don’t even know the answer.”

‘Could be. Who knows? Oh wait, I do. Eheh.’

“Dammit, what the hell?! You’ve never done this before! I don’t like surprises!”

‘That’s too bad. Because I do.’

“Agh!”

"401

--donation bonus (day #20, post 1/5)--

‘If it were something critically important, I’d just tell you,’ said Garovel.

“Right...”

‘Why don’t you go get some rest? I think you’ve trained enough for today.’

“Fucking... jerk...”

Garovel just laughed.

Hector's room was little more than a closet. The walls hugged the bed, and there was scarcely enough space to open the door. It couldn't be much of a step up from just sleeping in one of the cars, but he wasn't about to complain. A bed was a bed.

After a while, Garovel woke him up so that he could eat.

Colt's cooking was a decidedly unique experience. The man made some kind of indistinguishable gray slop, and yet when Hector tried it, he discovered that it didn't taste that bad.

“What do you call this?” Hector asked.

Colt shrugged.

Hector cocked an eyebrow. “What's in it?”

“Gravy.”

“...And?”

“And some other stuff.”

“What other stuff?”

“Just be glad I'm good at making gravy.”

Whatever it was, Stephanie and Thomas didn't seem to mind eating it.

Hector couldn't keep up much conversation, still feeling tired and sore all over, and Colt didn't seem all that interested in talking, either. Halfway through the meal, however, Hector's phone rang. He answered it.

<“Found you a doctor,”> said Gina. <“Dr. Marcus of Walton General apparently moonlights for some, shall we say, less-than-upstanding citizens. He's got a pretty foul reputation, though. Organ trafficking and the like. That okay?”>

“Yeah,” said Colt. “Did you make me an appointment, or do I need to make my own?”

<“This guy doesn't really do appointments. You'll have to go to him.

And he may not be particularly welcoming unless you've got cash on you. A few thousand troa, at least.">

"Alright. Tell me where to find him."

--+-+--+--

The old clinic stood at the foot of a hill. Its boarded up windows and broken, unlit sign suggested that it no longer served patients, but that was probably the whole idea."

"402

--donation bonus (day #20, post 2/5)--

Colt parked around back, seeing Hector's motorcycle pull up next to him. He told Hector and Garovel to stay behind and rest, but they insisted on coming along. Maybe they wanted to make sure the twins were safe. Maybe they wanted to make sure he didn't kill anyone. Probably both.

He didn't like Walton so much. If it wasn't for the reapers, he would've gotten lost at least twice on the way here. The city's night life seemed annoyingly vibrant as well. He could hear a party going on a few streets over.

Hector was kind enough to go first while Colt had his hands full with the children. Instead of going through the building's rear entrance, Hector lifted the door to the storm cellar and descended. Colt followed.

They came upon an underground hallway and another door. Hector knocked. After a wait, a deep voice asked, "Who is it?"

According to Gina's directions, the correct response was, "Someone in need of an especially skilled yet underappreciated doctor." Colt spared Hector the torture of having to say it.

The lock clicked open, and they were allowed entry. Hector stood off to the side and allowed Colt to approach the small man in a white coat.

The first thing Colt noticed was the cellar itself. It hardly seemed like a sterile environment for medical procedures. With the dank air and stone gray walls, it was practically a dungeon, though perhaps better lit. And the apparent doctor wasn't alone. Two bulky men sat on either side of him, their holstered firearms displayed clearly at their hips.

"Oh, wow," said Dr. Marcus. "I don't usually get children this time of night. Why, exactly, can't you bring them to me during normal business hours?"

"Does it matter?" said Colt.

The man's smile was not friendly. "Anyone who does what I do has to have at least a mild affection for children." He waved a hand, and his two bodyguards stood. "I don't take very kindly to kidnappers."

"403

--donation bonus (day #20, post 3/5)--

"I'm their father," said Colt steadily. "I didn't kidnap them."

"And if I asked you to prove it?"

"I'd say take a paternity test."

"Those aren't exactly quick. And they're not my forte, either."

"Look," said Colt. "All I want is a normal check-up for them. Just tell me if there's anything I should be worried about."

"Then answer my question. Why are you bringing them to me now?"

"Because I'm wanted for murder."

The man didn't lose a beat. "Are you guilty?"

"Yes."

The doctor paused to exhale a laugh. "You're very honest."

"Are you gonna check them or not?"

"Did you kill a child?"

"No."

The man stared at him. "Did you bring money?"

Colt showed him a backpack full of cash.

"Alright, then." The doctor took a step forward, and then he stopped, his eyes lingering on Hector. "Who's he?"

"My babysitter. Don't worry about him."

"No, no," the man said. "Take off your helmet. Let me see your face."

Hector glanced at Colt, and Colt shrugged. Hector removed his riding helmet.

The doctor backed away a few steps, as did his two bodyguards. "I recognize you," the man said, not shaken, but not pleased, either. "You've been all over the news."

"Don't worry about him," Colt repeated. "If you're wondering whether or not he's guilty, too, then I'll save you the trouble of asking. He's not."

The doctor tilted his head, loosening up a little. "Really now? And yet he's working as your... babysitter?"

"He and I have a complicated relationship. Are you done asking questions now? I didn't come here to be quizzed."

Dr. Marcus threw a last look at Hector before saying, "Very well. Follow me, please."

They all began walking together, heading for a staircase at the far end of the cellar.

"Tell me about your children," the doctor said. "Surely, you felt it was a risk coming here. Is there something about them that has been worrying you?"

"404 not found jk guys

--donation bonus (day #20, post 4/5)--

"They're strangely calm," said Colt. "Nothing seems to faze them anymore."

"So you're concerned about their mental health, rather than their physical health."

"Yeah."

“How old are they?”

“Little over fourteen months. They’re twins, if you couldn’t already tell.”

They ascended the steps into a whiter hallway, then took the first door on the left into a more conventional room. Old anatomical charts and reassuring posters filled the walls where cabinets didn’t. Colt set the twins on the waist-high table in the center of the room.

Dr. Marcus hovered around them both with a stethoscope, checking their heartbeats and breathing. After a bit, he moved on to checking their mouths, eyes, and ears. “Are they walking on their own yet?”

“Not really,” said Colt. “I’ve seen them stumble around a little, but that’s it. They don’t tend to move around on their own much. It even seems like they crawl less than they used to.”

The doctor helped Stephanie stand up on the table, holding her hand. He waited, watching her steady herself, then let her back down and did the same for Thomas. “Have they said their first words?”

“Yeah. A while ago.”

“Are they using words meaningfully? Any at all?”

Colt thought back. "Not that I can recall, no."

"You're sure?" said the doctor. "So when they speak, you only ever hear babbling?"

"Yeah."

The doctor pointed at the floor behind the twins. "Stand there please," he told Colt. And when Colt was out of the twins' view, the doctor added, "Call them by their names."

"Stephanie," said Colt. "Thomas." Neither one turned to look at him. "Stephanie. Thomas." Still nothing. The doctor handed him a large book to drop. When it hit the floor, the twins both turned to look.

The doctor stroked his bare chin. "Have you been using their names to address them?"

Colt hesitated. "Not really, I guess."

"Start."

The inquiries continued for a long while. While he performed repeated physical examinations, Dr. Marcus asked about their eating habits, sleeping habits, fine motor skills, games they liked to play, general sense of curiosity, as well as when they last received vaccinations."

"405

--donation bonus (day #20, post 5/5)--

At length, Colt had to ask, "So what do you think? Is there something wrong with them?"

"Yes," the man said plainly. "They clearly demonstrate a lack of development. Something has stifled their mental and emotional growth. At the moment, I'm not sure what. There doesn't appear to be any physical cause. I can perform more invasive procedures, but I'm not convinced they're necessary just yet. Can you tell me what their home life is like?"

"Well, at the moment, we don't really have a home."

"Ah. Then I suggest you find a place to settle--and soon. For now, the effects are not so bad. It's nothing you can't resolve with a few simple parenting techniques, but your children need a stable environment to grow up in or their development could be further stigmatized, which could have more lasting consequences. What about their mother? Is she in the picture at all?"

'You have to tell him,' said Bohwanox.

Colt knew there was no avoiding it. "Their mother tried to kill them."

Dr. Marcus blinked at that. "Oh."

"Also, they were kidnapped by a mob boss for nearly a month."

The doctor blinked several more times. "Ohhh... I see. Well, then. I guess I don't need to run those tests, after all. Um." He paused to rub his forehead. "Geez. I wish you'd told me that at the beginning."

"It's not the kind of information I'd like spread around."

He exhaled a sigh. "Alright, well. Clearly, they've been through a trauma. More than one, from the sound of it. What was the nature of their kidnapping?"

"What do you mean?"

"Details. What was their captivity like? Who was looking after them? How were they being treated?"

Colt fell quiet at that. He eyed Bohwanox. 'I don't suppose you know the answer to that, do you?'

'Sorry.'

"You have no idea," the doctor surmised.

Colt gave a strained expression. "They had a crib, I think. Some thugs looking after them. They were kidnapped by Joseph Rofal, if that means anything."

"406

The doctor smirked. "I figured as much. You know, I heard there was a hefty reward for finding the person who killed him."

Colt's icy blue stare seemed to tell the man everything he needed to know.

"Heh." He threw an unsteady glimpse at Hector. "I would never sell out such fine gentlemen, of course."

Truth be told, Colt was a bit surprised the man hadn't sicced his bodyguards on them earlier. But surely, by now, there was little remaining doubt that Colt really was the twins' father. It would have been rather difficult for anyone else to answer all of the doctor's previous questions.

Dr. Marcus cleared his throat. "So the short of it is, you don't know what this Rofal person subjected your children to." He scratched the back of his head. "Assuming the kids would've developed normally otherwise, I think I can tell you what they went through."

Colt's brow rose. "Go on, then."

"I don't think they were beaten, fortunately. But they were terrorized in some way. Most likely, they were discouraged from speaking at all, as their captors probably wanted them to be quiet. Any kind of curiosity the children displayed was likely met with anger. And I'm certain that they were kept confined to a small space and not allowed to crawl or roam freely."

The more Colt listened, the more he wished Rofal were alive so that he could kill him again.

"It's very good that you got them out of there when you did, but now you need to be thinking about the future. Like I said, they need a stable home environment."

"I get it. What else?"

The doctor hunted down a pen and paper. He started scribbling as he talked. "Speak to them directly as much as you can. Use their names. Also, encourage them to walk and explore. Help them stand and keep their balance. They should pick that up quickly enough on their own. And just try to stimulate their minds as much as possible. Toys, books, music, even just opening a bag of snack food can be turned into a game. Remember that you're making up for lost time here. They're at a critical age, and given that they're already behind, they definitely need your full attention now."

--donation bonus (day #21, post 1/5)--

Colt took the note, reviewing the bullet points, and from there, the check-up drew towards its conclusion. Dr. Marcus gave the twins their vaccinations and gave Colt his phone number in case there were any further concerns. The cash changed hands, and when Colt and Hector left, they found a waiting line had formed outside the cellar's entrance.

The drive back to Roman's bunker gave Colt plenty of time to think. He discussed his intentions with Bohwanox privately and found the reaper in agreement.

When they arrived, Colt waited until everyone was gathered in the garage again. With a child in each arm, he said, "I need to tell you something."

Hector and Garovel both turned to look at him.

And though he knew what he had to say and how he wanted to say it, Colt found himself reluctant. The words didn't want to come. He had to force them. "We have to go our separate ways."

Garovel's face was obscured by the reaper's hood, but Hector didn't seem especially surprised. Perhaps they'd been expecting this.

"I wish I could help you more," Colt went on. "And I'm grateful. For everything you've done for me. For my kids. But I--" He faltered, gritting his teeth and looking at the floor. He hated this feeling. Running. Fleeing. Especially when he knew what was at stake, when he'd seen first hand the kind of monstrous people they were fighting. "My kids come first," he said, partly to himself.

There was a pause, and then Garovel said, 'We understand.'

"Yeah," Hector added. "We know how important they are to you."

Of course they understood. The bastards. Why couldn't they get angry at him? That would've made this so much easier. Maybe he would've been able to storm out and never look back. Colt shook his head. No. Probably not even then.

'Where are you going to go?' asked Garovel. 'If you can't stay with us, then I assume you intend to leave the country, no?'

--donation bonus (day #21, post 2/5)--

Colt looked at Stephanie out of the corner of his eye as she patted his cheek with her tiny hand. "Little country out west called Snider. It's where my grandparents immigrated from. Back then, things were unstable there, but they've since improved. Lots of villages where we can get a fresh start."

'How do you plan to get out of the country? Don't tell me you're going to just drive across the wilderness. That's a good way for your car to breakdown and leave you stranded in the middle of nowhere.'

"I know. I was trying to leave the country even before all the shit in the capital happened, and it was a pain in the ass. But this time, I can fake my death pretty easily, and hopefully ask Gina for the name of someone who can forge some new identities."

"Are you sure you have to leave?" said Hector. "Couldn't you, uh... just... find someplace quiet here in Atreya?"

'Too risky,' said Bohwanox. 'Colt's only gotten more infamous since becoming your known accomplice.'

"Ah... s-sorry..."

"Don't be."

'Then how do you intend to fake your death?' said Garovel.

Colt shrugged. "Rob a bank, I guess. Get the cops to shoot me. Shouldn't take them more than three days to bury or cremate my body. I can count on you to look after the twins while I'm gone, yeah?"

"Of course."

"Thanks."

Chapter Forty-Seven: 'O, loitering chaos...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As well as he managed to conceal it, David wasn't exactly comfortable around these Abolish foreigners. Desmond was comparatively pleasant. That man, at least, seemed to have some level of restraint, but these other ones had moods that could flip in an instant. David hadn't yet been able to learn all of their names. He was a bit reluctant to, in all honesty.

He would have liked to avoid interacting with them as much as possible, but he knew that wasn't going to change anything."

"408 -- XLVII.

--donation bonus (day #21, post 2/5)--

Colt looked at Stephanie out of the corner of his eye as she patted his cheek with her tiny hand. "Little country out west called Snider. It's where my grandparents immigrated from. Back then, things were unstable there, but they've since improved. Lots of villages where we can get a fresh start."

'How do you plan to get out of the country? Don't tell me you're going to just drive across the wilderness. That's a good way for your car to breakdown and leave you stranded in the middle of nowhere.'

"I know. I was trying to leave the country even before all the shit in the capital happened, and it was a pain in the ass. But this time, I can fake my death pretty easily, and hopefully ask Gina for the name of someone who can forge some new identities."

"Are you sure you have to leave?" said Hector. "Couldn't you, uh... just... find someplace quiet here in Atreya?"

'Too risky,' said Bohwanox. 'Colt's only gotten more infamous since becoming your known accomplice.'

"Ah... s-sorry..."

"Don't be."

'Then how do you intend to fake your death?' said Garovel.

Colt shrugged. "Rob a bank, I guess. Get the cops to shoot me. Shouldn't take them more than three days to bury or cremate my body. I can count on you to look after the twins while I'm gone, yeah?"

"Of course."

“Thanks.”

Chapter Forty-Seven: ‘O, loitering chaos...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As well as he managed to conceal it, David wasn't exactly comfortable around these Abolish foreigners. Desmond was comparatively pleasant. That man, at least, seemed to have some level of restraint, but these other ones had moods that could flip in an instant. David hadn't yet been able to learn all of their names. He was a bit reluctant to, in all honesty.

He would have liked to avoid interacting with them as much as possible, but he knew that wasn't going to change anything."

"409

--donation bonus (day #21, post 3/5)--

They could all be terrifying, he knew, but the young woman named Nola Pauls was uniquely so. Affectionately so. For whatever reason--or perhaps for none at all--she'd taken an interest in David, often rubbing his large belly and remarking that doing so would grant her various wishes. She was joking, he was fairly certain, though he didn't know what about it was supposed to be funny. Foreign humor, he figured.

She was not a small woman, and like most of her comrades, she was red of hair. Her pale face, however, held far more freckles than anyone else's.

"Hey, fat prince!" she said, running up to catch him from behind.

He tried not to wince as he turned to greet her. "Hello, Nola."

"Look, look!" She kept one hand behind her back and, with the other, held up a lock of a black hair. "Guess who this belongs to!"

Her games always started like this, with something seemingly innocuous. "Allow me a hint?" he asked.

She grinned, showing her uneven teeth. "It's someone you know."

"I know a lot of people. Does it belong to one of my brothers?"

"Nope," she said. "It's someone who works for you."

"Is it my tailor?"

"Nope!"

"My driver?"

"Nope, nope! Give up yet?"

"Yes, I give up."

"It's your nanny!"

"But I don't have a nanny." David tilted his head. "I don't have children."

"Oh." Nola's face scrunched up. "Well, then who's this?" She brought her other hand around, and in its grasp was the severed head of a black-haired young woman.

Instinctively, he turned away and closed his eyes, struggling to maintain his composure. He tried to focus on not retching in the middle of the corridor.

"Is she someone else's nanny?" asked Nola. "I saw her walking around with some fat kids, so I thought she was yours."

"I'm sorry," he said. "I don't know who she is."

"You sure? I don't think you got a very good look. C'mon, open your eyes."

"410

--donation bonus (day #21, post 4/5)--

"The fuck're you doing?" came another voice. It belonged to Nola's partner, Andres Geth. Andres was a lanky man and a bit slimy to look at, darkly red hair slicked back and a tan face with a greasy shine to it. His voice, on the other hand, was quite weighty and penetrating. "Nola, you can't just go around killing random people."

"Fifty rigols says I can. Or wait, what's the money called here?"

Andres ignored her question. "Dammit, girl. Conall and Tessa are gonna be pissed at us. They're the ones who're gonna have to make sure people don't get too curious about what happened to this girl."

Nola shrugged. "Eh, fuck 'em. Anyone gets curious, Conall and Tessa can just send them to me."

"That's not how it works. More bodies make for more questions."

"So they say. But I think with enough bodies, the questions will start to go back down."

"Nola."

"Aw, c'mon. That's so boring. We finished the net weeks ago! I need something to do! And Desmond won't let me near the King!"

Andres frowned. "I know. I feel the same way. This castle is so stuffy with all of us in it."

"See? It could definitely do with losing a few people. Thin out the crowd a little, yeah?"

"Hmm. Y'know, maybe you're right."

"Ah--" Prince David held up a hand. "Please don't kill anyone else."

They both looked at him. A beat passed, and they started laughing.

"Aha, good one!" said Nola, patting David's belly. "I told you he's the best prince, didn't I?!"

"You did! He's hilarious! Pretending like he can give us orders! When he obviously knows better!" Andres waved a finger at him. "If anyone else'd said that to us, we'd have torn their fucking head off! But not you! Not the cheeky prince!"

"Ha! Cheeky! He's cheeky! Like, literally cheeky!"

"He is! Look at him!"

David often made a point of trying to "out laugh" them. It wasn't easy. Andres could reach an absolutely heinous pitch."

--donation bonus (day #21, post 5/5)--

David watched them leave. The hallway had mysteriously emptied of all its previous occupants, and only after a minute of walking did he begin to see people again.

There were usually three Abolishers here at any given time, while the rest patrolled the city or attended to duties elsewhere. He sympathized with all the people who were not allowed to leave the castle. At least he could come and go from this madhouse as he pleased. More than once, he considered never returning, and even now, he wasn't sure why he was still here. A smarter man would've fled by now, he felt. He'd always tried to be that smarter man, but this was something different. A sense of obligation, perhaps.

How Gabriel had managed to get involved with these maniacs in the first place, he didn't know. Why Gabriel still seemed to think it was a good idea, he couldn't even fathom. Surely by now, the man knew what a mistake he'd made. It had to be a façade. If not, then Gabriel was even more demented than he thought.

He completed the rest of the journey to Luther's chambers. He knocked on the white door.

"Enter," said Luther.

David found the man at his desk, overlooking an assortment of documents. A massive window with scarlet curtains sat behind him, providing a tremendous view of Lake Belgrant. The waters shimmered under the morning sun's amber grasp.

Luther looked up at him. "Ah, David. I was meaning to speak with you."

"Were you now? What about?"

"You first. You went to the trouble of coming to see me, after all."

"It was no trouble at all. I had no great reason for coming here. I merely wished for a pleasant conversation."

Luther paused, letting his gaze linger a moment. "I see. In that case, I wanted to ask your feelings on our current predicament."

David allowed a smirk. "My feelings? Of what importance are they now?"

Luther stood and circled around his desk. "You seem of a different mind than the others."

"When is that ever not the case?"

"You were the last of us to learn of Gabriel's plot against Helen. I am wondering if your heart is truly in this, or if you are merely along for the ride."

"Would the latter be so terrible?"

"No. Nor would it be unlike you. But if that is so, then I find it strange how you are so vocal in our meetings."

"You would be the first to be surprised by my candor."

"Candor? Perhaps not. That would imply that you were being completely honest with us."

"You suspect I wasn't?"

"Not at the moment," said Luther. "But I do find you an oddity. The brother I know would have shown little interest in our affairs."

"Perhaps you are confusing me with yourself. Luther, surely, you're the one who rarely speaks."

"You have always used many words to say very little."

David lowered his brow and chuckled. "Dear brother, I find that quite hurtful."

"I am sure you do."

David adjusted the cuffs of his suit. He enjoyed trying to at least look the part of a prince, unlike his brother here. "For someone who complains about the way I speak, you're certainly taking your sweet time getting to the point."

Luther leaned back on his desk, folding his arms.

David's expression soured. "Do you require me to move the conversation along myself, then? Fine. Let's not mince words. You think I am a traitor of some sort, no?"

"Oh, I do not know about that."

"Then what is your point?"

"Allow me to ask you something. Why do you think Gabriel is so obsessed with these ideas of expansion and conquest?"

"He believes it is Atreya's destiny. And, of course, he wants more power."

"Yes, but that is not all there is to it."

"I'm listening."

"413

Luther took his time, searching the ceiling for his words. "This was many years ago, and back then, you were often abroad, but you at least remember how Gabriel was always being groomed for the throne, yes?"

"Of course."

"Well, one summer, that extended much further. Father explained to Gabriel that one day Atreya would become a global superpower, that it would be Gabriel's responsibility to see that dream realized. Father's reasoning, he said, was that Atreya needed two things--the first of which was time to flourish. And you may have noticed, it has done just that. Our people have grown quite wealthy in recent years. I attribute that to our father. The second thing Atreya needed, he said, was land. He believed that the country's growth would inevitably plateau so long as we possessed so little land and so few people. And on that matter, I believe he has also been proven correct. And given that the Age of Exploration is long dead, there are only two methods by which we might acquire more land."

"Purchase or conquest," David finished.

"Both options are expensive. Worse, the prior is often not an option at all. Good land is usually not for sale, and bad land makes for a bad purchase. Hence, we arrive at our current dilemma. So you see, Gabriel's obsession is not his own. He carries on our father's will, who carried on our grandfather's will."

David eyed him doubtfully. "Why would Father never tell me of these intentions himself?"

"Oh, I was not meant to hear him speak of it, either. He only intended for Gabriel to know. I overheard purely by chance."

"I find that difficult to believe."

"I suppose you would. In his final years, Father obviously had a change of heart. Helen's appointment was a pitiful effort to undo the mistake that he spent his entire life creating."

"So you say. Yet you offer nothing in the way of proof."

"414

"Proof?" said Luther. "You are correct. In this, I can offer you none. However, I can offer you personal testimony that our father was not the man you thought he was."

"Haven't you already done that?"

"I assure you, this is something different. Do you remember a young woman named Rita Zannis?"

David thought back. He was about to say no when the name abruptly registered. He eyed Luther anew, beginning to sense where this was going. "You had a courtship with her, unless I'm mistaken."

The other prince snorted. "I am not sure 'courtship' is the appropriate word. She was a commoner. Our correspondence was hardly formal. But I was certainly infatuated with her. More than any other woman I have ever met."

"Excluding your wife, of course, yes?"

And Luther just looked at him. The man was not known for his warmth, but the stare he gave now had to be among the coldest David had ever seen from him.

David's head reared back. As enigmatic as his brother was, that one expression told him more about Luther than anything in the last ten years.

Luther chose to move on. "My relationship with Ms. Zannis came to an abrupt end, you may recall. It was her decision. Or so I was led to believe."

"You're telling me Father was responsible?"

"Yes."

David frowned. "Then you have my sympathy, but not my surprise. You are not the first of us to have had his love life distorted in such a way."

"I was planning to elope with her," Luther added. "I was ready to give up my status and flee the country, if necessary."

"Again, my sympathies, but--"

"Father learned of my intentions. He told her that he would have her entire family killed unless she refused me. And the only reason I know this, is because Father confessed it to me himself. On his deathbed, no less. Mere days before the end."

That made David stop."

"415

"I had trouble believing it as well," said Luther. "After father's funeral, I found Mrs. Zannis again. She has also been married for several years now--and quite happily, it would seem. But indeed, she confirmed the truth of Father's confession."

David could only listen.

"Before he died, I asked him why he did it. He said that, at the time, he believed I was too valuable to the family, that Gabriel would need my help to rule." Luther's expression darkened. "I did not like that answer. But of course, by then, it was far too late for me to seek any kind of meaningful retribution against him."

"And you've kept this secret for over three years now?"

"I have."

"Then why are you telling me now?"

"Because I want you to understand me when I say that I do not side with Gabriel. And, I suspect, neither do you."

And there it was. Said plainly at last. David took a breath, considering how to respond. He was prepared to give ground now, but a question lingered. "Am I then to assume that you want Helen back on the throne?"

"No," said Luther. "Returning Helen to power would be a step backward. I was the one who orchestrated Gabriel's little coup, after all."

David blinked. "What?"

"I do not want to overthrow the Crown. I want to destroy the Crown."

David stared at him hard. Those were not the words he'd wanted to hear.

"This antiquated form of governance is barbaric and has no place in today's world. A single person should never possess the power to ruin an entire people."

"So, what? You wish to spread democracy, then?"

"I suppose not," said Luther, shaking his head. "While I do believe those flowery words to some extent, the visceral truth is that I simply despise our kind."

He cocked an eyebrow. "Our kind?"

"Royalty."

David clenched his jaw. Suddenly, he could feel this conversation spiraling out of his control, off in some direction for which he was unprepared."

"416

"Gabriel's fall is inevitable," said Luther. "I have already ensured that much. His war with Rendon will ruin House Lumenbel and House Belgrant both.”

“What makes you so certain?”

“Abolish will deliver the chaos I asked of them. It is the one thing upon which we may rely.”

“Unless Helen returns and eradicates them first.”

“A highly doubtful outcome, but one I have considered, also. If she does somehow succeed, we will simply turn on Gabriel to prove our loyalty to her, and she will welcome us back to her court. It would prove an irritating setback, of course, but I am confident that another opportunity would present itself in time.”

The man wasn’t wrong, he knew. That contingency plan would probably work, if David didn’t fully intend to sabotage it. But hopefully, he wouldn’t have to wait that long.

Luther seemed to be growing restless as he asked, “So may I count on your assistance?”

Certainly, Luther was no ally. The only question now was how much of a threat the man truly was. “You may,” said David. “But it sounds as if you have matters well in hand. What is it that you want me to do?”

“You are an unambitious man,” said Luther. “You always have been. Father saw that as a great flaw, but it is precisely for that reason that I am likened to trust your judgment in developing a new power structure for Atreya.”

“Excuse me?”

“Once the dust settles, I believe that, together, you and I can set the cogs in motion for lasting reform. Not to become leaders ourselves, mind you, but to make room for newer, worthier people.”

David took a moment to consider the other man’s words. “For all your planning, you don’t know what the next step is?”

“I do not.”

“Rather reckless, don’t you think? You risk subjecting our people to utter lawlessness.”

“Even anarchy would be preferable to monarchy.””

"417 -- XLVIII.

David had to refrain from grimacing. His brother was possessed of a deeper hatred than he had ever realized. "The Crown is an institution. Even if you destroy both of the royal houses, this will not change. New houses will simply take our places."

"That is precisely why I am requesting your help, David. I am hoping you have an elegant solution to this problem."

"What if I don't?"

"Then I will crush any other houses which assume the throne. By whatever means necessary."

So many pieces were already in motion, and now Luther wanted to present him with a new one--one which could not be ignored, unfortunately.

David offered the man a nod. "Rest assured, then. I will give the matter due thought."

Chapter Forty-Eight: 'Thy diverging ways...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

In their own strange way, the next few days were surprisingly restful. Stephanie and Thomas required near constant attention, leaving Hector little time to actually sleep, but he didn't find it so terrible. Certainly, compared to fighting for his life, it was a much welcomed change of pace. And whenever he did manage to get some sleep, Garovel was there to watch over the children for him.

Colt's death made the news. They didn't show him actually getting shot and killed, of course, but it wasn't long before Bohwanox briefly returned to the bunker to confirm that nothing had gone wrong--which was incredibly nice to hear, for once. These days, it seemed like everything and everyone was out to either kill them or get in their way. It was good news, or at least, halfway decent news.

So he had three days with the kids, which meant following the directions that the doctor had originally meant for Colt. Stimulating their minds was the idea. At first, Hector just tried to turn anything and everything into a game, but that didn't go over so well. The kids would just kind of stare at him, apparently unaware that he wanted them to participate."

"417 -- XLVIII.

David had to refrain from grimacing. His brother was possessed of a deeper hatred than he had ever realized. "The Crown is an institution. Even if you destroy both of the royal houses, this will not change. New houses will simply take our places."

"That is precisely why I am requesting your help, David. I am hoping you have an elegant solution to this problem."

"What if I don't?"

"Then I will crush any other houses which assume the throne. By whatever means necessary."

So many pieces were already in motion, and now Luther wanted to present him with a new one--one which could not be ignored, unfortunately.

David offered the man a nod. "Rest assured, then. I will give the matter due thought."

Chapter Forty-Eight: 'Thy diverging ways...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

In their own strange way, the next few days were surprisingly restful. Stephanie and Thomas required near constant attention, leaving Hector little time to actually sleep, but he didn't find it so terrible. Certainly, compared to fighting for his life, it was a much welcomed change of pace. And whenever he did manage to get some sleep, Garovel was there to watch over the children for him.

Colt's death made the news. They didn't show him actually getting shot and killed, of course, but it wasn't long before Bohwanox briefly returned to the bunker to confirm that nothing had gone wrong--which was incredibly nice to hear, for once. These days, it seemed like everything and everyone was out to either kill them or get in their way. It was good news, or at least, halfway decent news.

So he had three days with the kids, which meant following the directions that the doctor had originally meant for Colt. Stimulating their minds was the idea. At first, Hector just tried to turn anything and everything into a game, but that didn't go over so well. The kids would just kind of stare at him, apparently unaware that he wanted them to participate."

"418

He found a box of reading material in one of the bunker's closets, but there wasn't anything suited for toddlers. There was barely even anything suited for him. Almost every book seemed to require a very high reading level, which only served to remind him that he would probably never finish high school. He wasn't sure it made much difference, though. He'd never been especially comfortable in any of his language classes.

Hector did, however, manage to get his hands on some music. Scrounging through all the cars in the garage paid off quite handsomely. He seemed to recall hearing somewhere that classical music was best for child development, so he tried to stick with that as much as possible. And in the meantime, he worked on getting the kids on their feet, which was easier than he expected.

Stephanie and Thomas were quite ready to walk, as long as Hector held their hands. They stumbled all the time, but usually got right back up or just resorted to crawling for a little while. He could hardly believe how adorable the whole thing was. It was entirely too easy to understand why people wanted to film stuff like this. He tried to give the kids the opportunity to walk on their own, but they weren't quite there yet. They were happy enough to crawl toward him, though.

The other big thing was conversation. Also not Hector's strongest area, but with a bit of encouragement from Garovel, he did his best. He talked to them pretty much nonstop, using their names, trying to listen and respond whenever they babbled back at him. It didn't seem to be doing much, but he supposed it was too soon to expect any kind of result.

The twins seemed to enjoy watching him make and unmake iron. It held their attention, the way the metal suddenly accumulated and then disappeared again. It got them to look at him with those wondrous little expressions of curiosity, which as Garovel reminded him, was immensely important."

~~Holiday Special (Day 1/7, Page 1/6)~~

Hector practiced making metallic toys for them. Small and intricate, was how he began, but when Thomas started gnawing on the dorsal fin of an iron shark, Hector decided to retry with larger, more rounded figures. Probably not the most efficient method of training for combat, but at the very least, it gave him the opportunity to work on his precision.

When Colt showed up again, he looked like hell. His clothes were a complete mess, caked with dirt and mud where they weren't already riddled with bullet holes and bloodstains.

'Welcome back,' said Garovel. 'How'd it go? Did you have a nice vacation?'

"Would've been a lot easier if they'd just cremated me," said Colt.

'Yeah,' agreed Bohwanox. 'I would have been able to come back here and remake him from scratch. But on the plus side, I did get to witness Colt rising from the grave like some kind of unholy abomination. That was quite enjoyable.'

'Be thankful they didn't need to preserve your body for a funeral,' said Garovel. 'It'd take days to get the embalming chemicals out of your system. They would've oozed out of your face, mostly.'

'I want to see that.'

Colt ignored them, more concerned with Hector and the twins. "How were they?"

"Amazing," said Hector, and he helped them walk over to their father.

Colt bent down, smiling but keeping them at arm's length. "Guess I should get cleaned up first."

"Alright."

Colt ventured off to shower and change.

Bohwanox turned to Garovel. 'So tell me more about embalming chemicals.'

'Oh, well, there are all sorts. Some are dyes meant to maintain tissue color. Some are pumped into the body arterially. They have all sorts of different effects.'

'Would they have oozed out of anywhere other than his face?'

Hector pursed his mouth to one side and figured that was a good place to stop listening. He turned his attention back to the children."

"420

~~Holiday Special (Day 1/7, Page 2/6)~~

After all the time Hector had spent with Stephanie and Thomas, especially these past few days, it was a bit strange to think they wouldn't be around anymore. In truth, he hadn't given the matter much thought, which was perhaps a good thing in its own way, but now the reality of it was beginning to hit him.

He was going to miss them.

And he frowned, but not in his usual way. He frowned in a way that was almost a smile. Because while he was sad to see them go, he was also glad that they could go, that they'd be away from him, where it was safer. It was a strange mixture of emotions, one he'd felt before but never this ardently. He didn't hate the feeling. There was a welcome sense of relief in there somewhere.

'Oh, and before I forget,' Garovel was saying, 'how much do you know about Sai-hee?'

Bohwanox bobbed his head to the side. 'The name sounds familiar. Who is that again?'

'Sai-hee is one of the four servant emperors. She stays out of the fight between Abolish and the Vanguard--or at least, that's how it was the last time I checked, which admittedly, was many years ago.'

'I see. Why do you bring her up?'

'I know that you don't want to get involved in major conflicts. If Sai-hee's reputation is to be believed, then neither does she.'

‘You are suggesting Colt and I go to her for refuge?’

‘No, no. I just mean, it might be something you’d wanna look into. I’d definitely suggest gathering more information before deciding anything.’

‘Mm. I’d rather keep a wide berth of any emperors. I’m sure Colt would feel similarly.’

Garovel offered a shrug. ‘Still, if worse comes to worst, you should know your options.’

‘I’ll keep it in mind.’

The wait wasn’t much longer. Colt returned to the garage with luggage in hand."

"421

~~Holiday Special (Day 1/7, Page 3/6)~~

Hector helped load the bags into Colt’s chosen vehicle, a midnight blue Pontiac. Afterwards, they shared one last meal together. It was a rather quiet repast, like all the others, but after a while, Colt broke the silence.

“Don’t die,” he said.

Hector looked up. “What?”

“When you’re out there,” said Colt. “Don’t die.”

Hector just tilted his brow at him.

Colt nodded toward the twins. “I want them to meet Uncle Hector when they’re actually old enough to remember him.”

His eyes widened at that. His mouth opened, but he didn’t know what to say. He glanced at the reapers, who both started laughing, which only made Hector flush red.

‘We’ll do our best,’ Garovel said in Hector’s stead.

Colt reached into his pocket and pulled out his phone. “I’ll get myself a new one to use for other things, and I’ll keep this one in reserve just for you guys. If you ever want to come find us, just give me a call.”

‘Alright.’

“Don’t lose the number. I’m guessing your phone will get destroyed one way or another, so keep my number some other way.”

‘I’ll remember it.’

Colt cocked an eyebrow at the reaper. “You’ll remember? Even if it’s five years from now?”

‘Oh yeah. Don’t worry.’

‘We have very good memories,’ said Bohwanox.

Colt gave a nod.

“W-we should, ah... we should have a code.”

Everyone looked at Hector.

“I mean, uh, y’know... just in case... because... I don’t want a repeat of... before.”

There was a brief silence, and then Colt said, “That’s a good idea. We’ll keep it simple. I won’t contact you at all from now on. You’ll call me if you want to talk. No texting. Speak directly to me or leave a voice mail. If there’s something wrong, but you can’t tell me what it is, for whatever reason, then use my first name. Jeremiah. That’ll be our code.”

“Uh. O-okay...”

‘Jeremiah,’ confirmed Garovel. ‘Got it.’”

"422

~~Holiday Special (Day 1/7, Page 4/6)~~

“Are you sure you understand?” said Colt. “This is important. If you call me Jeremiah, OR if you text me, then I’ll know you’re contacting me under duress. And moreover, I’ll know to expect some type of trap.”

“Alright, um.”

‘We understand,’ said Garovel.

“But, uh... what if, uh... if you’re the one under duress?”

“That wouldn’t happen, since you’d be the one calling and not me. But I suppose it wouldn’t hurt to have a plan for that, too. If I’m in trouble but can’t say so, then I’ll do the opposite. I’ll call you Mr. Goffe.”

“Er. Okay.”

From there, the meal and conversation both drew toward their conclusions. There was no more putting it off.

Everyone said their farewells, and Hector and Colt shared a firm handshake. On foot, Hector followed the Pontiac up the ramp and out into the early afternoon sun. He offered a last, sweeping wave goodbye as he watched Colt drive west toward Walton. A cloud of yellow-brown dust followed in the car’s wake, lingering for a while after it was gone.

‘Welp,’ said Garovel after a spell. ‘Looks like it’s just you and me again.’

“Yeah...”

‘It’s okay. They were cramping our style, anyway.’

Hector smirked and started back down into the bunker. “So what do we do now?”

‘Still waiting on a call from Gina. Hopefully, she’ll have some information for us soon. In the meantime, you should sleep. We’ll get back to training in a few hours.’

“Alright.”

--++--++--

These past couple days had been hellishly dull. Listening to the audio recordings out of the castle was more than a full-time job, yet somehow still mind-numbingly tedious. Whenever Gina slept, that meant she would be several hours behind upon waking up, and even with fast forward, trying to listen to every recording from every room she’d tagged was an organizational nightmare. A solid ninety percent of the recordings were either complete silence or just normal people talking to each other.”

~~Holiday Special (Day 1/7, Page 5/6)~~

Fortunately, Gina had a variety of underlings to help her sift through everything. Less fortunately, everyone involved had gotten a lot more from this job than they bargained for. After a while, a few of them outright refused to help her, and she couldn't really blame them, either.

The problem was what some of those normal people in the recordings were talking about. Oftentimes, there would be long conversations of trembling voices trying to console one another, if not merely bemoaning their wretched fortune. All of these people were trapped in that place with at least a half dozen psychotic murderers. Horrifically, one audio log had even captured the agonized screams of someone who was probably being killed.

Listening to all of these things, interspersed between gigantic bouts of nothing important whatsoever, was more than some of her employees could bear.

As for herself, Gina had mainly been listening to the King's chamber, but there hadn't been anything noteworthy since mention of Karkash being able to control magnetic fields. Abolish clearly didn't care to tell the King anything of importance.

Apparently, they weren't really after Hector, either. They didn't seem to count him as a credible threat, since he was so greatly outnumbered. A few of the servants had expressed interest in hunting him down, but none of them had any idea where to look and causing trouble just to bait him out of hiding would hinder their greater warmongering efforts.

None of this information was worth a phone call to Hector, she felt. She was waiting on more valuable details regarding their abilities or their movements.

Having more or less given up on the King's chamber, she spent most of her time browsing through all the different available audio feeds.

Abruptly, Karkash's voice came over the wire. <"What is it?">

Gina perked up in her chair.

“Turn that frown upside down,” said Nola. “You get to go with us to Harold! Aren’t you excited? I know I’m excited.””

"424

~~Holiday Special (Day 1/7, Page 6/6)~~

Karkash was not wholly pleased by the woman’s manic smile. “How many must go?”

“Five,” she said. “You, me, Conall, Tessa, and Hanjir. Andres is staying behind with Desmond, who is stuck babysitting the King as usual. Poor guy. I offered to fill in for him, but nobody seems to trust me. I don’t know why.”

‘Why do you need Karkash?’ said Hoyohté. To Karkash’s eyes, the reaper was an orca. Her huge, black-and-white body loomed to the right above his head, casting no shadow whatsoever, and her giant mouth did not move at all when she spoke.

Nola’s reaper floated down to answer, but her dorsal fin still stuck through the ceiling. As Karkash recalled, this one’s name was Vennek. ‘It’s not just about destroying the town,’ she said. ‘If it was, just one servant could do the job. We have to stage things carefully and make sure Rendon is blamed for the attack, which means controlling the flow of information afterwards. Karkash can make that a lot easier for us by knocking out electronics around the town. It’d be annoying if some random bystander captured footage of our activities on a camera phone or something. All the footage that gets leaked has to be of our making.’

Hoyohté gave a nod. ‘I see. Very well. We will accompany you.’

“Great,” said Nola, grinning again. She wrapped an arm around Karkash’s shoulder. “How about we grab something to eat, huh? Get to know each other a little better, yeah?”

Karkash silently removed her arm and walked away.

--++--++--

Hector awoke to Garovel’s insistence that he answer the phone. Gina’s call didn’t have a whole lot of information for him, but there was only one thing that he needed to know.

Five of them were going to be in Harold.

His heart sank as he heard that number. There was no way he could fight five servants by himself. He knew this, and by the look on the reaper's skeletal face, so did Garovel."

"425

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 1/6)~~

<"I've also learned all of the servants' names now,"> Gina was saying.

<"There's Desmond and Karkash, of course. The others are named Conall, Tessa, Nola, Andres, and Hanjir.">

"Th-thanks. That's helpful."

<"Eh. I know it's not much. There were really long periods of silence where I guess reapers were talking.">

"Don't worry about it. You've been, uh... you're, ah... very, um... I mean--"

Gina chuckled. <"Stop. I get the idea.">

"S-sorry..."

<"Oh, and I learned earlier that the one who was killed was named Stoker. Thought you might like to know.">

"Ah... I see." If nothing else, it was nice to be able to put a name to the man's face. Even if he'd been a member of Abolish, Hector couldn't help pitying him. It was clear enough, at least, that Stoker had been trying to escape from them, and while Hector didn't know the reason, it was easy to think of a few good ones.

<"But, um, anyway."> There came a long pause. <"I hope you're not planning on going to Harold, still. You understand that there's nothing you can do there, right?">

He exchanged looks with Garovel.

<"Even if Master Roman and the Queen were here, the three of you still wouldn't really stand a chance. And there's barely a week before the attack, so... I know it sucks, but you just. Um. You can't. Please don't go there.">

"Uh. Y-yeah. I know. Don't worry."

Gina sighed. <"Good. We really need you to stay alive right now.">
She'd already been disappointed to learn that Colt wasn't going to help them fight. She didn't need more bad news, Hector felt.

"Well, um. C-call me if you learn anything else."

<"Of course. Talk to you later, then.">

"Bye." After he hung up, Hector eyed Garovel again. "So?"

Garovel folded his arms, holding his scythe over his shoulder as he floated. 'You still want to go, don't you?'

Hector bobbed his head to the side. "I don't know about want to, but... I mean..."

"426

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 2/6)~~

'I won't allow it,' said Garovel. 'Gina's right. We can't go to Harold.'

"But, Garovel... we can't just let Abolish destroy an entire town full of people."

'Hector, we're not "letting" them do anything. They'll do it whether we're there or not. Either we don't go, and they destroy the town, or we do go, get killed, and then they destroy the town, anyway. That's the reason we're not going--because our presence won't make a difference.'

"But... maybe we could... help some people escape, at least?"

'At the cost of our own lives?'

His expression weakened. "You want me to just... sit this one out?"

'I'm sorry, but yes. We could try to come up with something that'll make the town evacuate, but even if we succeed and get away before Abolish shows up, they'd just pick some other town to destroy.'

He sighed and ran a hand over his head. His hair had grown out a little, as he hadn't cut it since fleeing Brighton.

'Listen. I know you don't place much value on your own life. And to be honest, we're oddly similar in that way. I don't place much value on mine, either. I've lived for a very long time already, and while I don't want to die, I won't mind terribly when I do, especially if it's for a good cause. And at times, it's helpful that we feel this way. Makes us a bit fearless. But now is not one of those times, because our lives can still help save many others. We don't have the best options in the world right now, but we have to choose the one that has the potential to do the most good.'

"Fuck..."

'However,' Garovel said slowly, 'we do have an opportunity here to do something else. It'll be dangerous, and it won't save Harold, but if we succeed, it'll definitely throw a motherfucking wrench into Abolish's plans.'

Hector's gaze hardened. "Sounds good so far. What do you want me to do?"

'It's gonna sound crazy.'

"Tell me."

'I want you to kidnap the goddamn King.'"
"427 -- XLIX.

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 3/6)~~
Chapter Forty-Nine: 'Thy converging ways...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

"Kidnap the King, huh?" Hector scratched his head. It didn't sound as crazy as he expected, honestly. But after a moment, he found himself wondering how he'd managed to reach a point in his life where kidnapping anyone--let alone a king--no longer sounded completely mad. He shook his head and tried to return to the conversation at hand. "Uh... how would I even pull that off?"

'We already know that five of them are going to be in Harold at once,' said Garovel. 'That only leaves two guarding the King.'

“So I’ll have to take on two servants...”

‘I did say it would be dangerous. But two is more manageable than five. Ideally, we could find a way to sneak through and get the King out quietly, but yes, we should obviously be prepared for a difficult fight.’

“Hmm.” He rubbed his neck. “It’s kinda fucked up, though... Sorta feels like we’ll just be using the deaths of all the people in Harold.”

‘Yeah, well. We kind of will be.’

He felt an inkling in the back of his head, a faint idea, still unformed but nagging at him. And then it hit him fully. His eyes widened, and a broad grin split his face. “Garovel!”

‘What?’

“Everyone hates me!”

‘Uh.’ Garovel looked at him confusedly. ‘Don’t be so hard on yourself?’

“No! Garovel! Everyone’s scared of me!”

‘Er. Wait... Oh!’

“Abolish wants to destroy Harold and blame it on--uh--some other country, right? But what if the Darksteel Soldier makes a public threat to destroy Harold beforehand?!”

It was the reaper’s turn to smile. ‘That might work! If Abolish destroys the town anyway, then it gets blamed on you and not a foreign country, thereby averting their trigger for war! And if they don’t destroy the town, then obviously, that’s even better!’

“And if they destroy a different town, then it’ll probably still get blamed on me!””

"427 -- XLIX.

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 3/6)~~

Chapter Forty-Nine: ‘Thy converging ways...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"Kidnap the King, huh?" Hector scratched his head. It didn't sound as crazy as he expected, honestly. But after a moment, he found himself wondering how he'd managed to reach a point in his life where kidnapping anyone--let alone a king--no longer sounded completely mad. He shook his head and tried to return to the conversation at hand. "Uh... how would I even pull that off?"

'We already know that five of them are going to be in Harold at once,' said Garovel. 'That only leaves two guarding the King.'

"So I'll have to take on two servants..."

'I did say it would be dangerous. But two is more manageable than five. Ideally, we could find a way to sneak through and get the King out quietly, but yes, we should obviously be prepared for a difficult fight.'

"Hmm." He rubbed his neck. "It's kinda fucked up, though... Sorta feels like we'll just be using the deaths of all the people in Harold."

'Yeah, well. We kind of will be.'

He felt an inkling in the back of his head, a faint idea, still unformed but nagging at him. And then it hit him fully. His eyes widened, and a broad grin split his face. "Garovel!"

'What?'

"Everyone hates me!"

'Uh.' Garovel looked at him confusedly. 'Don't be so hard on yourself?'

"No! Garovel! Everyone's scared of me!"

'Er. Wait... Oh!'

"Abolish wants to destroy Harold and blame it on--uh--some other country, right? But what if the Darksteel Soldier makes a public threat to destroy Harold beforehand?!"

It was the reaper's turn to smile. 'That might work! If Abolish destroys the town anyway, then it gets blamed on you and not a foreign country, thereby averting their trigger for war! And if they don't destroy the town, then obviously, that's even better!'

"And if they destroy a different town, then it'll probably still get blamed on me!"

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 4/6)~~

Garovel laughed. 'Not sure I've ever seen you this excited before.'

He looked for Gina's number in his phone. "We just got done talking, and I gotta call her back already..."

It started ringing, and she answered as quickly as ever. Hector struggled through explaining the general idea.

<"That's a nice thought, but there's a major problem with it.">

"W-what?"

<"When Karkash made the news a few days ago, Abolish really tightened their grip on the media. Nothing makes it to air without their approval now.">

"Shit."

<"I could put your threat up on the internet, but it wouldn't get nearly enough exposure.">

"Agh..."

'Ask her if she knows which servant is controlling the media.'

Hector did so.

<"There are two, actually. Conall and Tessa seem to be the ones responsible for public affairs, but from the sound of it, the others sometimes pitch in as well.">

'And does she know if they'll be among the five going to Harold?'

He asked her.

Gina paused. <"Actually, yeah, they will be. Are you thinking when they leave, we'll be able to sneak it through as breaking news?">

"Uh. Yeah, sure."

<"Hmm. That could work. It'll be a tight timeframe, though. The citizens of Harold won't have much time to evacuate, but I guess the only alternative would be to give them no warning at all.”>

‘That’s unfortunate for Harold, but it works out better for us,’ said Garovel. ‘Waiting until they leave ensures that our window for kidnapping the King also remains open. You should probably mention that plan to her, as well.’

“Oh, and, uh... I’m gonna try to, uh... to kidnap the King, too.”

<“Wait, WHAT?”>

--++--++--

The cloak was no longer the pristine white it had been when she procured it, but she’d wanted it more for protection against the elements than for style points.

She’d been walking for days, sleeping under the stars, hunting and gathering food but never straying too far from the road that cut through Lorent’s wide open grasslands.”

"429

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 5/6)~~

She supposed hitching a ride with someone was too much to ask. Cars were rare out here, and none of the drivers seemed especially interested in picking up a cloaked stranger. She tried pulling down her hood the next few times but still found no luck. Maybe the eye patch was off-putting. Or maybe it was the sword.

Thus far, she’d still not encountered even so much as a village. She knew Lorent was a big country, but this was getting ridiculous. All she wanted was a working phone, but she would have settled for just a bit of food that she didn’t have to kill first. Her sword wasn’t meant for hunting.

Gradually, the landscape on the left side of the road changed into wooded greenery. It would likely prove a better hunting ground, she decided, so she ventured into it. Before she found anything to eat, however, she spotted a house. It was hidden among a group of trees and would have been entirely concealed if she’d stayed closer to the road.

She approached eagerly, getting a better look at the building. One modest story, it had, along with perhaps a small attic, if the oval window beneath the roof's apex was any indication. A cobblestone chimney sat toward the back, and much of the house's white wood was overgrown with verdant moss.

She knocked on the front door, as it had no bell to ring. "Hello?!" she called, removing her hood again.

The door did not open, but someone shouted back, "Whaddy want?!" A man's voice. Elderly, too.

"Sorry to bother you," she said loudly, "but I was hoping I'd be able to use your phone!"

"Phone don't work!"

She frowned. "Then could I trouble you for a ride to the nearest town?!"

"Car don't work!"

"A place to rest, then?!"

"Bed don't work!"

She pursed her lips.

"Ain't got no food, neither, so don't ask!"

"Sir, please! My name is Lynnette, and I've been traveling for several days on foot!"

"430

~~Holiday Special (Day 2/7, Page 6/6)~~

"Then it looks like you'll be traveling for several days more!" the old man yelled. "And I don't give a damn who you are!"

Lynnette's eye throbbed. It tended to do that at the most inconvenient times. "Sir," she tried, quieter this time in hopes of luring him closer to the door, "I very much need to use a phone. I'd be quite appreciative of any help you could--"

There came a hastened rustle from inside the house, and a moment later, the door swung open. The balding old man was pointing a shotgun at her. "Young lady, in what capacity have I failed to make myself clear?"

She eyed the double-barrel, not concerned in the slightest. "Sir, you don't want to do that."

He barked a laugh. "Oh, don't I?"

"Please put the gun down, sir."

"Can't you tell when a man wants to be left in peace?! You think I live out here because I like visitors?! How'd you find me, anyway?! Are you from the government?! After all these years, now you decide to take me away?! Is that it?!"

"Sir--"

"You dogs'll never take me alive! I ain't goin' back to prison, so just get on out of here before I do something dramatic! I'm unstable, ya hear?! I'm crazy!"

"Yes, I can see that. But I really do need to use your phone."

"Woman! Are you fuckin' deaf?! I will rip you in half with this here buckshot!"

"Sir, you can try, but that's not gonna work out well for you. Trust me."

"That a threat?! You threatenin' me now?!"

Lynnette sighed. "Well, if you're gonna shoot me, then allow me to move over here so you don't accidentally kill yourself." And as she took a step to the right, the man pulled the trigger.

From no more than a meter away, she took the shot square in the chest. And instead of tearing into her, it met a sudden purple shadow and bounced right off, leaving Lynnette entirely unharmed."

"431

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 1/6)~~

The rebounding blast clipped the old man's shoulder. He dropped the gun and fell to the ground, groaning in agony.

"I feel a little bad, but I did try to warn you."

The man clutched his shoulder and growled, "What are you?!"

"I'm not too sure myself anymore," she said. "But look, you're wounded. I'd be happy to call you an ambulance. Or would you rather I went to find help on foot?"

"Argh...!" His groaning protests soon became breathy whimpers. "In the den. The satellite phone."

"What's the number for the emergency services around here?"

"7-5-1."

"Hang in there, sir." She wasn't terribly concerned over his condition since the wound didn't look very bad, but all the same, she decided she should make the emergency call first.

She found the phone exactly where he said it would be and raised her left hand up to dial, and upon that left hand was a rather special thing.

A kind of half-gauntlet, it was. It did not cover her fingers, nor was it made of metal. Instead, it was crafted from bone.

She spoke to a woman and warned that the driver should take special care to look for the house hidden in the woods, and the operator said it would be about twenty minutes before they arrived.

Lynnette decided to rummage around the house for some bandages and dress the man's wound just in case. He hadn't bled that much, but there was no harm in the extra caution, she figured.

And at length, she was able to dial the number that Roman had given her. The long-distance call took a little while to connect, but it eventually went through. And for her trouble, she received a busy signal. "Oh, come on! This can't be happening!" She tried again. "Gina! I swear, if you don't take my call--!"

<"Hello?">

"FINALLY! Goddess above!" She collapsed into a rocking chair.

<"Who is this?">

"It's Lynnette Edith. Gina, if you say you don't remember me, I'm going to lose my shit right now."

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 2/6)~~

Gina laughed. <"Don't worry, I remember you. In fact, I've been expecting your call for a while. Where are you?">

"I'm in Lorent. On foot. Please tell me you can help me fix that."

<"What's the nearest town?">

She turned to the old man. He was resting on the sofa now. "Hey, what town is the ambulance coming from?"

He groaned at her but said, "Linkerton."

"Which hospital?"

"There's only one clinic."

"Thanks. You get that, Gina?"

<"Yeah. Let me call Hector real quick and put him en route to the Linkerton clinic. I'll call you right back.">

She waited, rocking the chair back and forth. The motion of it made her contemplate a nap then and there, but Gina called back before she drifted off too far.

<"Okay. He's on his way. So tell me. How've you been? I'm guessing terrible.">

"That's pretty accurate. What about you?"

<"Oh, I'm doing just fine. Spying on Abolish. Learning all their secrets.">

Lynnette blinked. "What?"

<"I planted listening devices all over Belgrant Castle.">

"Are you serious?"

<"Yep. Don't worry. It's super fun and in no way terrifying.">

"You don't have anyone there to protect you? Or is that what Hector's been up to?"

<"Oh, that's right. You don't know."> And as Gina explained Hector's circumstances, her tone became considerably less jovial.

Lynnette could hardly believe it. That timid guy had become the most wanted criminal in the country? She wondered if he'd even be the same person when she saw him again.

Soon, the ambulance arrived, and Lynnette had to hang up the satellite phone in order to hitch a ride on it. The clinic in Linkerton wasn't particularly far, and she ended up waiting around for another half hour before Hector rode into the parking lot on his silver motorcycle.

Apart from his black riding jacket, he didn't seem so different. As he pulled off his helmet, he offered her a meek smile, but after a moment, it spoiled into a look of confusion."

"433

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 3/6)~~

"Lynn?" said Hector, abruptly very concerned. "What's happened to you?"

She tilted her head at him. "What do you mean?"

"Garovel says... that you... your presence is really different?" He paused, no doubt listening to the invisible reaper again. "He says you're not an aberration, but still... um... Garovel, what the hell are you trying to say?"

"Oh. I guess he's sensing this thing." She held up her half-gauntlet. "It was crafted from an aberration's bones. It's okay. It won't hurt you, and neither will I."

"Garovel's really confused..."

"Well, it is dangerous," said Lynnette. She clenched her fist, and the violet shadow enveloped it. "I basically stole it from the Vanguard. Or rather, I was forced to."

"Y-you... uh... why?"

“The Queen told me to try it on. Test it out while they weren’t looking.” She yanked at the gauntlet with her other arm, and it didn’t budge. “But apparently, once you put it on, it doesn’t want to be removed. Those Vanguard people were going to cut my arm off in order to get it back.”

“Oh...”

“Yeah. Her Highness ordered me to run. So I did.” The purple shadow leapt up from her arm, twisting into the shape of a hammer, then into a shield, then into a sword. “I can see why they wanted it back so badly. This thing is really strong. It’s not like the one that you and I fought in Sescoria.”

“How... so?”

“Well, for one thing, when I fled on my own, I didn’t make a clean get away. I had to fight a servant. And I won. Easily.”

“Ah...”

She gauged his expression, the way his eyes moved from her to an empty space where Garovel presumably resided. “I still can’t see or hear reapers, by the way.”

“O-okay...”

Lynnette tried to give him a smile. “I haven’t suddenly lost my mind and become a murderous psychopath, if that’s what you’re worried about.”

“No, well... I mean... m-maybe a little worried...”

"434 -- L.

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 4/6)~~

“Are you going to give me a ride back to Atreya?” said Lynnette. “Or should I start walking?”

And again, Hector was quiet a moment. He looked at her intently. “Um. C-could you tell me more about that thing on your wrist, first?”

“What do you want to know?”

“How... are you controlling it, exactly?”

She gave a shrug. "It just does what I want it to do. Like an extra limb, I suppose. Except..."

"Except?"

She made the shadow disappear again. "It does also feel... alive. Somehow."

"Hmm. W-what do you mean?"

"I'm not sure yet," she said, frowning. "I'm still getting accustomed to it. But maybe that isn't the answer you were looking for."

He nodded uncertainly, but after a time, he motioned toward the bike. "Let's go back to Atreya. You can, ah... tell me more later... you look pretty tired."

She took a relieved breath.

Chapter Fifty: 'O, strange guardian...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

He'd never seen the Lorentian countryside. Sunny skies and flat greenery as far as the eye could see. Not even mountains in the distance.

The motorcycle's roaring engine made it impossible to have a conversation with Lynnette, but Hector didn't mind so much. It gave him and Garovel a chance to discuss her unique situation. Hector did mind, however, having someone on the motorcycle with him for the first time. When it was just him riding alone, he didn't have to worry so much about screwing up and crashing. He would survive. Having Lynnette here made him all sorts of uncomfortable, especially with how she had to wrap her arms around his stomach to keep herself steady. He'd never done very well with physical contact.

Still, he did his best to ignore it. If he just focused on the road ahead of him, it wasn't so bad.

'I don't like this,' said Garovel.

'I know,' said Hector. 'But it's Lynn. I'm not gonna just leave her out here...'"

"434 -- L.

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 4/6)~~

“Are you going to give me a ride back to Atreya?” said Lynnette. “Or should I start walking?”

And again, Hector was quiet a moment. He looked at her intently. “Um. C-could you tell me more about that thing on your wrist, first?”

“What do you want to know?”

“How... are you controlling it, exactly?”

She gave a shrug. “It just does what I want it to do. Like an extra limb, I suppose. Except...”

“Except?”

She made the shadow disappear again. “It does also feel... alive. Somehow.”

“Hmm. W-what do you mean?”

“I’m not sure yet,” she said, frowning. “I’m still getting accustomed to it. But maybe that isn’t the answer you were looking for.”

He nodded uncertainly, but after a time, he motioned toward the bike. “Let’s go back to Atreya. You can, ah... tell me more later... you look pretty tired.”

She took a relieved breath.

Chapter Fifty: ‘O, strange guardian...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

He’d never seen the Lorentian countryside. Sunny skies and flat greenery as far as the eye could see. Not even mountains in the distance.

The motorcycle’s roaring engine made it impossible to have a conversation with Lynnette, but Hector didn’t mind so much. It gave him and Garovel a chance to discuss her unique situation. Hector did mind, however, having someone on the motorcycle with him for the first time. When it was just him riding alone, he didn’t have to worry so much about screwing up and crashing. He would survive. Having Lynnette here made him all sorts of uncomfortable, especially with how she had to wrap her arms around his stomach to keep herself steady.

He'd never done very well with physical contact.

Still, he did his best to ignore it. If he just focused on the road ahead of him, it wasn't so bad.

'I don't like this,' said Garovel.

'I know,' said Hector. 'But it's Lynn. I'm not gonna just leave her out here...'"

"435

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 5/6)~~

The reaper had been keeping his distance from Lynnette, and even now, he stayed a ways ahead of the motorcycle as it sped down the road. 'I suppose if she's telling the truth, then she'll be a valuable ally to have.'

'What can you tell me about her aura or whatever it's called?'

'It's an odd presence. Geoffrey's the only aberration we've ever seen, so our point of reference is pretty limited, but compared to him, her aura is quite different. I can still sense that she's human. That part of her seems no different from what I saw of her before. I guess that means she really is herself, still.'

'But...?'

'The wrist guard she's wearing has a presence of its own. A very potent one, no less. If Geoffrey's aura was a sword, then that thing's aura is a stick of dynamite. And because I don't know how it works, it just makes me very uneasy.'

Abruptly, Hector felt something against his upper back. His grip on the handlebars tightened as he tried not to freak out and run off the road. 'G-Garovel! What's she doing?!'

The reaper slowed down to see. And he started laughing. 'She's asleep. Looks like she really was tired.'

'That--! But--! I--! She's--! Garovel, make her stop!'

'Just try to relax,' said Garovel, still chuckling. 'I bet it'd be easier for you if she did turn out to be a psychotic monster, huh?'

‘Agh! I should’ve left her behind!’

Garovel just laughed harder.

After a while, they approached the border. Crossing it on the way here hadn’t been the easiest thing. The roads all had checkpoints, and he couldn’t just waltz right through them. So like he’d done the first time, he made a ramp and bridge for himself, allowing the bike to go right over the checkpoint on a wave of metal. There were more border guards this time, but they all just kind of stood there and stared at him as he flew over their heads."

"436

~~Holiday Special (Day 3/7, Page 6/6)~~

The bike jostled as its tires hit the road again, which thankfully stirred Lynnette back awake. And just like that, they were in Atreyan territory. He annihilated the metal bridge as they sped away.

‘Hmm,’ said Garovel, hovering a bit closer to Lynnette now. ‘I’m a little worried what the Vanguard was doing with something like this in the first place.’

‘You think... they have aberrations working with them?’

‘I don’t know enough about aberrations to say for sure, but if all of them are like Geoffrey, then there’s no way the Vanguard would work with them.’

‘How come you don’t know more about aberrations? They seem like, uh... kind of a big deal.’

‘I’m guessing they’re a recent development in the world. When I was a member of the Vanguard, aberrations weren’t a problem we faced. I don’t think they even existed. If they did, then they were hidden extremely well.’

‘Hmm.’

‘I wonder how common they are. Their presence could change everything in the war between the two big powers. Hell, maybe it already has.’

‘You think so?’

‘Well, yeah. Neutrality has always been a big thing. A lot of reapers believe that death is fated and shouldn’t be interfered with or just don’t want to get involved for whatever reason, so they don’t take on servants. That’s never been a problem, because as long as we stay away from big conflicts, we can’t be killed. But if there are these random monsters in the world who can hurt us, then that’s a big deal, like you said. Reapers who’ve never taken on a servant before suddenly have a very compelling reason to.’

‘Ah... like Bohwanox, huh? He only revived Colt after getting wounded by Geoffrey, didn’t he?’

‘Yeah. If that sort of thing happens on a larger scale, it’ll have a huge impact. All those new servants and reapers. Even if most of them try to stay out of the war, some of them are bound to get involved.’”

"437

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 1/6)~~

Hector listened to the wind howl past his riding helmet. He’d offered it to Lynnette, but she said she didn’t need it. For anyone else, he would have insisted. ‘I guess you, uh... you don’t agree with those reapers who think death is fated, huh?’

‘Correct,’ said Garovel, ‘though that’s beside the point. Even if I did believe in fate, why should I think that reapers exist outside its influence? If I had you save someone, then why should I not consider you to have been fated to save them?’

‘Uh... I dunno...’

‘Me neither. I don’t understand reapers who think that way. I suppose that’s why I think fate is a useless concept. You can make it conform to anything you want, which is just generally counterproductive to the learning process.’

‘Huh...’

‘You disagree?’

‘No, I... have no opinion, really.’

Garovel let the matter lie.

It was a ways to the bunker yet. Grassy plains gradually transformed into barren, dirty badlands. Eventually, though, they arrived. Hector opened the door in the ground. Lynnette went in on foot, and he wheeled the bike in after her. There wasn't much gas left in the tank, he realized. Hopefully, the bunker would have a supply. For the moment, however, he had a fresh question for Lynnette.

"So, ah... how much can, uh... ah..." He faltered, but Lynnette was patient with him. He had to avoid looking her in the face. "H-how much can you tell me about, um... about aberrations?"

"How much do you know about them?" she asked.

"Not much, I guess... Judging from your, uh... your gauntlet, I'm assuming they all have those... death-taffy things..."

She gave him a bemused grin. "Death-taffy?"

"Y-yeah, they're stretchy like taffy, but... deadlier?"

She laughed faintly, as did Garovel. "Yeah, all aberrations have one of these things. Roman talked about them while we were traveling together. Her Highness had all sorts of questions for him. I mostly just listened.""

"438

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 2/6)~~

"Are all aberrations as, um... as violent and crazy as Geoffrey was?"

"Geoffrey? Oh, is that the name of the one we fought?"

"Yeah..."

Lynnette rubbed above her eye patch. "Do you happen to know where he is?"

"Uh..."

"I've been wanting to get revenge for my eye."

He wasn't sure how else to say it, so he just said, "I killed him."

Lynnette blinked. "Oh. What happened?"

But Hector couldn't bring himself to explain. He knew she was one of the few people who would understand. Hell, she probably understood well enough already. But he just didn't want to talk about it. He didn't even want to think about it.

At his strained silence, she seemed to get the idea. "Oh, I didn't answer your question. From what Roman said, yeah, I think all aberrations are extremely violent. I think his exact words were that aberrations are always looking for amusement. They're just always amused by killing people, apparently."

"I see..."

"He said they can't really be controlled, either, because they tend to just do whatever they want. The only reason Abolish is able to manage them at all is because it lets them run wild."

"Sounds... accurate."

"Oh, and they grow stronger by consuming souls. That's why they all enjoy killing so much."

Hector just nodded.

She held her gauntlet up again. "I'm not sure if this can grow stronger in the same way. I'm not sure it matters, either. Even if I knew how to consume someone's soul, it sounds pretty disgusting."

His mouth twisted. "Egh, yeah... and you wouldn't be able to consume a servant's soul, anyway."

"No?"

"Our souls are bound to our reapers, so..."

"Hmm. Would I be able to consume a reaper's soul, then?"

Hector looked at Garovel.

'I don't know! Probably! I don't think I wanna find out!'

Hector offered Lynnette a shrug.

"What else do you want to know?"

“Uh...”

‘Ask her for details about what that wrist guard is capable of.’”

"439

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 3/6)~~

Hector's eyes fell upon her gauntlet. "What can that thing do, exactly?"

"Well, it's malleable," she said. The shadow took the shape of a small bird perched on her arm. "It seems like it can conform to any shape I want it to. I'm still learning."

"Does it have like a... maximum range or something?"

"Yes, it does." The shade shot out toward the garage's far wall and reached it, then looped back around but stopped halfway. It strained to reach her but could extend no farther. "What would you say that is? Twenty meters or so?"

"Maybe. But, uh..." He turned to look at Garovel, who'd retreated behind him. "Would you mind not doing that so suddenly, though? I think you scared Garovel."

"Oh! I'm so sorry!" She reeled the shadow back in. "Where is he? I didn't hurt him, did I?"

"N-no, he's fine."

She put her arm back down, keeping it inside her dirty cloak. "The shadow also protects me from harm, but I'm sure you knew that already."

"Y-yeah."

"It has another power that I haven't been able to use yet. Something called Incineration."

He tilted his head. "Incineration?"

"Don't ask me what it means. That's just what I heard the Vanguard servants calling it."

"Hmm..."

She rolled her shoulders and neck. "Maybe I should just tell you the whole story. Ah--but it might be pretty long. Do you have anything to eat around here first? I'm starving."

"Oh, sure. Uh--follow me." He led her to the kitchen. The choices weren't exactly gourmet. Everything here was meant to last for months without requiring refrigeration.

Lynnette grabbed a bunch of different things and sat down at the small table by the door. Atop the pile, she added the contents of her rucksack: a slab of charred meat and some wild berries. "So we flew to Korgum first," she said, unwrapping a packet of beef jerky, "and that was a dead end."

"440

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 4/6)~~

Hector didn't join her at the table, choosing instead to stand in the doorway with his arms folded.

"The Vanguard in Korgum wouldn't even have a proper meeting with us, but we honestly couldn't blame them. We were only there for a few days, but in that time, our plane was shot down, and we were attacked by Abolish patrols four separate times. I'm sure the Queen and I would have both died there if not for Roman." She shook her head. "And afterwards, he was suddenly much stronger. Almost like a different person."

Hector and Garovel exchanged glances. "Roman achieved emergence?"

"Yes. He ended up explaining that at length, too. Do you need me to relay what he said?"

"No, that's okay... I, uh... I've had my own experiences with it."

Her brow rose at that, but rather than inquiring further, she chose to continue her story. "The Vanguard there wouldn't help us, because they were clearly dealing with a lot already, but they did point us in the direction of another division, which was in Callum. So we went there next. And without a plane, that trip took a while.

“The group we found was more accommodating than the ones in Korgum, but Her Highness was rather quick to become displeased. Something about her negotiations with them left her quite unhappy. They were kind enough to give us a tour of their facility, which was when I encountered the gauntlet. They were conducting experiments on it, and when the Queen mentioned having fought an aberration before, the person in charge of the study was rather eager to tell us more. Apparently, they were trying to discover the exact mechanism by which its power is made to grow. They thought that artifacts like this might provide insight into emergence in servants.”

‘Ah,’ said Garovel. ‘Even more dangerous than I expected.’

“Did they make any progress on that?” Hector asked.

“No, I don’t believe so. They were very frustrated.”

‘Ha. Good.’”

"441

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 5/6)~~

Lynnette took a hearty swig of water. “The real problems started when it was made clear that we were not allowed to leave the facility. It became delay after delay and excuse after excuse. The Queen’s mood only worsened, and eventually, she told me to try the gauntlet on. I didn’t argue. I was just as curious as she was, really. And from there, the situation descended very quickly into chaos. I wasn’t even sure that she and Roman made it out safely until I spoke with Gina.”

“Seems... kinda reckless on the Queen’s part...”

“Perhaps. But then again, I think Her Highness was planning to have me steal it anyway, but when they started talking about taking off my arm to retrieve it, she accelerated her plans for my sake.”

“And then... you were able to beat a servant? Without any trouble, even?”

She nodded. “I’ll demonstrate how, if you want.”

‘That’s a very good idea,’ said Garovel. ‘You should start sparring with her as soon as possible. With Colt gone, a new training partner is invaluable right now.’

“Uh... Garovel wants me to spar with you...”

“Oh yes?”

‘You should help her gauge how strong the gauntlet really is. And ask her for some pointers on how to use a sword. Oh, and demonstrate your powers to her, too. It’s important that she understands what you’re capable of. Also, maybe you should--’

“Garovel, I get it. We’ve got a lot to do...”

‘I’m just offering suggestions.’

He looked at Lynnette again and immediately regretted it, meeting her gaze for a moment and having to blush and look away. “Ah--uh... you really don’t mind? Training with me, I mean.”

“Sure, but before that, could you tell me about what’s been happening in Atreya? What has Abolish been doing in the capital?”

“Ah, yeah... I needed to tell you that, anyway. Because, um. I’m hoping you’ll accompany me when I go to Sescoria next week.”

"442 -- LI.

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 6/6)~~

Lynnette stopped chewing to raise an eyebrow at him. “You’re going back there?” she said. “Isn’t that incredibly dangerous?”

“...Yeah.”

“Oh,” she said, stiffening in her seat. “You’re going there to pick a fight.” She paused for a rogue’s grin. “Tell me more.”

Chapter Fifty-One: ‘Of shifting tides...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

David spent the next week juggling a dozen different things. Between his meetings with King William, Duchess Jezebel, all of his brothers, and not to mention the unannounced visits from Nola, it was a struggle to find time for genuine scheming.

But he'd managed one thing, at least. For Jezebel, he'd assisted in setting up a rather large network of informants consisting of the kind of people who would normally be overlooked by David's peers. And he certainly needed their help. He wanted eyes on everyone at all times, which wasn't entirely possible for the Abolishers, as they scared the living shit out of everyone who might otherwise be willing to help keep tabs on them.

Still, word gradually trickled down to him of a plan that Abolish had for the little town of Harold. No one seemed able to give him details, but he knew that it would be enacted very soon. Too soon, in fact. There was no time to learn enough about it, let alone develop a counter-plan.

All throughout the week, he grew increasingly concerned over the matter, which made the time pass ever slower.

And then the day arrived, and everything started moving at once. First, the Abolishers began to leave the castle one by one, and soon, only Desmond Grantier and Andres Geth remained. Next, came the news report.

It was a video of none other than the Darksteel Soldier. David could scarcely believe what he was watching.

This young black man with the most infamous face in the nation was speaking directly into the camera. Very slowly, the words came, each one eerily quiet in its delivery, nearly making David strain to listen."
"442 -- LI.

~~Holiday Special (Day 4/7, Page 6/6)~~

Lynnette stopped chewing to raise an eyebrow at him. "You're going back there?" she said. "Isn't that incredibly dangerous?"

"...Yeah."

"Oh," she said, stiffening in her seat. "You're going there to pick a fight." She paused for a rogue's grin. "Tell me more."

Chapter Fifty-One: 'Of shifting tides...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

David spent the next week juggling a dozen different things. Between his meetings with King William, Duchess Jezebel, all of his brothers, and not to mention the unannounced visits from Nola, it was a struggle to find time for genuine scheming.

But he'd managed one thing, at least. For Jezebel, he'd assisted in setting up a rather large network of informants consisting of the kind of people who would normally be overlooked by David's peers. And he certainly needed their help. He wanted eyes on everyone at all times, which wasn't entirely possible for the Abolishers, as they scared the living shit out of everyone who might otherwise be willing to help keep tabs on them.

Still, word gradually trickled down to him of a plan that Abolish had for the little town of Harold. No one seemed able to give him details, but he knew that it would be enacted very soon. Too soon, in fact. There was no time to learn enough about it, let alone develop a counter-plan.

All throughout the week, he grew increasingly concerned over the matter, which made the time pass ever slower.

And then the day arrived, and everything started moving at once. First, the Abolishers began to leave the castle one by one, and soon, only Desmond Grantier and Andres Geth remained. Next, came the news report.

It was a video of none other than the Darksteel Soldier. David could scarcely believe what he was watching.

This young black man with the most infamous face in the nation was speaking directly into the camera. Very slowly, the words came, each one eerily quiet in its delivery, nearly making David strain to listen."

"443

~~Holiday Special (Day 5/7, Page 1/6)~~

<"Within the next twenty-four hours,"> Hector was saying on the television, < "I... the Darksteel Soldier, as you call me... will annihilate... the town of Harold... in its entirety... If you do not wish to die... then I suggest... you leave now...">

It wasn't the kind of voice David would have imagined, but somehow, this struck him as much worse. And the media seemed to share his opinion. They were playing the video on a loop with horrified commentary. Vain attempts were made to keep people calm, but it spread across channels with public alerts interrupting almost every program.

And yet, horrid as it was, the coincidence did not escape David's notice. The town of Harold. And there was also the matter of Hector's previous media firestorm. David remembered listening to Desmond chew Karkash out for making the news. So what was this young man's investment in Harold? David couldn't understand the boy's motive.

He did not have very long to think on the matter, as he was not watching the footage alone.

Desmond burst out laughing. "YES! He's up to something! What do you think he's gonna do next?!"

Andres stroked his chin, unable to conceal his smirk. "I wonder. He's obviously trying to evacuate the town, which begs the question: how did he find out?"

"Oh! You think he has a spy in the castle?" Desmond's gaze went to the empty space adjacent him. "Aw, don't be like that. It would've been so boring if everything went without a hitch." He paused. "Yeah, yeah, alright. I'll start questioning people."

David glanced at the King before looking back at the Abolishers. He decided to take the risk and ask an intervening question. "Could someone please explain what is happening here?"

Andres and Desmond exchanged looks, and then Andres said, "We've received intelligence that this Darksteel Soldier is an enemy of the Crown. He wants to destroy Atreya, you see."

David put on a worried frown. "Is that so? Why would he want that?"

Desmond shrugged. "Who could say for sure? I'm sure your family has made many enemies over the years."

"444

~~Holiday Special (Day 5/7, Page 2/6)~~

There was no denying that much, David conceded. But even so, their tune had changed much too quickly. He was more than a little reluctant to believe whatever they told him, and yet, perhaps listening to what they wanted him to believe would grant him a better notion of what the truth was. "Why do you suspect this young man has a spy in our castle?"

They hesitated again.

David was on touchy ground with that question, and he knew it. They didn't realize that he knew they had some type of agenda involving Harold. He wondered how much they would tell him.

"Well," said Andres, "I'm sure you've noticed that all of our comrades are not here at the moment. We don't believe it's a coincidence that this video was leaked today, of all days."

"I was wondering about that," said David. "Where have your friends all gone, exactly?"

"They received a request to return to HQ," said Desmond. "But don't worry. They will be back soon."

"Ah." Passable lies, he supposed. Time to press further, then. "Why did you say he was obviously trying to evacuate Harold?"

Andres' expression twitched. A sudden flash of irritation.

"We have a delicate operation there," said Desmond, still as cool as ever. "He probably wants to sabotage it."

"Oh? What type of operation?"

Desmond was ready with a smile. "Military supplies and so forth. The details would probably bore you, but if you're so interested, then I'll take you there tomorrow and give you a tour of the facility."

David was impressed as he returned a grin of his own. Doubtless, something would prevent that promise from being fulfilled. Perhaps it was time to petition Jezebel for an investigation. The only point where Abolish seemed to consistently encounter any difficulty was where the Darksteel Soldier stood.

--++--++--

Hector and Lynnette entered Sescoria from the east, him on his motorcycle, her in a sleek car of dark green."

"445

~~Holiday Special (Day 5/7, Page 3/6)~~

Lynnette had expressed concern that the vehicle was too flashy, that it would stand out too much, but Garovel insisted that they worry more about speed than looks. A car that could blend in was of little value when enemy reapers could track them through walls.

The plan had changed multiple times over the week due to a confluence of factors, the first of which being his training with Lynnette. In the beginning, he'd been a bit worried about hurting her, but that concern was now long dead. Lynnette completely kicked the shit out of him. So he started using his iron against her. And it made no difference whatsoever.

It was her apparent strength that allowed them to rethink their strategy for today. Suddenly, Hector wasn't going to be faced with a two-on-one fight. If anything, he felt like he was going to be the one providing support. The only advantage he had over her was that he could see reapers and she couldn't.

In addition to accounting for Lynnette's presence, Gina's information revealed that it wasn't just the King who was trapped in the castle. So now, the plan was not just to kidnap him but to get as many people out of there as possible.

And then there was the video. That had been a trying endeavor. The sheer number of takes he had to do in order to get it right was monstrous. It was mostly him agonizing through it for hours on end, with Garovel watching and being in turns amused, bored, and irritated by the lack of progress. In fact, Hector had been prepared to keep going, but Garovel informed him that one of the takes he'd done would work very well. He was doubtful but deferred to the reaper's opinion. And then today arrived, and he heard from Gina that Garovel had been right on the money.

Now it was just a matter of getting to the castle."

"446

~~Holiday Special (Day 5/7, Page 4/6)~~

At a glance, Sescoria seemed just as he remembered it. Tall, cylindrical buildings were common, as were the accompanying whites and blues. If he didn't know better, he might've thought everything here was normal.

Soon, they came upon the gatehouse. It had been destroyed during Hector's last visit and looked to have just begun reconstruction. It was closed, as they knew it would be, but still had a pair of uniformed officers standing guard.

Lynnette pulled over and exited her vehicle. Hector parked his bike behind her, keeping his motorcycle helmet on as he joined her.

"So?" she asked. "Can Garovel tell where Desmond is?"

That was their first objective. They knew from Gina's intel that Desmond rarely left the King's side. And as Garovel had seen Desmond's aura before, it was possible for the reaper to recognize and locate the man's presence.

'Yep,' said Garovel. 'I can lead you straight to him.'

Hector nodded at her. "Follow me."

Entering through the front gate had seemed like a bad idea when Gina first pitched it to them, but she explained that the reconstruction meant barely anyone was using it.

As he and Lynnette approached the wooden barricade, Hector covered the security cameras with iron. The guards on either side came out of their little watch houses, and he immobilized them both with metal. Each guard had a radio on his hip. Lynnette confiscated them both.

Hector removed his riding helmet, revealing his face to the two guards.

"Oh fuck!" said the one on the right.

"Don't worry," said Lynnette. "We'd like to let you go. It would be in your own best interests if you fled from this place now. Do you understand?"

Barely able to move their heads, the guards exchanged looks with one another. And after a moment, they said, "Yes!" and, "We understand!"

Hector released them, and they immediately ran away. Lynnette handed him a radio. He hooked it onto his belt."

~~Holiday Special (Day 5/7, Page 5/6)~~

The barricade stood a good four meters tall, preventing entry. There was supposed to be a large stone archway above, but it hadn't been rebuilt yet. Lynnette seemed ready to climb over, but Hector motioned for her to hold off, and instead, he raised platforms for the both of them. They reached the top of the gate, and then he raised more platforms on the other side as well, allowing them to simply step over and be lowered back down.

"Aren't you handy," said Lynnette. She'd pulled up the hood of her white cloak again, which she recently had cleaned. She'd made several trips into the city over the week, one of which was for fresh clothes--not just for herself but for Hector, too, as he couldn't shop for himself without causing a panic. She seemed to have grown especially fond of her cloak, though, to the point where she'd even gotten him a black one to wear. She could pull the look off, he thought, but he felt ridiculous in his and chose not to wear it. And besides, it wasn't really motorcycle-friendly attire.

'Over there.' Garovel pointed toward the west side of the castle.

They cut across the huge garden with Hector leading the way. He'd been able to learn the layout thanks to the building plans that Gina found for him. Lynnette already knew the castle and grounds, of course, but he wanted to be prepared.

Inside now, he kept an eye out for more security cameras, as did Garovel, and made sure to obstruct each one. Every guardsman they encountered was similarly subdued, but he couldn't let these ones go just yet. Instead, he found a spare office and began collecting them like life-size figurines. He had to cover their mouths so they couldn't yell out for help, but he was careful not to block any of their nostrils. Garovel promised to remind him that they would need to be released later, but Hector hoped he wouldn't forget such an important thing in the first place."

"448

~~Holiday Special (Day 5/7, Page 6/6)~~

Of course, these people would be able to recognize Lynnette, and at first, she merely tried to keep her face obscured by her hood, but after Hector hauled his fifth guard into the room, she chose to reveal herself.

"You all remember me, yes?"

One of them tried to speak, but he was too muffled by the iron, so Hector uncovered his mouth, along with all the others'. "Lynnette, what the fuck are you doing with him?!"

"He is on our side," she said, her posture abruptly more rigid. At their sounds of disbelief, she added, "I know what you've heard about him, but it is untrue. I am vouching for him."

"Then what is all this? Why are you holding us captive?"

"We couldn't risk you trying to inform Abolish of our presence right away." She looked the guardsmen over another time. "You've all been trapped in this castle with them. You must already know that they are not to be trusted."

"Of course we know. They're fucking lunatics."

"Shut up! You wanna die?! They can hear through walls, you idiot!"

"We are going to fight them," said Lynnette. "Which means they'll be distracted. We want you to use that opportunity to get as many people out of the building as you can."

"You're crazy if you think you can win against them!"

She lifted her gauntlet and loosed a chunk of the violet shade.

"What the hell is that?!"

"We will be fine," she said, "but regardless, whether or not we win is not your concern. Just worry about taking advantage of the distraction we provide for as long as we're able to provide it."

They fell quiet at that, and after a moment, Hector released them all. They still looked at him like he was some kind of demon, but if they had anything else to say about it, then they decided to keep it to themselves.

Lynnette pressed them for an answer. "Can we count on your help?"

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 1/6)~~

“Yes,” said the rightmost guardsman.

“Hell no!” said a different one. And he tried to flee, but the purple streak wrapped around him before he could reach the door and dragged him back to Lynnette.

She turned him around to face her. “Allow me to rephrase,” she said. “You will help us.”

The man kicked her in the stomach, and with her violet shield, she didn’t so much as flinch. Instead, her lone eye narrowed, and the guardsman turned pale.

“Lynn...” The word from Hector was quiet, enough so that it took Lynnette a moment to register that Hector had said anything at all. And when she turned to look at him, he said, “Let him go... We can’t force him to risk his life...”

By the expression on her face, she did not agree, but nonetheless, she allowed the man to flee unharmed.

The remaining guards left as well to begin evacuating and recruiting their other comrades to the cause.

‘By now,’ said Garovel, ‘we’ve probably lost the element of surprise, at least partially. Whoever’s monitoring the security cameras will have noticed all the black screens and reported it.’

Hector offered a small shrug. “That’s fine... I mean, we wouldn’t provide much of a distraction if we stayed hidden the whole time.”

Garovel gave an admmissive nod.

Hector followed Lynn back into the hallway. “Where’s Desmond now?” he asked the reaper.

Garovel pointed. ‘About twenty meters or so that way. If they’ve received the report, then his reaper will probably be recognizing our auras right about now.’

Hector led the way, but before they even reached the end of the hall, Prince Nathaniel turned into it, stopping dead in his tracks as soon as he saw Hector's face.

Lynnette was on the man in a heartbeat, binding him in violet with one hand and drawing her sword with the other.

"Lynn!" said Hector, running after her. "What're you doing?!"

"450

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 2/6)~~

"This is the person who tried to kill Her Highness," said Lynnette too calmly. The purple shadow wrapped around Nathaniel's face, suppressing his scream. "He's the one who set all of this madness in motion."

Hector blinked at the unexpected answer. "H-how do you know that?"

"The Queen told me herself." Lynnette pulled the man closer and raised her blade. "I'm struggling to find a reason why I should not simply kill him here and now."

"B-because he's just a normal person," said Hector. "I don't... I mean... are you sure there's no other way to handle this?"

Lynnette glared at the prince as she considered what to do.

Hector looked at Garovel. 'Should I do something? Should I stop her?'

'I don't see much reason to,' said Garovel. 'That is definitely Prince Nathaniel, and we already know that the princes are working with Abolish.'

'But he's... I... I mean, I know he's our enemy, but...'

'She knows more about the matter than we do. I'd say it's her decision.'

Hector just frowned.

Lynnette growled and sheathed her sword. She dragged Nathaniel into the nearest room and shoved him into a closet. Then she turned to Hector. "Would you mind leaving him encased in metal?"

He took a breath and nodded. A moment later, the prince was a statue from the nose down.

Lynnette shut the closet door on him. "We'll come back for you later, if we can," she said through the white oak. "Then we'll find you more suitable accommodations. In prison."

As they were leaving, Hector had to say, "Uh. Th-thank you... for not killing him."

"I couldn't be a hundred percent sure Her Highness would have wanted me to. He is still her brother, after all."

'Desmond is very close,' Garovel informed him. 'Maybe two hallways over.'

"Desmond's close by," relayed Hector. "Get ready."

"I've been ready."

They returned to the hall, and soon enough, Desmond appeared at the far end. And he just stood there, not ready to come closer yet.

"Great to see you again!" he shouted across the marbled corridor."
"451

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 3/6)~~

Rather than replying, Hector armored himself up. The helm formed around his head just as he'd memorized it. Then came the gauntlets, breastplate, and leggings. It wasn't a full suit of armor, as he was worried that his mobility would be hindered if he added much more to it.

Desmond didn't seem especially concerned by the sudden armor, choosing to wait patiently. "Ah! The girl with the sword! You've changed a lot, haven't you?! Did you go aberration hunting?! I like your new look!"

Lynn ignored him and whispered to Hector, "Do you think he's trying to bait us to attack him? Where is the other servant?"

"I don't know..."

"Pretty clever!" said Desmond. "This little plan of yours! I'm quite curious as to how you knew to enact it today, though! If you tell me, I'll do something nice for you! Do you like brownies?! I make amazing brownies!"

"What an idiot," said Lynnette.

"C'mon! If you're not going to talk to me, then things are going to get boring real quickly unless you attack!"

'...No,' said Garovel. 'It's a diversion. He wants to buy time so that his comrade can do something. Ignore him. Force him to chase us.'

Hector nodded. "We can't engage him yet," he told Lynn, and then he ran off into the intersecting hall with her and Desmond both following.

He knew the royal bedchamber was close. It was perhaps the most obvious place for the King to be, but then, Desmond probably wouldn't have realized so quickly what their objective was in coming here.

A sizzling hand came flying from behind, but Lynnette was prepared. Her shadow knocked it right back toward Desmond, who had to dive out of its path. The subsequent explosion made the hall jolt, and Hector stumbled but kept going.

The guardsmen must have been doing good work, because there weren't many civilians around. The few that remained, Hector tried to scare into fleeing as he ran past, making metal spikes suddenly jut out of the ground in front of them. That strategy, at least, proved quite successful."

"452 -- LII.

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 4/6)~~

Hector barged into the King's chambers, eyes searching frantically around. And luckily enough, there the man was, sitting up on his bed, looking haggard in his regal suit and clutching the shoulder of his missing arm.

When he saw Hector, he merely stood. Maybe it was just because the man looked too exhausted already, but he didn't seem particularly surprised by the young, armored black man. When Lynnette arrived, however, the King's expression changed. "You!" he said, eyes widening.

"Your Highness, we've come to get you out of here!" she said.

"Did Helen send you?!"

"Not quite," said Lynn, "but we're acting with her interests in mind. Please, there's no time!"

"Yes, of course!"

Then came the voice of Andres Geth. "I'm afraid I can't allow that," he said from the hallway, and after a beat, he appeared in the open doorway, along with a new reaper.

Hector wasted no time and launched a javelin straight at the man.

A wall of yellow crystal shot up from the floor and stopped the spear dead. Somehow, the force of the impact left the metal shattered, but the crystal had scarcely more than a crack. "Oh, please," said Andres. "I'd heard that you could make metal, but this is just embarrassing to witness. You call yourself a materialization user?"

Hector scowled inside his helm.

"Allow me to demonstrate how one truly uses materialization."

Chapter Fifty-Two: 'O, colliding fires...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A shower of yellow crystals flew toward them, and Hector raised a wall of iron, but it barely stopped anything. Chunks of crystal tore through his metal as if it were cardboard. Hector took a softball-sized crystal through the chest, knocking him off his feet.

'He's using soul-strengthening techniques on those crystals,' Garovel informed him privately. 'His element is probably sulfur.'

Hector struggled back up again, watching Lynnette buy him the time to do so. The purple shade could withstand the crystals much more effectively, and when Andres tried to coat her in them, the shadow ripped her free immediately.

'Be careful,' said Garovel. 'He can probably create it in states other than its solid crystal form.'

"452 -- LII.

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 4/6)~~

Hector barged into the King's chambers, eyes searching frantically around. And luckily enough, there the man was, sitting up on his bed, looking haggard in his regal suit and clutching the shoulder of his missing arm.

When he saw Hector, he merely stood. Maybe it was just because the man looked too exhausted already, but he didn't seem particularly surprised by the young, armored black man. When Lynnette arrived, however, the King's expression changed. "You!" he said, eyes widening.

"Your Highness, we've come to get you out of here!" she said.

"Did Helen send you?!"

"Not quite," said Lynn, "but we're acting with her interests in mind. Please, there's no time!"

"Yes, of course!"

Then came the voice of Andres Geth. "I'm afraid I can't allow that," he said from the hallway, and after a beat, he appeared in the open doorway, along with a new reaper.

Hector wasted no time and launched a javelin straight at the man.

A wall of yellow crystal shot up from the floor and stopped the spear dead. Somehow, the force of the impact left the metal shattered, but the crystal had scarcely more than a crack. "Oh, please," said Andres. "I'd heard that you could make metal, but this is just embarrassing to witness. You call yourself a materialization user?"

Hector scowled inside his helm.

"Allow me to demonstrate how one truly uses materialization."

Chapter Fifty-Two: 'O, colliding fires...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

A shower of yellow crystals flew toward them, and Hector raised a wall of iron, but it barely stopped anything. Chunks of crystal tore through his metal as if it were cardboard. Hector took a softball-sized crystal through the chest, knocking him off his feet.

‘He’s using soul-strengthening techniques on those crystals,’ Garovel informed him privately. ‘His element is probably sulfur.’

Hector struggled back up again, watching Lynnette buy him the time to do so. The purple shade could withstand the crystals much more effectively, and when Andres tried to coat her in them, the shadow ripped her free immediately.

‘Be careful,’ said Garovel. ‘He can probably create it in states other than its solid crystal form.’”

"453

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 5/6)~~

Lynnette was forcing Andres back into the hall by the time Hector rejoined. However, Andres was apparently baiting her toward him in order to hide the fact that Desmond was approaching her from behind, which was why Hector decided to place himself there first.

For a moment, he and Lynnette stood back-to-back, and he quickly whispered to her what Garovel had just told him about Andres’ ability.

“Got it.”

A giant crystal came flying toward them, and Lynnette cleaved it cleanly in two with her violet-coated sword. The subsequent halves of the crystal crashed into the walls and kept tumbling down the length of the corridor.

Desmond threw a blinking look at the suddenly missing walls around him. In a matter of seconds, his section of the hallway had been converted into one big room, a kind of adjoining chamber. The ceiling began to groan, and Hector thought it might cave in, but at least for the moment, it did not.

Desmond’s reaper, Ezmortig, appeared behind him, probably wanting to provide observational advice like Garovel had been doing.

Hector launched another javelin. Desmond dodged it easily enough while Hector began closing the distance with a freshly constructed blade in hand. And then abruptly, he clapped iron around Desmond’s face. Hector swung for the man’s neck, but even without the use of his eyes, Desmond still ducked right under the blow and caught Hector's arm with both of his own. The arm snapped, and the man's burly hands found Hector's throat. Hector could hear the sizzling noise, and he knew the explosion was imminent.

The iron spikes came out. They skewered Desmond in five places, loosening his grip and allowing Hector to kick him off before the hand exploded. Desmond went bouncing toward Lynn, who was more than happy to make time for the man. She brought her sword to bear and chopped both of Desmond's legs off.

Yellow crystals crashed into her, and she went flying away from Desmond. Hector leapt up and caught her, mostly with his right arm, as the other was still broken."

"454

~~Holiday Special (Day 6/7, Page 6/6)~~

And due to the odd angle at which he'd caught her, Hector landed with a swirling flourish. He was about to lay her down, expecting her to at least be disoriented, but that didn't seem to be the case. She looked just as clear-eyed as ever and got back on her feet straight away.

And it was a good thing, too, because Andres wasn't letting up. He didn't bother attending to Desmond at all, and instead launched a wave of fist-sized crystals at them. Hector raised a metal wall, and Lynnette added a purple coating to it. The crystals shattered on impact.

Hector already knew that Lynn's shadow was more resilient than Geoffrey's had been, but he was continually surprised by how much. Over the course of their training, he'd made multiple attempts to break through her shadow with a soul-empowered punch, but he had never once succeeded. Even after he'd started using enhanced strength and sent her flying, Lynn had described his punches as feeling like nothing more than a friendly pat on the arm.

Lynnette retracted her shadow while Hector destroyed his wall and prepared another javelin. She went first, diving headlong through Andres' storm of crystals and forcing him back again.

Which was another thing Hector didn't understand: how Andres could launch his crystals the way he did. The man hadn't thrown them. He'd merely put one hand forward, and the crystals shot forth as soon as they appeared. Hector very much wanted to know how that was possible, but now wasn't the best time to ask Garovel for an explanation.

Lynnette kept pressing and finally caught one of Andres' arms with her blade. The man tried to use it as an opportunity to hit her with a crystal fist, but a javelin flew into the man's chest, completely knocking him off balance. And Lynn sliced his head off.

Desmond had removed the metal from his face by now and was still waiting for his legs to regrow as Andres' head rolled toward him. When he looked up to see Lynnette and Hector bearing down upon them, he grinned and said, "Well, then! Try this one!"

And Desmond's entire body began to darken and sizzle."
"455

~~Holiday Special (Day 7/7, Page 1/6)~~

Hector and Lynn both screeched to a halt and tried to box Desmond in with metal and shadow together.

It wasn't enough.

The explosion shook the whole building and ripped their hasty container to pieces, even breaking Lynnette's shadow. The shock wave hit Hector like a train. He flew through a wall, then another, and was outside, toppling through grass and dirt until finally skidding to a stop.

His armor was in tatters, and his body was in shreds. Most of the flesh on his face was gone. His torso was no better, exposed ribs jutting out of his chest, jagged and broken. Blood seemed to be everywhere.

His extremities, however, were still attached, apart from a missing foot and half an arm. And he was still conscious. His eardrums were blown out. His eyes were gone. All the nerve endings on the front side of his body were destroyed. But Hector was awake, still aware that everything was regenerating.

And he couldn't speak yet, but he could think. 'Garovel?!'

'I'm safe, Hector. You suppressed it enough for me to get out of the blast radius in time.'

He would have breathed a sigh of relief if his lungs hadn't been crushed into a meaty paste. 'A-and... what happened to Lynn?'

'I'm searching for her now.'

--++--++--

A purple streak shoved the massive, wooden desk off of her. Lynnette coughed, half-expecting to see blood, but saw none. She wasn't sure if that was because the blood genuinely wasn't there or because she could barely see straight at the moment.

Before trying to move, she shut her eye and did a roll call. All of her limbs still worked, but she was reasonably sure that at least two of her ribs were broken. A pounding headache was there as well, and she raised a hand to her forehead and found a bit of blood there.

"Hoh," she breathed. She shifted off of her back and onto all fours. "I definitely felt that one..." She tried to stand and stumbled.

Looking around, she realized that she wasn't sure where she'd ended up. Whatever room this used to be, it was rubble now."

"456

~~Holiday Special (Day 7/7, Page 2/6)~~

The doorway was blocked by debris, no doubt from the giant hole in the ceiling, which also served as the only source of light for the otherwise dim chamber. At the moment, though, Lynnette wasn't feeling quite up to climbing, so she set the shadow to work trying to clear a path to the door.

"Oh, thank the goddess!" came a man's voice. "You are still alive!"

She looked up to see the King's blond-bearded face through the hole. "Your Highness!" said Lynnette. "Are you alright?!"

"Yes, I am fine. Do you require help getting back up here?"

And she realized that she must have fallen down to the basement level. She gathered herself, standing erect. "No," she said. "Please wait there a moment." She'd never used the shadow like a rope before and was thus unsure if it could even function as such, but now seemed like a good time to try. She sent a purple hook up and had it latch onto the first floor, and sure enough, she was able to pull herself up without much difficulty.

And as she met the King face-to-face again, she was reminded of her task. "Your Highness, we have to get you out of here." She took his hand, and they started navigating the ruined hallway.

"More of them are coming," said William.

Her brow lowered. "What do you mean?"

"Before your fight, Andres called their other comrades. I am certain they are on their way here."

Her mouth wrenched into a frown. "All the more reason to leave, then."

She had no idea where Hector was. Certainly, she wanted to go search for him, but from her understanding, it would only be a matter of minutes before Desmond and Andres regenerated fully. That left precious little time to get the King out. And even if she was strong enough to defeat them on her own, she knew that she still wouldn't be able to kill them so long as she couldn't see their reapers.

Lynnette escorted the King all the way to the front gate, where the castle's guardsmen were busy ushering civilians to safety."

"457

~~Holiday Special (Day 7/7, Page 3/6)~~

She found her car again and tossed the keys to William. "It has GPS," she said. "Follow it to the last address it recorded. Should be outside Walton. When you get there, look for a door in the ground, and you'll find an underground bunker."

He gave her a confused look. "You are not going to come with me?"

"I'll meet you at the bunker as soon as I can."

"But why--?"

"I'm not leaving here without my friend."

-+-+--+

The regeneration was almost finished. He had enough muscle tissue to stand again, though his walking remained slow and stilted. He could see Garovel overlooking the castle grounds from the sky. 'You see her yet?' Hector asked.

'Ah... Oh, there she is. She's already at the front gate.'

'Good.'

'And that's the King's aura driving away. Looks like she got him to safety.'

'Seriously?'

'Yep.' The reaper laughed. 'This was supposed to be our plan, but she's doing all the important stuff, isn't she?'

Hector shrugged. 'Hey, I don't mind...'

'Uh-oh.'

He stopped. He was starting to hate hearing that from Garovel. 'What's wrong?'

'I sense Karkash approaching.'

'Aw, fuck.' His legs were fully returned now, and he started running. 'You're sure it's him?'

'Afraid so. From the northwest. He must've received word we were here.' Garovel descended back to the ground where Hector could protect him. 'Harold's not that far away, and we've already seen how fast he can fly.'

'I really didn't want to fight him again...'

'His reaper will be able to sense us. He'll chase after us until you force him not to.'

He circled around the castle, trying to reach the front, but Karkash found him first. When Hector saw the man hovering there, he created a lightning rod in the grass for himself, but much to his surprise, Karkash did not immediately attack him.

Instead, Karkash slowly descended toward Hector, and offered a few words in a thick Vaelish accent. "Where is the King?"

Hector wasn't entirely sure how to answer, but Garovel did so for him.

'He's gone,' the reaper said."

"458

~~Holiday Special (Day 7/7, Page 4/6)~~

Karkash was briefly quiet. His reaper, Hoyohté, was right behind him, and the two of them were probably speaking, but Karkash never removed his eyes from Hector. "You must tell me where he is," the man said.

Hector's expression tilted. 'Is he serious? I don't understand why he's not just attacking me...'

'...Ah!' said Garovel. 'Because he's still not confident that he can beat you! He wants to buy time for the others to arrive and help him!'

'Err--you really think so?'

'Attack him now! We have to get away from here before they show up!'

Hector obliged. And for his opening move, he chose a sneaky thing. He put his hands together, disguising the motion by pretending to crack his knuckles, and behind Karkash, a line of four large catapults took shape. In truth, they were nothing more than seesaws with iron boulders lain at their far ends. Larger boulders took form over the seesaws' raised ends, and when they dropped, the original four boulders were launched.

Hector's trajectory wasn't perfect. The first two boulders missed Karkash, but the last two were on target. They still didn't hit him, though. Rather, they became caught in the man's swirling magnetic field, but that was enough. Their sudden appearance from outside of Karkash's view forced him to take his eyes off Hector for a moment, and in that time, Hector used a sudden platform to propel himself into the air.

When Karkash saw him again, Hector was already barreling toward him. Hastily aimed lightning cut through Hector's chest as a two-handed punch connected with Karkash's collarbone. Karkash torpedoed into the ground while Hector's body fell back down at normal velocity, spasming a bit from the electricity coursing through him.

When he tumbled into the grass again, Hector started running toward Karkash's body, knowing the deed to be yet unfinished. Fleeing on a motorcycle would be impossible so long as this person remained undefeated, so he annihilated his catapults and made fresh boulders over Karkash's head.

They stopped in mid-air and lightning shot up and bounced between them, crackling with furious energy."

"459 -- LIII.

~~Holiday Special (Day 7/7, Page 5/6)~~

Karkash burst up into the sky, wreathed in electricity as the iron boulders swirled around him with increasing speed.

Hector made more lightning rods as he ran along the ground. He wanted to stay ahead, to create iron spires more quickly than Karkash could seize control of them. Getting in close without anything to shield himself from the lightning was obviously dangerous, and Karkash wasn't likely to fall for another simple diversionary tactic.

For a time, their battle reached a kind of stalemate. Karkash refused to come in close where Hector could actually hit him, and Hector refused to leave the sanctuary of his many, fleeting lightning rods.

It did, however, give him and Garovel an opportunity to strategize.

'Karkash is only a problem because of his mobility,' said Garovel. 'If you can take that away from him, we'll be able to escape much more easily.'

'Is that even possible?'

'We know his power is to control electromagnetic fields, so presumably, he can only fly because he's wearing something metallic under his clothes. Destroy that.'

'How the hell do I do that?!'

'Good question.'

‘Fuck!’

‘I have an idea, though.’ And Garovel explained it to Hector, who listened as best he could while still trying to maintain the stalemate.

Hector understood. It sounded difficult but still doable. Before he could put the plan into action, however, he noticed Lynnette standing atop the castle’s roof. And then he noticed Andres and Desmond, too, appearing together through the hole in the wall that Hector had made upon being thrown outside.

If nothing else, the stalemate was about to be broken.

Chapter Fifty-Three: ‘Under mayhem’s gaze...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector enacted Garovel’s plan. He stopped running and made a soul-empowered dome around himself. Then, he extended the dome out in four directions at once, suddenly creating an above-ground tunnel--one with an intersection, no less. He ran in the tunnel to his right while still adding on to all four directions.

He could already hear Karkash ripping up chunks of metal, searching for him, but the odds were in Hector’s favor. And he meant to increase them even more."

"459 -- LIII.

~~Holiday Special (Day 7/7, Page 5/6)~~

Karkash burst up into the sky, wreathed in electricity as the iron boulders swirled around him with increasing speed.

Hector made more lightning rods as he ran along the ground. He wanted to stay ahead, to create iron spires more quickly than Karkash could seize control of them. Getting in close without anything to shield himself from the lightning was obviously dangerous, and Karkash wasn’t likely to fall for another simple diversionary tactic.

For a time, their battle reached a kind of stalemate. Karkash refused to come in close where Hector could actually hit him, and Hector refused to leave the sanctuary of his many, fleeting lightning rods.

It did, however, give him and Garovel an opportunity to strategize.

‘Karkash is only a problem because of his mobility,’ said Garovel. ‘If you can take that away from him, we’ll be able to escape much more easily.’

‘Is that even possible?’

‘We know his power is to control electromagnetic fields, so presumably, he can only fly because he’s wearing something metallic under his clothes. Destroy that.’

‘How the hell do I do that?!’

‘Good question.’

‘Fuck!’

‘I have an idea, though.’ And Garovel explained it to Hector, who listened as best he could while still trying to maintain the stalemate.

Hector understood. It sounded difficult but still doable. Before he could put the plan into action, however, he noticed Lynnette standing atop the castle’s roof. And then he noticed Andres and Desmond, too, appearing together through the hole in the wall that Hector had made upon being thrown outside.

If nothing else, the stalemate was about to be broken.

Chapter Fifty-Three: ‘Under mayhem’s gaze...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector enacted Garovel’s plan. He stopped running and made a soul-empowered dome around himself. Then, he extended the dome out in four directions at once, suddenly creating an above-ground tunnel--one with an intersection, no less. He ran in the tunnel to his right while still adding on to all four directions.

He could already hear Karkash ripping up chunks of metal, searching for him, but the odds were in Hector’s favor. And he meant to increase them even more."

"460

Each of the four tunnels forked off in two more directions, and then those forked off again. They began to converge with another, creating a symmetrical maze, of sorts. And Hector just kept on adding to it. The metal tubes were all hollow, so he wasn't concerned about reaching his volume limit anytime soon.

It wasn't easy to keep all the branching paths coordinated in his head, and he was pretty sure he'd mucked it up in a few places, but it didn't need to be perfect. Karkash was going to rip it to pieces, anyway. He just needed a means of getting Karkash's eyes off of him.

And then Karkash did the obvious thing. He pummeled the tunnels with lightning, sending a strong enough current through them that Hector could see sparks flashing across the ceiling.

'He's on your left now,' directed Garovel from underground, 'and still above you. About five meters or so.'

'What's Lynn doing?'

'Waiting, I think. Probably wondering what the hell you're trying to do. The other two are closing in, though. And since their reapers can't sense you at the moment, I expect they'll come for me.'

'Let me know when they get too close.'

'Oh, Lynn is engaging them now. Ten troa says she kills them both without you.'

And despite the circumstances, despite being worried about her, Hector couldn't help smirking at that.

--++--++--

A cloud of purple hit the ground before her and softened her landing. She was glad that worked the way she thought it would. Jumping off a four-story building would have looked really stupid otherwise.

Her ribs throbbed, but she didn't have time to worry about it. A gigantic crystal wall barreled toward her. She gripped her sword with both hands, coloring its blade violet. The shadow extended the sword's reach by a good two meters, and she swung vertically. The wall cleaved in two, but it went deeper than she realized, and she had to bring her sword back down for a second slash to finish cutting through.

Desmond was already there to greet her with a thrown, sizzling hand.

She raised a purple shield just as it exploded. She toppled back but caught herself with a bed of shadow."

"461

The pain was back, stronger now, and she had to clench her jaw. Perhaps another rib had just broken.

Her opponents attacked in unison. The flurry of yellow crystals came first, obscuring her view of Desmond, and she figured that was probably their real purpose. She had no intention of allowing herself to be pinned down again, so instead of blocking the crystals, she chose to avoid them. She thrust her gauntleted fist toward the ground, and the purple flooded forth, sending her up and over Andres' attack. With her ragged cloak flourishing behind her on the way back down, she whipped the shadow around to lash at Desmond, who lost an arm in order to avoid losing his head.

A bed of crystal spikes rose up to meet her as she landed, and she narrowly retrieved the shadow in time to stop herself from falling upon them. The spikes tried to rise up higher, but the shadow slashed them down, allowing her to reach the ground safely again.

And by now, with this being her third fight against the man, she had a good idea of what Desmond would do. Her back was to him at the moment, and she fully expected him to have already thrown another explosive at her, so she spun around in order to swat it right back at him. And sure enough, her prediction proved correct. The purple shadow slapped the sizzling forearm away, and the subsequent explosion knocked Desmond off his feet.

She pursued him, somersaulting with violet over the crystals that tried to bar her path, and as Desmond was struggling back up again, her sword fell upon him, goring him through the chest.

He met her gaze, and Lynnette could see the flesh of his face begin to darken.

She yanked the blade upward and cut straight through the man's neck and skull, splattering the grass with blood and brain. His remaining flesh ceased its darkening.

That was one down, but Andres didn't give her a chance to breathe, and the sky above her dimmed as a gigantic crystal appeared over her head."

"462

The shadow flexed and spun around her, becoming a swirling drill, and as Andres' crystal drew closer, Lynnette leapt up to meet it head-on. She pierced through, and even after losing her initial momentum, the ridges of her drill allowed her to keep climbing. And she arrived at the top, regaining her footing.

A small crystal pegged her in the shoulder, making her wince and stagger back a step. Then a second one, but when she staggered back this time, the crystal beneath her was suddenly destroyed, and she instead fell toward another bed of spikes. She grit her teeth, annoyed, and smashed them with a purple wrecking ball. Yellow shards flew everywhere as she landed.

She threw a glare at Andres, who was already shooting more crystals at her. The shadow deflected them as she ran straight for him.

Abruptly, a massive chunk of iron crashed between her and Andres, forcing her to stop and look toward Hector and Karkash.

Hector's network of metal tubes was no longer grounded. It hovered in mid-air, fraught with blue flashes of electricity. The tubes continued to grow, however, bending and spiraling and reconnecting with one another just as quickly as Karkash was ripping them apart.

She would have liked to ignore them for the moment and focus on killing Andres, but a dozen more car-sized lumps of metal were already flying in her direction.

--+-+--+--

It was a giant mess, now. He'd completely lost track of what went where, but he just kept adding more iron to everything. At the very least, if even he didn't know where he was anymore, then Karkash certainly didn't.

'Up and to your right,' said Garovel, apparently still able to make sense of things.

Hector curved his current tube as the reaper directed, and there Karkash was, facing a different direction. The man seemed reluctant to move around too much, probably to ensure Hector didn't get an easy shot at his reaper, who remained by his side at all times.

Hector launched himself out of the tube, and Karkash didn't see him until the last moment."

"463

Hector caught him with a full bear hug. At this range, the magnetic field around Karkash was too strong for Hector's metal to accumulate properly, and he didn't want any metal that he could've made beforehand to be suddenly turned against him here; so he was weaponless, and rather than pin all of his hopes on landing an instant deathblow, the plan was just as Garovel had told him earlier. He felt for the metal under Karkash's coat, and indeed, found it there.

Karkash thrashed, zigzagging in the air and trying to fling him off, but Hector had a solid grip on him. Hector ripped the metal undershirt out, and they were suddenly plummeting together. Karkash grabbed Hector's arm and finally yanked him off, following up with a flash of lightning that cut through Hector's stomach. Then they both hit the ground.

Hector struggled to stand but wasn't yet able, as he was fairly certain that his spine and hip were both broken. Only a few meters away, he could see Karkash having similar difficulty. They were immobilized for the moment, but both men still had their arms.

The lightning came, and Hector was ready for it with a pair of iron spires. The force of the impact caused the base around each spire to explode, pelting Hector with globs of grass and mud, but the spires themselves remained standing. He didn't bother trying to make them larger, because he knew Karkash could rip them to shreds at any moment, so instead, he went to work on something he'd cooked up over this week past--something Garovel had thought of for him.

Directly above Karkash, Hector materialized a gigantic, vertically-long chunk of iron--a mostly cylindrical tower. And at the top, where Karkash wouldn't be able to see, Hector created a similarly giant, downward-facing spike. And what Karkash wouldn't be able to tell while he was shredding the bottom half of the cylinder, was that the upper half of the cylinder was hollow and that an enormous spike was already falling toward him at a much higher velocity than the cylinder had been."

"464

By the time Hector completed the trap, his spires were both shredded, and he had to eat another lightning bolt. It sent him toppling backward with a smoldering chunk taken out of his neck and shoulder, very nearly decapitating him. Fleeting sparks leapt across his flesh as he fought the muscle spasms throughout his body, still struggling to stand and keep his eyes on the enemy.

Karkash received the surprise with a scowl. The shirtless man couldn't stop the spike, but he still managed to slightly alter its trajectory. Instead of crushing his entire body, it tore his legs off. The spike's impact made the ground bulge up around it, flipping Karkash into the air.

And Hector had a few moments to breathe. As he recreated his lightning rods, his gaze turned to Andres and Lynnette. Huge pieces of twisted iron littered their battlefield, but that didn't seem to have slowed them down any.

Andres had built a tall, crystal platform to elevate himself out of Lynnette's reach. She was busy trying to destroy its foundation while having to avoid a constant barrage of crystals. So while Andres' eyes were on her, Hector encased him in metal. It was enough of a surprise to make the man have to pause before crystals could tear him free again. It was only an instant, but Lynnette didn't need any more than that. She smashed one of the platform's legs, making it tilt over. Andres tried to rebuild it, but Lynn just smashed another one, and he fell. His crystals couldn't protect him as her violet sword cleaved him in two.

Hector, however, had turned away by then, having to deal with Karkash again. The stalemate had more or less returned, but Hector had his legs back, while Karkash didn't, so he was trying to press closer and making slow progress.

'Behind you!' came Garovel's warning, but it didn't matter.

Hector turned in time to see his own iron boulder hurtling toward him but not in time to annihilate it. It barreled into him, and again, he was sent bouncing across the ground. When he tried to stand up again, he was greeted with more lightning."

"465 -- LIV.

He fell back again, grounded and smoldering. He struggled to raise a fresh spire, but his arms fought him, still buzzing with electricity. He knew the next lightning strike was imminent.

And then Lynnette was there, standing over him. She took the flashing blue bolt in his place.

But the lightning broke through her violet shield.

She shrieked in sudden agony and crumpled to the ground.

"What?!" said Hector, eyes widening. "How did--?! No!" He finally raised another spire, stopping a second bolt from reaching her.

Garovel floated behind him. 'Get up, Hector,' he said. It wasn't encouragement. It was a command. No room for refusal or excuses. 'Get up and get to the bike.'

His body wanted to argue. It wanted more time to regenerate. But it wouldn't get it. He climbed to his broken feet, ignoring his shifting spine, and scooped Lynnette up in his unsteady arms. She was still conscious but looked in too much pain to know or care what was happening.

He didn't want to look at her wound yet. It wouldn't help anything now. He merely stomped onward, creating more spires as he went, and finally left the immobile Karkash behind.

The crowd outside the castle fled at the mere sight of him, which was handy enough as he made his way to the motorcycle. He mounted it and made sure she fit snugly behind him with a body-fitted metal seat.

They roared out of the city.

Chapter Fifty-Four: 'Fierce blade, be well...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

‘Just focus on the road,’ said Garovel. ‘It won’t do her any good if you crash the damn bike.’

Helmetless, clothes in blackened rags, blood all over him, Hector tried to take the reaper’s advice. He knew it was the intelligent thing to do. But he couldn’t tell anything about Lynn’s condition. Over the wind in his ears, he couldn’t even hear her. ‘Just... Garovel, please tell me...’

‘She’s still breathing. I can’t see the wound. It’s obscured with your metal. Don’t get rid of it, though.’

‘Where do I go?’ he asked. ‘Can we really just take her back to the bunker?’

‘For now, yes.’”

"465 -- LIV.

He fell back again, grounded and smoldering. He struggled to raise a fresh spire, but his arms fought him, still buzzing with electricity. He knew the next lightning strike was imminent.

And then Lynnette was there, standing over him. She took the flashing blue bolt in his place.

But the lightning broke through her violet shield.

She shrieked in sudden agony and crumpled to the ground.

‘What?!’ said Hector, eyes widening. “How did--?! No!” He finally raised another spire, stopping a second bolt from reaching her.

Garovel floated behind him. ‘Get up, Hector,’ he said. It wasn’t encouragement. It was a command. No room for refusal or excuses. ‘Get up and get to the bike.’

His body wanted to argue. It wanted more time to regenerate. But it wouldn’t get it. He climbed to his broken feet, ignoring his shifting spine, and scooped Lynnette up in his unsteady arms. She was still conscious but looked in too much pain to know or care what was happening.

He didn't want to look at her wound yet. It wouldn't help anything now. He merely stomped onward, creating more spires as he went, and finally left the immobile Karkash behind.

The crowd outside the castle fled at the mere sight of him, which was handy enough as he made his way to the motorcycle. He mounted it and made sure she fit snugly behind him with a body-fitted metal seat.

They roared out of the city.

Chapter Fifty-Four: 'Fierce blade, be well...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

'Just focus on the road,' said Garovel. 'It won't do her any good if you crash the damn bike.'

Helmetless, clothes in blackened rags, blood all over him, Hector tried to take the reaper's advice. He knew it was the intelligent thing to do. But he couldn't tell anything about Lynn's condition. Over the wind in his ears, he couldn't even hear her. 'Just... Garovel, please tell me...'

'She's still breathing. I can't see the wound. It's obscured with your metal. Don't get rid of it, though.'

'Where do I go?' he asked. 'Can we really just take her back to the bunker?'

'For now, yes.'

"466

The bunker was still almost an hour away, and right now, that seemed like an eternity.

'I don't understand,' said Hector. 'Why couldn't she stop the lightning? I mean, she could stop those crystals and... weren't they stronger?'

'No,' said Garovel. 'It has to do with the nature of soul-strengthening techniques. Karkash's soul power is clearly much more potent than Andres'. If I'd realized, I would've had you warn her.'

'I still don't follow...'

'Soul-strengthening techniques only increase the physical attributes of something, so even though Karkash's lightning is made more powerful, that still doesn't prevent your metal from conducting it. Andres' crystals, on the other hand, have no such interaction, so they can plow through your metal despite being objectively weaker.'

'Gah...'

'That's what makes these fights so volatile,' said Garovel. 'When soul power is thrown into the mix, it's difficult to predict how abilities will react to one another.'

He spent most of the ride back in a state of punishing anxiety. He tried not to relive the battle, to not dwell on what he might have been able to do differently, but it was impossible. And gradually, all of his confusion and worry evolved into anger. That familiar feeling, boiling in his chest. His physical enhancements wore off after a while. Garovel held back the pain, so only the exhaustion hit him, but he was still more pissed off than tired.

'You need to call Gina as soon as we get back,' said Garovel. 'A lot has just changed, and we'll need to act very quickly.'

When they arrived, they found the King waiting for them in the garage. The look on his face was of relief until he saw the state Lynnette was in. "Is she okay?"

Hector annihilated the metal around her and said, "Lynn, can you hear me?"

Her eye opened slightly, and she took a long breath. "Yeah..." She tried to get off the bike by herself but tensed up too much.

"It's okay," he said. "I've... got you." With a little more help from Garovel, he lifted her off the motorcycle. He carried her into a back room and rested her on a bed there."

"467

"What happened?" the King said.

"Ah--" And Hector abruptly realized who he was talking to. He'd been lucky enough to not actually have to speak to the Queen very much, but there was no avoiding it here. "We, uh... well... y-you... ergh..." And he must've looked more frustrated than he thought, because the King took a step back. "S-sorry. I'm not gonna... hurt you or... anything."

William looked about as uncertain as Hector felt.

Garovel was busy inspecting the smote cloth and flesh on Lynnette's arm, just above the bone gauntlet.

Her arm, Hector realized, blinking. Not her torso. That was good news, surely, but he waited for Garovel to speak. The King lingered closer, and Hector had to press him back to ensure the reaper had a good view. "Sorry. Just wait a minute, please."

'There's no cut,' said Garovel. 'Her shadow provided some protection, it would seem, but she still took a nasty shock. Ask her some more questions. What hurts and so forth.'

"Lynn," he started again, drawing her squinting gaze, "can you tell me what hurts?"

"I'm fine," she said breathily. "It's just my arm. And my ribs. Ugh, and my head..." She tried to sit up but quit right away. "On second thought, maybe I'll just lie here for a while."

'Hmm,' said Garovel. 'Might be a bit early to say, but I think she's alright. Ask her where her family is.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow. 'W-why?'

'Because we should find them and make sure they're safe. Quickly, ask her.'

"Uh, Lynn. We need to find your family. Because--" And he blinked again, knowing where this was going. "Abolish probably knows who you are, so. We have to, um--"

"My parents live in Sescoria with my little sister."

He looked at Garovel.

'Maybe Gina can help us with that. Get the address and give her a call.'

He retrieved the address from Lynnette and got up to leave the room.

"Wait," said William. "Please! Explain what is happening!"

'There's no time for that,' said Garovel.

"I'm sorry, Your Majesty, but I--I have to go."

"468

"It's okay," said Lynnette. "Go. I'll explain everything to him."

And he left the two of them there. His cellphone was in the rear pocket on his motorcycle. He made the call.

<"Talk to me,"> said Gina.

He started changing clothes in the middle of the garage. "Gina, I need you to get Lynn's family out of Sescoria. Can you do that?"

<"Uh. What?">

"They could be in danger. Please? I don't think I'd be able to."

<"Er. Okay. When?">

"Right now."

<"Are you serious? How am I supposed to do that?">

"Uh. I don't know. It's an emergency, though, so."

<"Ugh.">

"You're really smart. I'm, uh--I'm sure you'll figure something out."

<"You can't just say that and expect me to--">

"I'm sorry, but I really can't talk right now."

<"What? Why not?">

He frowned at Garovel as he mounted the motorcycle again. "My mother will be in danger, too."

<"Agh. Dammit, why do you have to have such a good excuse to ditch me, huh?">

"Sorry."

<"We'll talk later.">

"Right." He gave her the address before hanging up and heading back out again, this time with a fresh pair of pants, riding jacket, and helmet. It would have been nice to catch up with Gina during the journey to Brighton, but he wouldn't be able to hear her over the road noise. If he could've driven a car instead, that might be different, but it was a bit late to be fretting over such things. At least he would have plenty of time to talk to Garovel. 'How certain are you that they'll go after our families?'

'I'm not certain at all,' the reaper admitted. 'We're just taking precautions. Taking hostages is a common tactic for them to employ. Up to now, we didn't really pose much threat to them, so they wouldn't have wanted to expend very many resources trying to find and eliminate us. But now, considering we just took a metaphorical dump on their dinner table, I'd say all bets are off. No telling what they might do in order to get to us.'

'Hmm.'

'By the way, I have a confession to make.'

'Confession?'

'This past week, whenever you were sleeping, I went to Brighton by myself in order to keep tabs on your mother.'

His hands twitched, and he nearly swerved off the road. 'What?!'"
"469

'I knew we'd probably need to go get her if we survived the battle, so I went ahead and tracked her down.'

'By yourself?!'

'No offense, but finding her was a lot faster on my own.'

'But! Agh!'

'I thought about having you kidnap her before we attacked the castle, but if we'd ended up dying there, then she would've been kinda screwed. And besides, I wasn't in a hurry for you to meet that awful woman again.'

'That's my mother you're talking about.'

'I know. I don't like her.'

'Garovel...'

‘Hey, I understand that she’s important to you. And even if she wasn’t, we wouldn’t just let her get taken hostage. But that doesn’t mean I have to like her. I still think she’s a terrible mother.’

‘Don’t... don’t talk about her like that.’

‘Why shouldn’t I?’

‘Because she’s my mom, you asshole!’

Garovel fell quiet a moment. ‘Fine.’

A while of silence passed until Hector said, ‘...So how is she?’

‘She’s not living in your old house anymore. She’s still in the process of moving out, but she’s staying in a hotel at the moment.’

He’d seen her on the news, though not recently. All the media attention he’d gotten had of course spilled over to her. Hector could only imagine what she’d had to endure over these past few weeks. Even if time would have somehow changed her opinion of him, he knew that not nearly enough of it had passed. There wasn’t a chance in hell that she wanted to see him again.

‘She changed her name, too. She’s Vanessa Cole, now.’

‘I guess that’s why the reporters have stopped hounding her so much...’ He hesitated with his next question. ‘Did she... lose her job?’

‘I think so. Though, I imagine she quit. Just being related to a criminal isn’t grounds for being fired. Or at least, I’d hope it isn’t.’

‘Maybe, but... I’m not just a “criminal” in the public’s eyes.’

‘True.’

He took a deep breath. ‘Garovel... what do I even say to her?’

‘I don’t think you should lie to her, if that’s what you’re asking.’
"470 -- LV.

‘No, I mean... I just... ugh...’

‘There might be nothing you can say that will make her listen.’

‘I guess so...’

A beat passed, and the reaper said, ‘Well, we’ve still got a few hours. Let’s come up with something.’

--++--++--

Navigating the ruined hallway, looking for any kind of assistance, Luther began hearing muffled cries. And at first, he thought it was someone trapped beneath rubble, but when he followed the voice, he instead discovered his brother Nathaniel, encased in metal but safe.

The sight brought a smirk to Luther’s face. “Oh, Nathaniel. I see you met the Darksteel Soldier in person.”

Only Nathaniel’s eyes and nose were visible, everything else being covered. He could just barely move his head, though, so he gave a kind of twitching nod.

Luther supposed it only made sense. He hadn’t been certain who was responsible for all of this destruction, but there weren’t many people crazy enough to attack Belgrant Castle. And in broad daylight, no less.

Luther’s expression spoiled and darkened. Instead of attempting anything with his bare hands, he began searching the overturned chamber. The desk by the far wall was largely untouched, and he found a thin blade therein. An antique letter opener was all it was, but it would suffice. He returned to his brother with it in hand.

“A pity that I was the first to find you,” said Luther. And at Nathaniel’s confused look, he added, “A pity that you were also killed by the Darksteel Soldier.”

He jammed the blade through Nathaniel’s eye socket.

Chapter Fifty-Five: ‘Thine inherited wills...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Like most buildings on this side of town, the Edith household was a modest structure. Brown and gray and a bit worn down, it still retained an air of warmth to it, perhaps due to the potted plants in the windows or the handcrafted wind chimes by the front door.

Gina rubbed her face, trying to press the anxiety out of her expression. Her hand absently went to the compact pistol in her purse. She really didn't want to use it, but she wasn't especially confident in her ability to convince an entire family to suddenly drop everything and leave the city with her."

"470 -- LV.

'No, I mean... I just... ugh...'

'There might be nothing you can say that will make her listen.'

'I guess so...'

A beat passed, and the reaper said, 'Well, we've still got a few hours. Let's come up with something.'

--++--++--

Navigating the ruined hallway, looking for any kind of assistance, Luther began hearing muffled cries. And at first, he thought it was someone trapped beneath rubble, but when he followed the voice, he instead discovered his brother Nathaniel, encased in metal but safe.

The sight brought a smirk to Luther's face. "Oh, Nathaniel. I see you met the Darksteel Soldier in person."

Only Nathaniel's eyes and nose were visible, everything else being covered. He could just barely move his head, though, so he gave a kind of twitching nod.

Luther supposed it only made sense. He hadn't been certain who was responsible for all of this destruction, but there weren't many people crazy enough to attack Belgrant Castle. And in broad daylight, no less.

Luther's expression spoiled and darkened. Instead of attempting anything with his bare hands, he began searching the overturned chamber. The desk by the far wall was largely untouched, and he found a thin blade therein. An antique letter opener was all it was, but it would suffice. He returned to his brother with it in hand.

"A pity that I was the first to find you," said Luther. And at Nathaniel's confused look, he added, "A pity that you were also killed by the Darksteel Soldier.”

He jammed the blade through Nathaniel’s eye socket.

Chapter Fifty-Five: ‘Thine inherited wills...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Like most buildings on this side of town, the Edith household was a modest structure. Brown and gray and a bit worn down, it still retained an air of warmth to it, perhaps due to the potted plants in the windows or the handcrafted wind chimes by the front door.

Gina rubbed her face, trying to press the anxiety out of her expression. Her hand absently went to the compact pistol in her purse. She really didn’t want to use it, but she wasn’t especially confident in her ability to convince an entire family to suddenly drop everything and leave the city with her.”

"471

She rang the doorbell. It was a rather long wait, but just when she was about to ring it again, the door opened, and a burly man stood before her.

Her eyes widened.

He was easily twice her size, if not three times, and though he had a large belly on him, his arms were certainly not lacking in muscle, easily filling out his pale blue sweater. A broad, clean-shaven face looked down at her with big, hazel eyes. “May I help you?” he said.

And Gina had to stop and blink, because the man’s voice did not match his face or stature at all. It was actually quite airy and soft, not the least bit intimidating.

The man waited patiently for her to answer, though he did turn his head slightly to show his concern.

“Ah!” she said. “Are you Mr. Edith?”

“Yes, I am.”

"I have news about Lynnette."

And the man gasped, rather lacking in composure. "Is she okay?!"

"I believe so, yes, but--um. Well, it's difficult to explain. Is the rest of your family home? I'd like to tell all of you at once. I know this is very sudden, but it's something of an emergency, you see."

"Yes, please come in!"

She entered, frankly surprised at how smoothly that had gone.

"What's your name?" he asked.

"Gina," she said, following him into the den.

The mother and sister were watching television together, both fixated upon the news. Gina might have liked to join them if matters weren't already so pressing. Hector hadn't bothered to explain exactly what happened at the castle, but it was obviously big enough to get him on television again. Twice in one day was a new record for him.

"Honey, this is Gina," said the man. "She's come to tell us about Lynnette. She says it's an emergency."

And immediately, Gina could tell where Lynnette had gotten that penetrating gaze from. The mother's hair was darker, but she had the same sharp cheekbones.

"First of all," Gina started, "allow me to tell you that Lynnette is safe.""
"472

Mrs. Edith's expression was more rigid than relieved. "Where is she?" she said.

"In an underground bunker. I actually came here to take all of you to her."

They exchanged looks. Mrs. Edith seemed to be their designated speaker. "It's been almost two months since we last heard from her. Where has she been all this time, and why has she not come to tell us these things herself?"

“After the first attack on Belgrant Castle, Lynnette had to flee the country with the Queen and was traveling with her for a while. She didn’t want to risk contacting you for fear of putting you in danger, but that’s changed now. You are in danger. She is unable to come to get you herself, which is why I’m here.”

“How are we in danger?”

“We suspect that her enemies might try to use you to get to her,” said Gina. “Please, I know this is sudden, but I really need you to come with me right now.”

Lynnette’s father seemed ready to believe her, but Mrs. Edith did not budge. “What enemies are you referring to?”

“There are very dangerous people trying to overthrow the Crown,” she explained. “Lynnette is on the Queen’s side, which means the Queen’s enemies are also her enemies.” Her eyes went to the news program, and she pointed to it. “That was Lynnette’s doing. She rescued the King, which drew attention to herself and is why she’s afraid they’ll come after you next.” Hector hadn’t explicitly told her that last part, but after listening to the radio reports on the way here, it sounded pretty accurate.

Mrs. Edith folded her arms. “I want to speak with her,” she said. “Call her now.”

And Gina hesitated. Lynnette did have her own cellphone now; she’d picked one up over the course of the week just in case. But Gina had been trying it on the way over, and Lynnette hadn’t been picking up. “I’m not sure if... ah, but I’ll give it a try.”

She placed the call, and to her surprise, someone answered.

<“Hello?”>

Gina recognized it as the voice of the King. “Your Majesty?”
"473

<“Who is this?”> said the King.

“Ah--” Gina fumbled a moment, eyes shifting between the family of three. And she laughed nervously as she said, "I'm Gina. But, aha, you wouldn't actually know who I am, would you? I helped Hector and Lynnette rescue you, but um, I really need to talk to Lynnette right now. I've got her family here, and, um. She is there, isn't she?"

There came a long pause. <"Yes, she is here, but she is currently quite unconscious. She was very tired.">

Gina's expression shriveled up. "Mm. Ah. Okay. Not the greatest timing on that. You're the King, though, so--" She put him on speaker for everyone to hear. "Could you please help me convince these nice people that I really am Lynnette's friend?"

Another long pause. <"...She may have mentioned your name, yes. Gina, was it?">

The family was not looking especially convinced. Even the father seemed rather doubtful now.

Gina tried a smile anyway. "There you see? It's the word of the King. Trustworthy, yeah?"

"That voice could belong to anyone," said Mrs. Edith.

Her smile spoiled.

"You will take me to her," said Mrs. Edith.

"Of course," said Gina. "Let's all hurry, then."

"No, I alone will accompany you. My husband and daughter will wait here for the time being."

"Ah--no, please, you all have to come. You're all in danger."

"Not until I confirm your words with my own eyes," said Mrs. Edith in a voice that brook no argument.

And Gina grimaced. The mother was clearly not going to budge. Time was limited. Options were dwindling. She knew it was a bad idea, but Gina's eyes turned down to her purse, and she went for her pistol. She looked up at the family again, gun in hand, and was about to apologize when she realized that she no longer saw three people before her. There were only two. The mother was missing. And before Gina could even turn, the woman reappeared from around the corner to her left.

With one hand, Mrs. Edith grabbed Gina's gun arm, forcing it up and away, and with the other hand, she held a sword to Gina's neck.

Gina's eyes widened and a squeaking whimper escaped her lips. "Okay," she said quietly, heart in her throat. "I give up. You win.""

"474

"Who are you really?" Mrs. Edith took Gina's pistol for herself but did not move the blade away. "Why have you come here?"

"No, no," rushed Gina, "I actually was telling you the truth. And the gun--aha--I was just bluffing. It's not even loaded. You can check for yourself. In fact, please do. I wasn't really going to hurt anyone. I've never even fired a gun before, so--"

"Stop talking."

Gina did so.

Mrs. Edith handed the pistol off to her pre-teen daughter instead of her husband, and the girl checked it for her.

"She's telling the truth, Mom. No bullets."

Gina tried to smile, but it didn't come out quite right.

Lynnette's father took a step closer. "Honey, please. The poor girl is terrified. Put your sword away before you get blood all over my carpet again."

The woman sheathed her weapon, though her glare lingered.

"I'm really sorry," said Gina. "It's just--I don't know how much time we have, so I'm assuming it's not very long at all. If I leave any of you here, you'll probably die or be taken hostage."

"Fine," said Lynnette's mother. "I suppose you've demonstrated your conviction well enough. But if you are lying, I will ensure that you regret it."

"Aha... ah..."

-+-+--+

Hector saw the familiar skyline just as evening began to arrive. He stayed away from downtown Brighton, however, circling around it instead. Apparently, his mother had chosen a hotel that was nowhere near their house. He supposed it made the most sense. The media would have probably still found her if she stayed somewhere close by.

He pulled into the parking lot and chose a space near the exit. A deep breath, and he dismounted. He decided it would be best to keep his helmet on until he absolutely had to take it off.

Garovel led him through the front entrance and up to the fifth floor. Hector would have preferred to just make a giant platform and sneak in through a window like he'd done previously, but there were too many people around this time. They soon arrived at his mother's room."

"475

He tried to muster the courage to knock but found himself lacking.

'Perhaps I should check on her first,' said Garovel

Hector gave a small nod, and the reaper phased through the door. He waited for the report.

'...She's lying in bed and watching the news.'

He wasn't sure what he'd been expecting.

'Ah, it's about you. "Darksteel Soldier abducts King." As expected. Can't tell what your mother thinks of it. Hard to say if she's even paying attention or not.'

Hector had no response. He stared vacantly at the door in front of him, just waiting, dreading the moment that he knew was coming.

'They're talking about Lynn, too, though they don't seem to have identified her yet. Probably just a matter of time. I wonder if they've given her a nickname, also.'

He looked down the hallway on both sides. A number of people were walking past or standing in doorways chatting. Several of them were giving him odd looks. Still, it was better to have them wondering about the motorcycle helmet than to have them scrambling to call the police. Or the army. At this point, he wasn't sure who would respond.

‘Hector, we can’t drag this out. We don’t know how much time we have.’

Another deep breath. He knocked on the door with the back of his gloved fist.

‘She’s getting up.’

More waiting. Then he heard her voice.

“Who is it?” she said from beyond the door’s peephole. Her voice was not strong at all. He hoped it was just the helmet playing tricks on his ears, but he doubted it.

He still couldn’t quite get a word out, so he lifted the visor of his helmet instead.

A long spell of silence followed until she finally just said, more haggard than angry, “Go away.”

“I can’t,” he said, a bit more vigorously than he expected of himself. “Please. Mom.”

More silence.

Then, to Hector’s surprise, he heard the door unlocking. It opened, and his mother was already shuffling back to her bed by the time Hector entered. He closed the door behind him.”

"476

The room was noticeably dimmer than the hallway. With the heavy curtains drawn over the window, only a small lamp by the bed offered any light. Hector had to remove his helmet and tuck it under his arm.

Then he saw his mother’s face. He almost didn’t recognize her. She was so gaunt. She’d always been a rather slim woman, but now she looked unhealthily so. It hadn’t even been three weeks since he last saw her. He didn’t understand how she could have changed so much.

“You stopped shaving your head,” she said. “Trying to make yourself less recognizable?”

He ran a hand over his hair. Finding words was difficult again. Everything he'd discussed with Garovel on the way here was slipping away. Apologize, maybe? For what? Everything?

She tilted her head at him. "Did you really abduct the King?"

That at least had a straightforward answer. "Yeah."

"Why?"

"He was being held hostage... and tortured. By the same people who ran the Queen out of the country."

"So you rescued him."

Hector couldn't respond to that.

"These people," said his mother, "are they the same ones who killed your father?"

"No. But they are... related."

Her frown deepened.

"I..." His expression hardened. "I already killed the person who murdered Dad."

She returned a flat stare. "Good," she said. "At least you did that right."

He averted his gaze. The "compliment" cut deeper than any wound he'd suffered today.

"So are you going to tell me why you're here, or do I have to guess?"

"I... I need you to come with me. You're not safe here..."

"Ah. So you've put my life in danger now, too."

"I'm sorry..."

"Don't waste your breath on meaningless apologies, Hector. I honestly don't care how bad you feel." She stood from the bed and began packing her bag.

Hector waited in silence, occasionally throwing a humiliated glance at the reaper. The whole thing felt somehow worse by having someone witness it, even someone as understanding as Garovel.

Before she finished packing, however, there came a knock at the door."

"477

--donation bonus (day #22, post 1/5)--

Hector looked to his mother again. "Were you expecting someone?" he whispered.

She shook her head.

'I only sense one soul waiting on the other side of the door.' Garovel grabbed Hector's shoulder, sending fresh waves of vigor through his body. 'It's not someone we've met before.'

Hector set his helmet down and moved toward the door. Through the tiny scope, he saw a man in a black cap and coat. Not someone he'd seen before, just as Garovel said. He held up a hand for both his mother and Garovel, a silent request to stay where they were. He cracked the door open and looked through.

"Hello," the man said, "my name is--" His eyes widened as they lingered upon Hector's face. Metal clapped around his mouth, and Hector grabbed him by the collar to pull him into the room.

The door eased shut again, and Hector dragged the man into the bathroom and forced him to sit on the toilet.

"Who are you?" Hector said lowly. He annihilated the iron so the man could answer.

"I'm just a courier! The prince told me to ask the woman in this room to come see him! I don't know why! Oh, goddess! Please don't hurt me!"

"The prince?" Hector's brow lowered. "Which prince?"

"Prince David! Here!" He retrieved a cellphone from his coat. "Call him! You'll see! It's the number at the top of the list!"

"Calm down," said Hector. He tried to make his voice sound gentle, but the man only seemed to go paler. "As long as you don't try anything... I'm not going to hurt you. Please... just relax." He couldn't tell if the man believed him or not. He backed up toward the bathroom's entrance, keeping the courier in sight, and found the number in the phone. After a couple rings, the prince answered.

<“Is it done?”>

Hector glanced between the courier and the reaper.

‘Don’t just hang up,’ Garovel advised him. ‘Tell him who you are and that you have his man hostage. See what information you can get out of him.’”

"478

--donation bonus (day #22, post 2/5)--

Hector put the phone on speaker and then said, “Prince David... your courier is unharmed... for the moment.”

<“...And to whom am I speaking?”>

“Sir... please tell me... what were you planning to do with my mother?”

There came a very long pause.

--++--++--

David put his fork down, suddenly forgetting about his buttered duck and chanterelle mushrooms. He shot a heavy look across the table.

Duchess Jezebel had already taken notice and stopped eating as well. Instead of asking what was wrong, however, she smiled and kindly told her maidservants to leave the room.

He hated being caught off guard, but it seemed a running theme of late. He disregarded the pit in his stomach and tried to assess the situation intelligently. If nothing else, he decided that ignoring the young man’s question about intent would be unwise. “You probably won’t believe me, but truly, I was attempting to ensure your mother’s safety.”

<“...You’re right. I don’t believe you.”>

The ice in those words gave the prince a chill. He clenched his jaw. “I wish I could prove it to you. You seem like one of the few people who understands the dire circumstances facing Atreya.”

No response.

David tried again. "I won't claim to know what your goals are, but I have met the people against whom you've been fighting. I've seen their atrocities first-hand. I expected they would attempt to reach your loved ones sooner or later, but I see you are a step ahead of me. And them, it would seem. Your diversion was quite impressive. I was very pleased when I heard that you had stolen my brother-in-law away. If you had arrived at the castle earlier, I would have been there as well, and perhaps we would have met in person."

<"...You sure like to talk, don't you?">

"Aha! That I do. I would be most interested to talk about how I might be able to help you. That is why you are bothering to speak with me, yes? Information in exchange for my courier's life?"

<"...Y-yes.">

David cocked an eyebrow at that, but said, "What manner of information do you require?"

"479

--donation bonus (day #22, post 3/5)--

<"...Anything you can tell me... about Abolish's plans... would be helpful. Specifically... how they intend to trigger war with Rendon.">

"Ah. Well, I imagine your recent exploits have torpedoed whatever their previous game was. I will do my best to learn what their next strategy is, but they don't like to discuss such things with me." The prince paused, meeting Jezebel's gaze as he conceived a question of his own. "By the way, how did you know that they were going to be in Harold today? Even I didn't know of that."

Hector remained silent.

David was beginning to see a pattern here. "Fine. I suppose you have no reason to tell me."

<"...Do you know what they were going to do in Harold?">

"I could guess, but no, I don't know for certain. I could try to find out, if you prefer.”

<“They were going to destroy the entire town.”>

Worse than he’d expected, though not by much. “I wish that wasn’t so easy for me to believe.”

<“They wanted to make it look like Rendon was responsible.”>

“Of course. I see why you had the town evacuate.”

<“...Did it actually work?”>

The prince blinked. “You don’t already know?”

<“I’ve been... busy.”>

“Ah. Indeed, it worked very well. I don’t think they could have fled any faster. And as there’s been no news that Harold was destroyed, I believe it’s safe to assume our Abolish friends were unable to stage their massacre properly.”

More silence. David expected some sound of relief, perhaps, but there was nothing.

Wanting to keep the conversation alive, David concocted a fresh question. “Why are you fighting Abolish, anyway?”

<“...What do you mean?”>

“Well, you’re a criminal, aren’t you? The worst this country has to offer, according to the media and the police.”

<“...You really believe that?”>

The prince smirked. “I don’t. Or rather, I’d prefer not to, but I think hope might be affecting my judgment.”

<“...And I hope I can trust your information.”>

“Of course. You’ll kill my courier if I lie, won’t you?”

<“...No.”>

David’s brow lowered. “No?””

"480 -- LVI.

--donation bonus (day #22, post 4/5)--

<“Your courier hasn’t... he hasn’t done anything wrong. Even if you lie to me, I won’t... I won’t hurt him.”>

“But you said before that my help was in exchange for his life.”

<“No. You said that.”>

The prince chortled. “Then you’re admitting to me that you have nothing to leverage for my information.”

<“...I’m admitting no such thing.”>

“Then how can you be sure I’ll cooperate?”

<“...I said I wouldn’t hurt your courier. I didn’t say anything about you.”>

David opened his mouth but no words came out. He abruptly remembered that he didn’t know how Hector had learned about Harold. Some other source of information was undoubtedly involved, which could serve to check whatever intel David offered. Furthermore, he remembered that Hector hadn’t actually denied being a mass murderer.

<“So please, Prince David... don’t try to trick me.”>

The reports all said that Hector Goffe was only sixteen, but at the moment, David was having a hard time believing that. These didn’t strike him as the words of someone so young. There was a certain caution in Hector’s voice, a carefulness in everything he said. The boy even laid a kind of trap for him. As long as that other source of information was in play, David couldn’t just tell any old lie in order to gain Hector’s trust.

Of course, David had no intention of lying, but still, it seemed clear now that Abolish had underestimated this person. And David did not want to do the same.

“I would promise not to trick you, but I fear it would sound rather like something a trickster would say.”

Chapter Fifty-Six: ‘Gather unto thee...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Gina didn't get to drive. She had to sit in the front passenger seat, while Mr. Edith took the wheel and followed her directions. Mrs. Edith sat directly behind her, no doubt ready to pounce on a moment's notice and kill her in any number of horrible ways. Gina just tried not to stare at the woman in the car's side mirror. She would've liked to call Hector again, but Mrs. Edith also confiscated her phone."

"480 -- LVI.

--donation bonus (day #22, post 4/5)--

<"Your courier hasn't... he hasn't done anything wrong. Even if you lie to me, I won't... I won't hurt him.">

"But you said before that my help was in exchange for his life."

<"No. You said that.">

The prince chortled. "Then you're admitting to me that you have nothing to leverage for my information."

<"...I'm admitting no such thing.">

"Then how can you be sure I'll cooperate?"

<"...I said I wouldn't hurt your courier. I didn't say anything about you.">

David opened his mouth but no words came out. He abruptly remembered that he didn't know how Hector had learned about Harold. Some other source of information was undoubtedly involved, which could serve to check whatever intel David offered. Furthermore, he remembered that Hector hadn't actually denied being a mass murderer.

<"So please, Prince David... don't try to trick me.">

The reports all said that Hector Goffe was only sixteen, but at the moment, David was having a hard time believing that. These didn't strike him as the words of someone so young. There was a certain caution in Hector's voice, a carefulness in everything he said. The boy even laid a kind of trap for him. As long as that other source of information was in play, David couldn't just tell any old lie in order to gain Hector's trust.

Of course, David had no intention of lying, but still, it seemed clear now that Abolish had underestimated this person. And David did not want to do the same.

"I would promise not to trick you, but I fear it would sound rather like something a trickster would say."

Chapter Fifty-Six: 'Gather unto thee...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Gina didn't get to drive. She had to sit in the front passenger seat, while Mr. Edith took the wheel and followed her directions. Mrs. Edith sat directly behind her, no doubt ready to pounce on a moment's notice and kill her in any number of horrible ways. Gina just tried not to stare at the woman in the car's side mirror. She would've liked to call Hector again, but Mrs. Edith also confiscated her phone."

"481

--donation bonus (day #22, post 5/5)--

Mr. Edith was something of a chatterbox and seemed entirely too relaxed for Gina's comfort. In fact, so did Melanie--Lynnette's sister. She'd managed to learn all of their names during the drive. The father's name was Jacob, and the mother's was Isabelle.

And apparently, Isabelle was not an Atreyan native.

"She came here from Intar when she was twelve," said Mr. Edith. "We met only a year later, if you can believe that."

"Oh," said Gina. "So you fell in love quite young, then?"

"Well, not exactly. She terrified me back then!" He laughed. "We didn't start dating until we were much older."

Mrs. Edith pursed her lips. "Jacob, why must you tell her these things?"

Jacob ignored the question. "She's actually very sweet, once you get past all the aggression."

“Aha, I’m sure,” said Gina.

“Isabelle’s mother was a government-trained assassin, you know.”

“Jacob!”

“What? We’re not in Intar. It’s okay to tell people. Isabelle is a bit touchy when it comes to her mother. I’d recommend avoiding the subject if you want to get on her good side.”

Mrs. Edith just sighed.

By the time they reached the bunker, Gina could no longer tell if she or Mrs. Edith was more relieved. She was just starting to show the family around the facility when the King arrived from one of the back rooms.

“Greetings,” said William.

Lynnette’s whole family bent a knee at once. Gina only gave a small bow.

“That is unnecessary,” said the King. “But thank you.”

Gina eyed the gray coat draped over his shoulder. At a glance, it hid the King’s missing arm rather well, but as one’s gaze lingered, it became increasingly apparent that the man was not in the best of health. Pale complexion, bags under his eyes. Hopefully that would begin to change now.

“Your daughter is this way.” The King showed them to the rearmost room where Lynnette was sleeping.

Mr. Edith rushed to her side first. “What happened?”

“I do not know exactly,” said William. “I only know that she was injured after rescuing me. I do believe she will be fine, however.””

"482

“How do you know?” said the young Melanie.

“It was many years ago now,” said William, “but I have some experience in such matters.”

And Gina blinked, because she suddenly recalled reading somewhere that the King had actually been an EMT when he was younger, prior to marrying into the royal family. "Did you tell that to Hector before he left?" she asked.

"I intended to," said William, "but I... hesitated."

"Hesitated? Why?"

The man hung his head a little. "I was still rather confused and... frightened, I am ashamed to say."

"Oh." Gina frowned. "You don't have to be scared of Hector. He's a sweetheart. Besides, you've already dealt with much scarier people than him."

"I know that now," said the King. "Lynnette explained that he is different from Abolish."

Mr. Edith interrupted. "Pardon me, Your Majesty, but when will she be waking up? Do you know?"

"In a few hours, probably, but she should remain in bed a while longer than that. She has at least one broken rib, so she will be in considerable pain unless we can provide her with analgesics."

"I'll see about getting my hands on some," said Gina, and she eyed the King again. "You might need some, too, yeah?"

He gave a tired smile. "That would be appreciated."

"You should rest, Your Majesty," she said. "You look terrible."

"I think I shall." He shuffled off to the next room over.

At length, the family seemed ready to listen to Gina. She tried to bring them up to speed on everything--the Queen's departure, the presence of Abolish, the princes' betrayals, Lynnette and Hector's roles as well as her own.

When they were done asking questions, Gina helped everyone get situated and comfortable. There weren't enough rooms for everyone, but there were plenty of cars. For herself, she took a black SUV. The rear seats folded down, offering plenty of space to sleep, though she wasn't prepared to turn in for the night just yet.

She had to make a few calls. Painkillers were the priority at the moment, but she figured that a more spacious place might be needed soon."

"483

Eventually, Hector arrived, his mother following in her own car. They both looked completely exhausted, and everyone else was already asleep, so Gina figured introductions would have to wait. Mrs. Edith sat up inside her blue convertible to watch the newcomers, but she probably just wanted to make sure they weren't going to attack anyone, because she lay back down as soon as she saw Gina welcoming them in.

"It's a pleasure to meet you, Hector's mom."

"Likewise," Mrs. Goffe said flatly.

Gina smiled with sympathy. "I'm sorry for the inconvenience. And everything else, really. We're a bit pressed for space at the moment, so please just bed up anywhere you like. You'd probably be most comfortable in your own car, but please feel free to use any of the vehicles here."

The woman just nodded and returned to her car.

Gina walked with Hector as he searched for a place to sleep as well. "How's your mother handling things?"

"...Not very well, I think. Garovel will keep an eye on her, but, um... could you also watch out for her? I'm a bit... worried, I guess."

"Eh, I'm not sure I'll be able to help much with that. I need to get back to Sescoria soon."

Hector shook his head. "P-please, um... don't go back there."

"I have to. We need the intel."

"No, we don't," said Hector. "I have, um... a new source. Prince David will be helping us."

She raised her brow. "Wha--? How the hell did you get a prince to help us?"

“Ah--” Hector rubbed his neck. “He just kinda... offered. And look, even if you go back there... you won’t be able to learn anything. Because... Abolish will be more cautious now.”

“Hmm. You have a point, I suppose. I’m sure they’re curious as to how you knew to attack the castle today. They may’ve already found all the bugs I planted.”

“Y-yeah. So...”

She gave a nod. “Okay. I’ll stay and look after everyone. What about you, though? What are you going to do?”

He took a deep breath. “I need to rest while I can...””
"484

“Do you think you’ll have enough time to rest?” said Gina.

“Maybe... Garovel says that Abolish probably won’t make another move for at least a few days, so...”

“Why does he think that?”

“Oh, because of Lynnette.” Hector smirked faintly. “She fought Desmond and Andres by herself... and she fucked them both up.”

“Heh.”

“We, uh... we couldn’t kill them for good, unfortunately, but... they’ll probably need more time to recover than I will. They both died twice.”

After that, Gina let him go to sleep. He was out within minutes, and after making a couple more calls, she finally turned in as well.

In the morning, she was early to rise, more out of compulsion than because she felt fully rested. She’d never been much for sleeping, really, and so decided to whip up a large breakfast for everyone. Mr. Edith had beaten her to the kitchen, however, apparently having had the same idea. She offered her assistance with the preparations, which he happily accepted.

There wasn’t a large enough table for everyone, nor even enough space in the tiny dining room, so they all gathered in the garage and ate in a kind of rough circle, some standing, some sitting on the floor or in the back of a truck.

Lynnette, William, and Hector were the last to arrive, each one looking similarly ragged. Gina pitied Hector the most, however, as he became the target of a barrage of questions from Lynnette's mother.

"So if you're not really a mass murderer," Isabelle was saying, "then why does everyone seem to think you are?"

"I... ah... that's... not easy to... agh..."

Gina looked to Hector's mother, expecting her to pitch in with something, but the woman merely listened. Gina had to help him out herself. "He ended up being blamed for something that someone else did."

She actually knew more of the details than Hector probably realized. She'd looked into the events rather extensively and found several contradictory testimonies from people who'd been in the school at the time of the attack. In particular, there was the version given by one of his teachers, Ms. Trent, who claimed to have been saved by Hector."

"485

Ms. Trent's account of what transpired had been too difficult for the media or the police to believe, what with it talking about students becoming possessed with murderous intent. This, combined with the fact that Hector's own father had been among the listed victims, gave Gina a fairly clear picture of what had truly happened. Not to mention, it also explained why Hector seemed to have an especially difficult time talking about it.

She was, however, still left to wonder if Hector really had to kill the possessed students in order to stop them. That was the only thing to give her genuine pause, but even that had not lasted very long. She had one of her minions investigate and subsequently earned herself a peek at the autopsy reports, where she discovered that suffocation had not been the cause of death for any of them. Rather, it had been the work of severe brain damage, despite only one of the bodies indicating any kind of head trauma.

Gina was forced to articulate all of these things to Lynnette's parents by morning's end. She left out the part about his father, as everyone probably knew that already due to it being a focal point of so many news reports.

Hector tried to assist her in explaining, but he mostly just ended up nodding awkwardly. And afterwards, he shambled off to go sleep again.

"I have a request," said King William, who'd remained largely quiet up to now. "Might it be possible for me to speak to my wife soon?"

"Oh," said Gina, "I suppose I can try giving Master Roman a call. There's a good chance he won't answer, though."

"I understand."

She pulled out her phone and made the call. It rang for a long time, and she was about to give up when it suddenly went through.

<"Gina?">

"Master Roman, is the Queen there with you now?"

<"Yeah, why?">

"I have the King here with me."

<"You what?">

"He's quite eager to speak to his wife, Master Roman. Please quit hogging the phone to yourself."

<"No, seriously, what? How did--?">

There came a sudden rustling, and then Queen Helen's voice said, <"William?">"

"486

Gina handed the phone off to the King.

"Helen? Ah... yes, I am alright." He glanced across his crowd of onlookers, and after a moment, he flushed red and walked away, speaking more quietly into the receiver.

Gina eyed Lynnette next. She'd been moving a bit stiff all morning, not speaking very much, and just generally looking tired. "How's your pain?" Gina asked.

Lynnette looked at her with a half-drawn eye. "Excruciating," she said. "It's a little difficult to breathe, but His Highness told me that was to be expected."

"I'll make a trip into town and pick up those painkillers for you."

"I'll go with you," said Lynnette.

"No, no," said Gina. "It's better if I go alone. I'm the only one here who we know that nobody is looking for. And besides, you need your rest."

Lynnette frowned but nodded. "Take my phone, then." She offered it, and Gina accepted.

"Be back soon," she said. "Oh, and make sure the King fills Master Roman in on what's happened."

"Okay."

--++--++--

After watching Gina go, Mr. Edith offered to carry Lynnette back to her room, but that was hardly necessary. Even if she'd wanted to go back to bed, she could walk just fine on her own. Annoyingly, she was tired yet not sleepy, so she just stayed in the garage with her family for a while.

Despite the strange circumstances, it was certainly a relief to see them again. More than a few times, she thought she never would. Her mother had been light on the questions so far, probably not wanting to aggravate Lynnette's condition, which was why Hector and Gina had been targeted instead.

"It would seem you've been keeping up with your training during your absence," said Mrs. Edith.

Lynnette gave a weak laugh and regretted it. "You could say that," she said gruffly. "Looks like I'll have to take a break for a little while, though."

"Indeed."

"By the way, Mom, would you mind helping Hector out for me?"

The middle-aged woman folded her arms. "Help him how?"

"We were sparring partners. I'm sure he could benefit from practicing against you."

"487 -- LVII.

Mrs. Edith lowered her brow. "What is your relationship with this boy, exactly?"

"I'm planning to marry him," said Lynnette.

Her mother's eyes widened, as did her father's, her sister's, and even Mrs. Goffe's, who was still within earshot. "You're planning to what?!" said Mrs. Edith.

Lynnette smirked at their faces. "I'm joking. I hardly know him. He doesn't talk very much."

Mr. Edith interjected now, looking almost as stern as his wife. "Young lady, that was not funny."

"Pretty sure it was," she said, earning a titter from her little sister.

Her mother shook her head. "You insufferable--"

"You can't be mad at me. I'm injured." Lynnette clutched her ribs and hunched over a bit.

"Not injured enough, I'm thinking." But Mrs. Edith couldn't suppress her slight grin.

It was Mrs. Goffe's turn to interrupt. "How did you come to meet my son?"

Lynnette stood up straight again, though felt a bit light-headed and decided to lean on the red BMW behind her. "He just showed up at the castle," she said. "Completely out of nowhere. Saved the Queen's life. And mine. Did he not explain to you?"

Mrs. Goffe frowned. "As you said, he doesn't talk very much."

"Well, yes, but I would've thought--"

"We don't talk very much," she corrected.

That left an awkward silence in its wake.

Isabelle was the one to break it, addressing Hector's mother. "You must have had a difficult time with his infamy."

Mrs. Goffe's eyes glazed over. "Yeah," was all she mustered in reply.

"I heard his father was also one of the victims. You must be--"

"Honey, she probably doesn't wish to talk about it."

"I only meant to offer my condolences. I can't imagine what you must be going through right now."

Mrs. Goffe looked over the family with an utterly blank expression. "You're right," she said. "You can't imagine." And she walked away.

Chapter Fifty-Seven: 'Thy royal passing...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Nathaniel received an extravagant funeral service. There were so many flowers that the casket was almost hidden from view. David wasn't sure where they'd all come from."

"487 -- LVII.

Mrs. Edith lowered her brow. "What is your relationship with this boy, exactly?"

"I'm planning to marry him," said Lynnette.

Her mother's eyes widened, as did her father's, her sister's, and even Mrs. Goffe's, who was still within earshot. "You're planning to what?!" said Mrs. Edith.

Lynnette smirked at their faces. "I'm joking. I hardly know him. He doesn't talk very much."

Mr. Edith interjected now, looking almost as stern as his wife. "Young lady, that was not funny."

"Pretty sure it was," she said, earning a titter from her little sister.

Her mother shook her head. "You insufferable--"

"You can't be mad at me. I'm injured." Lynnette clutched her ribs and hunched over a bit.

"Not injured enough, I'm thinking." But Mrs. Edith couldn't suppress her slight grin.

It was Mrs. Goffe's turn to interrupt. "How did you come to meet my son?"

Lynnette stood up straight again, though felt a bit light-headed and decided to lean on the red BMW behind her. "He just showed up at the castle," she said. "Completely out of nowhere. Saved the Queen's life. And mine. Did he not explain to you?"

Mrs. Goffe frowned. "As you said, he doesn't talk very much."

"Well, yes, but I would've thought--"

"We don't talk very much," she corrected.

That left an awkward silence in its wake.

Isabelle was the one to break it, addressing Hector's mother. "You must have had a difficult time with his infamy."

Mrs. Goffe's eyes glazed over. "Yeah," was all she mustered in reply.

"I heard his father was also one of the victims. You must be--"

"Honey, she probably doesn't wish to talk about it."

"I only meant to offer my condolences. I can't imagine what you must be going through right now."

Mrs. Goffe looked over the family with an utterly blank expression. "You're right," she said. "You can't imagine." And she walked away.

Chapter Fifty-Seven: 'Thy royal passing...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Nathaniel received an extravagant funeral service. There were so many flowers that the casket was almost hidden from view. David wasn't sure where they'd all come from."

--donation bonus (day #23, post 1/5)--

The ceremony was televised, and there were more people crammed into the basilica than were probably needed, really. An orchestra on standby around both the east and west entrances, a choir in the back, cameras all over the first and second floors, and hundreds of distant relatives from all over the country. The Belgrants, the Carthraces, the Masdens, the Volliers, and many others whom David didn't care to think about.

In a way, all of these people made it sadder in David's mind, because he knew that almost no one in the room held any genuine affection for Nathaniel. Even the man's own wife and son had despised him. Apart from perhaps Charles, Meriwether, and, yes, a small part of himself, this huge confluence of people was merely to keep up appearances, to follow through with familial obligations.

"Here under the Goddess' divine light do we pray," said the Master Cleric, a balding man of severely limited stature but with an incongruently large voice that reverberated through the hall. He was a favored speaker at many royal ceremonies, probably due to the sense of gravitas that he could lend a room. "Dear friends and loved ones. Standing before you now, it seems an affront to all my sensibilities that a man so fine as our Prince Nathaniel should be taken from us so long before his time. I would not chide you if your faith in Her will was wavering, if you were beginning to wonder why She would allow such a tragedy to happen."

David recalled these same words at his father's funeral, as well. They'd felt just as shallow then, too.

"But let me be the first to remind you, dear brethren, that our beloved prince is now at peace in Her eternal embrace. Mourn, grieve, and shed tears where you must, but remember that he is with Her now, and nothing has truly been lost, for we will all be able to see him again in time."

David squinted. Nothing quite lightened the mood like a gentle reminder that they were all going to die, as well. He stopped listening and looked over at his brothers."

--donation bonus (day #23, post 2/5)--

Seven were now six, and they all sat in the front pews, interspersed between their wives and children, David being the odd man out in that regard. Of all his siblings, he'd been the only one to escape the pressure to ensure their bloodline live on. Ironically enough, he'd always felt that he might have been inclined to have children if that sense of "duty to his lineage" had never been forced upon him in the first place. Though, if he did ever meet a woman he loved truly, he would probably just run away with her, rather than risk subjecting her to his family.

The Abolishers were in attendance as well, though only five of them, and they concealed themselves beneath blue-and-gold clerical robes. He tried to keep a sense of where they all were, but they kept moving, creeping around and leaving him unsettled as usual. The absent two, he believed, were still resting. Before apparently hibernating, Desmond had met with David one last time, and the man expressed very little disappointment at having lost the King and considerably more relief at no longer having to "babysit the dull bastard."

The other Abolishers were all in a tizzy, now. Belgrant Castle was completely empty of subjects to maim and torture for their amusement, and word had therefore spread around Sescoria about the monstrous people who'd been holding the building hostage. Word hadn't made it into the news, of course, as that was still being monitored and suppressed, but it was progress.

As for this business about Hector Goffe being the one who killed Nathaniel, David didn't believe it, partly because Luther was the one who claimed it so, and partly because David had already asked Hector himself. Granted, murder wasn't a thing that many people would admit to, but David could see no motive for anyone other than Luther.

Though, if David was honest, part of him still wanted Luther to be innocent. Part of him wanted to think the man wasn't that far gone yet. Foolishness, he knew. Luther had already betrayed Helen, nearly to the cost of her life."

--donation bonus (day #23, post 3/5)--

Strangely, Luther's recent deception had served to pacify the Abolishers for the time being. The only reason they were present today was because they believed that Hector had killed Nathaniel, leading them to suspect that Hector wanted the other princes dead as well. So rather than occupying themselves elsewhere with more important matters, they were stuck here, playing guards in case of an attack that wasn't going to happen.

This meant that information about Abolish's presence in the capital had greater opportunity to spread--a chance which David and Duchess Jezebel were taking full advantage of. Even now, while they both sat through this ceremony, their agents were busy helping refugees flee the city and get the word out. For the first time in a long while, David could see genuine hope brewing, hope that Atreya might make it out of this mess without going to war with Rendon or Kahm.

The primary hitch, however, was trying to find out what the Abolishers planned to do next. As volatile as they were, it was difficult to predict how they would respond to being outed. Somehow, he doubted that they'd simply up and leave. Even despite being on relatively good terms with them personally, David had thus far been unable to break any new ground with them.

Desmond and Andres were obviously unavailable. David had no rapport with Conall and Tessa, as they were the busiest of the seven and were usually preoccupied with one thing or another. And since Karkash might as well have been a brick wall for as often as he spoke, that only left Hanjir and Nola.

Hanjir was perhaps the most terrifying of all seven, but not because he was more imposing or intimidating--Karkash had all of them beat there, surely. Rather, it was simply that Hanjir had, by far, the worst mood swings. He was easily the most unpredictable, even starting fights with the others at whim. Moreover, David discovered that Hanjir tended to lie for no apparent reason, which rather devalued him as a potential source of information.

So that left Nola."

"491

--donation bonus (day #23, post 4/5)--

The service drew to a close, and the casket was removed from the building. Only the princes and their immediate families were allowed to follow. David couldn't see the Abolishers from his black limousine, but he was sure they were in pursuit as well.

Nathaniel's final resting place would be beneath the Atreyan Royal Palace, entombed next to their father.

David had been down here a few times before, curious to see what the catacombs were normally like. He'd found them much colder and darker when not in the throes of ritual entombment, which he supposed was only to be expected. At the moment, however, flower petals lined the stone halls, and a hundred lamps bathed the path to Nathaniel's chamber in warm, golden light.

At length, they finally arrived, and David and his brothers proceeded on together, now accompanied only by Nathaniel's flat-faced wife and vacant-eyed son. They watched the casket handlers set it down on the stone slab and slide Nathaniel into the hole in the wall. The chamber itself was only for ornaments and mementos, now laid down by everyone present.

"He will be missed," said Gabriel.

"And avenged," added Meriwether. He'd been the only one of the brothers to cry during the service, and even now, he hadn't fully regained his composure.

They all said their farewells to Nathaniel, and then it was done. Gradually, they all returned to the surface.

David rubbed his face and sighed as he saw sunlight again. It was barely past midday, but all this gloom had taken its toll on him. He would have rather liked to go home and sleep, but there was yet work to be done.

"I still do not understand it," came Meriwether's voice, and David realized the man was addressing him. "This Hector Goffe. By all accounts, he was just a common boy before all of this. How could he harbor such a grudge against us?"

David looked around. The others were dispersing, but Luther was still within earshot, as were a few of the wives, who could be just as problematic if they heard the wrong thing. David decided to remain neutral as he walked with Meriwether. "It is a mystery, isn't it?"

"492

--donation bonus (day #23, post 5/5)--

"I suppose the boy would not require much motivation," said Meriwether, almost sighing. "What kind of world do we live in, where mere children can cause so much misery?"

"You say that like we've caused none of our own," said David.

"There is a difference. What we do, we do for the good of the nation."

"Of course."

Meriwether shook his head. "There is that tone of yours. Saying one thing while implying another. I wish you would just be straightforward for once."

David merely returned a placid smile.

Meriwether had always been a rather blunt instrument. Sometimes that was helpful. Most times it wasn't. But he was an honest man, on the whole, which David appreciated. It made things simpler, if not necessarily easier.

"Bah," said Meriwether. "You and your games. I have no patience for them."

"I've noticed." David rested a hand on the shorter man's shoulder. "But these are hardly games anymore, I fear. I hope you will take that under advisement and err on the side of caution."

Meriwether eyed the hand. "As usual, I have no idea what you are trying to say."

David's smile tightened. If only matters were as simple as just being able to warn the man about Luther. Certainly, it would have been nice to come right out and say it, but what, then, would happen if Meriwether went on to have a conversation with Luther about David? Quite possibly, Meriwether would be his tactless, confrontational self and alert Luther to the fact that David might not truly be on his side. That, or maybe Meriwether was playing some game of his own that David had yet to see through. Doubtful, sure, but David had misjudged his brothers before.

But despite all this, perhaps there was yet a way that David could help his brother here, a way which posed no risk to himself. He removed his hand from Meriwether's shoulder. "I wonder what Luther was thinking as he watched Nathaniel being killed."

Meriwether's expression turned to disgust. "What a repulsive thought. Why would you wonder such a thing?"

"493

"I was merely curious as to why Luther even chose to watch in the first place," said David. "He must be a bolder man than I, because I know that if I encountered the Darksteel Soldier, fleeing would be the only thing on my mind."

"What are you talking about?" said Meriwether. "Luther probably did not have the opportunity to flee. He was probably trapped in some way."

"Oh, yes, I'm sure you're right."

Meriwether threw him a sideways look but said nothing.

And that was it, the look he'd been hoping for.

David couldn't offer him any information directly, so instead, he'd tried to plant an idea in Meriwether's head--a tiny seed of doubt. It would be up to Meriwether to make that seed grow, of course, but that was the whole point. It had to feel like the man had thought of it himself, otherwise David's name would undoubtedly crop up.

If Meriwether chose to investigate the matter further, he might even find evidence that contradicted Luther's version of events. Of course, it was also possible that Luther had covered his tracks too thoroughly. It was a rather weak gambit, admittedly, but David didn't see much reason not to have it in play.

After that, eight days passed with very little progress on any front.

He spent the majority of his time working on Nola. She wasn't difficult to find. Rather, she came to him. The Abolishers split their manpower, allocating Nola and Karkash to keep tabs on all the princes around the clock, and she visited David the most, often bringing him presents of the bloody sort.

She was surprisingly tight-lipped about their plans, however.

“Always so curious,” she said in that gleeful tone of hers. “The clever prince. What angle are you working, eh?”

This time was different, though. He’d thought of a new strategy. “I’d tell you what angle I’m working, but... honestly, you see, it’s a bit embarrassing.”

“Oh?” Her eyes narrowed, and she stuck her head closer. “Embarrassing how?”

“No, you’ll surely think me foolish.”

“I won’t, I won’t! So tell me!”

“Well, okay. I was wondering how someone might go about becoming a member of Abolish.”

Nola’s eyes lit up. “No shit?!”

"494

“I understand that one must die first,” said David.

She smirked. “Oh, and how do you know that?”

“I have informants of my own,” was all he told her.

David’s alliance with Hector proved very enlightening. He knew of reapers now as well. He’d already suspected that there was some kind of hidden force behind the Abolisher’s ability to “hear through walls,” as some people had called it. That was one of the first things Hector had told him, in fact, as the young man wanted David to be careful with what he said when he thought no one was listening. It also meant that their correspondence had to be performed largely via text message, though Hector also insisted that David use coded voice mails to confirm that he was the true sender.

Nola laughed. “Are you asking me to kill you?”

David forced himself to grin. "I would kindly request that you wait until I am certain of my conviction."

"Heh." She threw a candid look around David's empty dining chamber. Looking for her reaper, perhaps? After a moment, she said, "It wouldn't work if I killed you right here and now, anyway. You need a willing reaper for that sort of thing, otherwise your soul would decay too quickly, and then you'd just be dead."

"I see. Reapers, yes. I have heard tell of that as well, I think. But truthfully, I was more curious about how one joins Abolish in particular. As in, what sort of oaths one might have to take, and especially how one might be able to prove oneself."

"Oh, that's all boring stuff."

"Is it? I feel that it is paramount for me to earn the trust of your comrades and superiors. Would you know of a way I might accomplish that?"

The mirth in her face lessened somewhat. She was thinking now.

One more push. "I was hoping there might be an opportunity for me in whatever you and your friends have planned next."

"So that's why you've been asking me about it so much."

"Indeed."

She hesitated still. But he could see that she wanted to tell him.

"I apologize for not being more forthcoming earlier," he added. "As I said, I was afraid you would think me foolish.""

"495

"Different sects of Abolish have different requirements," said Nola, "but our sect is pretty simple. All you have to do is kill someone you don't know, while three of us bear witness."

"Hmm. I was hoping for something that would allow me to make a more favorable first impression."

"Heh. Eager prince." She scratched her flat nose for a moment.

"Alright, well. You can't tell anyone what I'm about to say."

"Of course."

"Okay, so... the old plan was to gain the public's favor so that the war with Rendon would last longer and just generally be more 'impassioned.' That was how Ezmortig put it, anyway."

"Ezmortig?"

"Desmond's reaper. But anyway, the old plan's been shot to hell now, and honestly, I'm glad it was. I mean, yeah, it was more ambitious, but it was just so slow. I like the new plan a lot better."

David already didn't like where this was going.

"Basically," said Nola, "we've just decided to attack Rendon ourselves. We'll steal a platoon of Atreyan soldiers and force them to accompany us across the border, where we annihilate the first town we see. Or maybe the first two towns. Or three. I'm sure we'll stop eventually. When we get bored or something."

"...I see. That is much more straightforward."

"I know, right? It's great!"

"When do you intend to do this?"

She grinned. "Tomorrow."

David's eyes widened. Worse news, he could not currently imagine. "So soon?"

"Yeah. We figured we're already operating under time constraints here, what with that sister of yours trying to return with reinforcements. And on top of that, if the metal brat gets much more famous, then his reputation alone will probably draw the Vanguard to Atreya--which would just be a big ol' pain in the cooch. So at this point, all we want to do is set things in motion and get the fuck outta this country."

"What about Desmond and Andres?"

"They've already had over a week to rest. They should be in fighting shape again. Or close enough, anyway."

"Ah, I see..."

"496 -- LVIII.

“So if you’re looking to help,” said Nola, “then maybe you could get us that platoon of soldiers so that we don’t have to steal them.”

David put on a frown. “I’m afraid I wouldn’t be much help with that. I don’t have any sway with the military.”

“Shame.”

David gave a small gasp, partly for the impression it would leave on her and partly because he genuinely did realize something. “No,” he said. “Wait a moment. Perhaps there is a way I can help. Do you know where you will be taking these troops?”

“Oh, um. Where was it? Through that big nature reserve, I think.”

“The one belonging to the Carthraes?”

“Yeah, that sounds right. Why do you need to know?”

“Mm, I’m not sure yet. It might still prove fruitless. Allow me to make a few calls.”

“Sure.”

He stood from the table. “If you’ll excuse me, then.”

“By the way,” said Nola, making David hesitate, “I have a friend who I bet would really like you. She’s a bit of a chubby chaser, and she would be over the moon to date a prince.”

“Oh.” He didn’t dare risk spoiling her good mood now. “That sounds. Delightful. I look forward to meeting her.”

Nola merely returned that manic smile of hers.

He had to force himself to keep only a brisk walk as he fled the room.

Chapter Fifty-Eight: ‘O, warriors of the fore...!’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been a very fast week for Hector. Half of it, he’d spent asleep, and the rest, he’d spent training. He wasn’t sure if Lynn’s mother didn’t like him very much or if that's just how she was with everyone. He thought Garovel might know, but whenever he asked about it, the reaper just smiled and shrugged.

His training with Mrs. Edith was more of a one-way thing. He couldn't really spar with her like he had with Lynn, so the woman mostly focused on demonstrating how to wield a sword properly, as well as helping him figure out what kind of blade suited him best."

"496 -- LVIII.

"So if you're looking to help," said Nola, "then maybe you could get us that platoon of soldiers so that we don't have to steal them."

David put on a frown. "I'm afraid I wouldn't be much help with that. I don't have any sway with the military."

"Shame."

David gave a small gasp, partly for the impression it would leave on her and partly because he genuinely did realize something. "No," he said. "Wait a moment. Perhaps there is a way I can help. Do you know where you will be taking these troops?"

"Oh, um. Where was it? Through that big nature reserve, I think."

"The one belonging to the Carthraes?"

"Yeah, that sounds right. Why do you need to know?"

"Mm, I'm not sure yet. It might still prove fruitless. Allow me to make a few calls."

"Sure."

He stood from the table. "If you'll excuse me, then."

"By the way," said Nola, making David hesitate, "I have a friend who I bet would really like you. She's a bit of a chubby chaser, and she would be over the moon to date a prince."

"Oh." He didn't dare risk spoiling her good mood now. "That sounds. Delightful. I look forward to meeting her."

Nola merely returned that manic smile of hers.

He had to force himself to keep only a brisk walk as he fled the room.

Chapter Fifty-Eight: 'O, warriors of the fore...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It had been a very fast week for Hector. Half of it, he'd spent asleep, and the rest, he'd spent training. He wasn't sure if Lynn's mother didn't like him very much or if that's just how she was with everyone. He thought Garovel might know, but whenever he asked about it, the reaper just smiled and shrugged.

His training with Mrs. Edith was more of a one-way thing. He couldn't really spar with her like he had with Lynn, so the woman mostly focused on demonstrating how to wield a sword properly, as well as helping him figure out what kind of blade suited him best."

"497

--donation bonus (day #24, post 1/5)--

He'd already learned from his previous sparring sessions with Lynn that the metal he created wasn't as strong as that of a professionally forged sword, but a lot of it also had to do with learning to hone the blade's weight and balance. Granted, it wasn't the biggest concern for him, seeing as he could freely manipulate the size of the blade whenever he wanted, but even so, Garovel encouraged him to come up with a "default" form for his sword. The idea was to memorize the shape so that he didn't even have to concentrate in order to make it.

And indeed, it proved quite effective. He learned to do it well enough to create the full sword in under three seconds. It was only a one-handed blade in its normal state, unlike Lynn's two-hander. He wanted to ensure that his left hand remained free, as he would undoubtedly need it in order to continue creating more iron on the fly. Plus, he wanted his left arm to be where he mounted his shield--something he considered even more important than the sword.

Most of his training, however, was spent alone. He kept trying to add his soul to the metal and thereby strengthen it, which reminded him of his battle with Andres, along with a question that he hadn't been able to ask before.

‘Garovel, how was Andres able to manipulate his crystals the way he did?’

‘What do you mean?’

‘The way he could just, like... launch them at us. He didn’t have to throw them or anything.’

‘Oh, right. I doubt you’re able to do that yet. I mean, you can try, but it’s a pretty advanced technique.’

‘How does it work, though?’

‘It’s not an easy explanation. But, um. Let’s see. You’ve probably noticed by now that once you make your iron, you’re not able to manipulate it in any way. Apart from destroying it, that is. Correct?’

‘Ah--yeah?’

‘That’s just how materialization works in general. Once it’s created, it’s a finished product. You’re done with it. It becomes subject to gravity and any other environmental forces, just like normal metal would.’

‘Right, so...?’”

"498

--donation bonus (day #24, post 2/5)--

‘You can’t make your element magically float or fly around with your mind,’ said Garovel. ‘And to my knowledge, that will never change, no matter how much you develop your ability. But that’s not what Andres was doing. He was manipulating his sulfur BEFORE creating it.’

Hector tilted his brow. ‘Uh...?’

‘That’s the trick of it. You change the “state” in which your element is created. What Andres was doing wasn’t technically “launching” the crystals. Rather, the crystals were ALREADY moving when he created them, because he manipulated their “position state,” so to speak, adding an aspect of velocity to them. Which, as I mentioned, is not an easy thing to do.’

‘Hmm...’

‘You’ll also be able to change the physical state that your iron appears in. As it is now, you’re only making iron as it forms naturally in the world, but you’ll eventually be able to create it in liquid or gas form. Especially strong materialization users can even eliminate impurities in their elements. Though, as far as iron is concerned, the impurities are actually what give it its strength, so that might not be terrifically useful for you personally. A lot of elements decay too quickly in non-natural states to serve much purpose outside of a laboratory.’

‘Er, okay...’

‘I should also clarify that we’re not completely certain yet that your element really IS iron.’

‘Wait, really? I thought that was settled a long time ago.’

‘Nope. Even now, we’re still operating under that initial assumption we made.’

‘What else would it be?’

‘Beats me. My knowledge of metals is general, at best. I do believe it is iron, but I’d like to confirm that with an expert when we get the opportunity.’

‘Eesh... and when do you think that’ll be?’

‘Next week, I’d wager.’

‘What? Why would you--?’

‘That was a joke. I don’t have any fucking clue. The way things have been going, we’ll be dead before we get the chance to find out.’

Hector scratched his forehead. ‘You... you do know that jokes are supposed to “lighten” the mood, right?’

‘Let me try again. Why’d the chicken cross the road? It didn’t. It got hit by a car and died.’

‘Ugh...’

"499

--donation bonus (day #24, post 3/5)--
'I've got loads more jokes,' the reaper said.

'Please, no--'

'Why aren't dinosaurs any good at math? Because they're all dead.'

Hector shook his head. 'Y'know... of the two of us, I thought you were supposed to be the cheerful one...'

'Oh, you want cheerful? I can do cheerful. A rabbit goes into a jewelry store, looking to appraise a gold watch. He asks the vendor, "How many carrots?"'

He couldn't help smirking. 'That... that's terrible...'

'Then why are you smiling?'

'I'm not smiling...'

'You definitely are. What about you? Know any jokes?'

'Ah...'

'Oh, c'mon.'

'Uh... okay... a coal miner walks into a bar, and the bartender says... "We don't serve your kind here." The coal miner says... "You mean you don't serve 'minors'? Never heard that one before." And the bartender says... "No, I mean we don't serve black people."'

'Whoa, Hector, what the hell?! I thought we were sticking to cute jokes with bunnies and crap!'

'Oh, ah, sorry...'

The reaper just laughed.

Throughout the week, Hector found considerable enjoyment from eating together with everyone. Of course, he couldn't hold a conversation with any of them, which was embarrassing, but it was fun just listening. It felt a bit homely, which was something he wasn't sure he'd ever properly felt before. Lynn's family got along particularly well, he thought. Given the circumstances, they seemed strangely normal, but he supposed he wasn't the best judge of that anymore.

Gina had been trying to acquire a new place with a similar level of concealment, but she'd not been having an easy time of it. She was hoping to move everyone by the month's end.

"We've actually met before, Your Majesty," said Gina over breakfast one morning.

"Have we?" said the King, squinting at her.

"It was very brief," she said. "I'm not surprised you don't remember. I was dressed as a maid at the time, and Desmond and Karkash were hassling you."

He blinked at her. "Ah! Yes! Come to think of it, how in the world did you sneak into the castle? It was locked down at the time."

"500

--donation bonus (day #24, post 4/5)--

"Yeah, that took some doing," said Gina. "The castle grounds were undergoing repairs at the time, so I disguised myself as a construction worker in order to gain access. Bit tricky, that. I don't really have the physique for it, so I was a little worried, but it worked out. The repair crew was only allowed into the castle itself for use of the lavatories, which was where the second disguise as a maid came in. Snuck it in with me and changed in the bathroom. Went through the building, planting bugs, then changed back and left, fast as I could."

The King gave her a smile. "I see. So all this time, you have been feeding information to Lynnette and Hector."

"Mostly Hector," said Lynn. "I only returned to Atreya a couple weeks ago."

"By the way, Your Majesty," said Gina, "what can you tell us about Prince David? I'm curious as to why he's helping us. Or seeming to help us, at least."

"That man is an odd one," said William. "I do believe he is trustworthy, but perhaps I am being naïve. I am afraid I have never been very good at reading people."

Mrs. Edith chimed in now, as well. "It's no secret that Prince David has always been different from his brothers. The media loved reporting on his antics when he was younger. For a while, it seemed like there was a new story on him every month.”

“I remember,” said the King. “I never associated with him very much. I thought he was nothing but a troublemaker back then. I wish now that I had not been so quick to judge him.”

“What’s his relationship with the Queen like?” Gina asked.

“I asked her about that very subject when we spoke the other day,” he said. “I always thought they were quite distant from one another. David was often out of the country, and I never saw them together very much. However, they were apparently much closer as children. And when I told her that I believed David was secretly our ally in all of this, she seemed very happy. She even laughed.”

Mrs. Edith’s brow rose. “I can’t imagine that woman laughing.”

“You’re one to talk,” said Lynn.”

"501

--donation bonus (day #24, post 5/5)--

The King looked at Mrs. Edith. “Have you met Helen before?”

“Oh, no,” she said. “I only meant according to her reputation. She’s always struck me as a very serious woman.”

“Mom loves the Queen,” added Melanie. “She’s a super royalist.”

Mrs. Edith glared at the girl, which only made her giggle.

“Is that so?” said William, smiling.

“Oh yeah,” agreed Mr. Edith. “You should’ve seen her after she found out that Lynnette had been accepted into the Queen’s Guard.”

“Jacob, please--”

“She was so happy that it was actually kind of scary. Abnormal-like, y’know? Just freaky.”

Mrs. Edith could only sigh.

"That is very sweet," said William. "I am sure Helen would be pleased."

Lynn and the King had both begun to look a little healthier. They were oddly similar--one who'd lost an eye, and one who'd lost an arm. Both had been through the wringer, and both ended up recounting their tales to everyone. It was difficult for Hector then. Their stories reminded him of all the things he'd lost as well, reminded him that his own pain hadn't really gone away, only been buried.

Perhaps everyone could sense that he didn't want to talk about himself, because they never asked. Maybe they already knew enough from the news. Or maybe they were talking about him behind his back. Strange, to realize he would've preferred that. Garovel probably knew for certain, but Hector avoided asking about it. He didn't really want to know.

Hector's mother, however, looked no better than when she'd arrived. She still had the same gaunt, hollow-eyed stare as before.

Occasionally, Gina would try to engage her. "So what do you do for a living, Mrs. Goffe?"

"I was a stage director," she said.

"Stage director? You mean like for plays and musicals?"

"Yes."

"Wow, that's cool!"

"It was. Before... everything."

Gina frowned. "Of course. I'm sorry."

"It's fine."

"You know, I bet I could help you find new work after this is all over. I'm pretty good at finding things."

"No, thank you."

"502

"Ah--are you sure?" said Gina. "It wouldn't be any trouble."

Hector decided to intervene. "Mom, you should accept her offer."

"I said no." She walked away.

Hector gave Gina an apologetic look and then pursued his mother to the other end of the garage.

She'd climbed into her car to lie down.

"Mom..."

She didn't bother to sit up again. "What?"

"I'm... I'm worried about you."

"You're wasting your time on me."

Hector had no idea what to say to that.

"You should have just left me to die," she said.

"Mom... don't say that..."

"Why not?"

"B-because... how could you think I would ever just...? Agh..."

"It has nothing to do with you. I just don't care."

"Mom..."

"The only person I've ever loved is gone," she said. "What difference would it make if you'd let me die? I'm already dead, anyway."

"Agh, Mom. Stop. You're not--"

"Tell me. Do you even care that your father is dead? That you got him killed?"

Her words might as well have been knives. "How can you--? You don't even know that I--how much I--?" He choked on his own breath, feeling his throat swelling up. He squinted, suddenly having to fight the gathering tears.

She sat up to look at him now. "Wow," she said dully, "so you really do have emotions. I was starting to think you were some kind of monster."

Hector couldn't stop the tears at all now and just tried to hide his eyes with a hand.

'Fuck, I hate this woman,' said Garovel. 'Hector, please stop talking to her.'

But Mrs. Goffe wasn't done. "All this time, you've been off doing whatever you want, getting into more trouble, trying to be a hero. And you're worried about your family now? It's a bit late for that, don't you think? You don't honestly expect me to forgive you, do you?"

He couldn't even respond.

"If you're going to do something, then you might as well do it all the way, Hector. Just leave me be. Worry about your fight with Abolish or whatever it's called. If you get me killed, too, then at least you'll know that it didn't matter."

"503

Hector fled the garage, up the ramp and outside into the harsh sunlight.

Garovel said something to him, and the words even passed through his head clearly, but he simply wasn't paying attention. His mind was cluttered with confusion and fury, wondering if she'd really meant those things, angry that she could even say them, furious that he couldn't respond. And just. Sadness. It hurt, a pain right in his chest. He'd always thought heartache was just a figure of speech.

"Hector?" It was the King's voice.

Hector hurriedly wiped his eyes. "Y-yes?" He couldn't bring himself to turn around and face the man.

"I apologize," said William. "I happened to overhear what your mother said."

He winced. "O-oh..."

"I did not mean to eavesdrop."

"Did... did everyone hear?"

"Only Gina and myself, I believe. She seemed rather concerned as well. Are you alright?"

"I'm--I, uh... I'm, ah--"

'It's okay to say no,' said Garovel. 'Hector, you don't have to pretend like everything is fine.'

Hector just looked at the ground, opting to say nothing.

The King stepped closer. "Perhaps it is not my place to say this, but would you like my opinion?"

"Um... okay?"

"A child does not require a parent's love or approval in order to live happily or honorably."

Hector's brow receded, and he looked up at the King. "Your Majesty, what are you saying?"

"Were you thinking I would try to convince you how valuable family is? How important it is to reconcile with your mother? Because words such as those would not suit me, I fear. I have considerable experience with family discord."

Hector only frowned.

"Of course, if it is within reason to reconcile, then certainly do so. But please, do not believe that there is something wrong with you merely because of what she said. That would be a mistake. One that I have made, myself."

"But... it's not... I mean, what do I do?"

"Whatever you can. But you cannot force someone to love you. Nor do you need to."

"But I'm... I'm all she has. Whether she acknowledges it or not... I can't just..."

"504

"I am not saying you should abandon your mother," said the King. "But her well-being is not entirely your responsibility, either. She must also want to be well.”

“With respect, um... sir... y-you don’t know very much about us.”

“That is true. I apologize if what I said seemed callous.”

“It’s, ah--it’s fine.”

A heavy silence fell, and Hector realized that the sun was probably beginning to take a toll on the King, so he raised an iron half-dome to shield them both. The man seemed to appreciate it.

“There is something I still do not understand,” said William. “Well, I suppose there are many things, truthfully. But I am curious as to why you are helping us. Is it only because this reaper companion of yours compels you to?”

Hector glanced at Garovel. “No, it’s not just that. I, um... ah... I... want to... agh...”

“Yes?”

He flushed with embarrassment. “I just... we just want to help people.”

The King cocked a blond eyebrow at him. “Begging your pardon, but I find it difficult to believe that your motive could be so simple.”

“Yeah, well...”

“I understand that this Roman Fullister gentleman is helping us because he is an Atreyan loyalist and has business interests here. But unless I am mistaken, you were merely a student in high school a few months ago.”

Hector took a breath and scratched his forehead. “W-well... things kinda, y’know... spiraled out of control.”

“Even so, you have put yourself through quite a lot, and you are telling me that was only because you wanted to--”

Hector’s phone interrupted. He fished it out of his pocket and eyed the caller ID. He hurried back down the ramp while it continued ringing.

The King followed.

“Gina!” shouted Hector, and she turned away from her conversation with Lynn's family.

Everyone gathered around as the phone stopped ringing. Even Mrs. Goffe wandered a bit closer.

The voice mail triggered, and then came David's confirmation.
<"Jonathan. Please pick up if you are there.">

Hector did no such thing."
"505

<"...I guess you are unavailable. Pity. I was hoping you could assist my friends with a very valuable and time-sensitive opportunity. I will send you a text with the details, instead. I hope you receive it soon.">

Everyone waited.

"Time-sensitive?" said Melanie. She did not look very much like her older sister. She seemed to take more after their father than Lynn did.

Gina pulled out her own phone. "I guess that means I should get ready to call Master Roman."

When the text arrived, Hector let Gina be the one to read it aloud.

--++--++--

The chamber didn't look like it belonged to a captain of the Vanguard in the slightest. An entertainment system filled one wall entirely, and Helen could see a shelf full of video games and movies, which seemed to have seen frequent use if their current state of disarray was any indication.

It had taken days to find the Vanguard in Intar. The country was massive, and apparently the group stationed here quite enjoyed its secrecy. Voreese had suggested they just start making a mess of things and wait for the Vanguard to show up, but she was outvoted. Despite how poorly their previous encounter with the Vanguard had gone, Helen still felt that they needed to make a good first impression to have any chance of acquiring assistance.

Indeed, these Intarian servants were a far cry from the ones in Callum. They didn't put on a welcoming façade here. They openly distrusted

Helen and Roman as soon as initial contact was made. And even though it made things more difficult, Helen was more appreciative for it, and she felt slightly more inclined to trust these people.

That being said, she had still been unable to make any progress with negotiations.

The Vanguard's regional captain was a very young boy by the name of Bartholomew Erickson. He didn't look any older than ten years, so she was rather hesitant to speak to him at first, but the boy's reaper, Kohzek, was the one who did most of the talking, anyway. It soon became apparent, however, that Bartholomew was almost as old as Helen."

"506

Kohzek was a difficult negotiator. This was going to be their second meeting with him, and Helen still wasn't sure if the reaper was trying to bargain for a better deal or if he genuinely did not yet believe that Atreya's need was as great as she and Roman claimed it to be.

As Helen took her seat next to Roman, she eyed the two servants across from her--one more than she had been expecting. Bartholomew fidgeted in a chair that was too big for him, but the podgy man next to him was not someone Helen recognized. He had not attended their previous meeting.

As usual, Voreese was the first to ask the obvious question. 'Who's he?'

Kohzek motioned with a ghostly hand. 'This is Harper Norez. And his reaper, Darsihm.'

A sudden silence took the room, making Helen glance around. Both Mehlsanz and Voreese were staring at the newly introduced pair.

'Are you fucking serious?' said Voreese. 'This fucking guy is Harper?'

The fucking guy gave a laugh. "I see my reputation precedes me."

Mehlsanz hovered behind Helen. 'What is someone like you doing here?'

Helen had to interrupt before she got too far behind. "I apologize for my ignorance, but who is this man?"

'Harper Norez,' explained Voreese, 'is a Lieutenant General. He's considered one of the strongest thirty-four people in all of the Vanguard.'

"Thirty-eight, now," Harper corrected. "We've expanded a little. All these young guns rising in the ranks, gotta make room for 'em somewhere."

Helen took another look at this Harper person.

He was of a darker complexion than most Intarians she'd seen, which perhaps implied that he was also a foreigner. With a round face and a broad nose, messy black hair and a mud brown jacket, he looked rather more like an itinerant worker than some kind of great warrior.

"Darsihm and I are actually here because of you," he said, pointing at Mehlsanz. "You rustled some jimmies when you deserted your division."

Roman tensed in his seat. "You've come to capture Mehlsanz?"

"Oh, no, no," said Harper. "Quite the opposite, in fact. I'm here to ensure that doesn't happen. So relax."

"507

'That's awfully considerate of you,' said Voreese with more than a hint of doubt in her voice.

'Yeah, we're nice like that.' Darsihm leaned back in the air, as if lying on an invisible bed, and crossed his ghostly arms. 'But it'd also be problematic if one of Mehlsanz's old comrades came to kill you. We'd rather the Vanguard not be collectively blamed for the assassination of the Atreyan Queen. But then, that is precisely why Mehlsanz here resurrected her, isn't it? To hide behind her status?'

'I didn't think anyone would actually come to protect me,' said Mehlsanz. 'Especially not a Lt. General.'

"We weren't planning to, either," said Harper. "But then word got out that the Queen was traveling around, visiting different divisions all haphazard-like. If you stumbled onto the wrong people, they might've done something very stupid.”

“So you’re only here for damage control,” said Roman.

‘We’re only here because Mehlsanz and I share an old friend,’ said Darsihm. ‘Valeess.’

Mehlsanz shifted. ‘Ah... that wonderful fool. It’s been ages. How is he?’

‘Finally took on a new servant. When he heard about the trouble you were in, he wanted to come for you himself, but he doesn’t have that kind of freedom or authority. So he begged me to have Harper come help you, instead.’

“Wait,” said Roman, “so you weren’t even ordered to come here?”

‘Harper is a Lt. General in title only,’ said Darsihm. ‘In truth, he’s more of a freelance officer.’

Helen tilted her head. “I do not understand. How does that work?”

“Basically,” said Harper, “I don’t have the authority to order anyone around, but in exchange, I don’t have to take orders from anyone below the rank of general, either. So Darsihm and I are usually able to go where we like and do as we please.”

“Sounds like my kind of deal,” said Roman. “How’d you swing that?”

Rather than answering, Harper just returned a confident smile.

‘Would you mind saving the chat for later?’ said Kohzek, whom Helen had nearly forgotten about. ‘I have other matters to attend to.’”

"508

--donation bonus (day #25, post 1/5)--

‘Sorry, go ahead,’ said Darsihm. ‘Harper and I were just curious to meet these people. It’s taken a while to track them down.’

Bartholomew had already grown bored and gone to the far end of the room to play one of his games. Kohzek didn’t seem to care, either, which compounded Helen’s confusion. If the boy was truly near her own age, then she would have expected him to display a bit more maturity and interest in their conversation.

Roman's phone chose that moment to go off, which earned a look from Kohzek. "I should take this," said Roman, and he exited the room.

'Now then,' said Kohzek, addressing Helen, 'the matter of your request. Since our last meeting, I have received confirmation that Abolish is indeed present in your country. I do not require proof that they are attempting to instigate conflict. That much can be assumed. However, I remain unconvinced that sending my troops to rout them is the wisest course of action.'

"Why would you think it unwise?" said Helen.

'Because I feel you are asking more of me than you realize. Yes, with our help, you would likely retake your country without much difficulty. The problem lies in holding onto it once it is retaken. I cannot allow my people to remain with you indefinitely, so what is to stop Abolish from merely waiting until we leave and then attacking you again?'

"I have been thinking on that as well," said the Queen. "I was hoping we could establish a more long-term partnership. My country can provide you with financial backing, if you need it, or perhaps some kind of natural resource would interest you more."

'I do not think so,' said Kohzek. 'The most valuable resource to me at the moment is manpower. Intar is a much larger country than Atreya and so requires many more people to protect it. Our enemies might well seize the opportunity to attack while our attention is divided.'

Helen frowned. "Be that as it may, I am sure we could find--"

Roman burst into the room again, phone in hand, drawing everyone's attention. "Gina, tell them what you told me."

"509

--donation bonus (day #25, post 2/5)--

<"Ah--we've received word that Abolish will be taking a group of Atreyan soldiers to attack Rendon tomorrow. If we're going to prevent war, then we're out of time. We need you back in Atreya tonight. Or at the very latest, tomorrow morning.">

Helen shut her eyes and rubbed her forehead. "Why have they accelerated their plans?"

<“They’re afraid the Vanguard will show up and ruin everything for them. Our source says they just want to get the war started and then book it.”>

She didn’t need to ask who the source was. She knew it was David, and she knew she shouldn’t doubt the validity of his information.

‘Well, that sure as hell changes things,’ said Voreese, and she eyed Kohzek again. ‘We’re out of options here. If you don’t help us right now, then it’s war. You understand that?’

Kohzek shook his head. ‘I am sorry, but if I must make an immediate decision, then I cannot assign anyone to help you.’

‘Fucking bullshit!’

Helen had to contain herself. “Then you doom my people to misery and death,” she said, calmer than she wanted to. “It was my understanding that the Vanguard considered protecting innocents from Abolish a moral imperative. If you cannot help--”

Darsihm intervened. ‘Now just hold on a minute there. How many enemy servants are we talking about here?’

‘Seven,’ said Mehlsanz.

‘I see,’ said Darsihm. ‘Do you know all of their names?’

Voreese had them covered. ‘Desmond Grantier, Andres Geth, Nola Pauls, Tessa Shelrick, Conall Learen, and then Hanjir and Karkash, whose last names remain unknown.’

‘Hmm.’ Darsihm exchanged looks with his servant. ‘There are no big name threats, at least. What do you think?’

Harper scratched the top of his head. “Eh, I don’t think I can fight seven at once. Assuming there’s nobody problematic involved, I could probably take three or four, but--”

‘Holy shit,’ said Voreese, ‘are you seriously offering? Because you wouldn’t need to fight by yourself. Roman’s pretty strong, and Queenie’s not too bad, and we’ve got two more combatants waiting for us back home.’

“Oh.” Harper smiled. “Well, okay then.””

"510 -- LIX.

--donation bonus (day #25, post 3/5)--

Chapter Fifty-Nine: 'Thy promised return...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The airplane was rather compact, with only a few seats left empty despite having a mere three passengers. Harper looked out the window and across the tarmac. The gray skies were a common fixture of this province, as were the drizzling rain and thick forest in the distance.

They hadn't wasted any more time trying to convince Kohzek to help them, as apparently it was a rather long flight back to Atreya. Harper had never been there before. He'd barely even heard of it.

'Are you sure about this?' said Darsihm privately.

Harper had to conceal his chortle. 'Would you stop asking me that already? It was your idea to go with them.'

'I know, but are you REALLY sure? It's been a while since you've seen combat.'

'Is that your subtle way of tellin' me I'm fat?'

'Of course not,' said Darsihm. 'We both know I'm not that subtle.'

'Then quit your worrying.'

'Now that you mention it, though, you have gotten a little fat.'

'Thanks.'

Harper wasn't truly surprised by Darsihm's sudden hesitance. There weren't very many reapers who enjoyed flying by plane. As fast as reapers were, they were still outclassed by a typical aircraft, and since they couldn't actually "sit" within the cabin like a living person could, they had to latch onto their servants in order to not be left behind.

It was a common fear that they would accidentally let go at some point during the journey and thus end up separated from their servants by hundreds or even thousands of kilometers. Of course, they would still be able to communicate with their servants, so meeting up again was an eventuality, but it remained a tremendous inconvenience nonetheless. If it happened over enemy territory, however, then it would be much more than that. Harper recalled various harrowing tales about servants being forced to jump out of a plane in order to go protect their reapers. It was because of such tales that most servant-owned aircraft were not of the leisurely variety, instead opting for an open door through which to jump in the event of such an emergency." "510 -- LIX.

--donation bonus (day #25, post 3/5)--
Chapter Fifty-Nine: 'Thy promised return...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The airplane was rather compact, with only a few seats left empty despite having a mere three passengers. Harper looked out the window and across the tarmac. The gray skies were a common fixture of this province, as were the drizzling rain and thick forest in the distance.

They hadn't wasted any more time trying to convince Kohzek to help them, as apparently it was a rather long flight back to Atreya. Harper had never been there before. He'd barely even heard of it.

'Are you sure about this?' said Darsihm privately.

Harper had to conceal his chortle. 'Would you stop asking me that already? It was your idea to go with them.'

'I know, but are you REALLY sure? It's been a while since you've seen combat.'

'Is that your subtle way of tellin' me I'm fat?'

'Of course not,' said Darsihm. 'We both know I'm not that subtle.'

'Then quit your worrying.'

'Now that you mention it, though, you have gotten a little fat.'

‘Thanks.’

Harper wasn't truly surprised by Darsihm's sudden hesitation. There weren't very many reapers who enjoyed flying by plane. As fast as reapers were, they were still outclassed by a typical aircraft, and since they couldn't actually "sit" within the cabin like a living person could, they had to latch onto their servants in order to not be left behind.

It was a common fear that they would accidentally let go at some point during the journey and thus end up separated from their servants by hundreds or even thousands of kilometers. Of course, they would still be able to communicate with their servants, so meeting up again was an eventuality, but it remained a tremendous inconvenience nonetheless. If it happened over enemy territory, however, then it would be much more than that. Harper recalled various harrowing tales about servants being forced to jump out of a plane in order to go protect their reapers. It was because of such tales that most servant-owned aircraft were not of the leisurely variety, instead opting for an open door through which to jump in the event of such an emergency."

"511

--donation bonus (day #25, post 4/5)--

Harper doubted that would be an issue today, though. Even in the unlikely event that Darsihm did slip away from him during flight, this plane looked small enough to slow down while still remaining aloft, which would allow the reaper to catch up. Sure, Roman and the Queen would be displeased with the delay, but they didn't strike Harper as the kind of people who would so readily leave an ally behind. And besides, they weren't flying over dangerous territory. Not yet, anyway.

He thought about trying to explain all of this to Darsihm, but the reaper probably knew it already and was just being a worrywart for no reason. That, and it seemed like a hassle.

Harper yawned and scratched his chin, preparing for a nap.

‘So what's your power, anyway?’ said Voreese.

Harper turned to look at her, wrapped around Roman's arm. To Harper's eyes, reapers were simply black clouds, albeit with half-faces on them--glowing yellow outlines of lips and eyes embedded in dark fluff. He no longer gave their appearance much thought, but when he'd seen Darsi hm for the first time, it had nearly scared him back to death.

‘Roman is an alteration user,’ Voreese went on. ‘He can control particle vibrations. It’s pretty fucking sweet.’

Harper smirked. “I know we’re allies ‘n all, but you shouldn’t be so quick to volunteer that information. Generally-speaking, the less folks know about your servant’s power, the better.”

Voreese gave a hoarse laugh. ‘You think I don’t know that, you fucking chump? I was extending a modicum of trust your way, dumbass.’

“Voreese, don’t be rude to our new friends.”

‘Psh. If a few choice words are all it takes for them to give up on us, then I’ll go ahead and take a stab in the dark here and guess that they weren’t really that invested in helping us in the first place.’

“Voreese.”

‘Fine.’ Her luminous gaze returned to Harper. ‘But please. Don’t act like you know better than I do. I’m older than your whole family put together.’

‘She’s right,’ said Darsi hm publicly. ‘That was very rude of you, Harper.’

“Wha--? Tch.””

"512

--donation bonus (day #25, post 5/5)--

‘Harper apologizes for his impertinence,’ said Darsi hm. ‘You know how these young folks are. Once they reach a certain age, they think they know better than everyone.’

‘Oh, I do know!’ said Voreese. ‘Roman is always trying to tell me what to do. Thinks he’s the boss of everybody, this one.’

“Voreese, please--”

‘See that? All the fucking time.’

‘Wow. Roman, you should really relax.’

Roman and Harper just exchanged pitying head shakes.

‘For Harper, it’s less being bossy and more just general smugness. He’s even started doing it to me lately. It’s out of control.’

Harper wondered if they would ever get back to the point about what his ability was. He decided to take that nap he’d been wanting. Darsi seemed eager enough to speak for him, anyway.

--++--++--

Hector could hardly focus on meditating. The anxiety was ridiculous. After a week of no news, it seemed like everyone was suddenly moving. Tomorrow, he would get into a fight that would involve more servants than he’d ever seen.

‘Are you frightened?’ said Garovel.

Sitting under his iron dome as the sun grew heavy in the sky, Hector looked over the golden brown horizon. ‘I’m... uh... I’m actually not sure.’

‘Really? It’s only natural to feel fear. There’s no shame in admitting it.’

‘Yeah... I mean, I guess I’m scared, but... I dunno... I think I’m more afraid of what might happen to everyone else than of what’ll happen to me.’

‘Ah.’

‘I’m not trying to sound brave or anything...’

‘I know. You just genuinely don’t care about yourself very much.’

‘Well... I do care about myself. K-kinda. I mean, because... if something happens to me, then something might happen to YOU. So...’

Garovel laughed. ‘So you care about yourself via proxy? That doesn’t seem very healthy, you know.’

‘Yeah, well... if something happens to you, then I’m fucked anyway, right?’

‘True, but still.’

'I know. I just. I know.'

'Hmm. Not too scared, huh? But how nervous are you?'

'Aw, fuck, I don't... I--agh...'

'Give me a number. On a scale of one to ten. One is how you feel when you're deep in meditation. Ten is how you feel when you have to talk to a girl.'

"513

'...I think I'll pass,' said Hector.

'Spoil sport.'

Hector continued working on his soul-empowered metal. His objective was to make as large a dome as possible while still having his soul permeate it thoroughly enough that there were no holes for reapers to escape through. He'd been devoting chunks of training time to this effort all week long, and he'd finally begun to see the fruits of his labor.

In order to implant his soul into the metal, he needed a point of contact with it, so he couldn't just make a normal dome over his head. Rather, he'd taken to creating a pillar down the center, like the handle of a gigantic umbrella. Moreover, he discovered that after annihilating only the pillar, the soul power that he had already fed into the dome would linger for a while longer before eventually dissipating. Garovel likened it to blood leaving the body after the heart had been removed, which was perhaps not the happiest metaphor, but Hector understood what he meant.

'Not bad,' said Garovel. 'I think I should tell you more about soul-strengthening techniques now.'

Hector's brow rose.

'At the moment, there's only one technique you need to concern yourself with, because the others are way out of our league. And that technique is "resilience"--increasing the durability of a designated object. That was what Andres was using and why his crystals could plow through everything the way they did.'

'Okay...'

‘The technique is simple enough to pull off. All you have to do is concentrate on your soul within whatever object you’ve pushed it into, and then just “think about” making it physically more durable.’

His head tilted. ‘Wow, uh... I know you said it was simple, but... that’s still simpler than I was expecting.’

‘Yep. Conceptually, it’s very straightforward, just like when you learned to empower attacks in the first place. In execution, though, it’s much more difficult than that was. It’s completely dependent on the synchronization that you and I have, but I think we’re synced enough now that you can at least start attempting to do it.’

‘Er. Alright.’

"514

Hector spent the rest of the evening trying to strengthen his metal. He imagined it becoming more durable like Garovel said, but it was difficult to tell if he was succeeding at all. Garovel seemed to think he was, if only a little.

‘Why don’t you ask Lynn to help you out?’

‘Ah--how?’

‘Have her break through your metal when it’s strengthened and when it’s not. See if she can tell the difference.’

‘O-okay.’ He descended the ramp.

Gina and Mr. Edith were busy making dinner while everyone else was gathered around the television in the corner of the garage. Even his mother was with them, though she sat off to the side.

Conditions were far from ideal. The garage was in turns too warm and too cold, and the bunker only had one-and-a-half bathrooms for eight people. They’d considered moving to Roman’s mansion in Walton, but Gina didn’t think the risk of exposure was worth it. She had a more discreet location lined up, and she planned to have everyone make the transition tomorrow, when Abolish’s attention was sure to be occupied.

“Dinner in ten!” called Mr. Edith from the kitchen, apparently having spotted Hector's approach. And as usual, the food smelled amazing. Gina had been fetching fresh ingredients from Walton by herself, and she and Lynn's father seemed to work exceptionally well together.

Hector returned an acknowledging nod and made his way over to the others.

Mrs. Edith saw him first. "Ah, are you ready for more sword training?"

"Actually, um--I need, uh... Lynn's purple shadow-thing."

Lynn perked up at her name. "How can I help?" she said, still quite slow to stand.

"I will observe," said Mrs. Edith.

"Me too," added Melanie. "I wanna see what that purple stuff can really do."

The King also seemed interested, and even Mrs. Goffe spared them a look. Everyone had already observed Hector training with his metal, so that much was old news to them, but they had yet to see Lynn do anything with her shadow, aside from wave it around a little to prove that it was actually real."

"515

Hector led everyone outside. He would have preferred they not watch, but he supposed there was no helping it. He raised a hand, telling the small crowd of onlookers to wait there at the top of the ramp. He was a bit surprised to see his mother had also come to see. She was probably just bored, he figured. There wasn't a whole lot to do here after all.

Lynn moved expectedly slow. She didn't seem to be in much pain, but neither was she her normal, sharp-eyed self.

"H-how are you feeling?" he asked her.

She returned a lazy smirk. "Just don't ask me to do a backflip yet."

Whether or not she would participate in tomorrow's battle had been a point of contention. Lynn said she could still fight if necessary, and when they called the Queen to ask about it, Helen deferred to her husband's medical opinion. The King felt she was not yet in fighting shape and told her to remain here with everyone.

Hector had mixed feelings about the decision, himself. On the one hand, he certainly would've felt better if she was backing him up when the shit went down, and on the other hand, he was glad she would be here to protect everyone else in case something unexpected happened.

He raised a fat iron cylinder out of the ground, as tall as a bus. He left it unstrengthened by his soul and motioned toward it. "Uh--could you cut that in two for me?"

Lynn shrugged. Purple swirled around her, but she didn't draw her sword. Instead, a violet blade formed on its own and slashed the metal cleanly. The two halves of the cylinder toppled apart, and Hector annihilated them.

He created a second one, then touched it with his hand and applied the strengthening technique. He bid her do the same thing again, and she did so, but this time, the shadow stopped about three-quarters of the way through. Lynn blinked at him, then reapplied the blade horizontally, stronger this time, and it cut cleanly through again."

"516

"What'd you do to it?" asked Lynn.

"Oh, I, uh... um. G-Garovel was just, ah... he--"

Lynnette waited patiently.

"Garovel calls it a soul-strengthening, ah, technique."

"You used your soul to make it stronger?" she said.

"Y-yeah."

"Hey!" yelled Melanie. "Do something else!"

Lynn threw her little sister a look. Then the shadow swirled and formed into the shape of a mouth. And it stuck a purple tongue out and blew a raspberry at the girl.

Mr. Edith soon called them back down for dinner. Hector did not stay to eat with everyone, however. He took his plate back outside and continued training while he worked on the meal. The cooks were kind enough to stack the food extra high for him.

Afterwards, Gina came to fetch him again. The sun had set, and it was time to go meet up with Roman at the airfield. Gina was the only one who knew where it was, and the King was quite eager to see his wife again, so they would accompany Hector there before returning here without him. For everyone else, this was goodbye.

He shook hands with all of Lynn's family, beginning with the father, then Melanie, then the mother.

Mrs. Edith's handshake lingered. "Thank you for protecting my daughter," she said, warm enough to make Hector blush in front of everyone. Then she pulled him closer and kissed his forehead.

'Oooh,' said Garovel, snickering. 'I knew she didn't hate you.'

"Uh, it's, um--not at all. I didn't even--ah--"

Melanie chimed in to help him. "Just be cool and say: no problem, ma'am."

He looked over everyone again, still burning up. "...No problem, ma'am."

"I was wrong!" laughed Melanie. "That wasn't cool at all!"

He shook hands with Lynn next, who was probably the last person in the world that he wanted seeing him right now.

"Come back safe," she told him.

His eyes were on the floor, so he couldn't see the softness in her expression, but he managed a nod.

That only left Mrs. Goffe.

He made his way over to her, as she had not come to him with the others."

"517

--donation bonus (day #26, post 1/5)--

Garovel placed himself between Hector and his mother. 'You don't have to say goodbye to her, you know.'

Maybe the reaper was right. Hector certainly didn't expect any warm words from the woman. If anything, he expected her to tell him that she was glad he was leaving, that she hoped she'd never see him again. But he felt ready for it this time, like he needed to hear it now in order to understand his mother's feelings fully. She already knew he could die out there. She'd heard them discussing their plans earlier. Hector wanted to know what she would say to him now, when she understood that this could be the last chance she had to say anything to him at all.

So he ignored Garovel's advice.

His mother just watched him approach from inside the open cabin over her car.

He supposed he would have to be the one to initiate the conversation. "Mom, I'm, ah... I'm..."

"You're going," she said.

"Yeah..."

"Risking your life for the good of the nation. I guess I should be proud."

And again, Hector found himself not knowing what to say.

"What do you want from me then?" she asked. "You want me to wish you good luck?"

"I don't want anything... I just wanted to say goodbye."

"Well, you've said it."

And that was all. That was the extent of what she had for him. He was almost disappointed. But he didn't move away from her yet. He still had a question for her, something he didn't think he would've been able to ask if he didn't feel like it might be his last opportunity to.

"Mom..."

"What?"

"You... you don't love me, do you?"

She stared at him a moment, blinking vacantly. "No. I don't."

He nodded. She'd basically said as much during their last conversation, but even so, after all this time, he was a bit grateful that she just came right out and said it. No more dancing around the issue. Finally, a definitive answer. "Was there ever a time when you did?"

That made her pause again, longer this time as she thought about it. "Not really, no."

"518

--donation bonus (day #26, post 2/5)--

Hector shook his head. At this point, he was honestly just curious. "If that's the case... then why didn't you just put me up for adoption?"

She seemed amused by the question. "I thought about it more than once. But your father was stubborn. He insisted we keep you. Though, if you're thinking it was because he loved you, then--"

"I already know he didn't," he said, suddenly wanting to get there before her. He felt a change taking place in himself, a kind of quiet epiphany, though he wasn't quite sure where it was coming from just yet.

The look she gave him then seemed more disappointed than surprised.

"Dad never wanted to show any weakness. If he didn't want to put me up for adoption... then it was only because he was worried how it would look."

"At least you're not stupid."

'Oh, fuck her!' said Garovel. 'Hector, let's get out of here.'

"One last thing before I go," he said, sterner now. "Mom. Thank you for being honest with me."

"Hmph."

"And... I still love you. I don't know why. You're a terrible mother. But I'm realizing... that I don't give a shit, anymore. I'm going to protect you, whether you want me to or not.”

She snorted. “Is that so?”

“It is.”

She didn’t have a response for that.

So he left her there. He donned his riding helmet, pulled on his gloves, and mounted his bike. He gave one last wave to Lynn and her family before following Gina and the King out of the bunker.

It had been a while since he rode at night. The stars were out, shimmering in a clear sky, and he greatly appreciated the brisk air. It was almost cathartic.

Garovel was quiet for a while, perhaps still uncertain what to make of that last exchange. Then he finally said, ‘You sure you’re okay?’

‘Yeah.’

‘Really?’

‘Really.’

‘Huh.’

A few beats passed.

‘You’re really, really sure?’

He laughed weakly inside his helmet. ‘Garovel, I’m fine. I won’t let what she says get to me anymore.’

‘Huh,’ repeated Garovel.”

"519

--donation bonus (day #26, post 3/5)--

‘Try not to sound so disappointed,’ said Hector.

‘I am, though. I was preparing to cheer you up with a light-hearted story. Or maybe I could’ve gone for a moment of emotional support, and then we would’ve grown closer than ever before.’

‘What a shame.’

‘Tch. It could’ve been great.’

‘Anyway, uh. I’ve been meaning to ask, uh. Do you know anything about this Harper person that Roman mentioned?’

‘The name does ring a bell,’ said Garovel. ‘I remember hearing it in passing when I was with the Vanguard. It belonged to a rookie back then, but if it’s really the same guy, then I imagine he must be pretty strong by now.’

‘How long ago was that? Er, I mean, when did you leave the Vanguard?’

‘Twenty-ish years ago, I think.’

‘You think? I thought you had a really good memory.’

‘Memorization requires that one be paying attention. The passage of time is kind of a blur to me, these days. I stopped keeping track a long time ago.’

‘Hmm. So, uh... why’d you leave the Vanguard, anyway?’

‘Well, my servant had just decided that he was ready to die, so after I released him, I was on my own again. And before him, I’d had many other servants as well, and we were always fighting. And y’know, after a while, that takes a toll on you. I suppose you could say I was tired. Not physically, of course. I just wanted to take a break from it all.’
‘Really? Even though, um... I mean, I assume Abolish was a problem back then, too, right?’

‘Yes, they were,’ said Garovel. ‘But that’s the thing. The fighting doesn’t end, Hector. Abolish and the Vanguard have been going at it for fucking ages. There’s essentially no hope that the war will end anytime soon.’

‘Geez...’

‘And even being immortal, you can’t just keep fighting forever and ever. It wears you down. You have to take time for yourself sooner or later.’

Hector had no trouble understanding that. He could only imagine what kinds of terrible things Garovel had seen. He didn’t want to ask about that right now, though, so he asked something else. 'So, um... am I the first servant you've had since leaving?'"

"520

--donation bonus (day #26, post 4/5)--

'Yep,' said Garovel. 'It was a pretty long break, I suppose. Twenty years.'

'And you weren't, uh... afraid of not having a servant to protect you?'

'Ah, well, reapers who don't take on servants are generally left alone. There's something called "the Old Law," which is a kind of unwritten agreement that non-combatant reapers be allowed to reap souls in peace, and even Abolish tends to respect that.' Garovel paused. 'Or at least, they DID. Now that aberrations are running around and doing whatever the fuck they want, I feel like things have probably changed.'

'Hmm...'

'The Old Law is also what Sai-hee bases most of her neutrality on. As I understand it, she considers it her duty to keep the others in check, and she devotes the majority of her resources to trying to "keep the peace," as it were. And for her part, she seems to do rather well. She keeps several territories under her protection, and they make up some of the most peaceful areas in the world.'

'Wow. Why didn't you join her side?'

'Because her side is very "reactionary." They only get involved after the fact, trying to make sure things don't get worse. Which is certainly valuable, of course. I don't mean to denigrate her efforts. That's just not what I wanted to do. I wanted to get directly involved in things and save the people who were in imminent danger--y'know, try to prevent the terrible shit from happening in the first place. Which is what the Vanguard does. That's why it's called "the Vanguard." It's the first to jump in and try to stomp out the threat.'

'Oh.'

'Or at least, that's what the Vanguard is SUPPOSED to do. Looking at the state Atreya is in, you'd be forgiven for doubting the validity of that claim.'

‘Did you... have a falling out with your comrades?’

‘Nah. I mostly kept my opinions to myself. The Vanguard attracts its share of crazies, so I preferred to just leave quietly. But from what Mehlsanz said to me before, it seems like the Vanguard is having problems these days.’

‘Great...’

"521

--donation bonus (day #26, post 5/5)--

Soon, they arrived at the airfield. Hector followed Gina into her chosen garage and parked behind her black SUV. He kept his helmet on, and the King wore a hooded, black cloak--the very same one that Lynn had bought for Hector.

Gina led them through the facility. Only a handful of people were around, but they all made way for Gina and her guests. She took them into the observation room, but surprisingly, no further waiting was necessary, as they could already see an airplane easing to a stop on the landing strip.

‘Is my timing good or what?’ She took them around to the outside and finally met up with the others.

Voreese was the first one Hector saw, and her giant, skeletal grin made him take off his helmet so he could return a smile of his own.

‘There’s the little fucker!’ she said, laughing and swirling around him. ‘How ya doin’, Hector? And Garovell! Happy to see us?’

‘More than you can possibly know,’ said Garovel, sounding equal parts delighted and relieved.

“Definitely,” agreed Hector.

Then everyone else began to appear. Mehlsanz and Darsihm floated up behind Voreese, and then Roman, the Queen, and presumably Harper each descended from the plane in turns.

The King rushed over to his wife first and swept her into his arm. He kissed her then and there.

Helen looked a bit taken by surprise, but she didn't exactly seem upset, either.

The onlookers all shared a chuckle.

Afterwards, Helen touched her husband's face, then moved to his missing shoulder. "Oh, William... what have they done to you?"

"Nothing that seeing you again hasn't made utterly inconsequential."

And they kissed again.

'Damn,' said Voreese. 'Who knew the King was such a smooth operator?'

The married couple didn't seem to hear her. Of course, the King genuinely couldn't.

Roman made his way over to Gina. He looked at her, briefly stone-faced before he couldn't hold his smile back any longer. He gave her a big hug and kissed her forehead.

She giggled. "So I get hazard pay this month, right?"
"522 -- LX.

Chapter Sixty: 'O, looming tempest...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector hadn't realized just how good it would be to see everyone again. He and Garovel had only met Roman and the Queen briefly on that chaotic day in Sescoria, barely even two months ago now, but after everything that happened to him and everything that he knew had happened to them, it was like seeing his oldest friends again. And in a way, he supposed they actually were. They'd been in his thoughts so frequently, and of course, it helped that he'd been able to correspond with them over the phone as well.

Burning with embarrassment, he was still thrilled to shake hands with everyone.

"You look well," said the Queen, her smile much warmer than Hector would have imagined.

"Ah--you--um... ah--"

'You too, Your Majesty,' laughed Garovel. 'Hector is so glad to see you that he can't even put it into words.'

She looked different than he remembered. But then again, the last time he saw her, she'd been having a rather rough day. Here and now, she was nearly restored to that regal form that he'd seen in papers and television, the only difference being her commoner's attire and general lack of cosmetics.

Voreese seemed the most pleased of anyone to be back. 'So I hear you two have really been giving Abolish the middle finger lately. I require juicy details.'

'Seconded,' added Mehlsanz.

Garovel only laughed harder.

Hector found himself confronted with Roman next. "Ah--uh, Mr. Roman, I can't... I can't thank you enough for all your help. I mean, your motorcycles and facilities and, uh..."

"Oh yeah," said Roman, as if he'd forgotten. "No problem. Thanks for looking out for Gina while I was gone."

"Oh, no, she was the one looking out for me," said Hector. "I mean, I would've... I would've been screwed without her help."

Gina smacked him on the shoulder. "Continue."

Hector had to laugh.

Roman seemed different, too, though Hector hadn't really gotten all that good of a look at him during their previous encounter. Roman was wearing his glasses now, and combined with his silky black tie and blood red waistcoat, the man had an air of prominence about him that Hector hadn't noticed before."

"522 -- LX.

Chapter Sixty: 'O, looming tempest...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector hadn't realized just how good it would be to see everyone again. He and Garovel had only met Roman and the Queen briefly on that chaotic day in Sescoria, barely even two months ago now, but after everything that happened to him and everything that he knew had happened to them, it was like seeing his oldest friends again. And in a way, he supposed they actually were. They'd been in his thoughts so frequently, and of course, it helped that he'd been able to correspond with them over the phone as well.

Burning with embarrassment, he was still thrilled to shake hands with everyone.

"You look well," said the Queen, her smile much warmer than Hector would have imagined.

"Ah--you--um... ah--"

'You too, Your Majesty,' laughed Garovel. 'Hector is so glad to see you that he can't even put it into words.'

She looked different than he remembered. But then again, the last time he saw her, she'd been having a rather rough day. Here and now, she was nearly restored to that regal form that he'd seen in papers and television, the only difference being her commoner's attire and general lack of cosmetics.

Voreese seemed the most pleased of anyone to be back. 'So I hear you two have really been giving Abolish the middle finger lately. I require juicy details.'

'Seconded,' added Mehlsanz.

Garovel only laughed harder.

Hector found himself confronted with Roman next. "Ah--uh, Mr. Roman, I can't... I can't thank you enough for all your help. I mean, your motorcycles and facilities and, uh..."

"Oh yeah," said Roman, as if he'd forgotten. "No problem. Thanks for looking out for Gina while I was gone."

"Oh, no, she was the one looking out for me," said Hector. "I mean, I would've... I would've been screwed without her help."

Gina smacked him on the shoulder. "Continue."

Hector had to laugh.

Roman seemed different, too, though Hector hadn't really gotten all that good of a look at him during their previous encounter. Roman was wearing his glasses now, and combined with his silky black tie and blood red waistcoat, the man had an air of prominence about him that Hector hadn't noticed before."

"523

"It's a shame I couldn't meet this other friend of yours," said Roman. "Colt, right?"

Hector bobbed his head to the side. "Heh, uh... You probably wouldn't have liked him very much, anyway."

"Oh? Why do you say that?"

"Because I don't like him very much," said Hector, still with a smile.

"Ha. That just makes me even more curious."

Roman and Gina both went to have a word with the pilot, who looked rather shaken up and out of place. Hector guessed that the poor man had probably gotten more than he bargained for with this trip, but Roman was reassuring him that there would be handsome compensation for his trouble.

Harper was next, and he looked rather less formal than Hector had been imagining. "I heard the others mention your name," said Harper. "Hector, right?"

"Ah--yes, sir."

"You look younger than I was expecting."

After having wandered off a little with Voreese and Mehlsanz, Garovel floated closer to Hector again. 'Harper Norez, correct?'

'Indeed. And I'm Darsihm.'

Four glowing skeletons in one place, all with scythes and black shrouds. Hector supposed the number didn't seem like much to anyone else here, but this was the first time he'd seen so many without there being at least one who wanted him dead. It was a nice change of pace.

'I'm Garovel, by the way. Roman said you two were with the Vanguard?'

"That's right," said Harper.

'If you don't mind my asking, what's your rank?' said Garovel.

'Harper is a Lt. General,' said Darsihm.

'What the--?' Garovel looked over at Roman, who was just joining them again. 'Why didn't you tell us earlier that he was a freaking Lt. General?'

"Oh, I assumed you already knew," said Roman. "Voreese and Mehlsanz already did."

Hector eyed Garovel, not wanting to ask his question aloud. 'Uh, is that, er... how high up is that, exactly?'

'The Vanguard is split into three divisions,' said Garovel privately. 'Army, navy, and air. Lieutenant General is an army ranking, and there are only four ranks above it: General, Captain General, Field Marshal, and then the High Commander, which is Sermung's official title.'

'Uh... whoa...'

‘There are equivalent rankings in the air and naval forces which would also be considered “higher up” than Lt. General, but you get the idea,’ said Garovel.

‘Yeah,’ said Hector.

As the salutations concluded, a certain tension began to fill the air. Everyone knew there was still dangerous work ahead of them. And just like that, it was already time for goodbyes again.

Gina gave a last hug to Roman. She had one for Hector, too, which caught him by surprise. “Look out for each other, yeah?”

“Of course,” said Roman, to which Hector added a nod.

Another round of handshakes and reluctant words for the King, and then he and Gina took their leave. Only the servants and reapers now remained, making their way toward the next set of vehicles.

Voreese started them off. ‘So we only know that the enemy will be passing through the Carthrace Nature Reserve. That’s a lot of ground to scout with just the eight of us, but we know that they have to cross the border into Rendon, so I say we keep a line formation.’

‘They won’t be difficult to spot,’ said Mehlsanz. ‘They’re taking a whole platoon of soldiers with them, so scouting shouldn’t be too much of a problem, especially considering we also have the element of surprise.’

‘It’s still four against seven,’ said Garovel. ‘Much of the burden will fall upon Harper. The rest of us should form up around him as soon as possible and support his position.’

“Let’s get underway,” said Harper. “The four of you can discuss details while we’re en route.”

--++--++--

David couldn’t sleep. He knew too much about what would transpire tomorrow for that to be possible. It was the sense of powerlessness that really got to him. Hector hadn’t messaged him back. Admittedly, that was the smartest decision. Strictly speaking, David didn’t need to know how or even if Hector planned to respond to Abolish’s actions. It would've been a needless operational risk. David still would've appreciated it, though.

Draped in a soft bathrobe, he shuffled into his kitchen, looking for something to calm his nerves."

"525

He cut a big slice of chocolate cake for himself, poured a tall glass of milk, and then made his way into the den. He flicked the fireplace on with a remote control and sat down to enjoy his treat in silence, but scarcely more than two bites in, his doorbell echoed throughout the house.

David eyed the clock on the mantelpiece. It was barely past three in the morning. And as he'd dismissed his butler over a week ago, suspecting Nola would take the poor man's head, David had to answer the door himself. He looked through the peephole first and was surprised to see Meriwether's face there. He opened the door.

"I apologize for the hour of my visit," said Meriwether.

"It's fine. I was unable to sleep, anyway." He invited his brother in and offered him some wine. Meriwether requested something stronger. David poured the man a glass of brandy. "So what brings you here so late?" he asked, returning to his own glass of milk for a sip.

"Um... David, please just tell me... do you know who really killed Nathaniel?"

David gave the man a sidelong stare. His brother did not seem in the finest state at the moment. Bags under his eyes, hair in a mess, clothes unpressed. Granted, it was extremely late at night, but even still.

"I have been looking into his death," Meriwether went on. "I cannot help but feel something is wrong with Luther's story, but I have been unable to find any kind of evidence which contradicts it."

"I see." As David suspected, Luther had been thorough.

"But you always seem to know more than you let on," said Meriwether. "So please--"

The doorbell rang again.

David looked at Meriwether heavily and then stood to go answer it again.

It was Luther this time.

David's hand lingered on the door handle as he raced through the scenarios in his head. It seemed highly coincidental that Luther would visit now, just as Meriwether was making inquiries into him. But even if David assumed that Luther somehow knew about this discussion, what purpose would Luther have in interrupting it? Surely, if Luther wanted Meriwether dead, then there were more timely ways in which to do it."

"526

Moreover, Luther should have no reason to suspect that David knew he had lied about Nathaniel's demise, so perhaps this late night encounter truly was a coincidence. But still, David mistrusted coincidences, as any rational person would, so before he committed himself to anything else, he fished for more information. He opened the door a crack and peeked through.

"Luther?" he said. "What are you doing here so late?"

"Please invite me in."

"Why?"

"I need to speak with you."

"Then speak here and do it quickly. I am tired."

Luther tilted his head with a knowing smile. "I would also like to speak with Meriwether."

So much for coincidence. There was little point in refusing the man entry now. He allowed Luther in and rejoined Meriwether in the den.

Meriwether only looked confused by the new arrival.

"Allow me to forego pleasantries," said Luther, taking a seat. "The Abolishers have left the city. Mr. Conall Learen was kind enough to share their plans with me earlier this evening. They will be gone for most of the day today. I have therefore decided to take advantage of the opportunity that their absence presents.”

“Take advantage how?” said Meriwether.

“Their names and faces are already known to the police and the military, and come morning, word of their many misdeeds will finally make the national news--at which time, they will also receive credit for a few extra murders.”

David’s expression flickered.

Meriwether blinked. “What are you talking about?”

“A handful of select individuals,” said Luther. “Ones who might have otherwise become obstacles to our objective.”

“What objective?” said Meriwether.

Luther ignored him, instead looking at David. “Abolish will not be upset by this move. They are already enemies of the state and intend to leave Atreya as soon as war with Rendon is triggered.”

Meriwether scowled. “Has there not been enough bloodshed already? You intend to have even more people killed?”

“Oh, Meriwether. You simple fool. I do not intend to have them killed. I already have. You honestly think I would be telling you such sensitive information if it was not already decided?””

"527

It took everything David had to keep the disgust from his face. “Why are you telling us, then?”

“Well, you see,” said Luther, reaching into his coat, “my men were supposed to kill Meriwether earlier tonight.” He pulled out a small handgun.

David and Meriwether both stiffened in their seats.

“Imagine my surprise when I received word that Meriwether was not at home and had come here, instead. Now I am left to wonder if killing him is truly necessary.”

"It surely isn't," David said hastily, ignoring his increased heartbeat. "Meri is on our side. Why would you even think it necessary to kill him in the first place?"

"One must be meticulous," said Luther. For a long moment, his gaze held on Meriwether, whose return expression was not one of fright or worry but of anger and defiance. "I did not think Meriwether would understand, especially when he learned that Gabriel, Charles, and Martin are all dead as well."

Meriwether stood. "WHAT?!"

Luther pointed the gun at him now. "You see? So easy to read, this one."

It was all going wrong. David knew he had to think of something, but nothing came to mind. "Luther, please don't do anything rash. Let us speak reasonably on this matter. Meri, sit down. Meri."

Slowly, Meriwether sat.

"David will soon receive word of their deaths," said Luther, "and as he is now the oldest, emergency power will fall to him." He glanced at David. "I would appreciate it if you did not accept your new responsibility and instead passed it on to me."

"Of course," said David. His mind was racing again. If Luther's only objective was to obtain emergency power, then killing Meriwether would not be strictly needed, as Meriwether was younger. Perhaps one brother's life could yet be saved here. "But please don't harm Meri. If you have any affection for me at all, Luther, then allow me this one favor."

"You are fond of him?" said Luther. "I do not see why. He only seems like a needless complication to me."

"528

--donation bonus (day #27, post 1/5)--

David tried not to grimace. He hadn't seen this coming. And he should have. He had left himself exposed to this assault, despite already knowing that Abolish would not be here to protect him. Which was the strangest bit of irony here--as volatile and dangerous as the Abolishers were, they had also been serving as guards for the princes up to now. Nola had made sport of terrorizing anyone else David hired to protect him, and he knew that she was not the only one to act as such.

If only he'd realized that Luther also had access to Abolish's plans. It was sloppy to presume otherwise. He'd been so preoccupied with worrying about the attack on Rendon that he'd forgotten about the more immediate threats.

There was no time to be upset with himself, however. The situation required his full attention.

"How about this?" said Luther. "If Meriwether can convince me that he is not a threat, then I will not kill him."

David clenched his jaw, struggling to think and failing. The pressure was getting to him. He didn't know what to do. He wasn't prepared for this at all, and he hated himself for it.

"I have a better idea," said Meriwether. "Put down the gun now, and I will attempt to prevent you from being executed."

Luther seemed amused. At first. But as he stared at his younger brother's unflinching expression, Luther's smile began to wane. "Bluffing will not help you," he said.

"Last chance," was all Meriwether said.

And Luther blinked at him, visibly uncertain.

David was perhaps even more confused, looking to Meriwether for an explanation, but the man was too busy staring Luther down. To David's utter astonishment, Luther did decide to put the gun down on the table in front of him.

Meriwether picked it up and trained it on Luther now, who raised his arms.

David's mouth hung open slightly. "...What just happened here? Meri, what--?"

"I am not entirely sure myself," said Meriwether.

"So you were bluffing," growled Luther.

"No, I was not. You already know that I am a terrible liar. You made the correct choice."

--donation bonus (day #27, post 2/5)--

David still required answers. "Meri, please explain--"

"Not in front of him."

"What now, then?" said Luther.

"We wait."

Not more than thirty seconds later, a group of soldiers in tactical gear kicked down the front door and stormed into the room. The one at the head of the troupe called through a black helmet, "Lord David, sir! Are you alright?!"

"And who are THEY?!" said David. "Someone explain what is happening!"

Meriwether lowered his weapon. "Everything is fine," he told the armed men. "Please take Luther into custody now on suspicion of treason and murder."

The lead soldier hesitated. "I'm sorry, Lord Meriwether, but we do not take orders from you."

"Right." Meriwether looked over at David. "If you would be so kind."

David was incredulous. "Uh--please do as Meri says?"

"Yes, sir!"

David watched a pair of soldiers emerge from the crowd and haul Luther away. He was still waiting for his explanation as Meriwether addressed the apparent guard captain.

"Is she on her way?"

"Yes, sir."

And from that small exchange, David began to understand, though the details still eluded him. "These are Duchess Jezebel's men?"

"Yes," said Meriwether. "I knew she had someone observing your residence. Luther could not have had more than a handful of men waiting outside, so I knew it would only be a matter of time until the duchess' watchers called in enough reinforcements to completely overwhelm them."

David stared at him. "Tell me honestly. Are you really Meriwether? Are you now going to pull your face off and reveal that you are actually someone else?"

The man snorted a laugh. "I have only been working with the duchess for a few days. She told me to keep my involvement a secret from you. I have been thinking about telling you anyway. That was one of the reasons I came here tonight, in fact."

David sighed. "I thought I had earned her trust." He supposed it was good that he hadn't, though.

Jezebel soon arrived, also in a robe over her pajamas. Her face spoke of weary relief when she saw them. "I am glad to see you are both unhurt."

David frowned at her. "Could you not have at least warned me about this plan to trap Luther?"

"530 -- LXI.

--donation bonus (day #27, post 3/5)--

"I must agree," said Meriwether. "This whole situation could have gone terribly awry. I should have liked to be let in on the plan as well."

"You darling boys," she said, smiling sympathetically. "This was no plan of mine."

"What?" said David.

She returned a frown of her own now. "Gabriel, Charles, and Martin are dead. And so too would Meriwether be if he had not come here when he did. Honestly, I thought this was somehow your mad plan."

The brothers exchanged looks.

"I was only having David watched as a precautionary measure," she said. "Ostensibly, I did it for your protection, but frankly, I wanted to be sure you were not pulling one over on me."

David narrowed his eyes. "You also planted bugs in here, didn't you?"

"My apologies," she said with a nod.

"No need for that," said David. "Your distrust has apparently saved my brother's life, if not also my own."

She tilted her head a little. "It would seem that we have all deceived each other so thoroughly that not one of us has any idea what we are accomplishing anymore."

David rubbed his forehead. "This. This is why politics terrifies me..."

Chapter Sixty-One: 'To yield no ground...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

"Everyone! Hello! My name is Desmond, and my friends and I will be kidnapping you today!"

A crowd of about fifty soldiers looked at him as he stood on the dais on one end of the base's conference hall. Their faces were a wild mixture of anger and fear and horror. Clearly, they still required a bit of homogenizing.

"Now I know what you're thinking. 'Kidnapping?! That doesn't sound very fun!' But you are mistaken. We're going to have a grand, old time. Trust me! I have experience with this sort of thing!"

The reapers floated among the soldiers, watching and listening, sizing them all up, while the other six servants hovered around the perimeter of the crowd--the shepherds who had gathered the flock.

"You may notice that we've taken all your knives and ammunition and given you unloaded guns. This is because we don't need you fine fellows to do anything other than march around and look pretty.""
"530 -- LXI.

--donation bonus (day #27, post 3/5)--

"I must agree," said Meriwether. "This whole situation could have gone terribly awry. I should have liked to be let in on the plan as well.”

“You darling boys,” she said, smiling sympathetically. “This was no plan of mine.”

“What?” said David.

She returned a frown of her own now. “Gabriel, Charles, and Martin are dead. And so too would Meriwether be if he had not come here when he did. Honestly, I thought this was somehow your mad plan.”

The brothers exchanged looks.

“I was only having David watched as a precautionary measure,” she said. “Ostensibly, I did it for your protection, but frankly, I wanted to be sure you were not pulling one over on me.”

David narrowed his eyes. “You also planted bugs in here, didn’t you?”

“My apologies,” she said with a nod.

“No need for that,” said David. “Your distrust has apparently saved my brother’s life, if not also my own.”

She tilted her head a little. “It would seem that we have all deceived each other so thoroughly that not one of us has any idea what we are accomplishing anymore.”

David rubbed his forehead. “This. This is why politics terrifies me...”

Chapter Sixty-One: ‘To yield no ground...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

“Everyone! Hello! My name is Desmond, and my friends and I will be kidnapping you today!”

A crowd of about fifty soldiers looked at him as he stood on the dais on one end of the base’s conference hall. Their faces were a wild mixture of anger and fear and horror. Clearly, they still required a bit of homogenizing.

“Now I know what you’re thinking. ‘Kidnapping?! That doesn’t sound very fun!’ But you are mistaken. We’re going to have a grand, old time. Trust me! I have experience with this sort of thing!”

The reapers floated among the soldiers, watching and listening, sizing them all up, while the other six servants hovered around the perimeter of the crowd--the shepherds who had gathered the flock.

"You may notice that we've taken all your knives and ammunition and given you unloaded guns. This is because we don't need you fine fellows to do anything other than march around and look pretty."

"531

--donation bonus (day #27, post 4/5)--

Desmond reached into the bag at his feet and pulled out a special treat for everyone. "As you can see, I have in my hand here, your commanding officer's head."

A ripple of murmurs passed over his audience.

Desmond held up his other hand. "Please hold all questions until after the presentation is over." He cleared his throat. "I didn't catch his name, so we'll just call him Teddy. Teddy was very brave. Teddy didn't want to do as my friends and I asked." Desmond dropped the head on the floor. "Don't be like Teddy. Don't be brave. We're looking for cowards here today. Cowards listen to us. And more importantly, cowards get to live. But if, for whatever reason, you are still feeling that courageous impulse, then absolutely feel free to tell any of my esteemed comrades, and they will happily solve that little problem for you. I'm sure you all recognize our faces already and are therefore aware that we can snap your frail bodies like the tiny, insignificant twigs that they are."

'Nice speech,' said Ezmortig privately. 'Move it along before our friends start getting restless.'

"Right. Everyone, please make your way to one of the designated vehicles on your left."

Six armored cars sat near the wall in a disjointed line, and the soldiers all began to filter toward them. It wouldn't be enough for all the troops, but that was what the small jet in the adjacent hangar was for.

Desmond very nearly felt a tinge of pity for the soldiers who ended up on that plane, because Hanjir was the one piloting it. The reason they hadn't stolen a giant plane for everyone to board together was because Hanjir was the only pilot of the seven, and nobody else wanted to fly with that maniac at the controls. There'd been talk of stealing a new pilot to go along with it, but Hanjir made a fuss, ranting about how they shouldn't trust some random person with such an important part of the mission. It seemed obvious enough to Desmond that Hanjir just didn't want to share the sky with anyone, but the man's words had convinced the reapers."

"532

--donation bonus (day #27, post 5/5)--

Under cover of darkness, they set out. Of the six cars, one was left unoccupied by a servant, as Karkash chose to simply fly under his own power and observe the convoy from above.

Desmond relaxed in the backseat, a soldier on either side of him. His body still felt a bit stiff, muscles sore, bones heavy. He rubbed his eyes and gave a loud yawn. "I'm going to take a nap now," he announced to his fellow passengers. "You may be tempted to try to kill me or run away while my guard seems to be down. Go ahead and give it a try, if you want, but I will become rather cranky. At which point, I won't care if only one of you tried something. I'll kill all four of you, anyway." At their uncomfortable silence, he added, "Can I get a 'yes, sir'?"

"...Yes, sir."

"Delightful. Wake me up when we get there. Or if something catches fire. Or if that plane crashes. I will need to go laugh in Hanjir's face in the event of that last one."

"...Yes, sir."

Desmond grinned and shut his eyes. "I could get used to this. Have you given any thought to becoming professional yes men? Because I might like to hire you."

--++--++--

The Carthrace Nature Reserve was an enormous stretch of forested mountains and valleys, occasionally broken by small lakes or hidden caverns. There were only two roads that ran through this area, both having been built long before the land had come under protection, and as such, they were no more than dirt trails, used only by hikers and forest rangers these days.

Hector supposed the place would have been more beautiful during the daytime, when it wasn't all just pitch blackness against the lone headlight of his motorcycle.

The servants took up positions at the far western edge of the reserve, while the reapers all flew up high in the sky to enhance their view of the horizon. They'd all expected a long wait, and they certainly got one.

Hector partnered with Roman to watch the southern path, the Atreya-Rendon border at their backs, no more than three kilometers away."

"533

The two men were perched atop a cliff, sitting on a metal bench with a domed cover against the wind. The night air was brisk on Hector's face, but his riding jacket was fairly warm. Roman didn't look bothered by the temperature, but of course, the man could also generate heat with his alteration power, so perhaps he was cheating.

Voreese and Garovel were both off scouting, so Hector and Roman took turns meditating while one kept watch over the road below, but after a few hours, Roman seemed to grow bored of it and struck up a conversation instead.

"So I guess your power has grown quite a bit since I last saw you."

"Ah... y-yeah, I suppose," said Hector. "What about you? Lynn said you achieved emergence."

"Lynn? Oh, you mean Lynnette? You call her Lynn, huh?"

"I, uh... well, that's what she said her name was, so..."

"Mm. Yeah, I'm a lot stronger now, too. I can do all sorts of fun stuff. Like flying."

Hector turned his head curiously. "Really?"

"Little difficult, though. Haven't quite mastered it. I can fly even faster than reapers can, but I haven't worked out how to prevent my body from getting pummeled by g-forces." Roman rolled his neck. "Broke my spine a few times.”

“I know the feeling.”

“Heh. What’s the worst injury you’ve had so far?”

“Oh, um. Hmm.” He scratched his head and took a deep breath. “I think that time I got blown up in Sescoria is still the worst. Y’know, when... uh... back when you saved me and Garovel?”

“Oh yeah. Okay, then what’s the worst you’ve had that didn’t kill you?”

“Hmm... I’m not sure, uh... There was one time in Klein where the cops pumped about a hundred bullets into me. There was the time my whole mouth got shot off--oh, but the time I had my, uh... my chest cavity ripped open... with like, surgical clamps... that was pretty bad. Though, I guess I was technically dead when it happened...”

“Impressive. Worst for me was probably the plane crash. Had to shield Lynnette or she would’ve been toast, so I didn’t have time to protect myself from this huge metal beam--came straight for me, basically cut me in two.””

"534

--donation bonus (day #28, post 1/5)--

“Ouch,” said Hector.

“Yeah. Was feeling that one for a couple weeks.”

The conversation hit an abrupt pothole as Hector realized that it was up to him to respond but that he didn’t have anything to say. He quietly agonized for a fresh topic, but Roman soon filled the void for him.

“So how did you originally die?”

Hector’s mouth was left open at that question. Mid-breath, it just made him stop.

Thankfully, Roman didn’t seem to notice yet. “Me, it’s kind of a funny story. Guess you could say I was a bit of a punk, back then. Always trying to get my hands on something valuable, something I could sell. Always trying to work people, get them to think that I was someone I wasn’t so that I could, y’know, take their stuff.” Roman paused for a nostalgic smirk. "Maybe I'm still a bit of a punk, honestly. It's so much fun when you trick the right person."

Hector just offered a nervous smile, still dreading the moment when he would have to answer. It felt like he was somehow back in school, back before meeting Garovel, during one of those awful times when he was just waiting for the teacher to call on him and tell him that he had to give his presentation to the class.

"Basically, though," Roman was saying, "I ripped off the wrong guy, and he had me killed. All because of some stupid diamonds that he didn't even need anyway. Guy was absolutely loaded. I mean, don't get me wrong--I am a greedy son of a bitch, too, but come on. I outwitted him, was all. Murder was taking things a bit far. So I didn't see it coming until it was too late, and that's when Voreese found me. Then she helped me dismantle the bastard's entire life and leave him rotting in prison with nothing."

"Ah... w-wow..."

"Was pretty satisfying, I have to say."

Hector was just hoping Roman would forget the previous topic as he said, "Uh, w-was that also when you met Gina, or...?"

"535

--donation bonus (day #28, post 2/5)--

"No," said Roman. "I didn't meet Gina until about a year later."

"H-how long have you two been... um...?"

"How long have we been, what?"

"Been, um...? Er, what is your relationship, exactly? I-if that's not too personal, I mean."

"She's my second-in-command. My right-hand woman. My babysitter."

"One of those things doesn't--"

"She's the glue that keeps my boat in the air."

"That's definitely not a thing people say..."

"She's the golden goose that makes sure I don't count my chickens before they hatch."

"...I don't even know what that's supposed to mean."

"She's the giraffe to my peanut butter--"

"If you don't want to tell me, you can just say so."

"I don't want to tell you."

"Ah..."

Roman gave a sideways nod. "Honestly, though, I'm not entirely sure, myself. Gina is a curious one. I've met a lot of people who make their living off of keeping secrets, but Gina is more difficult to read than most of them."

"You think so? She seemed pretty, um... straightforward... uh, to me."

"Yes, well. She would. And I did tell her to help you, as well."

"Hmm..."

"When I first met her, she was borderline agoraphobic."

"Agora...?"

"She was extremely reluctant to go outside. I don't think she'd left her apartment in months."

"Oh... and you helped her get over that?"

"You could say that."

Hector just looked at him, waiting for elaboration.

"I kind of burnt down her apartment," said Roman.

"Aha..."

"Accidentally."

"Right."

"The details aren't important."

“Uh-huh...”

“Long story short, I helped her get back on her feet. Was only meant to be a temporary situation, but she ended up sticking around.”

“And you don’t know anything else about her?”

“I never said that.”

“But you said... all that stuff about her being difficult to read.”

“Yep.”

“Then...?”

“If you want to know more about her, then ask her yourself. Not my place to tell.”

Hector gave a small nod.

“You never answered my question,” said Roman. “How did you originally die? Told you mine.”

Hector nearly cringed. He was better prepared to answer now, but he certainly would’ve preferred Roman to have forgotten.”

"536

--donation bonus (day #28, post 3/5)--

For most servants, it was probably a benign enough thing to answer-- simple and chat-worthy, even morbidly amusing, like Roman’s had been. The man likely had little reason to suspect that it was so personal a question.

He considered lying. It would be easy enough. A car accident, maybe. But the thought of lying about it was somehow even more humiliating to him. So he decided to take a cue from Roman. “I... don’t want to tell you.”

Hector knew that it might appear rude for a seemingly harmless question or that it might just spark even greater curiosity from Roman, but he was prepared. He’d had plenty of practice remaining silent.

However, Roman did not pry any further. “Fair enough,” was all he said.

Hector took a long, quiet breath as there came another lull in the conversation, this one more enduring. He could already see the first hints of daylight on the horizon. Clouds gathering in the distance suggested rain to come, no doubt very common weather for this forest.

He squinted, looking up diagonally. He could just barely make out the floating white skull in the sky. It was moving, scouting, and Hector couldn't tell if it was Garovel or Voreese. 'How much longer, do you think?'

'Not sure,' said Garovel from wherever he was. 'The waiting is pretty terrible, though, isn't it?'

'Y-yeah...'

'Something not too many folks realize. Big fights usually involve a fuckload of waiting. You'd think that'd change in these modern times, but nope.'

'Ugh...'

'How's Roman? Does he seem nervous?'

'Er, not really...'

'Hmm. Ask him how long he's been a servant.'

Hector regathered himself and asked, "How, um... how long have you been a servant?"

"Six years or so."

'He says six years,' said Hector.

'Odd.'

"What about you?" said Roman.

"Oh, uh." He recalled what Garovel had told him previously about keeping his faster growth a secret, but he wasn't sure what an appropriate lie would be. "About seven months, I think..." It hadn't even been four yet, but he remembered telling Gina five a couple months ago.

Roman cocked an eyebrow at him. "So young."

--donation bonus (day #28, post 4/5)--

Hector returned a shrug. "Six years seems kinda old."

"I suppose it is. I've mostly stayed out of conflicts, so I'm sure my power hasn't grown very quickly compared to yours. Voreese and I were more concerned with financial matters."

"Why would she care about money?" Hector asked. "Why would any reaper?"

Roman gave a laugh. "You probably wouldn't think it, but she's actually quite ambitious. Wants to build a servant empire of her own."

Hector blinked at that.

"Not getting involved in big fights for the first few years was part of her plan, see? According to her, that's how the servant emperors in the past have pulled it off. Keep a low profile for many years, let your physical power build slowly, and in the meantime, focus on acquiring funds and a reliable network of contacts. Then you make your debut and try to draw in some bigger fish, hopefully get them to join your team. And from there, it's all about momentum."

"I see..." Hector looked across the endless canopy of trees another time.

"That's what she says, anyway. The simplified version."

"Hmm. In that case... six years seems really young, too."

"Yeah. That's the trouble with long-term plans. The world keeps turning while you're busy getting ready. You remember Gerald, right? That old prick whose garage I took you to? That's why he abandoned us, you know. He's more concerned about the future than the present."

"Mm."

"Networking is a real bitch. My advice? If you find genuinely trustworthy people, hold onto them as best you can. If you don't have enough space for them in your life, then get a bigger house. Don't let them go."

Hector was quiet a moment as he let those words sink in. They seemed wise, though maybe a bit simplistic. He was reminded of a certain family of three. Perhaps that was Roman's intention. "You... you really want to become an emperor? Like Sermung and all them?"

"Maybe."

"It hardly even seems possible--uh, no offense. I mean, like, personally, uh... I couldn't imagine myself doing something like that.""
"538 -- LXII.

--donation bonus (day #28, post 5/5)--

"You don't think so?" said Roman with a sheepish grin. "Maybe we could be partners, you and I. Build an empire together."

Hector's brow depressed. "Uh..."

Roman laughed. "Not up to you. I know."

"Ah... w-why does Voreese want to make an empire?"

"Delusions of grandeur."

"...What?"

Roman's expression softened. "She wants to make the world a better place. And not just in a good-deed-for-the-day kind of way. She wants me to obtain so much strength and influence that I can at least try to fix some of the really fucked up things in the world. Like slavery and widespread famine and institutionalized poverty--y'know, the things that no one's been able to fix in centuries."

"Y-you, uh... um... wow."

"And that's not even counting Abolish." Roman laughed again. "She fucking hates Abolish."

"Garovel's not a fan, either."

"Ha. Anyway, yeah, she's got all sorts of lofty ambitions. But I suppose that's what I like about her." He paused to look at Hector. "Don't tell her I said that, by the way."

After a bit more chatter, they both returned to their meditations. Not long into it, however, Roman's hand gripped Hector's shoulder, taking the young man away from the metal house that he had been imagining.

All amusement had gone from Roman's face. "They've chosen our road," he said. "Voreese is on her way to inform the others. Tell Garovel."

Chapter Sixty-Two: 'The Battle at Rathmore...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector nodded. 'Garovel, get back here. Abolish is close.'

'Voreese can sense them?'

'Yeah.'

'Aw, fuck. I sense them now, too.'

Roman was stretching his arms. "How you feeling, Hector? You ready?"

"Hell yes."

When Garovel arrived, the first thing he said was directed at Roman. 'What's the enemy's ETA?'

There was a silent pause as Roman asked his reaper. "Voreese says fifteen minutes, at most."

'It'll take Harper and the Queen at least twenty to reach us. Let's fall back. There's a large rock formation west of here called Rathmore's Gate. Does Voreese know it?'

Another pause. "Yeah."

'Then let's go.'

They ran down the cliff's rear slope to reach their vehicles."
"538 -- LXII.

"You don't think so?" said Roman with a sheepish grin. "Maybe we could be partners, you and I. Build an empire together."

Hector's brow depressed. "Uh..."

Roman laughed. "Not up to you. I know."

"Ah... w-why does Voreese want to make an empire?"

"Delusions of grandeur."

"...What?"

Roman's expression softened. "She wants to make the world a better place. And not just in a good-deed-for-the-day kind of way. She wants me to obtain so much strength and influence that I can at least try to fix some of the really fucked up things in the world. Like slavery and widespread famine and institutionalized poverty--y'know, the things that no one's been able to fix in centuries."

"Y-you, uh... um... wow."

"And that's not even counting Abolish." Roman laughed again. "She fucking hates Abolish."

"Garovel's not a fan, either."

"Ha. Anyway, yeah, she's got all sorts of lofty ambitions. But I suppose that's what I like about her." He paused to look at Hector. "Don't tell her I said that, by the way."

After a bit more chatter, they both returned to their meditations. Not long into it, however, Roman's hand gripped Hector's shoulder, taking the young man away from the metal house that he had been imagining.

All amusement had gone from Roman's face. "They've chosen our road," he said. "Voreese is on her way to inform the others. Tell Garovel."

Chapter Sixty-Two: 'The Battle at Rathmore...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector nodded. 'Garovel, get back here. Abolish is close.'

'Voreese can sense them?'

'Yeah.'

'Aw, fuck. I sense them now, too.'

Roman was stretching his arms. "How you feeling, Hector? You ready?"

"Hell yes."

When Garovel arrived, the first thing he said was directed at Roman. 'What's the enemy's ETA?'

There was a silent pause as Roman asked his reaper. "Voreese says fifteen minutes, at most."

'It'll take Harper and the Queen at least twenty to reach us. Let's fall back. There's a large rock formation west of here called Rathmore's Gate. Does Voreese know it?'

Another pause. "Yeah."

'Then let's go.'

They ran down the cliff's rear slope to reach their vehicles."

"539

Garovel led the way. Hector's motorcycle wasn't suited to the dirt road, nor was he accustomed to riding on such terrain, but he managed well enough. The path diverged, and Garovel chose the narrower one. The branches grew uncomfortably close, even brushing Hector's helmet as he passed, and in his rearview mirror, he could see Roman's black BMW scraping its way through.

The forest abruptly gave way, replaced by a wide area with enormous pillars of natural stone. It was a kind of rocky hill, accented in green by swathes of moss, and the pillars themselves were an odd sight. Only two, there were, rising out of the uneven ground like a misshapen tuning fork. The northern pillar was almost twice the height of the southern one, but they were both still larger than an average building. Each one cast a long shadow in the amber dawnlight.

Hector parked his bike and dismounted as Roman pulled up next to him. He took off his helmet, feeling the dewy air against his face again.

"Can you still sense them?" he asked.

'Yeah,' said Garovel. 'But I can sense our friends now, too. Shouldn't be much longer.'

And indeed, it was not. After a couple minutes, the other three reapers arrived from the opposite path, along with the Queen and Harper. Everyone gathered around.

'I sense Karkash at the head of the group,' said Garovel. 'They'll be here in under a minute.'

Then came the sound of a distant airplane, and everyone's attention was drawn to the sky. From where they all stood, they had a clear view of the small aircraft.

'Shit,' said Garovel.

'It's too far away,' said Mehlsanz. 'We can't sense who's on board or even how many there are, but I highly doubt it's a bunch of civilians who just happen to be flying by.'

Voreese swirled over to Roman and grabbed his shoulder. 'Leave it to us,' she said.

'You can't just shoot it down,' said Garovel. 'There might be innocent soldiers inside.'

'We can't let it cross the border and attack a town, either,' said Voreese. 'Don't worry. We'll use a delicate touch.'

"540

"Be back as soon as I can," said Roman, letting Voreese latch onto his back. And as he crouched down, everyone took a step back. It wasn't quite far enough, however. He shot up into the sky, leaving a shock wave in his wake that cracked the ground and nearly knocked Hector on his ass.

'Holy shit!' thought Hector, looking up with wide eyes to see Roman and Voreese dwindling from sight.

Then Garovel pointed suddenly. 'Karkash.'

And Hector saw the Vaelish man as well, diverting up and after Roman, obviously wanting to intercept him.

Harper raised an outstretched arm with a closed fist. He didn't need more than a moment in order to take aim, and then a beam of solid, white light flashed into existence all at once, cutting the sky in two.

Karkash instantly lost an arm, a leg, and half of his torso. He ceased flying up and spiraled off into the forest below.

'Nice shot,' said Darsihm, bobbing his head at his servant.

It was an alteration type, Hector knew. The ability to manipulate light waves. Garovel had learned of the man's power after his long strategy meeting with the other reapers and had then been kind enough to impart that knowledge to Hector, as well. But even though he'd known about it beforehand, seeing it firsthand was something else. And just like that, the Lt. General had already crippled Karkash, at least temporarily.

Hector could hear the enemy drawing close now. They didn't seem especially concerned with keeping quiet, whooping and hollering over the already raucous sound of their vehicles pushing down the narrow path.

Then the noise died down, the cars' engines shut off, and Hector could hear people exiting the vehicles.

'I sense a lot of souls over there,' said Darsihm, 'but only ten are making their way closer. Half of them are floating, so it would appear we have five opponents.'

'Until Karkash gets back,' added Garovel.

'Keep the formation,' Mehlsanz reminded them. 'Don't let them separate you.'

From there, a heavy period of silence seized the area. The Abolishers did not show themselves in order to exchange words."

"541

The first attack came in the form of an enormous yellow crystal, crashing through the trees like they were nothing. When Harper pierced it with a white beam, however, the boulder exploded into chunks, clearing out a small section of the forest.

Andres and Desmond were immediately visible, which meant the other three were probably about to flank them.

‘On your left,’ warned Garovel.

‘Right, too!’ said Mehlsanz.

Hector raised metal walls on both sides, but as he was too far away to strengthen them with his soul, the three opponents broke through almost instantly. On Hector’s side, there were two women. They could only be Tessa Shelrick and Nola Pauls, though he didn’t know their faces. On Helen’s side, there was Conall.

Desmond had already lobbed an arm at the party, but a white beam detonated it before it reached them. Harper had one more beam, and he spent it on Tessa, cleaving her in two before she even reached Hector.

Nola, however, still made it to him. He raised another wall and rolled out of her path, but she smashed through it anyway and caught him by the ankle. Metal spikes shot out of his entire leg, piercing her. She didn’t seem to care very much and just pressed his foot against the ground.

His foot sunk into the rock. Melted into it. It was suddenly stuck there, and confusion was about to get the better of him until Garovel’s voice reached him.

‘Don’t panic. Protect yourself.’

Nola reached for his head next, but a full suit of spikes leapt out of his body, skewering her more completely than before, even raising her off her feet.

“You little fuck!” she yelled, spitting blood.

He struggled for leverage on his sunken foot and retracted his spikes. She fell toward him, and he punched her square in the face at full strength.

--+-+--+--

Roman arched his path toward the aircraft with bursting shock waves, each one affecting his body, breaking dozens of bones and putting pressure on every one of his muscles."

"542

Exhilarating as it was to fly under his own power, it still demanded quite a bit of Roman's concentration to sustain. He was essentially just using strong, controlled vibrations to fling himself through the air, and it all felt rather haphazard, like any simple misstep might send him whirling out of control. Moreover, if he hadn't focused his soul into his head and strengthened his resilience there, the constant force against his skull would have left him completely disoriented. Voreese wouldn't have let him fall unconscious, of course, but that hardly would have made much difference if he couldn't even see or think straight.

As he drew closer, the jet's true speed became clearer, and Roman slowed down to match it, gradually positioning himself beneath the blue-gray underbelly.

'Fifteen souls on board,' Voreese informed him. 'Can't tell if there's a reaper with them, but if there is, then they know we're here.'

'Right,' said Roman. 'How do you want me to do this?'

'Hmm.'

'You don't even have a plan, do you?'

'I'm thinking.'

The plane banked right, hard and sudden.

'Think faster, please.'

'Shut the fuck up. Go around to the nose and get us a view of the pilot first.'

Roman accelerated and did as she requested. Through the window, they could see Hanjir, a burly man with wild hair. He was looking right back at them, and a reaper sat perched on his shoulder.

'Guess that answers that,' said Voreese privately.

'Yeah, but now what?' said Roman. 'Garovel was right. If I just shoot it down, the soldiers in there will probably die.'

'I'm sure there are parachutes on board,' said Voreese.

'Are you seriously telling me to attack it now?'

'Bah. I guess not. Let's just wait for it to land and then fight this asshole there. I hate to waste time, but--'

The pilot stood up from the controls.

'The fuck does he think he's doing?' said Voreese. And then, publicly, 'Hey! The fuck do you think you're doing?'

The other reaper chimed in now. 'You morons are dead! Get 'em, Hanjir!'

"543

Hanjir wrapped one arm around the pilot's seat.

'Are you kidding me?' said Voreese.

Hanjir's hand reared back.

'He's not kidding me. Get ready to dodge.'

When Hanjir threw his hand forward, a path of destruction flew out of it, annihilating the windshield.

Roman avoided the attack easily enough, and he and Voreese merely watched as the cockpit depressurized, very nearly sucking Hanjir out into the sky.

'What a fucking lunatic!' said Voreese. 'He's a destruction type! He can't even fly, and he does THAT?!' Then to the other reaper, Voreese yelled, 'YOUR SERVANT IS STUPID AS FUCK!'

'Voreese, that's not helping--'

'No, YOU'RE stupid as fuck, you bitch!'

Another wave of destruction came for Roman, and he dodged it even more easily than the first one. 'Okay, maybe it's helping.'

‘DUMB SHIT!’ said Voreese. ‘HOW’D HE EVEN LEARN TO FLY A PLANE?!’

Roman hadn’t realized how obnoxiously loud she could make her supposedly soundless voice. He knew she could be annoying, but this--he was just flat out impressed.

‘Shut up and die, already!’ the other reaper was saying.

‘LAND THE PLANE SO WE CAN HAVE A REAL FIGHT!’

And Roman understood what she was doing. With a hole in the plane, the depressurization put all of the normal people aboard in danger, and neither could Roman attack without potentially blowing it up or otherwise causing it to crash. But if they could get the pilot to make an emergency landing, then matters would be dramatically simplified.

‘You idiots wouldn’t stand a chance against Hanjir on the ground!’

‘YEAH, RIGHT! ROMAN WILL MAKE THAT GUY EAT HIS OWN DICK!’

‘Hanjir, land the plane so we can kill these fucks!’

‘Wow,’ said Roman, watching as Hanjir strapped himself back into the pilot’s seat. ‘I almost can’t believe that worked.’

‘It’s Abolish,’ said Voreese privately. ‘Odds are about fifty-fifty that any given member is one of the stupidest motherfuckers on the planet.’

‘Maybe. It also helps that you’re the most irritating person who ever lived.’

‘Aww, Roman, you sweet talker. You’ll make me blush.’

Roman followed the plane’s descent toward the ground."

"544

They’d crossed the border into Rendon a while ago, and Roman could see the edge of the forest, giving way to flat grasslands that extended all the way into the horizon. He stuck close to the plane as it landed, prepared to help in case the unideal terrain caused something to go horribly awry, but to the pilot’s credit, nothing did.

Roman touched down as well, choosing to simply stand still while his body fixed itself. There was nothing that took a great amount of time to regenerate--just some snapped bones, torn muscles, and likely a bit of internal hemorrhaging. All things he could more or less shrug off. He would certainly feel it later, though.

Hanjir didn't even bother to turn off the engines. He pulled the door open and jumped out into the grass, wasting no time in throwing another wave of destruction.

It wasn't exactly slow, but it certainly wasn't fast enough to hit Roman. He propelled himself out of the way, bounding across the ground in leaping strides. Hanjir tried to cut him off, but Roman just zagged away from the next attack, getting Hanjir to pursue him. He needed the Abolisher to move away from the plane so that he could capitalize on the open environment as much as possible.

Roman circled around Hanjir and engulfed the man in an invisible cage of crushing pressure. More precisely, it was a spherical, inward-facing shock wave, the very same thing he had once used to temporarily suppress an explosion from Desmond.

Hanjir gave it little consideration, however, and merely punched through. He attacked again, forcing Roman left.

Roman readied his fire. The trick of it was to set his own flesh ablaze. By invigorating particles at a concentrated point, natural heat would increase, dry out his skin, and subsequently ignite it. He found it easiest to make a tiny flame and help it spread, rather than trying to set his whole hand alight at once. And after the flames grew large enough, he could project them out with a shock wave, effectively shooting fire at the enemy."

"545

The flames flew toward Hanjir, who made no effort to avoid them. Instead, the man simply destroyed them before they could reach him.

That was generally the trouble when dealing with destruction types. As much as their power was renowned for its offensive potential, it was perhaps even more effective defensively. Distorting space the way they did could stop virtually any attack, the only exceptions being things that were very powerfully enhanced by the opponent's soul--but even then, if the destruction user's soul power was remotely as strong, then it would still make no difference.

So Roman knew that he would not be able to defeat Hanjir in terms of raw strength. But he didn't need to. Given the opportunity, Hanjir would stop every attack, so Roman simply wouldn't give him the opportunity. He returned to the air and began a continuous volley of simple shock waves in order to keep Hanjir busy for a few moments.

He recalled Voreese's lessons. She'd lectured him at length about all the different types a long time ago, but it was these past two months in particular when she'd made sure to drill all the knowledge into his head again. According to her, destruction types were all one-trick ponies, lacking the kind of unpredictability that most other abilities benefited from. Moreover, they were completely outclassed by almost any opponent who possessed superior mobility. To cover this weakness, they would often carry light firearms or otherwise rely on technology for added mobility--both solutions which could backfire against the wrong opponent. This was why they were better suited to large battles where they could provide heavy-hitting support for their allies, instead of individual scrambles where they had to carry their own weight.

This fight wasn't going to be a problem.

When Roman landed again, he slammed both feet into the ground.

The earth leapt out from under Hanjir and flung him into the air. His path of destruction ran uselessly into the dirt, leaving a pentagonal trail as Roman closed in to take full advantage, already preparing more flames with the hand he hadn't used before."

"546

--donation bonus (day #29, post 1/5)--

Fire engulfed Hanjir, along with a shock wave that knocked him and his still-connected reaper higher into the air. Roman flew up after them, giving the opponent no chance to regain his balance, and juggling him even higher with each successive blast of soul-empowered vibrations. The flames continued burning all the while, fighting with Hanjir's rapid regeneration, but ultimately doing more damage to the reaper, who then chose to abandon Hanjir and fly away. And once Roman had achieved great enough height, he let the Abolisher drop again.

Hanjir was in freefall for only a few seconds, but that was plenty of time to reach terminal velocity. As he grew close to the ground, he shot it with his power, which made a crater and was perhaps the only thing the man could think to do in the last moments of panic. His body splattered on impact, bones shattering, organs liquefying.

Roman was already busy chasing the reaper down.

‘No!’ The soul-empowered fire had taken its toll, leaving the black crow smoldering, ethereal feathers in tatters. ‘You fuckers! How dare you!’ The reaper tried to flee underground.

Roman did not allow it. He caught the bird with a pressurized, soul-empowered cage. And crushed it.

The reaper’s body evaporated and vanished entirely.

‘Fucking idiot,’ said Voreese. ‘Good riddance.’

He flew back to Hanjir’s crater to set the dead body ablaze and crush the head with a focused shock wave. “That’s one down,” he said as he landed again.

‘Check on the soldiers real quick,’ said Voreese.

He made his way over to the plane. Only a few of the men had left the cabin, the rest watching from window seats. The first soldier he approached shied away from him, but the second stood his ground.

“Are you guys okay?” Roman asked.

For a moment, the uniformed man merely returned a hard look. He was black and quite young. “You... saved us?”

Roman decided not to smile, figuring it might come across as more insane than comforting, especially after all these men had been through. “Yeah.”

"547 -- LXIII.

--donation bonus (day #29, post 2/5)--

“Who are you?” said the soldier.

“Not important.” Roman adjusted his spectacles, which had also benefited from his soul-enhancements. “Listen, I’ve gotta go now. I’ll try to return soon with new transportation for you guys, but if I’m not back within half a day, then you should just start walking, because I’m probably dead.”

“Wait a minute. What do we do if the Rendon military shows up?”

‘That’s very likely to happen,’ said Voreese. ‘They probably have jets already en route. These guys should just explain that they were taken hostage and surrender peacefully.’

Roman relayed the information.

“Are you serious?” said the soldier.

“Quite.” And Roman ran off, getting some distance before launching himself into the sky again.

Chapter Sixty-Three: ‘Of advancing borders...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

News of the princes’ deaths broke, followed by reports of superpowered assassins and terrorists, and followed again by the revelation of Luther’s incarceration.

David was still confused, still unsure what to make of everything. The game had literally changed overnight--perhaps even for the better. It was an unsavory thought, given three of his brothers had been killed, weighing heavily on his heart, but at the same time, they had been traitors and, yes, obstacles to Atreya’s recovery. And already, the power of the Crown was beginning to fall upon his head.

Only, it wasn’t so easy as that.

He didn’t yet know whether he had real power or not. Abolish could still return at anytime and force him to do whatever insane thing they desired, so as much as he wanted to address the nation and give an honest speech about the tumult behind everything, he knew it would have to wait.

So David took his time to “grieve.” He needed it, anyway.

Hunched over in his chair with his head in his hands, David just tried to think. What was the most pressing concern? The biggest problem? Figuring that out took him a while.

The potential outbreak of war. That was the biggest. And this news of royal death could have a profound impact on it. Atreya's relationship with Rendon was tenuous at best, what with all the talk of increased tension every day, thanks to Abolish's propaganda."

"547 -- LXIII.

--donation bonus (day #29, post 2/5)--

"Who are you?" said the soldier.

"Not important." Roman adjusted his spectacles, which had also benefited from his soul-enhancements. "Listen, I've gotta go now. I'll try to return soon with new transportation for you guys, but if I'm not back within half a day, then you should just start walking, because I'm probably dead."

"Wait a minute. What do we do if the Rendon military shows up?"

'That's very likely to happen,' said Voreese. 'They probably have jets already en route. These guys should just explain that they were taken hostage and surrender peacefully.'

Roman relayed the information.

"Are you serious?" said the soldier.

"Quite." And Roman ran off, getting some distance before launching himself into the sky again.

Chapter Sixty-Three: 'Of advancing borders...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

News of the princes' deaths broke, followed by reports of superpowered assassins and terrorists, and followed again by the revelation of Luther's incarceration.

David was still confused, still unsure what to make of everything. The game had literally changed overnight--perhaps even for the better. It was an unsavory thought, given three of his brothers had been killed, weighing heavily on his heart, but at the same time, they had been traitors and, yes, obstacles to Atreya's recovery. And already, the power of the Crown was beginning to fall upon his head.

Only, it wasn't so easy as that.

He didn't yet know whether he had real power or not. Abolish could still return at anytime and force him to do whatever insane thing they desired, so as much as he wanted to address the nation and give an honest speech about the tumult behind everything, he knew it would have to wait.

So David took his time to "grieve." He needed it, anyway.

Hunched over in his chair with his head in his hands, David just tried to think. What was the most pressing concern? The biggest problem? Figuring that out took him a while.

The potential outbreak of war. That was the biggest. And this news of royal death could have a profound impact on it. Atreya's relationship with Rendon was tenuous at best, what with all the talk of increased tension every day, thanks to Abolish's propaganda."

"548

--donation bonus (day #29, post 3/5)--

It was rather depressing to contemplate, but enough people had already repeated Abolish's lie and thereby transformed it into truth.

David tried to focus on what could be done. He had a whole room full of advisers in front of him, but he'd drifted from their conversation a while ago.

"Your Majesty, are you listening?" someone was saying.

David opened his eyes but did not look up.

"Perhaps we should reconvene later," said someone else, "after you are rested."

"No," said David, and not in the light tone that they had perhaps come to expect of him. He'd never spent very much time at all with most of these people, and here they were, giving him contradictory counsel, likely just trying to cover all their bases. He wasn't yet sure how many of them he wanted to dismiss, but the number was growing. "Continue. I will listen and ignore as I please, but you will not stop talking. Understood?"

"Yes, sir."

"We have to consider how Rendon might react to this news," said someone else, a middle-aged woman and duchess of the House Vollier. "They could well see this as a moment of vulnerability and mount an assault. We should strike first."

David tried not to roll his eyes. She almost had a point. Rendon was as unpredictable as Abolish right now. It was why he had not gone to them for help, not tried to inform them of a rebel faction that might attack them today. He didn't need to give Rendon a reason to move in and occupy Atreyan land in order to eliminate said rebel faction. Not only would that escalate matters, but it would also give Rendon an immense advantage in the event of full-scale war. So David could understand the woman's concern there, but he was most certainly not going to attack a foreign nation purely out of fear.

"Don't be absurd!" said someone else, an elderly fellow and baron of the House Belgrant. "We should be working with Rendon to prevent war from even occurring! They will be looking to see where our soon-to-be king stands on the matter, which is why His Majesty should waste no time in assuring them that he will sue for peace!"

"549

--donation bonus (day #29, post 4/5)--

Ah, the Belgrants. The idyllic, unremarkable house that skyrocketed to power because of a freak political storm. Four years hadn't done much to stave off their reputation for being simple and uninformed.

David would have liked to agree with the man, of course, but even assuming the Rendon Parliament to be of benevolent intentions, there was still the very possible threat of Abolish having its claws in Rendon as well. Hector had mentioned such a suspicion in one of his texts-- words passed along from Helen.

David wished he knew where his sister was right now. He wondered how she would handle this situation, because to him, it seemed like there was nothing he could reasonably do except wait until he heard from either Hector or Abolish.

The advisers were arguing again. These were the people Helen had for counsel? No wonder she'd nearly been assassinated.

"I don't care!" said the baron from earlier. "I am right! And all of you are wrong! Which is why I sent word to Rendon an hour ago!"

The entire room turned to look at the man, then at David.

At least David knew which person he wanted to dismiss first.

--++--++--

Harper had to keep a close eye on the Queen. Her power was the least developed, which put her in the most danger. Moreover, she'd had something of an unlucky draw in terms of servant abilities. Calcium transfiguration, she'd gotten; and while it was far from useless, transfiguration was notoriously difficult to master, generally requiring the most study and practice. It was little wonder why most transfiguration users only figured out one or two different ways to use their power and just stuck with that.

Protecting her in the middle of the fight should have been easy for him. Objectively, he was clearly stronger than all of the Abolishers present. But one of the opponents still posed a problem--Conall Learen, a man of imposing stature, easily the tallest of the group. By now, it was apparent that Conall's power was materialization, and his element was a highly reflective metal--aluminum, Darsihm posited."

"550

--donation bonus (day #29, post 5/5)--

While Conall couldn't completely stop Harper's soul-enhanced beams of light, he could still provide rather solid protection from them--protection which he extended to the other Abolishers. And that was the real problem.

Darsihm passed the obvious instructions on to Mehlsanz and Garovel. 'Take that one out,' he said, motioning to Conall, 'and Harper will be able to annihilate the others.'

Harper pooled his concentration and threw his hand into the air. From it, an immense beacon of light poured out, illuminating the ruined forest in front of him and casting giant, moving white lasers across the dirt, gouging out trenches as they all convened toward the aluminum shelter around Andres and Desmond. The beams left smoldering trails in the aluminum but still bounced off into the forest, cutting through trees and igniting them. Not the most desirable outcome, but Harper just needed to keep Andres and Desmond pinned down for a few moments.

Hector coated the Queen's arms in metal as she closed in on Conall. Conall raised an aluminum wall for himself, and even with its soul-enhancements, the full might of the Queen's punches left enormous dents in the shimmering metal. And all the while, an iron meteor formed high above Conall and begun its descent.

And as the meteor neared the ground, the Queen retreated out of its way. However, it stopped in mid-air before ever reaching Conall.

And that's when Karkash reappeared, tearing the iron meteor into electrified chunks, swirling them around the battlefield while Hector rushed to annihilate them all again.

The tide of battle shifted.

Hector was suddenly very busy diverting lightning strikes with iron spires, which allowed Conall to help Desmond and Andres draw closer to Harper. Nola was back up as well, and soon, so would Tessa be, and her power was still unknown.

Harper had to keep them all at bay while the others worked on eliminating at least one before the enemy regrouped fully. He tried to shoot Karkash out of the sky again, but the Vaelish man saw it coming this time and surged through the air at the last moment, avoiding the beam completely."

"551

And though it missed, the attack on Karkash bought Hector a bit of time. A dozen iron pillars shot up around the trio, providing brief refuge from lightning while Karkash went to work removing them.

A mound of yellow crystal flew toward Harper, and he had to spare a laser to destroy it before being flattened. An aluminum coating tried to slow the movement of his arms, but Harper tore through without losing a beat and sent a two-handed blast of light toward Conall's shelter. The laser hit aluminum, reflecting off but still toppling the metal anyway.

Conall was left briefly vulnerable, and Harper wanted to take advantage, but then Andres and Desmond were both there in his face while Nola came up from behind.

Judging from the way she'd melted Hector's foot into the ground earlier, Nola's power was certainly integration type, though Darsiham didn't yet have more details for him. Hector had yanked himself free a while ago and discovered the foot to have become stone--having not just displaced the ground it had sunken into but actually merging with it.

On its own, Nola's power would not be immensely threatening to Harper, but here and now, supported by her comrades, if she managed to touch him and disable just one of his limbs, however briefly, it would spell trouble indeed. Thankfully, though, the Queen intercepted her, leaving Harper to only worry about Desmond, Andres, and Conall.

It was time to change tactics. His enemies knew they couldn't touch him from a distance, so now they were trying to surround him and attack at close range.

That was absolutely fine with Harper. They would find that his soul power was more than up to the challenge.

Yellow crystals gathered around him, trying to hold him down while Desmond closed in with a flaming fist.

Harper merely waited and let them think he was trapped. Then he reached out through the crystals, shattering them like they weren't even there, and grabbed Desmond by the arm and neck. White light brimmed around the edges of Harper's palm and exploded forth, taking Desmond's head off in an instant."

"552

As he tossed Desmond's corpse aside, Harper was already turning to receive Andres, but the other man was suddenly reluctant, perhaps deterred by the sight of his comrade's quick death.

Harper prepared a beam of light with one hand and stalked closer to Andres. Predictably, Conall's aluminum rose to Andres' defense, so Harper leapt forward and instead of shooting it with light, he bashed through with a soul-strengthened punch.

Andres fled behind more crystal and aluminum walls, and Harper might have given chase if not for the need to keep formation. If the enemies lured him too far away from the Queen, then they'd be able to sacrifice one or two of their pawns to keep him busy while they ganged up on her. He could not let that happen.

He spared a beam of light for Nola, catching her right through the torso and allowing the Queen to send her flying again.

'On your left,' warned Darsihm.

Harper saw Tessa there, fully regenerated and bearing down on him. And she'd pulled her hand back behind her, concealing it from view. Harper knew better than to gamble on an unknown power, so he played it safe and merely readied himself. And when Tessa threw her hand forward, Harper saw the air visibly distort along a straight path toward him.

He dove out of the way, rolling onto one knee, and then leveled a beam at her. Aluminum was already there, reflecting it, and then Tessa's path of destruction broke through from the other side, gunning for him again.

Harper's strength went to his legs and he fired himself away from the ground, up and over the path.

'Crystal above you,' said Darsihm.

Barely even seeing it himself, Harper busted through and sent yellow shards raining down below, along with two more beams of light, one from each hand.

--++--++--

Hector was getting really sick of having to fight Karkash. And unlike previous times, he had to keep Karkash focused on himself. If he tried to do something clever, it'd probably just result in Karkash going off to fight Harper or the Queen instead--and they both had enough to deal with already."

Expectedly, they'd once again arrived at a stalemate. Hector wanted to attack Conall, but Karkash's magnetism wouldn't allow it; Karkash wanted to attack Harper, but Hector's lightning rods wouldn't allow it.

Then Karkash stopped attacking and just hovered there in the sky, looking down at Hector's network of safety towers.

'What's he doing?' said Hector.

'Not sure,' said Garovel. 'Changing tactics, maybe? Be careful.'

Karkash thrust a hand down. Lightning flashed forth and expectedly crashed down on the spire nearest Hector, throwing up dust and cracking the stone beneath it. Already, Hector could tell that this was more power than Karkash had previously bothered expending. The man was focusing on a single lightning rod, and Hector wasn't quite sure why. Karkash's other hand moved as well, but a second line of lightning did not project from it.

'It's a diversion,' said Garovel privately. 'He's trying to steal a tower behind you while your attention is focused here. It's the one on the right at about forty-five degrees.'

Hector knew the exact tower the reaper was talking about. He annihilated it without even turning around.

'You got it,' Garovel confirmed. 'Karkash doesn't look too pleased, though.'

Hector concentrated on reinforcing the still-assailed spire, adding smaller ones around it to absorb some of the run off electricity. It wasn't actually attached to the ground--none of them were, as that would have required Hector to materialize metal underground. Rather, Hector just made the foundations much broader than the peaks so as to allow greater stability.

Karkash used both hands now, converging two streams of electricity into one giant one, and the sudden additional force made the air tremble. The surge became blindingly bright. Hector couldn't even open his eyes, but he could still feel the air crackling against his skin, wild sparks that would tear into him the moment he made a mistake.

And Karkash wasn't letting up. If anything, he seemed to be putting even more into it with each passing second.

'He's just trying to overload the towers now,' said Garovel. 'Don't let him.'

'Easier said than done!' said Hector."
"554 -- LXIV.

The sparks only increased, heating up the air to the point that Hector could feel his flesh searing. He tried to raise more spires, to make them taller and more robust, but the lightning was ripping into them as soon as they formed now, stunting their growth, making Hector's iron accumulate irregularly, if at all.

'You need more,' said Garovel, somehow very calm. 'C'mon, Hector. Do it.'

'Shit!' Hector's muscles all tensed as the surges drew ever closer. He started coating himself in metal just so that the electricity would come for him and not Garovel.

But abruptly, the lightning ceased.

Hector's eyes were too damaged to see what was happening. They would only need a few seconds to regenerate and restore his vision, but Garovel could still see just fine and so informed him immediately.

'Roman's back.'

Chapter Sixty-Four: 'The crack of Thunder, the pulse of Fire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Roman tore through the air like a missile, and Karkash was clearly prepared to receive him, no doubt having been warned by his reaper.

Roman didn't need an introduction. Garovel had of course provided the details of Hector's past encounters with this man, and ever since Roman heard that Karkash could also fly, he'd been expecting to end up in single combat with him.

They were both alteration users, and they were both highly mobile. The only thing left unclear was the degree to which Karkash could control his lightning. If Hector was able to divert it with the natural conductance of iron, then Karkash's control couldn't be too strong, but from Garovel's account, Karkash could also hone his lightning well enough to even cut through flesh like a blade. This, combined with the knowledge that the man had recently achieved emergence as well, made Roman think this fight would not go as smoothly as the one against Hanjir.

Honestly, though, a part of him had been looking forward to this. He'd never been one much for battle, but recently, he'd found himself growing restless with his power."

"554 -- LXIV.

The sparks only increased, heating up the air to the point that Hector could feel his flesh searing. He tried to raise more spires, to make them taller and more robust, but the lightning was ripping into them as soon as they formed now, stunting their growth, making Hector's iron accumulate irregularly, if at all.

'You need more,' said Garovel, somehow very calm. 'C'mon, Hector. Do it.'

'Shit!' Hector's muscles all tensed as the surges drew ever closer. He started coating himself in metal just so that the electricity would come for him and not Garovel.

But abruptly, the lightning ceased.

Hector's eyes were too damaged to see what was happening. They would only need a few seconds to regenerate and restore his vision, but Garovel could still see just fine and so informed him immediately.

'Roman's back.'

Chapter Sixty-Four: 'The crack of Thunder, the pulse of Fire...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Roman tore through the air like a missile, and Karkash was clearly prepared to receive him, no doubt having been warned by his reaper.

Roman didn't need an introduction. Garovel had of course provided the details of Hector's past encounters with this man, and ever since Roman heard that Karkash could also fly, he'd been expecting to end up in single combat with him.

They were both alteration users, and they were both highly mobile. The only thing left unclear was the degree to which Karkash could control his lightning. If Hector was able to divert it with the natural conductance of iron, then Karkash's control couldn't be too strong, but from Garovel's account, Karkash could also hone his lightning well enough to even cut through flesh like a blade. This, combined with the knowledge that the man had recently achieved emergence as well, made Roman think this fight would not go as smoothly as the one against Hanjir.

Honestly, though, a part of him had been looking forward to this. He'd never been one much for battle, but recently, he'd found himself growing restless with his power."

"555

--donation bonus (day #30, post 1/5)--

Childishness, Roman knew--an immature impulse to test out his still relatively new strength. But still. There it was. And if he had no choice but to fight this time, then perhaps there was no harm in learning to enjoy it a little. And besides, the extra motivation had helped him practice.

'Don't stop moving and don't stop attacking,' said Voreese.

'I know,' said Roman. His arm fought against the pounding wind force as he sent a shock wave ahead of himself--his own flight speed added to it like a bullet fired from the nose of a plane.

Karkash responded in kind. Lightning cut into the shock wave before it reached him. The clash made the air erupt. Frantic waves of sparks shot out in all directions.

Roman banked right hard, and he saw Karkash following suit. Another shock wave, another surge of lightning, another furious explosion. And again. And still another time. They followed each other higher up, exchanging attacks as Roman gradually forced his way closer, swirling around each explosion, ignoring his own battered body because Karkash's couldn't be in much better shape.

When he was finally within range, Roman threw his fist out and surrounded Karkash with a pressurized cage. It certainly wasn't enough to stop the man, but it slowed him for a moment, and Roman took the opportunity to move in even closer, a shock wave already flying ahead of him.

Karkash deflected it with another burst of lightning, but he was too close to the explosion this time and got caught up in the blast. He flew off course, toppling through the air.

Roman gave chase, preparing a bath of fire with a trembling hand. The flames poured forth on another shock wave.

But instead of struggling to steady himself, Karkash seemed to embrace his downward tumble, and it became a broad, swooping maneuver. He moved down and away from the fire, which burned up harmlessly after going too far. And then Karkash was flying up toward Roman again, smoothly sliding past the next stream of fire and retaliating with fresh lightning."

"556

--donation bonus (day #30, post 2/5)--

Roman was already covering himself with a fiery shock wave as he swerved right. Fire and lightning clashed. The explosion rocked the air and threw sparking embers across the sky, obscuring Roman's view of Karkash.

Karkash veered around the explosion. Roman expected more lightning to accompany the man and so immediately launched another shock wave at him, but perhaps Karkash had anticipated as much, because there was no such lightning to be found. Instead, Karkash flew up and over, avoiding the shock wave before raining blue bolts from above.

A branch of lightning caught Roman's left arm, making him grit his teeth and muscle through the seizure. In an instant, he swiped the air with his right arm and returned an enormous shock wave. Karkash must not have expected such a quick response, because it barreled into his torso.

Both men lost aerial control and started falling. Roman's body seized up as the electricity coursed through it, and Karkash's chest had caved in on itself.

They recovered nearly in unison, and abruptly found themselves staring each other down.

A tense quiet arrived as they got a good, long look at one another, both reluctant to make the first move again. Roman might have guessed from the man's name that Karkash was different from the other Abolishers present, but the attire made that point rather clearly. The long, slender coat with a black sash was certainly not Atreyan fashion, nor was it something Roman had seen any of the other Abolishers wearing--though admittedly, he'd only seen three, and perhaps Desmond's butler disguise didn't quite count.

'Still okay back there?' said Roman, eyes still locked on Karkash as he floated.

'Yeah, don't worry,' said Voreese.

Hoyohté, the crow on Karkash's shoulder, took the lull in combat as an opportunity to speak. 'Who are you people? Why must you stand in our way?'

'Why do you have to fuck with our country?' said Voreese.

'We are honor-bound,' said Hoyohté. 'We are all servants of the Void--even you, though you may refuse to acknowledge it.'

'OH!' yelled Voreese, reaching for that obnoxious tone again. 'WELL, OKAY, THEN! IF THE VOID WANTS EVERYONE DEAD, THEN THAT'S FINE!'

"557

--donation bonus (day #30, post 3/5)--

'I do not expect you to understand,' said Hoyohté.

'NO, SERIOUSLY!' said Voreese. 'TELL ME MORE ABOUT THE FUCKING VOID! I'M IMAGINING IT AS A GIANT, INVISIBLE

ASSHOLE IN THE SKY! IS THAT ACCURATE?!

'I suppose I should expect no less from heretics, but will you even refuse to identify yourselves out of warriors' respect?'

'IS IT PUCKERED OR GAPING?!'

Hoyohté said nothing more as Karkash started moving again.

Roman knew that negotiations would have just been a waste of time, and Karkash didn't look especially fazed by Voreese's words, but even so, Roman had to wonder if it was wise, attempting to anger a man who could throw bolts of fucking lightning.

--++--++--

Helen had thus far only managed to develop one real use for her calcium transfiguration power, as the learning curve for it had proved too steep for anything more. Epidermal calcification was all she had, a means of hardening her skin.

It was a simple enough idea but not at all easy in execution. Despite calcium itself being fairly tough on its own, Helen could not simply replace the surface layer of her skin with the stuff, as it would naturally react with the other elements below and reduce her flesh to a bubbling, melting mass of decidedly useless goo. So to prevent that from happening, she needed to make calcium carbonate--a mineral also requiring carbon and oxygen. Both of those elements were readily available in the human body and indeed, the skin itself, but learning to bond them together with her transfigured calcium had been a grueling exercise in patience and concentration. It took a rather precise application of mental pressure, and she'd only recently been able to get it down.

Combined with the fact that, in all of her thirty-three years, she'd never been in a fight until a little over two months ago, Helen was admittedly feeling disadvantaged in this whole ordeal.

Still, she had refused to stand by and let these three gentlemen do all the work. Enhanced strength and regeneration were useful enough on their own, and if nothing else, she could at least help to divide the enemy's attention."

"558

--donation bonus (day #30, post 4/5)--

Perhaps it was tactically unwise, going into battle herself like this, but to her mind, it was worth the risk. In the worst case scenario, Abolish would kill her here and then leave the country for fear of the Vanguard, at which point, Atreya would primarily be left in the hands of David, William, Gina, and Lynnette. And she trusted those hands.

So here she was, gambling for the optimal outcome. Though, from what Mehlsanz and Voreese had said, it was pretty safe to bet on Harper Norez.

An immense flash lit up the battlefield, making Helen squint and shield her eyes. Then just as suddenly, the light vanished, taking more with it than expected. It took Helen's eyes a moment to adjust and another moment to understand what she was seeing.

An apparent hole in space stood where Harper was--a black dome in the middle of the forest. Presumably, Harper was still there somewhere, having stopped the movement of light within, or bent it perhaps. It would surely buy the man a few seconds of confusion, but not likely more than that, because as Helen understood it, reapers could still see souls regardless of light, and, Helen suspected, so could servants--provided their soul-synchronization was strong enough.

Conall posed the greatest threat to Harper, so it was rather obvious that Harper would attack him in the darkness--which was perhaps why Harper didn't. Instead, when the veil of darkness lifted, it was Tessa he was in the midst of attacking.

As for herself, the Queen worked alongside Hector to keep Conall occupied.

An enormous iron slab gathered high above Conall's aluminum shelter. It crashed down with full force, not breaking the no doubt soul-strengthened aluminum but still sending impressive cracks through it.

Helen took that as her cue to begin whaling on it. Each punch broadened the cracks and made the aluminum tremble. And she broke through, but a second barrier was already waiting for her. And it had spikes.

This one was truly just a wall, though, not a dome. Hector raised an iron platform on the other side and flung Conall up and over."

--donation bonus (day #30, post 5/5)--

Conall spun in the air, seeing Helen and Hector below, as well as the iron sword flying toward his gut. The man encased himself in aluminum. The blade shattered on impact and knocked Conall farther away, into a group of still-standing trees.

They pursued. The Queen held her hand out toward Hector as they ran, and he created a sword for her.

The strained light of the forest darkened even further as metal appeared above her head. For a moment, it was difficult to tell whose it was, but she didn't have to guess.

"That's not mine!" said Hector.

'Split up,' said Mehlsanz.

Helen ran right, and Hector ran left. The aluminum crashed down between the trees. Conall probably would have liked to follow the attack up, but the man no doubt realized by now that Harper would tear his comrades apart without him. And that was the game here. They didn't have to defeat Conall--only distract him.

Helen spotted Conall again and chucked the sword with all her strength. It flew straight and true. Conall was forced to shield himself again, allowing Hector a few moments to circle around. A horizontal pillar shot out of Hector's gauntlet with a pointed tip.

Conall launched himself up with an aluminum pillar, clearing the treetops for a fresh view of Harper, where he took the opportunity to make fresh shelter for his comrades. Another iron sword shattered against his aluminum coating and knocked him away again. As he fell, he retaliated once more.

A flurry of aluminum spikes flew toward Helen. She took refuge behind a burly tree trunk, which did manage to stop the spikes but only just. The wood was left skewered in multiple places, sharp tips poking out through splintered holes.

Then Karkash reappeared, swooping low over the treetops. Roman was not far behind, though he was missing an arm now.

Hector raised an iron spire to catch the imminent lightning, but it didn't work. The lightning eagerly went for the aluminum spikes instead, making Helen's tree explode.

The impact knocked her off her feet, countless scraps of wood tearing into her."

"560

--donation bonus (day #31, post 1/5)--

Helen made a fist and punched the dirt in order to give herself the leverage to climb back to her feet. Her regeneration was already pushing the chunks of broken wood out of her flesh, and she could feel her shattered bones reforming.

As her ear drums restored themselves, she heard more explosions, quite close. They sounded like Desmond's, being preceded by that distinct and low sizzle. She could feel drops of rain as well, few and faint, perhaps just now starting to fall.

'Hurry,' said Mehlsanz. The reaper was not without her wounds, either. Thin plumes of white-and-black smoke rose out of the ghost's backside and upper right arm.

Helen rushed back toward the battle.

And from that point, it was utter mayhem.

Every combatant was present again. All hope of keeping formation was lost in a mad scramble. Lightning hacked Hector's arm off. Flames engulfed Andres. A shower of yellow crystals riddled the Queen with holes before an iron wall rose to her defense. A beam of light claimed one of Karkash's legs. A forest fire devoured trees in the background, and no one was in any position to stop it from spreading, but perhaps the rain would render that unnecessary.

'I can hardly tell what is happening!' said Helen. She bounded out of the way of another swarm of crystals.

'We're slowly losing ground,' said Mehlsanz privately. 'And it's about to get worse. I sense six new souls approaching quickly from the direction of Rendon, and given the situation, they're probably Abolish, too.'

An iron spire shot up next to Helen, and then lightning crashed against it. She squinted against the blinding flash while struggling to maintain her concentration. 'Should we retreat?!'

'Maybe,' said Mehlsanz, 'but we probably wouldn't get away--on your right!'

The top of the tree next to her erupted, making the whole thing groan and topple over. Helen leapt out of the way. 'There must be something we can do.' She went to work on her arms, focusing and flexing in order to reestablish the calcium carbonate. Her peachy skin turned pale white as it hardened, cracking here and there."

"561

--donation bonus (day #31, post 2/5)--

'It's not over yet,' said Mehlsanz. 'I suspect Harper is holding back.'

'Why would he possibly be--?' She had to break the question off as she was abruptly confronted with Andres, who seemed just as surprised by the encounter. She struck before he could and punched him hard enough to make her calcified skin crumble.

Andres went toppling through the air and took a tree down with him.

'Just be ready to run,' said Mehlsanz. 'If I'm right, then things are going to escalate very quickly.'

--++--++--

Harper scowled as another aluminum wall rose to Tessa's defense.

Even with Roman and Karkash thrown back into the mix, the battle saw little in the way of progress--which was unfortunately still in Abolish's favor. They probably just wanted to buy time for their comrades to arrive from Rendon, at which point they would merely try to overwhelm Harper. Such was Darsihm's assessment, anyway.

Conall and Tessa were the core problem, Harper knew. Conall's mirrors needed to be broken down at close range, but that was where Tessa's destruction power excelled. If Harper rushed in to smash through, she would be there with her unstoppable attack. And all the while, the other Abolishers were attacking more or less as they pleased, probably trying to catch him off guard.

He just needed an opening, a foothold, and he was sure that he would be able to make up all of his lost ground.

Then Roman fell out of the sky, crashing down at a low angle and skidding across dirt and stone right in front of Harper. Roman's body was in tatters, bones sticking out of his flesh, limbs hardly seeming to function. But his right arm still worked. And that was enough.

Undeterred by the reflectivity of aluminum, Roman's shock wave smashed through Conall's barrier, leaving Tessa suddenly exposed.

Harper immediately capitalized, and a beam of light tore the woman asunder.

Now was the moment, he felt. The close range threat was gone for now. He still wasn't sure where Tessa's reaper was, so he just moved against Conall next."

"562 -- LXV.

--donation bonus (day #31, post 3/5)--

Karkash was busy trying to kill Roman while Hector stood in the way again, and the Queen was still trying to occupy Conall's attention. That only left Desmond and Andres for Harper to deal with on his way to Conall.

Wait. No, it didn't. That other woman was still missing.

'This is--no, behind you!' said Darsihm.

Nola Pauls was there, crouched and reaching for him. A beam of light would have taken her head off if not for the aluminum faceguard. Instead, she was merely flung back, but not before she succeeded in melting Harper's right leg into the rock below.

He was suddenly immobile, stuck fast above the knee while his left leg could achieve no leverage to pull himself free. He struggled as aluminum walls shot up around him, encasing him completely. From the sound of it, Andres was adding an outer layer of sulfur crystals, too.

His mind raced. Even with all his years in the service, here and now, he still had to fight the urge to panic. If he didn't break out right now, Abolish would certainly overwhelm the others. And then they would gang up on him.

There was no other choice now. He'd fallen for the enemy's feint. And hell, even breaking free of this cage wouldn't be enough. More Abolishers were en route, and there was no telling what fresh problems they could present.

Harper's jaw muscles tensed in the darkness. He closed his eyes and concentrated. He could already feel the first stage of the transformation taking place. 'Warn the others,' he told Darsihm.

The reaper didn't require an explanation. 'You know I can't do that without also alerting the enemy.'

'If we accidentally kill one of them--'

'We've committed our allies to memory. Trust in our instincts, Harper. It's all we can do now.'

Chapter Sixty-Five: 'Come, ye devils, and perish...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rain fell in sheets now, slickening the earth, evaporating against each flashing bolt. Hector saw the tower go up around Harper and would've liked to help, but he was rather occupied at the moment with a storm of lightning."

"562 -- LXV.

--donation bonus (day #31, post 3/5)--

Karkash was busy trying to kill Roman while Hector stood in the way again, and the Queen was still trying to occupy Conall's attention. That only left Desmond and Andres for Harper to deal with on his way to Conall.

Wait. No, it didn't. That other woman was still missing.

'This is--no, behind you!' said Darsihm.

Nola Pauls was there, crouched and reaching for him. A beam of light would have taken her head off if not for the aluminum faceguard. Instead, she was merely flung back, but not before she succeeded in melting Harper's right leg into the rock below.

He was suddenly immobile, stuck fast above the knee while his left leg could achieve no leverage to pull himself free. He struggled as aluminum walls shot up around him, encasing him completely. From the sound of it, Andres was adding an outer layer of sulfur crystals, too.

His mind raced. Even with all his years in the service, here and now, he still had to fight the urge to panic. If he didn't break out right now, Abolish would certainly overwhelm the others. And then they would gang up on him.

There was no other choice now. He'd fallen for the enemy's feint. And hell, even breaking free of this cage wouldn't be enough. More Abolishers were en route, and there was no telling what fresh problems they could present.

Harper's jaw muscles tensed in the darkness. He closed his eyes and concentrated. He could already feel the first stage of the transformation taking place. 'Warn the others,' he told Darsihm.

The reaper didn't require an explanation. 'You know I can't do that without also alerting the enemy.'

'If we accidentally kill one of them--'

'We've committed our allies to memory. Trust in our instincts, Harper. It's all we can do now.'

Chapter Sixty-Five: 'Come, ye devils, and perish...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Rain fell in sheets now, slickening the earth, evaporating against each flashing bolt. Hector saw the tower go up around Harper and would've liked to help, but he was rather occupied at the moment with a storm of lightning."

"563

--donation bonus (day #31, post 4/5)--
'Mm?' said Garovel privately. 'What's Harper--?'

Light erupted out of the tower around Harper, a beacon straight up, cleaving the sky in two and dispersing the rain clouds around it.

'Oh fuck!' said Garovel.

Then the tower exploded, and a huge wave of force washed over the area. Hector felt it pass through him, but it didn't knock him over like it did for the Abolishers. He wasn't sure why until he saw Roman's fist in the air, though Roman himself was still incapable of standing.

'Grab Roman and run,' said Garovel.

Hector didn't need to be told twice. 'What the hell is happening?!' he said as he hoisted Roman over his shoulder. The man said something, but Hector couldn't hear him. 'Is it emergence?'

'No. Harper's entering one of the hyper states--something called "pan-rozum." I highly doubt he's old enough to fully control something like that.'

'You mean he's gonna attack us, too?!'

'I'd rather not find out. We're all dead, if he does.'

Harper's movements were decidedly inhuman. Hector's eyes couldn't even follow him. It looked like the man was teleporting, the only evidence to the contrary being the straight trails of fleeting white light that Harper left in his wake. One moment, he stood at the center of the crumbled tower, and the next, he was in front of Andres, arm through the Abolisher's chest. And the moment after that, Andres was dead, decapitated in a cloud of blood, along with the reaper behind him.

Everyone scattered.

Harper went for Conall, encountering brief resistance from the aluminum. Very brief. The trail of light bounced off the mirror wall and then went up and over, getting behind Conall faster than he could even turn around. Harper split the man down the center with a glowing arm. Conall's reaper was already fleeing, but it made no difference. A white laser turned the skeleton to vapor.

Hector could hardly believe his eyes. They were nothing to Harper. And they all knew it. Karkash was already gone, flown off as soon as he realized what they were up against."

"564

--donation bonus (day #31, post 5/5)--

Hector searched for his motorcycle as he ran, expecting to find a smoldering pile of scrap, but there it was, untouched and right where he'd left it.

"Hey, put me down," said Roman as they reached the bike. Hector did so, and Roman proved capable of standing again.

"Get on, and I'll--" The sentence died in Hector's throat as he turned.

Harper was right there in front of him.

Hector leaned backward, eyes widening. The look on Harper's face was especially unsettling, because it was one that he'd seen before. It was just like Stoker's. Half-asleep, seemingly unaware or even conscious. The only difference was that Stoker had been twitchy, whereas Harper still moved rather smoothly as he poked his head closer, perhaps curiously.

'Don't attack him, Hector!' said Garovel. 'Just let him look at you.'

'O-okay,' said Hector, trying not to sound terrified. After everything he'd faced in the past, he'd nearly forgotten what it was like to feel genuine fear. Without a doubt, this was a much more effective reminder than necessary.

Harper's head turned, and then in a blink, he was gone again, leaving an equivalently tall streak of light behind as he went after Nola next.

Her reaper went down first, and Nola hardly had enough time to look confused before a luminous pillar burned through her skull.

Seeing how quickly the man could dispatch people, Hector didn't understand why Harper had just let him and Roman go. But he decided that now wasn't the time to question it. He mounted his bike with Roman behind him. He found the dirt road, as well as the Queen in her black sedan, already ahead of him.

She soon stopped, however, as they arrived at a group of armored vehicles. It was the soldiers that Abolish had kidnapped.

The border guards had proved rather stubborn, trying to stop them from crossing into Atreya. Vladimir had briefly considered merely waiting for Desmond and his comrades to cross into Rendon first, but that would have required far too much patience. And besides, he hadn't gotten to kill anyone in ages, and those guards had really annoying faces. It was definitely the correct decision, he felt."

"565

The news of Atreya's royal turmoil had unfortunately sent sympathetic ripples through the Members of Parliament. Thankfully, they were slow to make up their minds about what to do next, so all the pressure that Vladimir and his two friends had been building up over these past couple months had not yet gone to waste. That was why this attack today was so important and why he wanted to make sure that it went without a hitch.

Vladimir hadn't been expecting a fight at the end of this trip, so when his reaper told him the good news, he'd been pleasantly surprised. Even from this distance, the reaper could tell that something was amiss by the way the souls moved, seemingly clashing with one another, some even in mid-air. There were also many souls present which were apparently not involved in the conflict, but those were probably just the hostages that Desmond and his comrades had brought along.

"Can you tell how many opponents there are?" Vladimir said in his native Bolenese.

'Not sure,' said his reaper, 'but unless Desmond has already lost multiple fighters, there can't be more than three or four enemies.'

Vladimir's small car rumbled down the muddy road, following close behind the two ahead of him. "I hate getting wet. They'd better give us a decent fight, at least."

'That's stupid. I hope they die in seconds.'

He laughed. "That would just be embarrassing."

A white pillar shot up into the sky at a distance, glowing bright and cutting through the rain clouds.

‘Oh hell! Stop the car! Turn around right now!’

“What? Why?”

‘Do it!’

Vladimir didn’t have much choice in the matter as the cars in front of him stopped as well. Even for their compact vehicles, there wasn’t much space on the road, so the other servants got out and started flipping the cars around with their bare hands. Begrudgingly, Vladimir began to do the same.

‘Hurry up, you slow ass! Desmond’s people are dropping like flies!’

“Oh, come on,” he said. “They can’t be that str--”

‘Oh god! Here it comes!’”

"566

Vladimir turned in time to see one of the cars get speared by a surge of light and explode. The accompanying servant flew back into a roadside tree, and their reaper didn’t get very far before being impaled by a bar of white light.

There was hardly time to react, hardly even a chance to glimpse the attacker. His own reaper was simply vaporized in an instant. Vladimir was not given the opportunity to lose his mind. Light engulfed his vision as he died.

--++--++--

Hector watched the Queen take charge, directing the soldiers who seemed utterly shocked by her presence.

“You must all retreat from here now!” she told them. “That is an order!”

“Yes, ma’am!” said multiple voices, apparently quite keen to leave as they scrambled back into their vehicles.

Helen looked to Roman next. “Mr. Fullister, take the reapers away from here as quickly as possible. As long as the reapers are far enough away, Harper will not be able to sense them, yes?"

"Right, good thinking." The man's body was mostly restored by now. Voreese was already attached to his back, so he moved to gather the other two reapers up.

'Here,' said Garovel, giving Hector one last boost of strength and regeneration. Mehlsanz did the same for the Queen.

Then Roman was off with his three passengers, bursting through the sky again, up and over the trees.

"Hector, you and I will ride with the soldiers and help them escape." She motioned to the adjacent vehicles as the engines roared to life. The ones at the other end of the column were already started back down the road.

Everything was happening so fast. He didn't have much time to process it all, but he at least understood that these soldiers were in the most danger. He mounted his motorcycle again, and the Queen decided to jump into one of the cars with a group of soldiers. He brought up the rear as the last cars began moving.

Hector built giant walls behind the group, knowing they probably wouldn't delay Harper more than a second, if that."

"567

'Garovel, talk to me,' said Hector. 'What am I up against here?'

'Harper and Darsihm have merged their souls, and now they're in a kind of battle trance, hardly even conscious. The only reason they didn't kill us earlier was because they must've memorized our souls as belonging to their allies. It's amazing that they even have enough control to do that much.'

An idea struck him. 'So Harper won't attack me because of my soul?'

'Yeah. But he can't possibly have memorized the soldiers' souls, because he's never met any of them. He'll definitely attack them, and they stand even less of a chance than you do.'

He brought his bike to a sudden halt. 'Then, maybe...' An iron wall rose up in front of him, cutting him off from the armored vehicles ahead. He touched the metal with one hand and made sure to block the entire road, from one giant cluster of trees to the other. And he kept growing the metal higher, curving back over his head while simultaneously empowering it with his soul.

It was a giant cage in the making, one that he couldn't be sure would work. His soul was the important part. Maybe Harper wouldn't attack the cage if it also carried Hector's soul. It seemed like a long shot, but trying to fight Harper didn't even seem like an option.

Hector built the cage as fast as he could. It had to be gigantic, or Harper would probably just jump over it. He arched it back and raised iron pillars to support the high roof. He added a floor as well, not wanting Harper to dig his way out. And the cage became quite long, encasing a massive section of the road like a tunnel.

If Harper pursued the soldiers, he would have to enter Hector's cage. This was the only path Harper could take. Unless he could fly now, too. Or just chose to navigate the forest, anyway.

That'd suck.

No other ideas sprung to mind, though, so Hector focused on his task. The cage was nearing completion, only the far wall of it left open while he stood in darkness on his end.

And then Harper appeared."
"568

In a blink, Harper Norez was already standing there next to Hector. The Lt. General illuminated the entire tunnel as he faced the wall that Hector was touching.

Hector shut the far end of the tunnel, completing the trap. He stared at Harper, waiting to see what the man would do.

But Harper did nothing, only turned his head back and forth slowly until eventually settling on Hector.

'Wow,' said Hector. 'It really worked...?'

'What did?' said Garovel.

'I think I've... I've got Harper trapped...'

There was a pause. 'You what?'

'I made a cage and added my soul to it... and he's not attacking it, I guess because he thinks it's me?'

'That wouldn't--uh... How the...? You--?! How the fuck did you get him inside a cage?!'

'Well, uh... I mean, I knew he'd probably come this way... It's the shortest and clearest path to the soldiers, so...'

'Hector...! Just--! Holy shit!'

He gave a nervous laugh, still wary of Harper's half-conscious stare.

'It's not because he thinks your metal is actually you, though,' said Garovel. 'It's more like you've blinded him. He can't sense the souls on the other side of your walls, so he just doesn't know where to go anymore.'

'Ah... yeah, that's what I meant to say.'

'You had no idea. You got lucky.'

'...You can't prove that.'

Garovel laughed. 'Whatever the case, good work! Now try to move him back up the path, as far away from the soldiers as you can.'

'Garovel.. I don't like the way Harper is looking at me...'

'He's in a state of self-hypnosis. He's only driven forward by a desire to attack things, but he can't sense anyone other than you right now.'

'...So he's going to attack me.'

'Almost definitely.'

'Great.'

'I'm betting it's just a matter of time until his bloodlust overcomes the "knowledge" that you're his ally. That's why you need to move him away from the others. He is probably going to break out of your cage sooner or later.'

‘I’m fucked, aren’t I?’

‘SO fucked.’”

"569

Hector shook his head as he started backing up on his motorcycle.

‘Y’know, Garovel... sometimes, you can be a little TOO honest.’

‘Hey, it’s not like you need to win,’ the reaper said. ‘Just try not to die too quickly.’

‘Super helpful, thanks.’ He kept one hand on the iron wall as he moved along, returning down the path he’d come from. The metal floor proved rather slippery against the soles of his shoes and the bike’s tires, but he had to move slowly anyway in order to ensure that Harper followed him, lumbering and eerily silent.

‘You could try talking to him,’ said Garovel. ‘Probably won’t do any good, but it’s worth a shot.’

‘Egh...’ Hector soon reached the end of the tunnel and so had to add on to it. He created an empty room on the other side of the wall, and then annihilated said wall. And repeated the process each time. ‘How far away do I have take him?’

‘Not much farther, I’d imagine. I can barely even sense your soul at this range. Roman will be heading back to help you soon.’

He could see Harper’s pace increasing. “Mr. Harper, sir... heh... y-you don’t wanna attack me, right? Garovel’s just... worried for no reason, yeah? You’ve totally got this battle-trance-thing under control... I’m sure we won’t have to--”

Faster still.

Hector armored up.

It was a lot to keep track of. Growing the tunnel. Maintaining the soul-empowerment. And now armoring himself, too. He had to simplify the metal attire, and much of it was reduced to mere coatings, leaving only space for his joints to bend freely.

As Harper drew too close, Hector raised a wall between them.

Darkness enveloped the young man as Harper's light was cut off.

But only for a moment.

Harper broke through, glowing white, and smashed Hector in the chest. The impact shattered the iron breastplate and sent Hector flying off his bike and through the wall behind him. He bounced through the mud, toppling over himself again and again, still not stopping until he slid up next to a familiar rock formation, the one Garovel had called Rathmore's Gate."

"570

It might've been a surprise to see the rocks still standing after all the combat that had taken place around them, but Hector didn't spare it any thought as he climbed to his feet again. His sunken-in chest was regenerating, crushed lungs in the midst of reforming.

Harper flashed closer but stopped not long after exiting the cage. His head turned to the side, glazed eyes looking away from Hector.

That was bad.

A spiked ball materialized in Hector's hand, and he tried to shout and get Harper's attention, but his lungs couldn't hold breath just yet. So he just threw it with full force.

Harper vanished just before the ball reached him. In a blink, he reappeared next to Hector, already with a hand around the young man's throat, fingers digging through the iron coating and into Hector's flesh.

The spikes came out, skewering Harper's hand and forearm. Hector was briefly free, until Harper's other arm connected with the side of his helm. Again, the armor shattered, and Hector went flying, toppling across hard stone with a broken neck.

He struggled to stand back up this time, his body not wanting to listen to him. Vital nerves below his brain stem needed time to repair. He could barely move, but he could at least see Harper. He knew that a single beam of light through his skull could've already ended this fight. And yet it hadn't.

Hector felt his lungs working again. "You're still holding back," he said.

The words didn't seem to register. Harper just looked away again.

"No! Focus on me!"

If Harper leapt away now, there would be no catching him. There would be no saving anyone. More innocent lives destroyed. More failure.

Hector understood these things. And he refused to let them happen.

Defeating Harper, that was impossible. But delaying him? Surely, that could be done. If this stupid body would just move. Always breaking when he needed it most. If he couldn't move, he couldn't materialize anything. Except, perhaps, coating himself. In spikes.

That would have to do."

"571

The first pillar shot out of Hector's armor like a rocket--a massive knife through the air, a good fifty meters. He couldn't direct it. The thing just shot up and out, far enough to reach Harper but still well over the man's head. So he added sharpened branches to it, as well--blades upon blades upon still more blades, a great tree of iron daggers. It had nothing in the way of support, however, and immediately began to fall, which if nothing else, certainly demanded Harper's attention.

And it was not alone, this knife. Nine more followed it up, all leaping from Hector's body in different directions, splayed out and wild, each one so thick that it crushed or impaled its own cluster of trees.

Hector annihilated them each at the base only and let the boat-sized columns of metal fall around him. He propped himself up with another pillar as his neck finished regenerating. Looking over his work, he wasn't sure if this was emergence's doing, just because it happened so quickly this time, but he didn't have long to think about it.

Harper's zigzagging frames of light bounded from pillar to pillar, and then in an instant, Harper was there in front of him, an arm plunged through Hector's chest.

Still not quite going for the kill, it seemed. That suited Hector just fine. Every functional muscle in his body flexed as he strove to repeat himself. A new mass of spikes flew out, each one furnished with thorns and gnarled hooks.

They forced Harper back and gave Hector a moment to breathe.

He spotted a broken slab of aluminum on the ground, shimmering in the mud and drizzle. He dove for it and clapped a pair of iron straps around the thing. He slid his arm through the straps and raised it in front of himself. A mirror shield. Makeshift and crumbling, but better than nothing. And just in time, too.

A white laser flashed across the clearing.

It bounced off the shield, but the force of the impact still blew him back. His mirror held together, however, and Hector regained some unsteady footing on slippery rock."

"572

'Garovel, tell me the soldiers are safe.'

'They're not. You need to buy another two minutes or so.'

'Two minutes?! Do you know how long that is in the middle of a fi--?!'

The attack came from the side, catching Hector under the rib cage. Light burst out of Harper's fist, cutting through metal and flesh like butter. He sailed into the rock formation, which stood strong against the impact, not even cracking.

The right side of his chest was gone, but he didn't let that slow him down. More spikes, broad as he could make them.

Harper tore through them with a spray of light.

He raised the mirror shield. It protected him but shattered. He dove away, knowing another attack was imminent, hoping for another chunk of aluminum and not finding it.

Abruptly, Harper shuddered. The man doubled over onto his hands and knees.

Hector had to spare a moment of surprise before deciding to keep attacking anyway, but by the time he launched another spike from his gauntlet, Harper had vanished again, the trail of light leading behind Hector this time.

He didn't get the chance to turn around before feeling the next impact. The beam of light cleaved horizontally through his chest, finishing Harper's earlier work. Hector's legs and stomach flew one way, and his upper body flew another. Still perfectly conscious, he splattered to the ground in a bloody heap, arms mangled but still functioning.

He made to attack another time, undeterred by the loss of over half of his body, but when he saw Harper hunched over and trembling again, Hector hesitated. He suddenly wasn't sure that attacking was the smartest move. On the one hand, he of course needed to provide a distraction, but on the other hand, if he provoked Harper too much, then the fight might just end instantly, and then everything would be for naught. So he stayed his hand this time and observed.

He squinted. 'Harper's not looking so good...'

'Not surprising,' said Garovel. 'The hyper state takes a very heavy toll-- heavy enough to kill him and Darsihm both if they can't control it well enough.'

"573 -- LXVI.

'Uh, shit... is, um--is there anything I can do to help them?'

'No,' said Garovel. 'They've taken their lives into their own hands now. It's up to them.'

Uncertain, Hector went to work on a soul-empowered dome. He doubted it would do much good at this point, but attacking directly seemed like a much worse idea now. At least this way Harper would be "blinded" again.

Darkness fell over the two of them as the iron roof spanned out, blocking out the sky and the rain. Able to taste both blood and mud in his mouth, Hector watched Harper begin to glow again, becoming the only source of light once more. Dozens of pillars supported the dome as it completed itself. Even Rathmore's Gate was covered.

Harper returned to his feet. He looked straight at Hector, and the expression on the man's face seemed to indicate that he had regained consciousness.

However, Hector didn't get the opportunity to ask.

The explosion of light made everything go white.

Chapter Sixty-Six: 'Once the Light has arrived...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Roman saw the solid bar of white shoot up into the sky and had to shield his eyes. It remained there for a long moment, and even after it was gone, the image of it was still burned into his vision for a few seconds.

As he drew near, he saw the aftermath of the fight from the air. The forest had been leveled all around Rathmore's Gate, the odd chunk of metal or stone mixed in. Unable to see either Hector or Harper, he returned to the now wildly uneven ground for a closer look, knocking an upturned rock over with his rough landing.

'Damn,' he said. 'I know the place wasn't in such great shape when we left it, but now it just looks like a bomb went off.'

'See anyone?' said Voreese.

'Looking.'

Harper appeared in a flash, standing right in front of Roman. But he didn't attack. Instead, the light dimmed all around him, and he collapsed face-first into the mud.

Roman stared at him a moment. "Huh.""

"573 -- LXVI.

'Uh, shit... is, um--is there anything I can do to help them?'

'No,' said Garovel. 'They've taken their lives into their own hands now. It's up to them.'

Uncertain, Hector went to work on a soul-empowered dome. He doubted it would do much good at this point, but attacking directly seemed like a much worse idea now. At least this way Harper would be “blinded” again.

Darkness fell over the two of them as the iron roof spanned out, blocking out the sky and the rain. Able to taste both blood and mud in his mouth, Hector watched Harper begin to glow again, becoming the only source of light once more. Dozens of pillars supported the dome as it completed itself. Even Rathmore’s Gate was covered.

Harper returned to his feet. He looked straight at Hector, and the expression on the man’s face seemed to indicate that he had regained consciousness.

However, Hector didn’t get the opportunity to ask.

The explosion of light made everything go white.

Chapter Sixty-Six: ‘Once the Light has arrived...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Roman saw the solid bar of white shoot up into the sky and had to shield his eyes. It remained there for a long moment, and even after it was gone, the image of it was still burned into his vision for a few seconds.

As he drew near, he saw the aftermath of the fight from the air. The forest had been leveled all around Rathmore’s Gate, the odd chunk of metal or stone mixed in. Unable to see either Hector or Harper, he returned to the now wildly uneven ground for a closer look, knocking an upturned rock over with his rough landing.

‘Damn,’ he said. ‘I know the place wasn’t in such great shape when we left it, but now it just looks like a bomb went off.’

‘See anyone?’ said Voreese.

‘Looking.’

Harper appeared in a flash, standing right in front of Roman. But he didn’t attack. Instead, the light dimmed all around him, and he collapsed face-first into the mud.

Roman stared at him a moment. “Huh.””

Darsihm melted out of Harper's back, a formless mass at first, then slowly becoming an ethereal crow again.

"You conscious?" said Roman. A beat passed. "You alive?"

Neither answered.

"Hmm. I suppose if you were dead, there wouldn't be anything left of you." He picked the reaper up with a soul-empowered hand and then hoisted Harper over his shoulder.

That only left Hector. And with all the rubble around, the kid could be just about anywhere.

'Hey, is Hector even alive?' he asked.

There was a pause, and then Voreese said, 'Garovel can't recreate him from scratch, so he must be there somewhere.'

'Dammit, why's that kid gotta be so resilient? I don't wanna search through all this shit.'

'What about Harper?'

'Yeah. Already found him. Pretty sure he's just unconscious. Darsihm, too.' He flipped over a bisected tree trunk. 'Aha, hey. Think I see Hector.' He moved closer and pulled a pair of legs out of the ground. 'Aw, shit. It's just his legs. Hmm. Guess he'll be wanting these pants, though.'

'Y'know, you could try calling out to him.'

'Good idea.' Pants and belt draped over one arm, he started shouting. "Hector! Where are you, pal?! If your lungs still work, then say something!"

Rather than a voice, a sudden spire shot up on the other side of the rock formation. When Roman made his way over, he found Hector's upper body in the midst of regeneration. Crumbled chunks of his helm remained around his head, and he had one-and-a-half of his arms, but his chest had yet to fully reform. Roman could see Hector blinking at him.

“Well, now,” said Roman. “This brings back memories. You managed to stay conscious this time, though.”

--+-+--+--

It took a while to reach the nearest rallying point. Karkash didn't even know where it was. Because he didn't need to. Hoyochté had all the fallback locations and contingency plans memorized. This one was a long-abandoned gas station, and it stood some fifty kilometers north of the Carthrace Nature Reserve.

Karkash was the first to arrive, of course. He took a seat on the roof, which groaned under his weight but held together.”
"575

Hoyochté floated behind him, her hulking orca's body casting no shadow. 'I knew this assignment would be terrible,' she said in Vaelish. 'What other result could there be when working with such fools?'

"I don't understand how the Morgunovs ever accomplish anything at all," said Karkash, also in Vaelish. "It could only be the Void's will that has allowed them to last this long."

'I know what you mean, but I think it's something of a testament to Morgunov's abilities that he can organize and lead people like that.'

"Is he not as mad as people say?"

'Mad, certainly. A fool? No. I've only met him once, but I've seen his work. He's just as much a genius as he is insane.'

"Would you say he is smarter than Dozer?"

'Of course not. Dozer is the true vessel of the Void's will and power. There is no competing with him.'

"Unless your name happens to be Sermung, apparently."

'Let's not turn this into an argument.'

Karkash rubbed his neck as he stretched it. "You know my faith in Dozer is strong. I wasn't trying to argue anything. But regimes do change. Sooner or later. And there's only so much we can do about it."

'Not this again. You don't have the power to be speaking words such as those. As servants go, you're still a child. I'd hope today has taught you that much, at least.'

"I understand the limits of my strength. It's the limits of others that I question."

'Enough.'

They waited for a long while. Honestly, Karkash didn't expect anyone else to have survived the fight. Waiting in this place seemed like a waste of time, but unsurprisingly, Hoyóhté was adamant that they follow protocol. He occupied himself with meditation, and eventually, the reaper stirred him out of it.

'I sense Ezmortig,' she said.

He opened his eyes and looked out over the lowlands. A vast reach of grass stretched toward the horizon, and in the distance, he could just make out the shape of another reaper headed toward them.

"Surprising.""

"576

When Ezmortig was close enough, he started to recreate Desmond. The brain was the first thing to appear, growing out from a speck on the ground and from there, it only took a few minutes for the man's body to regenerate fully.

Desmond took a deep breath, stretching his jaw muscles with one hand as he looked around at Karkash and the two reapers. He was nude, of course, but he didn't seem to mind very much. He gave a loud sniff and cracked his neck. "So I guess things didn't go very well for us, did they?"

'I'm fairly certain that everyone else is dead,' said Ezmortig. 'Hanjir and Jupard might've gotten away, but I suspect Roman killed them.'

"Who's Roman?" said Desmond.

'The flying man that Karkash was fighting. We fought him, too, back when we tried to kill the Queen the first time. He told us his name at Belgrant Castle, though you probably don't remember. His reaper's name is Voreese.'

Desmond squinted. "That was the same guy? I don't remember him flying around before."

'Seems his power has grown since then,' said Ezmortig.

'You should have killed him the first time, then,' said Hoyohté. 'If that man had not been present today, the fight might have gone very differently.'

"Pfft, whatever. I seem to recall you not killing the metal kid on two separate occasions. Three, now. Oh, and let's not forget about your little stunt with Stoker and Nize. If you'd just let them go--or better yet, let me handle it--then maybe you wouldn't have ended up on television and put the entire fucking plan in jeopardy for no reason."

'In our sect, we make an example of treasonous cowards,' said Hoyohté. 'I do not expect you to understand.'

Ezmortig interjected. 'Calm down. It's no use complaining at this point. Anyway, the real problem was the man with the light powers. Even if Karkash had been free to attack more, I highly doubt it would have made a difference. No offense.'

Karkash merely gave a small shrug and folded his arms.

"Eh, fuck it," said Desmond, shaking his head. "So what's the plan now?"

"577

'We should return to headquarters,' said Ezmortig.

'Are you sure?' said Hoyohté. 'We can still fall back to our allies in Kahm, no?'

Ezmortig shook his huge head. 'This operation is lost. We'd need to bring someone in who could kill that light bastard, but this mission just doesn't have that kind of priority. Atreya isn't important enough right now.'

'I was told that this operation was critical for establishing Abolish's dominance over the continent.'

'Ah. Well. Our captain tends to exaggerate when she gets excited.'

Hoyohté swam up behind Karkash, and her voice bristled with irritation as she said, 'We would not have come here if we had known that this was just some trivial fancy for your sect.'

'Yeah,' was all Ezmortig said.

Desmond snickered, drawing Karkash's glare.

'You waste our time,' said Hoyohté. 'I do not find that amusing.'

'Oh, please. Your people knew this assignment was probably horseshit when they only sent two servants to assist. Simple risk-reward scheme. They wanted to send someone so that if things went well, they could claim to have helped, but they obviously didn't want to devote any real resources to it. And all the while, both sides could dress it up as the spirit of cooperation, which is always good for morale.'

'Hmph.'

'But you knew that already,' said Ezmortig. 'C'mon. There's no need to play dumb with me. I know you're smarter than you would have me believe. The way you ferreted out those traitors of yours, led them right into a trap--and by pretending to be overeager and stupid, no less. You're really quite calculating, aren't you? No doubt, you were hoping this assignment would help you gain traction with your superiors, too.'

"You talk too much," said Karkash.

Desmond laughed. "He does talk too much. There's no stopping him once he gets going. But still, I've learned that he's worth listening to. I'm sure you'll understand that we're pretty good friends to have, if you give us a chance."

Karkash eyed them flatly. "You both talk too much."

"578

'Look,' said Ezmortig, 'I understand. You're upset. You think this has all been for naught. And maybe it has been. But how about we make it up to you?’

There was a long pause, and then Hoyohté said, ‘I’m listening.’

‘Before you return to Vaeland, come with us to Calthos.’

“Whoa, hey,” said Desmond. “Ez, please. We don’t need to--”

‘Shut up, Desmond. I’m negotiating.’

Hoyohté looked between them. ‘Why Calthos? Your headquarters is in Kavia, no?’

‘It is. We’d only stop in Calthos briefly. You see, a while back, Desmond came into some money. Which is in Calthos.’

‘Money?’ said Hoyohté.

Desmond frowned.

‘Compensation for your time,’ said Ezmortig. ‘I’m sure a smart woman like yourself could think of all kinds of uses for it.’

‘And you would simply give us this money freely,’ she said, more than a little doubtful.

‘Well, I’d be lying if I said I wasn’t hoping for anything in return, but it’s completely up to you. Think of it as an extension of trust, an offer of good faith in hopes of fostering future partnership.’

‘Ah... I see. You’re one of the ambitious ones.’

‘Aren’t we all?’

‘Ha. Rather a bold investment, don’t you think? You hardly know us.’

‘Simple risk-reward scheme,’ he said again. ‘And it’s not that bold, really. We have a LOT of money.’

‘Will your captain not be upset that you are spending funds without her approval?’

‘Let me worry about that.’

‘Ah. She doesn’t know you have it, does she?’

Ezmortig chose not to answer.

‘If it is as much money as you say, then your captain would have taken it from you and used it elsewhere. You certainly would not be given such access to it as you claim to have.’

‘Maybe she just trusts me.’

‘If that were true, you would not be here. As you said, Atreya is not important right now. Is that what this is all about, then? You feel you are being undervalued in your sect? Looking for a way to move up in the world, perhaps?’

“Now who talks too much?” said Desmond.

"579 -- LXVII.

‘Our circumstances are not your problem,’ said Ezmortig. ‘Rather, they’re to your benefit. So what do you say? Will you come to Calthos with us?’

Karkash wasn’t certain what to make of this offer. He didn’t like Desmond very much, but Ezmortig at least seemed competent. He looked at Hoyohté as she deliberated. She didn’t ask his opinion, and he knew she would probably just ignore him if he gave it.

‘Very well,’ she eventually said. ‘We will go with you.’

‘Wonderful. Like-minded friends are a rare sort, you know. I’m sure our partnership will become the stuff of legends.’

‘Do not get ahead of yourself.’

‘Of course.’

Desmond scratched his bare ass as he turned around, facing the eastern horizon. “It’ll take a while to reach Calthos. Unless Sunshine over there can fly and carry me at the same time.”

Karkash glanced at Hoyohté. ‘Should I?’ he asked.

She gave him a small nod.

He pointed at the back of Desmond’s head. Lightning exploded through it.

Desmond's body fell over, headless now as well as naked.

Ezmortig eyed the corpse and sighed. 'You could have warned him, at least.'

"More fun this way," said Karkash.

Hoyohté chuckled. 'And they say we have no sense of humor.'

Chapter Sixty-Seven: 'Blessings be upon thee...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Once Roman found him, Hector wasn't conscious for very much longer. He was completely gone even before they'd made it back to the others.

So he slept. Deep and familiar, warm and embracing. And he awoke, as he had many times before, to the sound of Garovel's voice.

'Get up, Hector.'

His eyes took their time focusing. He saw blue sheets in front of him, and he slowly realized that he was lying on his side. He turned over and rubbed his face.

'I know you still need more time to rest,' said Garovel. 'I'll let you sleep all you want later.'

He sat up and found a well of pain waiting for him. "Guh!"

'Yeah. Sorry about that. You can handle it, though, right?'

"Fffghhh--!" Every part of him burned. He buried his face in his pillow and growled out a few muffled curses. It helped. He hadn't felt this much pain in a while."

"579 -- LXVII.

'Our circumstances are not your problem,' said Ezmortig. 'Rather, they're to your benefit. So what do you say? Will you come to Calthos with us?'

Karkash wasn't certain what to make of this offer. He didn't like

Desmond very much, but Ezmortig at least seemed competent. He looked at Hoyóhté as she deliberated. She didn't ask his opinion, and he knew she would probably just ignore him if he gave it.

'Very well,' she eventually said. 'We will go with you.'

'Wonderful. Like-minded friends are a rare sort, you know. I'm sure our partnership will become the stuff of legends.'

'Do not get ahead of yourself.'

'Of course.'

Desmond scratched his bare ass as he turned around, facing the eastern horizon. "It'll take a while to reach Calthos. Unless Sunshine over there can fly and carry me at the same time."

Karkash glanced at Hoyóhté. 'Should I?' he asked.

She gave him a small nod.

He pointed at the back of Desmond's head. Lightning exploded through it.

Desmond's body fell over, headless now as well as naked.

Ezmortig eyed the corpse and sighed. 'You could have warned him, at least.'

"More fun this way," said Karkash.

Hoyóhté chuckled. 'And they say we have no sense of humor.'

Chapter Sixty-Seven: 'Blessings be upon thee...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Once Roman found him, Hector wasn't conscious for very much longer. He was completely gone even before they'd made it back to the others.

So he slept. Deep and familiar, warm and embracing. And he awoke, as he had many times before, to the sound of Garovel's voice.

'Get up, Hector.'

His eyes took their time focusing. He saw blue sheets in front of him, and he slowly realized that he was lying on his side. He turned over and rubbed his face.

‘I know you still need more time to rest,’ said Garovel. ‘I’ll let you sleep all you want later.’

He sat up and found a well of pain waiting for him. “Guh!”

‘Yeah. Sorry about that. You can handle it, though, right?’

“Fffghhh--!” Every part of him burned. He buried his face in his pillow and growled out a few muffled curses. It helped. He hadn’t felt this much pain in a while.”

"580

‘C’mon, Hector. Just walk it off.’

Hector grit his teeth. “Fucking...! Agh...!”

‘Pain is just an illusion, Hector. Like friendship or personal happiness.’

That wrenched a laugh out of him. “Garovel, you suck...”

‘Yeah, yeah.’

He looked around, and it took him a moment to understand what he saw. It was a bedchamber, but it certainly wasn’t any place he’d stayed before. A large, clean desk and lamp sat adjacent a cedar shelf filled with scores of books, and a tall window with silvery curtains offered natural light into the room. His bare feet touched a silken rug, and he noticed that the room had two different doors as well, each on a different wall. “Where the hell...?”

‘We’re in the royal palace. In Sescoria, that is. We’ve been here for three days already.’

He held a hand to his forehead. “Oh, man... what’d I miss?”

‘I’ll tell you while you get ready. The bathroom is the door on your right, by the way.’

“Get ready for what?” he said, sluggishly making his way to the bathroom.

‘Dinner with the Queen.’

He stopped, and his eyes widened. “Oh shit...”

Garovel snickered. 'Hector. Something actually NICE is happening. And we're not dead! We survived. Try to appreciate that much, at least.'

"Ah... yeah. Is everyone...? I mean, uh, how is everyone?"

'They're safe. You stopped Harper from hurting anyone else. I decided to wake you up, because Harper and Darsihm are awake now, too. I thought you'd like to have dinner with everyone, especially since Roman and Gina are leaving in the morning.'

"Oh. Uh... th-thanks." He went through the door and found a change of clothes next to the spotless sink. He saw himself in the mirror and blinked, abruptly remembering that first day after Garovel originally revived him. It felt so different this time, yet so familiar. His face still had that same gloomy look as before, but he didn't mind it so terribly now. His hair had grown out a little, though, and that, he did mind. It'd always looked like the rough side of a blackened sponge to him."

"581

Hector sifted through the drawers beneath the sink, hoping for a razor to shave his head with, but he only found an assortment of soaps, shampoos, and extra towels. He considered trying to shave his head with materialized metal but soon decided against it.

"So, um... what's gonna happen now? I mean, uh, is Atreya safe from Abolish?"

'For the time being, it is,' said Garovel. 'The Queen's been busy trying to make sure things stay that way. Well, she's just been busy in general, really.'

Hector turned on the shower and pulled his shirt off. "What about the war with Rendon?"

The reaper phased through the wall and gave him his privacy. 'It's been averted.'

'Just like that?' said Hector, stretching while he waited for the water to warm up. It didn't take nearly as long as he thought it would.

'I suppose it sounds simpler than it was. Less than a day after finally returning here to Sescoria, the Queen went to Rendon--against pretty much everyone's advice, mind you. But she knew what she was doing. Peace negotiations are now underway. And the Atreyan soldiers whom Rendon had taken into custody, she brought them home safely, too.'

He lowered his brow and chuckled. 'How'd she pull that off?'

'I didn't go with her to Rendon, obviously, but I'm sure it was the spectacle of it all that made it possible. First thing she did when she got back? Appeared before the press, right out there on the front steps of the royal palace. She hadn't even made it inside the building yet. She ensured they'd be here waiting for her as soon as she arrived. And of course, this was gigantic news, so the whole country knew about it in a matter of hours. Then she and the King jumped on a plane and went straight to Rendon. They took Lynn and Roman along in case things went south, but it seems to have gone smoothly. I suppose Rendon didn't really want to go to war, and with all of the insanely good press that the Queen's gotten, she was able to offer their parliament an easy way out of a terrible situation.'"

"582

'Wow,' said Hector. 'Pretty bold move... But I guess the Queen wouldn't need to be too worried about getting captured by a bunch of normal Rendon soldiers.'

'Yeah.'

'So... I guess... everything worked out?'

'You say that like you had nothing to do with it.'

'I mean, I'm just... kind of... shocked.' And on top of everything, his shower soap smelled amazing.

'I know what you mean. We've scored a pretty huge win on this one. It's almost worrying, how well things have turned out.'

'You mean like something really bad is about to happen?'

'Aw, Hector, don't say that. You'll jinx it.'

'Wouldn't it be more of a jinx not to mention it at all? And besides, you're not even superstitious.'

‘Mm. Both good points.’

He finished up his shower and got changed. The white shirt had a flaring black collar and silver buttons, and its long sleeves fit his arms perfectly. The pants suited him similarly well, and he wondered if someone had taken his measurements while he slept. As he slipped into a fresh pair of thickly-soled shoes, there came a knock at the door. He opened it to find Harper Norez there.

“Evening, Hector.” The man looked rather haggard, slumped over with heavy eyes. Darsihm clung to his back, a kind of ethereal lump that didn’t look anything like a skeleton at the moment.

“Hello, Mr. Harper. Ah... you don’t look so well.”

The man smirked. “I can’t be feeling much worse than you, I imagine. I heard about what we did to you. I’m sorry.”

“Oh, no, no,” said Hector. “Don’t worry about it. I mean--uh. You saved everyone. If you hadn’t done that, then, uh... Abolish would’ve killed us all.”

“Well, yeah. I’m still sorry you ended up in that position, though. If we’d had more control, things wouldn’t have gotten so bad.”

“Really, Mr. Harper, it’s fine.”

‘Yeah,’ added Garovel. ‘Hector’s accustomed to getting the shit kicked out of him.’

That made Harper laugh. “I see.”

“Is, um... is Darsihm okay?”

“Oh yeah. He’s going to be out of it for a couple weeks still, but he’ll be fine.””

"583

Hector was about to leave with Harper, but Garovel stopped him.

‘Hold up,’ the reaper said. ‘There’s a hat for you by the bed. Put it on.’

It was an officer’s cap, he saw. “Uh... why?”

‘Not many people know you’re here, but if you’ll recall, a LOT of people know your face. We don’t want to incite a panic while you’re strolling around the palace. There’s a fake mustache in the drawer, too.’

Hector opened the drawer and sure enough, it was there, bushy and gray and ridiculous-looking. “You... you’re joking.”

‘Of course I’m joking. But seriously, wear it. When people see it, they’ll think, “Aha, that’s silly!” and not, “Oh fuck, it’s the Darksteel Soldier!” Which is what we’re going for.’

“Can’t I just make a mask for myself?”

‘That would probably scare people, too.’

“Agh... what about my motorcycle helmet?”

‘I had Roman hide it from you.’

“You asshole...”

‘Oh, c’mon. You know you’ve always wanted a sweet stache like that one.’

He looked to Harper for help, but the man only offered a sympathetic shrug. Hector finally caved. He donned the hat and then the mustache, peeling away the layer of plastic on the back to stick it on his upper lip. It was too big for his face, nearly covering his entire mouth and even poking him in the cheeks.

Garovel busted out laughing and didn’t stop, which made Harper crack up as well.

“I hate everything,” said Hector. And he shook his head, but the reaper’s laughter was getting to him, too.

They made their way out into the hall. Apparently, Harper didn’t know where to go, so Garovel led the way. The palace was certainly busy, people bustling to and fro everywhere Hector looked. And of course, the building itself was enough to make him gawk. Every corridor was at least five times taller than him, and the walls were all a pristine white, frequently adorned with enormous paintings. Columns of blue marble rounded off every corner, and it seemed like there were never any sharp edges anywhere, apart from perhaps the massive chandeliers that hung down over every intersection."

Garovel gave them something of a tour as they walked, explaining where each new corridor led to and even pointing out various people among the crowds as being international representatives.

'Oh, and I should probably mention,' the reaper said, slowing a little but not stopping, 'the night before we returned, three of the Queen's brothers were murdered.'

Hector's eyes widened, and he looked at Harper, who seemed equally surprised. He looked at Garovel again. "Um, Prince David, ah...?"

'He's alive. Him, Meriwether, and Luther are fine, but apparently Luther was the one responsible for the killings, so he's been imprisoned. The Queen's already held a joint funeral service, despite the fact that those same brothers were also traitors who tried to assassinate her. I'm sure it's a rather confusing and difficult situation for her, so maybe don't ask about her family over dinner, yeah? If she wants to talk about it, just let her bring it up on her own.'

"Understood," said Harper. "Thanks for the warning."

'Sure.'

They arrived at an enormous banquet hall, but they didn't stop there. Garovel led them toward the far corner and into an offshoot chamber which was much smaller and mostly filled with one large table. Roman and Gina were already here, as were David and Meriwether, and also Vanessa Goffe, who sat at the other end of the table. Voreese was present as well, and she was the first to greet them.

'Finally, someone else who can actually see me,' she said. 'Was getting tired of talking to that clod.'

Roman threw them a look from across the room but was apparently too invested in his conversation with Gina to do anything more.

Hector just gave her a smile and left Harper and Garovel to keep her company. He made his way over to his mother.

When she saw him coming, she stiffened. She looked in slightly better health than before, but that may've only been due to the makeup she was wearing now.

He pulled out the chair next to her but didn't sit down just yet. "Mom... uh... how are you? Have they been treating you well here?"

"585

His mother chose not to answer the question and instead asked one of her own. "What the hell are you wearing?"

"Ah..." He pulled off the mustache. "Just a prank someone played on me."

"You shouldn't let people make a fool of you."

"It's not like that," said Hector.

"Hmph."

He sat down and glanced across the table at the others. He still found it difficult to make eye contact with his mother, but he tried his best. "I'm sorry I haven't been around the past few days. I've been unconscious, so... yeah."

She didn't have anything to say to that.

'She knows what happened to you,' said Garovel, and Hector flinched a little, only now realizing the reaper had followed. 'Believe it or not, she visited you several times. Not sure if it was because she was concerned about you or what. She didn't say much.'

Vanessa took a long breath, perhaps irritated, perhaps just bored. "So what are you going to do now, anyway?"

"Uh... I'm not sure yet."

"We can't stay here in the palace forever. And I assume we're not returning to Brighton, either."

His brow receded. It struck him as odd that she was already accepting of the idea that she would continue living with him. He thought it would surely be an ordeal, convincing her to stay where he could protect her. "I'll figure something out soon," he said. "Seems like things've finally calmed down a bit, so... ah..."

She just nodded and fell silent again.

He gave up trying to get a read on her. After a few moments, Prince David and Prince Meriwether took the opening and approached. Hector stood to greet them.

"It is a pleasure to finally meet you in person," said David. He and his brother both looked rather tired as they took turns shaking hands with Hector.

"Uh, I'm, ah..."

David tilted his head. "I'm Prince David. We spoke on the phone? And corresponded via text? You do remember, yes?"

"Y-yeah, of course. I'm just, um--I... it's very nice to meet you. Oh, and I'm sorry about, uh... about threatening you before..."

"586

David laughed. "I should think we're more than past that by now. Is everything okay? You seem nervous."

"Ah, s-sorry, uh..."

Thankfully, the Queen's arrival saved him further embarrassment. Compared to his previous encounters with her, however, she looked decidedly different, thanks in no small part to her midnight blue gown with elaborate swirls of white, silver, and gold. He almost didn't recognize her, the change was so stark, but after a moment, he vaguely remembered seeing her in dresses on television. Before all this, he'd never paid much attention to what the royals were up to. If he'd ever expected to meet any of them, that might have been different. The King and Lynn both followed her into the room, and all three of their faces lit up when they saw him.

"Hector!" said the Queen. "I was not expecting to see you here! What a pleasant surprise. I have been wanting to speak with you."

As all eyes turned to him, he had to resist the urge to run out of the room. Instead, he merely flushed crimson.

Garovel floated up next to Hector and addressed Helen as he said,

‘Really? If you wanted to ask him something, you could have just asked me.’

‘Nah,’ said a smirking Mehlsanz, who had of course accompanied her servant into the room as well. ‘This is the kind of thing that should be discussed in person.’

As soon as the Queen sat down at the table, the food began to arrive. Hector pulled down on the brim of his hat and turned away from the door, not wanting to risk scaring any of the staff members. Perhaps the Queen understood this, because as soon as the last dish was set, she ushered the attendants out of the room and told them not to disturb her meal. She returned to a very quiet table, however, and had to throw a curious look across it.

Clad in a guardsman’s attire, Roman broke the silence for everyone. “I think we’re all wondering what you wanted to talk to Hector about.”

“Ah,” said Helen. “If you must know, I wanted to discuss the matter of Hector’s heroism in the preservation of Atreya and its citizens. Specifically, I wanted to ask what manner of reward he would like.” Everyone looked at Hector again, then back at the Queen.

Helen smiled warmly. “What do you think, Hector? I was thinking something along the lines of, perhaps, a castle.””
"587 -- LXVIII.

Chapter Sixty-Eight: ‘Of measured worth...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector’s mouth hung open as he looked at the Queen. He wasn’t sure he heard her right. He couldn’t have.

‘Whoa, whoa,’ said Voreese. ‘You’re giving away castles? Can we have one, too?’

“Voreese, no,” said Roman. “Hector’s one thing, but we definitely don’t need or want anything from the Queen.”

“Are you certain?” said Helen. “I have no qualms about granting you lordship over lands of your own.”

Roman bowed his head forward a little. "That's very generous, but it'd be problematic for me if people found out that I was working with the government. In the circles I frequent, that kind of information is liable to ruin a man's reputation."

"I see," she said. "Am I to expect lobbying requests for favors from you, then?"

Roman leaned back in his chair and shook his head. "It's not like I have leverage over you or anything. I'd just appreciate if you and I could maintain a certain amicability moving forward. Having a friend in your position would be nice for me, and likewise, having a friend in my position would be nice for you."

The Queen gave a nod.

'Fuck that, I want a castle!' said Voreese.

Roman rolled his eyes. "Voreese, shut up."

'No, you idiot! If she's just giving shit away, then I want Warrenhold!'

Now Roman just seemed confused. "Why? And what is that, even?"

'Ugh! Because--!' She cut herself off and looked at Mehlsanz and Garovel. 'Wait, am I the only one who knows?'

The other two reapers exchanged shrugs.

"Warrenhold?" said the Queen. "Are you referring to the Gray Warren?"

'Yeah! The fortress in Gray Rock! No one's lived there in ages, right? So it currently belongs to the Crown, right?'

"Yes, that is correct."

'Great! Then we'll take it!'

"No, we won't, Voreese! I can't accept land from the Queen! It'll ruin everything! Why do you even care so much?!"

Voreese grumbled and looked around the table. Her hollow eyes fell upon Hector. 'Hector. Sweetie. And Garovel. You handsome devil. Choose Warrenhold. So we can visit you. It'll be delightful.'

"587 -- LXVIII.

Chapter Sixty-Eight: 'Of measured worth...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector's mouth hung open as he looked at the Queen. He wasn't sure he heard her right. He couldn't have.

'Whoa, whoa,' said Voreese. 'You're giving away castles? Can we have one, too?'

'Voreese, no,' said Roman. "Hector's one thing, but we definitely don't need or want anything from the Queen."

"Are you certain?" said Helen. "I have no qualms about granting you lordship over lands of your own."

Roman bowed his head forward a little. "That's very generous, but it'd be problematic for me if people found out that I was working with the government. In the circles I frequent, that kind of information is liable to ruin a man's reputation."

"I see," she said. "Am I to expect lobbying requests for favors from you, then?"

Roman leaned back in his chair and shook his head. "It's not like I have leverage over you or anything. I'd just appreciate if you and I could maintain a certain amicability moving forward. Having a friend in your position would be nice for me, and likewise, having a friend in my position would be nice for you."

The Queen gave a nod.

'Fuck that, I want a castle!' said Voreese.

Roman rolled his eyes. "Voreese, shut up."

'No, you idiot! If she's just giving shit away, then I want Warrenhold!'

Now Roman just seemed confused. "Why? And what is that, even?"

'Ugh! Because--!' She cut herself off and looked at Mehlsanz and Garovel. 'Wait, am I the only one who knows?'

The other two reapers exchanged shrugs.

“Warrenhold?” said the Queen. “Are you referring to the Gray Warren?”

‘Yeah! The fortress in Gray Rock! No one’s lived there in ages, right? So it currently belongs to the Crown, right?’

“Yes, that is correct.”

‘Great! Then we’ll take it!’

“No, we won’t, Voreese! I can’t accept land from the Queen! It’ll ruin everything! Why do you even care so much?!”

Voreese grumbled and looked around the table. Her hollow eyes fell upon Hector. ‘Hector. Sweetie. And Garovel. You handsome devil. Choose Warrenhold. So we can visit you. It’ll be delightful.’”
"588

‘Perhaps you could explain what is so special about this Warrenhold place before we decide,’ said Garovel.

Voreese looked over her audience. ‘Well, it’s old as shit! In a good way! Lots of history, very defensible, and tons of space underground.’ She leveled a stare at Garovel. ‘Trust me on this one. You’ll thank me.’

A silent pause followed, and Hector was left to wonder what the non-servants at the table must be thinking of this conversation, watching the Queen and Roman talk to their imaginary friends. However, Hector noticed that most of them weren’t even watching, really, instead taken to enjoying the feast laid before them. He realized he hadn’t even started eating yet, despite being utterly famished, so he decided to dig in as well.

‘Okay,’ said Garovel. ‘We’ll take Warrenhold. If Her Majesty is actually offering it to us, that is.’

The Queen tilted her head. “Are you certain? Perhaps you should visit it before deciding. Unless my memory is mistaken, the Gray Warren was forced to endure an earthquake some years ago. You may not come to find it in the most desirable state.”

‘Eh, we’ll make do,’ said Garovel. ‘No need to draw things out. We’ll take up less of your time this way.’

Helen eyed the two reapers a moment, perhaps skeptical, but then said, “Very well. You will have the papers by the week’s end.” She turned to Hector. “Do you find that agreeable?”

“Oh, um, sure... but, uh...” He faltered again under everyone’s gaze.

“Yes?” said the Queen, as they all waited for him.

“S-sorry, it’s just... maybe I’m missing something, but, uh...” His fists clenched under the table as he forced the rest of the words out.

“Wouldn’t it be a problem for, uh, Your Highness, if you give such an incredible gift to... well, me? I mean, I’m pretty hated by... ah, everyone...”

“Once the public knows the truth, that will not be a problem,” said Helen. “I intend to address the matter of your innocence in front of the press very soon. In fact, I was hoping you might accompany me when I do.””

"589

‘Pfft, are you kidding?’ said Garovel. ‘You want Hector to appear on television? I thought you wanted to reward him, not torture him.’

“He has done it before, has he not?” said Helen. “He threatened the town of Harold to facilitate its evacuation, no?”

‘That was a recording, and it still required about fifty takes.’

“Ah--Garovel’s right,” said Hector. “I really don’t--please don’t ask me to--I just--agh...”

“Very well,” said the Queen. “I understand. Regardless, it will require time. I can order the police and the military to stop hunting you easily enough, but I would ask that you take a well-deserved respite while we attempt to win the public over.”

‘Mm, dunno about that,’ said Garovel. ‘Hector’s pretty gung-ho when it comes to protecting innocent people.’

Hector gave the reaper a look. 'You say that like you're any different.'

'He can be so stubborn,' Garovel went on. 'I don't think an inconvenience of reputation would be enough to stop him from going out and looking for trouble.'

Her Highness smiled warmly and nodded. "Yes, well, protecting people would not be a problem, but it would be helpful if you could avoid taking the blame for crimes you did not commit."

'There go my plans for the weekend,' said Garovel.

'How do you intend to tell the public, exactly?' asked Voreese.

'Carefully,' said Mehlsanz. 'Most of the blame will fall upon Luther as the orchestrator of everything. Unfortunately, we can't really name Abolish as the instigator unless we want to give them more reason to return and silence us.'

"They may try to do that, anyway," said Harper, who'd thus far only listened quietly as he ate.

'We're aware,' said Mehlsanz. 'We were hoping you would stay here in Atreya for a while longer.'

"That's fine with me," said Harper. "I don't have any pressing business elsewhere at the moment, but you should know, I could be called away at any time. Out there in the world, if something big enough happens, my superiors might well contact me. And that's not going to be the kind of thing that I can just ignore.""

"590

"I understand and thank you for all your help," said the Queen. "If there is anything you need, please do not hesitate to ask."

Harper laughed. "Oh, do I get a castle, too?"

"If you desire one, yes."

"Ha, that's okay. My whole reason for being here is to protect you, so I'd rather stay wherever you do, if you don't mind."

"Of course. You are more than welcome here."

King William took the opportunity to break into the conversation.
“Where are you from, Mr. Norez?”

“Oh, nowhere,” said Harper. “Or everywhere, depending on how you look at it. I don’t really identify with any particular place anymore. I travel too much for that. This is my first time in Atreya, though. I’m liking it so far.”

“Now that the genocidal maniacs are gone, you mean,” said Roman.

“That is definitely a step up, yes,” said Harper. He looked at the King again. “Ah, but my apologies, Your Highness. I suppose that’s not a very satisfying answer to your question, is it? I can at least say that I was born in Jesbol, though I don’t have many memories from there. My parents escaped when the Jungle Wars began spreading.”

“The Jungle Wars?” said William. “That was some sixty years ago, and yet you do not look a day over thirty.”

“I moisturize.”

The Queen laughed faintly and turned to her husband. “Reapers may choose to prevent their servants from aging, dear.”

“There’s that, too,” said Harper. “But I’m pretty sure it’s the moisturizing. I mean, just look at my skin.”

--++--++--

It was raining, but that was no rare thing, nor was it even that heavy. Already at the age of twelve, Marcos Elroy was accustomed to much more than this meager drizzle. There wasn’t even any flooding; he could still see the grass beneath the playground, or more accurately, beneath the platform on which the playground stood, on which the entire city stood.

Sometimes, the rain was so strong, it was like living on the sea. Or at least, he thought it was. He’d never been to the sea.”

"591

Playing basketball in his bulky blue raincoat wasn’t the easiest thing, but he knew that his mother would get mad at him again if she found out he took it off, and he didn't want her to forbid him from coming out here to play. After all, his school had an indoor court and so did the youth club near the estate. But he didn't have any friends in those places.

The past few times, he'd felt stupid for being the only one wearing a raincoat, so this time, he'd brought enough for everyone. Now the court bustled with a group of flailing, child-shaped blueberries.

For some reason, they tried to return the coats to him after the game was over, and Marcos had to refuse them. He thought it was obvious that they were gifts, so he didn't understand why his friends seemed so reluctant. He ended up just running away before they could put up any more of a fuss. Besides, he didn't want to carry them all the way back home. Carrying them all the way here had been a big enough pain, already.

The journey back required a good bit of legwork, and Marcos had always been taught not to run when the ground was so wet, so he resorted to a brisk walk as soon as he was out of sight.

It was sometimes easy to forget that Aguary stood on a platform. It had asphalt roads and concrete walkways and grassy parks. The only real reminders were the perforated drains that riddled the ground and the madega trees, which all had their own holes to stand in. They were already massive things to look at with their sprawling canopies of wispy teal leaves, but to then realize that below the platform, the madegas all had another five meters of trunk, made them seem all the more impressive. But of course, they were older than Aguary itself, so perhaps that was only to be expected.

When Marcos arrived at the gatehouse, the pair of guards made him pull back his hood before smiling and welcoming him home. Nico and Jorem were their names, and they didn't look very friendly, but that was probably the whole idea. They were always nice to him, at least."

"592

Marcos proceeded up to the Main House, stopping briefly under the overhang to wipe his feet and shake some of the water off his coat. He pushed through the tall doors, hung his coat up, and pulled his boots off. Dinner was soon to arrive, he knew, but until then, he had time to kill.

He found Cisco in the center hall--or rather, Cisco found him, slipping up behind him and pinning both his arms behind his back, holding him in place. "Hey, brat. Can you get out of this yet?"

"Stop!"

"Come on. Get out of it."

Marcos thrashed fruitlessly. "I can't!"

"Yes, you can. I showed you how."

"I can't! Just let me go!"

"No."

"If you don't let me go, I'll yell!"

Cisco released him with a shove, and Marcos nearly fell over. "You're pathetic."

"And you're an ass!"

"Whatever. Go cry to Ma if you want." Cisco walked away.

Marcos scowled and rubbed his sore shoulders. He had four siblings, and he definitely hated Cisco the most. Cisco was the second-oldest, having four years on him, but Gema was never around anymore, so Cisco still got to play the role of eldest.

He decided to head up to his corner room on the third floor, but he encountered his father on the stairwell first. Marcos had never known a sterner face than that of his father. The man's jawline and cheek bones were harsh enough to cut with. The stone gray irises and bushy black eyebrows were both traits that he had passed on to all of his children, even the girls.

This man, Zeff Elroy, was a Rainlord of Sair, and by extension, so too were all of his kin. Admittedly, Marcos didn't know what all that entailed, but he knew that it meant his father was important to the government in some way and that it was an honor to bear his name.

When Zeff's cool gaze fell upon his son, he offered the boy an acknowledging nod. "Marcos."

"Pa." He wished he could deliver such a simple greeting with as much gravitas. One day, maybe."

"593

"Did you have fun with your friends?" his father asked.

"Yes, ensir," said Marcos.

"Good. Go get cleaned up before dinner."

"Yes, ensir."

"Wait. Have you wished your sister a happy birthday?"

Marcos averted his gaze. "Ah..."

"That comes first, then."

He tried not to groan. "Do I have to?"

"Yes."

"But she hates me."

"Why do you think that?"

"Because she said so to my face."

"And did you perhaps do something to provoke her before she said that?"

"No, ensir," he lied.

Zeff knelt down to look his son in the eye. "Your sister does not hate you. She is merely different from you and the others. You should show your support for her, especially when she is having a difficult time. Understood?"

"Yes, ensir."

"Remember this, Marcos: an effective means of measuring a man's character is by observing how he treats his loved ones. See to it that you may not be measured as such and found lacking."

Someone should've told that to Cisco, Marcos thought. He held his tongue, however, and simply nodded. He watched his father walk away and then proceeded up the stairs.

Emy's room was on the third floor as well, across the hall from his own. Marcos knocked on the door.

"What is it?" came her voice.

"Uh, I was just wondering how you're doing."

There was a pause as footsteps stomped toward the door. She cracked the door open and looked through. "What?" As of today, she was still only two years older than him, but she looked like more than that. It was so unfair that girls got to mature more quickly than boys.

"Listen, I'm sorry about the frog. And the mouse."

"Mice," she corrected.

"Mice."

"And the roaches," she went on. "And the snake."

"Yeah, those too. Sorry."

She just eyed him doubtfully.

"And, uh--happy birthday?" Not a question, but he offered it like one.

"Thanks," she said flatly.

"But you know, the snake wasn't dangerous. You didn't have to freak out as much as--"

She slammed the door in his face.

He shrugged and moved on to his room."

"594 -- LXIX.

There'd been a stint in the past where part of the estate had been destroyed, which resulted in him having to bunk with Cisco temporarily. Needless to say, Marcos now fully appreciated his good fortune in having a room all to himself.

He washed his hands, dried his hair with a towel, and then made his way back downstairs.

Dinner was tenser than usual. For as long as Marcos could remember, their lord father had made a point of ensuring that the family always sat down and ate together, going so far as to ground any child who was late for the meal without good reason. It was a sacred time, often reserved for parental inquiries, but today was different. Emy's fourteenth birthday meant something special, something that everyone knew she was not looking forward to.

"You should just relax," said Cisco. "It's not even going to hurt."

Emy kept her eyes down at her plate as she said, "I don't expect you to understand."

Annoyance flashed across Cisco's face. "You're the one who doesn't understand. This is a good thing, you idiot."

"Francisco," said their mother, "do not speak to your sister that way. And Emiliana, do not scorn your brother's attempt to comfort you."

"Yes, enma'am," they both said.

Rare as it was, Marcos found himself in agreement with Cisco on this one. If he were in Emy's position, he would've been excited to finally be receiving a reaper. Even if it did mean dying.

Chapter Sixty-Nine: 'Thy bonds in blood...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

With the helium tank in hand, Zeff entered the center courtyard where the rest of his family was waiting for him. They all stood together on the small bridge over the pool as rain continued to fall, filling in the silence with a kind of pattering static. His wife held Emiliana's hand, who just looked pale as Zeff drew close. The other children stood nearby, but there was no one else around, as he had dismissed all of the family's attendants for the remainder of the evening. Excepting, of course, the four reapers who were also present."

"594 -- LXIX.

There'd been a stint in the past where part of the estate had been destroyed, which resulted in him having to bunk with Cisco temporarily. Needless to say, Marcos now fully appreciated his good fortune in having a room all to himself.

He washed his hands, dried his hair with a towel, and then made his way back downstairs.

Dinner was tenser than usual. For as long as Marcos could remember, their lord father had made a point of ensuring that the family always sat down and ate together, going so far as to ground any child who was late for the meal without good reason. It was a sacred time, often reserved for parental inquiries, but today was different. Emy's fourteenth birthday meant something special, something that everyone knew she was not looking forward to.

"You should just relax," said Cisco. "It's not even going to hurt."

Emy kept her eyes down at her plate as she said, "I don't expect you to understand."

Annoyance flashed across Cisco's face. "You're the one who doesn't understand. This is a good thing, you idiot."

"Francisco," said their mother, "do not speak to your sister that way. And Emiliana, do not scorn your brother's attempt to comfort you."

"Yes, enma'am," they both said.

Rare as it was, Marcos found himself in agreement with Cisco on this one. If he were in Emy's position, he would've been excited to finally be receiving a reaper. Even if it did mean dying.

Chapter Sixty-Nine: 'Thy bonds in blood...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

With the helium tank in hand, Zeff entered the center courtyard where the rest of his family was waiting for him. They all stood together on the small bridge over the pool as rain continued to fall, filling in the silence with a kind of pattering static. His wife held Emiliana's hand, who just looked pale as Zeff drew close. The other children stood nearby, but there was no one else around, as he had dismissed all of the family's attendants for the remainder of the evening. Excepting, of course, the four reapers who were also present."

"595

For Zeff, the reapers took on the appearance of overlarge bats--as big as hyenas and with similar faces but also bearing wings and glowing white eyes. They had a curious habit of hanging upside down just as normal bats might, only these ones didn't need to hang from anything, so they simply floated there in midair.

Among the four reapers here, there was one each for Zeff, his wife Mariana, and Francisco. The last would be the one to resurrect Emiliana.

As Zeff reached out to her, pressing the transparent gas mask toward her face, Emiliana suddenly began to tremble. "Mama, Papa, please!" she said. "I can't--! Please! Please don't make me do this!" She was already on the verge of tears and trying to pull away, but her mother held her firm.

A part of him wanted to chastise the girl. She didn't know how good she had it. Drowning was the original tradition, but having experienced it personally, Zeff decided to spare his own children that agony. He remembered his passing all too vividly. Panicked and terrible. In this very pool. Helium gas was nothing like that. Just as Francisco's had been, Emiliana's death would be peaceful and painless, like drifting off to sleep.

He wanted to tell her these things--things she already knew, had been told--but as he looked at her face, at the terrified expression of his baby girl, he found his heart slowly leaving him. He lowered the mask.

Everyone looked at him, the same silent question being asked. It was his own reaper who posed it.

'Zeff, what are you doing?' said Axiolis.

"We will wait a bit longer," said Zeff. He patted Emiliana on the head.

His wife did not look pleased. "Zeff," was all she said, and Zeff knew she would have said more if the children weren't present. Fortunately for her, Axiolis was more than happy to fill in.

'You shouldn't delay without good reason,' the reaper said. 'You're not doing the girl any favors by postponing things.'

Zeff chose to ignore him and instead eyed the reaper meant for Emiliana. "I apologize for the inconvenience."

"596

'No hurry,' said the other reaper. 'I'm plenty patient.' This one's name was Chergoa.

Zeff gave a grateful nod.

Marcos stepped up next to his sister. "Hey, if Emy doesn't want her reaper, then I'll take it."

Zeff exhaled an amused breath. "No, Marcos. Emiliana will still be receiving her reaper. Just not tonight."

The relief on Emiliana's face seemed to lessen at that, but she nodded all the same. "Thank you, Papa..."

"Francisco, see that everyone gets ready for bed," said Mariana.

"Yes, enma'am."

After returning indoors, they parted ways with their children. The long corridor with ribbed arches in the ceiling gave them plenty of time to speak as they walked toward the Main House's master bedroom, all four of the reapers following.

"You do know that it is not because she is merely scared, don't you?" said Mariana.

"Yes," said Zeff.

"She's not like her sisters. Gema and Ramira are both tomboys, but Emiliana is about as girly as girls come."

Zeff threw his wife an odd look--curious and amused by the way she put it.

"She wants to marry young and live quietly as a mother," Mariana went on. "She wants a different kind of life for herself--one without all the commotion that the name Elroy brings with it."

He took a deep breath. "I know."

"Then why are you humoring her? It would be better to just get it over with and disillusion her now."

"Because I am wondering if that is necessary."

They arrived at their room, and Zeff entered first while Mariana stopped in the doorway. "What are you saying?"

Zeff looked to Chergoa. "I know this is not what you bargained for, but would you allow Emiliana to live quietly if she were your servant?"

Chergoa unfurled her black wings. 'Uh. I suppose I could do that. But what do you think, Axiolis? You're the one who recruited me into this Vanguard business.'

All eyes turned to Axiolis, and for a while, the reaper just stared at Zeff. 'Frankly, I'm not pleased by the idea. Nor will the General be.'

"597

"The General is not Emiliana's father," said Zeff. "And neither are you."

'Yes,' said Axiolis, 'but I think the argument here is that you would be taking a reaper away from the Vanguard for personal reasons.'

"Chergoa has not joined the Vanguard yet," said Zeff.

'That may not matter.'

'Is it necessary for her to have a reaper at all?' asked Chergoa. 'If she is only going to live quietly, then why even bother with all this?'

'Because she is an Elroy,' said Axiolis in Zeff's stead. 'Even if she changes her name and moves far away from here, trouble might still find her one day.'

'Ah. So I would be her backup plan, then.'

"I would ask you to prepare her," said Zeff. "If she is forced to fight, I want her capable of protecting herself."

'I can do that,' said Chergoa.

‘And what does the Lady Elroy think of this?’ asked Axiolis. ‘Do you agree with your husband?’

“I think the heart of a teenager is fickle and uncertain,” said Mariana. “She may desire a quiet life now, but what will she want in five years? Or ten?”

“I don’t know, but I don’t want us to decide for her.”

“We decided for Francisco,” she said.

His expression darkened. “We also decided for Gema.”

Mariana’s face tightened, eyes narrowing a moment before looking away. “Gema made her own choices.”

“Only after we took away the one she wanted.”

The woman shook her head and sat down on their bed. “When did you become so indulgent?” she said, still not looking at him. “I thought I married a Rainlord.”

‘Rain isn’t always cold,’ said Axiolis, and Zeff was a bit surprised to find the reaper defending him.

So was Mariana, apparently. “I thought you were on my side.”

‘As a Vanguardian, I am. But as this man’s reaper, and as someone who considers your family my own, I do find your husband’s words convincing.’

Mariana sighed. “All this, because you can’t bear to see your daughter a bit frightened.”

Zeff merely folded his arms.”

"598

“Oh, very well,” Mariana conceded. “If that is your decision, then I will stand by you.”

“Thank you,” said Zeff.

‘So when would you like to perform the ceremony, then?’ asked

Chergoa.

"Tomorrow night," said Zeff. "That should allow more than enough time to explain the change in plans to her."

'Okay. I'll just haunt your neighborhood in the meantime.'

-+-+--+

David descended the long steps into the underbelly of the sterile white prison. As far as dungeons went, it didn't quite have the same medieval menace to it that he'd had in mind, but he supposed the eerie calm and cleanliness offered a different kind of discomfort.

Two guardsmen escorted him in silence, and he soon arrived in front of the designated cell with a transparent wall and a speaker box in the center. David hit the button on the right side to let his voice carry through. "Hello, Luther."

Luther sat up and tilted his head. "David. I was beginning to think you had forgotten about me down here."

"Oh, you will be getting plenty of attention soon enough."

"Ah. Am I to be executed, then? Given a farce trial, perhaps?"

"A trial, yes, but not for your execution. I'm told the prosecution will be seeking life imprisonment."

"Life imprisonment. Ha. That is an execution, too. Instead of a needle or a chair or an axe, it is simply a box and patience. In a way, it is much crueller--killing someone with time. Boring a person to death, taken literally."

"Shall I tell the prosecution you feel that way?"

Luther scowled and turned away.

"I thought not," said David.

"Why are you here?" said Luther. "To gloat?"

"Well..." David grinned. "Yes. That is exactly why I am here."

"Ugh." Luther shook his head in disgust. "I suppose this is what I get for acting so impulsively. I thought I saw a golden opportunity to eliminate all rivals. I should have known better."

“Indeed. It almost makes one wonder how you could be so foolhardy.”

Luther stared at him for a long moment. “Oh, you liar. You did come down here for another reason.”

“Did I?”

"599

“You came to observe my mood,” said Luther.

David smirked. “I am interested in your mood, am I? Dear brother, perhaps I should find you a larger cell. Your ego must be taking up so much room in this one.”

“Heh, I would not refuse the offer.” He stood and approached the clear wall, inspecting David’s face more closely. “But no, you are most certainly here to see how miserable I am. Because if I am not miserable, then you would begin to wonder why that is.”

“I would wonder that, yes. Are you miserable, then? Is there anything I can do to make you more so?”

“Knowing you, I am sure there is.” Luther pulled away and walked toward the other end of his cell. “What of our esteemed sister? She has not graced me with her presence.”

“I’m certain she will visit you eventually, but she has been rather busy of late. Cleaning up your mess, you understand.” There was a pause, and David almost expected Luther to crack some misogynistic joke about cleaning, but instead, the man merely asked a different question.

“And what about Meriwether?”

“What about him?” said David.

“He has yet to visit me, but if what you say is true about my stay of execution, then it would seem he has at least kept his promise to me.”

Briefly, David wasn’t sure what promise he was talking about, but then he remembered how Meri had managed to invoke Luther’s surrender. “Meri is a man of his word,” was all David said.

"I suppose I can no longer call him a fool."

"Not without being the bigger fool, no." As David expected, Luther was still unaware that their previous encounter had been a series of wild accidents. David was more than content with not correcting him.

Luther sat back down. "So what is your verdict, then? Am I hiding something?"

David was almost certain that he was. But instead of answering, he asked, "Are you not curious about your wife or your children?"

Luther paused. "Are they dead?"

"No, of course not."

"Damn."

"600

David squinted. "You hate them that much? Why?"

"Ask me that again after you have been married for seventeen years."

David could almost understand the man's hatred for his wife; that woman was a relentless ladder-climber, and to Luther, she probably embodied everything he despised about nobility. But still. "Your wife is one thing, but you even resent your own children?"

"I resent all insufferable nuisances."

David felt his irritation flare up, becoming true anger for a moment, and he couldn't keep himself from glowering.

"Oh, does that bother you?" said Luther. "Hmm. That is right, isn't it? You were always the affectionate uncle."

David breathed and wiped his expression clean again. "At least I can take solace in the fact that you are no longer part of their lives."

"On that, we can agree."

"There is hope for us yet."

That made Luther laugh outright, longer and more loudly than David had perhaps ever heard from him. Admittedly, that wasn't saying much, but it was surprising just the same. When Luther's voice settled again, a small period of silence elapsed. And Luther looked suddenly hollow, as if that laugh had gouged a hole into him. "I genuinely wanted to trust you, you know. You were the only one I liked."

David had nothing for him. Four dead brothers. Countless innocent lives lost at the hands of Abolish. For this man here, David could hold no pity.

"Why did you have to side with Helen?" said Luther. "When I think of what you and I could have built, I feel like weeping for this country."

David couldn't even bring himself to humor the man. "You are mad."

And there it was again, that look in Luther's eyes. The cold, flat stare. After a moment, however, it was gone once more. "Enough," he said. "Let us continue our game. Am I hiding something, or am I not?"

"Of course you are," said David.

"Correct. Would you like to know what it is?"

"Sure."

"Wonderful. Then I will give you a hint. If you give me something first, of course."

"Well, I have two candy bars on me. I am willing to part with half of one, but only if you promise to tell the truth."

"601 -- LXX.

"That is not quite what I had in mind," said Luther.

"Well, okay. I'll give you a whole bar--but only if you really promise to tell the truth."

"I wonder if you will still be so funny once you figure it out."

"I hope so," said David. "I like to think that an unbreaking sense of humor is the pinnacle of human integrity. Or at least useful for annoying one's opponents."

"I want a television," said Luther.

David almost said no immediately. The most dangerous thing about Luther was his political mind, so granting him access to a news source would be a mistake. But after debating it in his head a little more, David decided that he could work around that problem. With a deliberate bit of reluctance, he said, "I can do that."

Luther eyed him a moment, probably skeptical of how easy that was. "Television first. And a written agreement of exchange."

"Of course. I will speak to your lawyer and have everything sorted."

Chapter Seventy: 'O, abiding blade...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Following Her Highness around all day long was more exhausting than she thought it would be. It also didn't help that she still wasn't feeling her best, what with her ribcage throbbing whenever she took too large a breath. She tried not to let it show, though, and as far as she could tell, she succeeded.

The promotion to being the Queen's personal bodyguard had taken Lynnette by surprise. Moreover, Her Highness wanted her to continue wearing the white cloak as a symbol of the position, as the media had already latched onto it when she and Hector kidnapped King William--an act now known to the public as one of liberation. They'd taken to calling her the White Sword. Lynnette wasn't really sure what to make of it, but seeing as the Queen had already spun it to their advantage, there wasn't much left to do but just accept it. She wondered if it had felt this weird for Hector when people started calling him the Darksteel Soldier. She'd have to ask him whenever he woke up again."

"601 -- LXX.

"That is not quite what I had in mind," said Luther.

"Well, okay. I'll give you a whole bar--but only if you really promise to tell the truth."

"I wonder if you will still be so funny once you figure it out."

"I hope so," said David. "I like to think that an unbreaking sense of humor is the pinnacle of human integrity. Or at least useful for annoying one's opponents."

"I want a television," said Luther.

David almost said no immediately. The most dangerous thing about Luther was his political mind, so granting him access to a news source would be a mistake. But after debating it in his head a little more, David decided that he could work around that problem. With a deliberate bit of reluctance, he said, "I can do that."

Luther eyed him a moment, probably skeptical of how easy that was. "Television first. And a written agreement of exchange."

"Of course. I will speak to your lawyer and have everything sorted."

Chapter Seventy: 'O, abiding blade...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Following Her Highness around all day long was more exhausting than she thought it would be. It also didn't help that she still wasn't feeling her best, what with her ribcage throbbing whenever she took too large a breath. She tried not to let it show, though, and as far as she could tell, she succeeded.

The promotion to being the Queen's personal bodyguard had taken Lynnette by surprise. Moreover, Her Highness wanted her to continue wearing the white cloak as a symbol of the position, as the media had already latched onto it when she and Hector kidnapped King William--an act now known to the public as one of liberation. They'd taken to calling her the White Sword. Lynnette wasn't really sure what to make of it, but seeing as the Queen had already spun it to their advantage, there wasn't much left to do but just accept it. She wondered if it had felt this weird for Hector when people started calling him the Darksteel Soldier. She'd have to ask him whenever he woke up again."

"602

Over the course of the week, the Queen held a large press conference every single day, inviting a different batch of reporters each time. Lynnette attended all of them, as Her Highness wanted her to be a constant presence in the background. A few times, the media directed questions at Lynnette, but she decided to remain quiet and let Her Highness do all the talking.

The topic of Hector Goffe proved to be one of the most difficult. The Queen explained, repeatedly, that he was no longer a fugitive, that she considered him a national hero. Instead of trying to explain how the people Hector was accused of killing had been dead already, the Queen chose a simplified version of the truth: that their deaths were not his doing. Furthermore, she went on to flat out lie, saying that the people who falsely accused Hector were trying to prevent him from aiding her. And as the conferences continued and more detailed questions were asked, the Queen's tale grew rather elaborate. By the end, Lynnette wasn't sure she understood it all anymore, but apparently, Hector had been working under the Queen the whole time. The public never knew, of course, because it was a state secret, a matter of internal security.

"I gave him a mission," Helen was saying, "to discover who the architect of the plot against me was. He was unfortunately a bit too successful. They attempted to frame, imprison, and subsequently silence him. But obviously, they underestimated young Mr. Goffe. In spite of his age, he is not only strong--as you all well know--but also, intelligent and courageous, which is of course why I hired him in the first place. And after all that he has done for his countrymen, all that he has sacrificed, I want his true nature to now be made clear to all. I hope every single one of you--"

This would go on for a while. If nothing else, Lynnette had to appreciate the woman's ability to weave a tale.

Some journalists ate the story up. A horrid villain secretly being a noble hero certainly made for an exciting headline. Others were rather understandably more skeptical."

"603

Lynnette noticed that the Queen never mentioned anything about Hector's whereabouts or the fact that she was giving him the Gray Warren. Whenever someone asked where he was now, she would plainly refuse to answer, saying instead that he was well and would no doubt return to keeping people safe very soon. Hector would probably appreciate that, Lynnette thought.

The omissions didn't stop there, however. There were several things that the Queen never told the press. She said nothing of her own powers as a servant, attributing all her success in the past conflict to her subordinates. She never even brought up the existence of reapers in the first place--nor that of aberrations, Abolish, or the Vanguard. No doubt, the Queen felt these things would not only complicate the public narrative but also prove dangerous.

As for the origins of the Darksteel Soldier's superhuman abilities, that was actually not much of an issue for the press. Everyone already knew that powerful individuals existed in the world, so the Queen could get away with saying that Hector was simply born with his gifts. Even before Hector and Abolish had started making waves in Atreya, everyone had heard the ominous stories from abroad about terrible wars among the international superpowers, about their soldiers of insurmountable strength. It was always a kind of muted, distant tale, one that people told each other with an awful sense of hopeful doubt and weary helplessness. It was an unassailable constant, one that people simply learned to live with. Because there was no other choice. The world was big and frightening. There was no changing that.

Lynnette knew that she couldn't claim to be much different, herself. And after everything that had happened over these past few months, it seemed obvious to her that Atreya was still in immense danger. The immediate threat might have been gone, but the country was still in a state of flux, and the bigger perils out there now seemed even more imposing.

And behind closed doors, Lynnette could tell that Her Highness thought so, too."

"604

Since returning, Helen had not met with her council even once. Prince David had convinced her very quickly to dismantle it and rebuild from the ground up. Instead of doing it herself, however, she delegated the responsibility to him. David didn't seem particularly thrilled with the job but accepted it gracefully, and after he was gone, Lynnette saw the Queen putting the reapers to the very same task. They, of course, would be able to spy on everyone and report back to Her Highness with any candidates they deemed suitable for the positions.

It struck Lynnette as a bit odd--and a little devious--that the Queen did not inform Prince David of what the reapers were doing, but she supposed it never hurt to be cautious. Or maybe the Queen just wanted two independent lists to compare against each other. Whatever the case, it wasn't Lynnette's job to worry about such things. It was, however, her job to observe everyone closely, and Prince David had become someone who met with the Queen more frequently than anyone else.

And to Lynnette's eye, this was a good thing. Despite recent circumstances, terrible as they'd been, the good prince seemed to have a clear head about it all, and oftentimes, he brought a smile to Helen's face.

"And how is my beautiful sister on this fine evening?" said Prince David.

"I am well," she said from her desk. "And what about my intrepid brother? How are you?"

"I have certainly been worse, thank you for asking. Ah, and I see your bodyguard is still looking as stalwart and intimidating as ever."

Lynnette wasn't sure what made him say that. Maybe it was the eye patch. Maybe she should find a new one. A white one, like her cloak. Or maybe that'd only make it worse. She wondered where in the world she might find fashion tips regarding eye patches. Curiously, that didn't seem to be a big thing in magazines or on television.

"What brings you here?" said the Queen. "Have you finished your list, already?"

"Ha, not quite yet. I'm not a wizard, you know. These things take time."

"605

"So you have a more pressing concern?" the Queen asked.

"Yes," said David, "or at least, similarly pressing. I am worried about the AFA. I have been observing its movements for a while, and I believe I can say with some confidence now that it should be destroyed. It's filled with people who were loyal to Gabriel. Even with him gone it's still too dangerous to let those people retain their positions."

"Mm." Helen sipped from a fine blue tea cup. "You are worried they will now prove more loyal to Luther than to me, is that it?"

"There is that, yes, but more broadly speaking, I think the AFA is frankly too much of a wild card at this point. Even if those people don't choose to follow Luther, they could quite easily splinter off and form new rogue factions of their own."

"I see your point, but at the same time, we cannot simply dissolve the Agency of Foreign Affairs. It does serve a rather important role, when not plotting against me. We will certainly have need of it moving forward."

"True. Perhaps we should refurbish it, then."

"That is what I am thinking. But that would also require strong new management."

"Indeed. Not just someone who can bring potential traitors to heel, but also someone who can make use of them. Not an easy command, dearest sister."

"I might ask you to take the job, but..."

David gave a weary laugh. "Don't you think I have enough to do?"

"Do you have someone else in mind?"

"Your aunt. I believe she would serve admirably, and if not, then she could probably point you toward someone just as capable. Perhaps more than one person, even."

Helen frowned. "That woman. Yes, I suppose she would do very well there."

"Try to sound more enthusiastic when you offer it to her. Whatever you think of her, she did save Meri's life, and possibly my own."

"Yes, yes. And she is fiercely loyal to William. I will offer her the position soon."

"Thank you."

Their conversation went on for a while longer, and then David ventured off again."

"606

Not long after that, the Queen looked up from her reading. "Lynnette."

"Yes, ma'am?" she said, sitting up in her chair by the door.

"What do you think of my brother?"

Lynnette hesitated. "I'm not sure what you mean."

"Come closer," said the Queen, motioning to the chair on the other side of her desk. "Sit here."

Lynnette did so.

"Now tell me. You have been observing everyone around me over these past few days, yes?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"So what is your opinion of David?"

"...He seems like a good man. And intelligent."

"Is that all?"

She eyed the Queen, a bit reluctant to say any more, but after a moment, she decided to ask, "Do you not trust him?"

The Queen smirked. "I trust him very much. Why do you ask?"

"The assignment you gave him. You didn't tell him that you're having reapers do the same thing."

"Aha. Yes. And why do you think I did that?"

"Because you are secretly testing his loyalty."

"Correct."

"I don't understand why, though. If you trust him so much, then...?"

"Trust is not a switch that you flip on or off," said the Queen. "Trust is a currency, and everyone must earn it, myself included. The good thing about trust is that it gets easier to earn as you acquire more of it. The bad thing about trust is that once you lose it, it is very difficult to get back."

"Are you saying Prince David did something to lose your trust?"

"No. I believe David has a kind heart, but he hides it well. And that is precisely the problem. He is a very secretive man."

"Really?" said Lynnette. "I was under the impression that the two of you were quite close."

"When I was a child, that was the case, but the age gap between us was an obstacle. When I was eight years old, David was already seventeen and leaving for school abroad. And then, even after he finished school, he stayed away. In retrospect, I think I can understand his decision to do so. By the time I saw him again--really saw him again--it was eleven years later, and he was a stranger to me."

"607

"Did he change that much?" Lynnette asked.

"We both did," the Queen said. "I was about to marry William. My life was already upside down. And when I saw David, he was nothing like I remembered. He had grown... well, he had grown fat. There is no dancing around it. He ballooned up like an inflated pool toy."

Lynnette tried not to laugh. "Your Highness!"

"It was surprising," she went on. "But to my mind, that was not the real concern. He was so much less cheerful than I remembered, less happy. Thankfully, he is a bit better about that presently, but I do not think he ever quite found that old mirth again. I still wonder what might have happened to effect such a change in him. He has never told me. Or anyone, as far as I am aware."

"So you can't bring yourself to trust him completely as long as he is keeping things from you."

"Partly, yes, but I also find that it is best never to trust someone completely unless it is the only practical option remaining."

"I see."

A lull in the conversation arrived, and Lynnette thought it would die there, but the Queen posed another question before Lynnette could leave the chair.

"Why do you think I decided to give you this job?"

Lynnette found herself hesitating another time. The Queen had not deigned to speak to her this much in quite a while. "To be honest, Your Highness, I'm not sure."

"Do you dislike it?"

"No. But you could have returned me to the Queen's Guard instead of inventing an entirely new position for me."

"That might have been easier, yes. But frankly, you are too frightening for your old job."

Lynnette blinked. "Frightening?"

"Have you truly not noticed? Your mere presence unsettles most people, including your former comrades. Truthfully, you even unsettle me a little."

"Oh... I'm sorry. I didn't mean to--"

"I know. Do not worry. Rather, I should be the one to apologize. I have been taking advantage of that part of you. Having the White Sword on my arm helps me to appear strong in the public eye, you see."

"608

"My sword isn't even white," said Lynnette.

The Queen chortled. "Would you like me to force them to change the name via royal decree?"

"That would be amusing, but I suppose not."

The Queen took a moment before asking her next question. "What is your opinion of Hector?"

“My opinion? Your Highness, what do you mean?”

“I am merely curious what you think of him. You have spent more time in his company than I have.”

“Well, I think we are lucky to have him on our side.”

“A banal answer.”

“I’m not sure what sort of answer you’re looking for...”

“Tell me something I do not already know about him.”

“Um... I doubt I know any more than you do.”

“As I recall, you spent an entire week alone with him in an underground bunker. Are you saying you learned nothing else about him in that time?”

“When we weren’t training together, he mostly kept to himself. He’s not exactly the most talkative person.”

Helen exhaled a breath. “And neither are you, it would seem.”

Lynnette just returned a flat expression.

A beat of silence passed as the Queen observed her. “Do you have a boyfriend?”

Lynnette pursed her lips together on one side. She was no longer uncertain where Her Highness was going with this conversation. Momentarily, she wondered if stabbing the Queen would still be considered treason as long as she knew the woman couldn’t die from it.

“Lynnette, please stop looking at me like that. It is a harmless question.”

“You are usually more subtle than this, Your Highness.”

“I would rather not have to play word games with you as well.”

She sighed. “...I do not have a boyfriend.”

“Ah. Girlfriend?”

“No, ma’am.”

"I see."

She could practically see the gears turning in the Queen's head.
"Hector is a bit young for me, don't you think?"

"Oh, are we talking about Hector again?"

"Your Highness, please."

The Queen laughed. "He is sixteen, yes? And as I recall, you are nineteen? Hmm, I suppose you have a point. Three years makes a big difference at your age."

"609

"I'm glad you agree, ma'am. And I'll thank you to never bring it up again."

The woman smiled wryly a moment, then looked to her side and laughed.

"Did Mehlsanz say something?" said Lynnette.

"Yes, she said--"

"Tell her I said to shut up."

The Queen laughed again. "She heard you."

"Why the sudden interest in my love life, anyway?"

"Mostly to tease you, I suppose."

"Gee."

"Also, I am trying to have a bit of forethought. I told the media that Hector works for me, but of course, he does not. Nothing binds him and Garovel to Atreya other than good intentions. They have no investments here."

Lynnette's brow depressed. "So that's why you gave him a castle? It wasn't to reward him?"

"It was both. There are two things required in order to form a truly enduring alliance with someone. The first is an amiable relationship, and the second is a shared investment. Without either one, any alliance can be easily compromised when difficult times inevitably come calling, and unfortunately, those are the times when you will need that alliance the most.”

“Your Highness... honestly, that is a bit disgusting. With respect, you do know that there is such a thing as too much scheming, don’t you?”

“Lynnette, if I were truly ‘scheming’ to pair the two of you up, you would not be aware of it.”

“...I’m not sure that makes me feel any better, Your Highness.”

“No? My apologies, then.”

“And you say I’m the frightening one...”

There wasn’t much time left for conversation, and soon, the Queen was off again to another meeting, this time at the Ministry of the Interior on the other side of Sescoria. The majority of the talks concerned reparations for the extensive physical damage that the country had seen of late, especially that of Belgrant Castle. Admittedly, Lynnette couldn’t follow a lot of what was being said and eventually just stopped listening--that is, until the Queen started to raise her voice and then went on to fire several people in front of the entire assembly.”

"610

During the ride back to the palace, when they were alone again, Lynnette asked, “Are you sure that was wise, Your Highness? Didn’t you just make a lot of new enemies?”

“They were already my enemies,” said Helen. “They were embezzling disaster relief funds. I would have preferred to imprison them, but I currently have no physical proof of their misconduct--only Garovel’s word.”

“Why not wait until you could gather proof, then?”

“They threatened to go after me in the media, unless I granted them more funding today.”

“Wow. You’d think they’d know better than to mess with you by now.”

"These are times of political upheaval. Corruption and betrayals are to be expected. They probably believe that if they do not gain an advantage now, I will eventually destroy them."

"They are probably right."

"I have a special place in my heart for those who steal from disaster relief. I think I will sic David and Meriwether on them. With any luck, they will be in prison before they can find jobs elsewhere. If not, perhaps I will ask Hector for a favor."

"Heh."

"Speaking of Hector, I believe he is leaving for the Gray Warren tonight. Shall we go bid him farewell?"

"I thought he was still sleeping," said Lynnette.

"He is, but Garovel will awaken him for us."

Lynnette was still hesitant from earlier. "Please, tell me you're not... trying to... mgh..."

"Ha. I can go by myself, if you would prefer. We may not see him for quite a while, however."

Lynnette just grumbled under her breath.

"I hope I have not accidentally jaded you to the idea. You should not let me influence your feelings in either direction. I was only teasing you before. Truly."

"I'll try to keep that in mind, ma'am."

When they arrived at the palace again, it was still a while yet until Hector was slated to leave, and the Queen of course had more business to attend to. Lynnette couldn't help being slightly distracted through it all, and by the time they went to visit Hector, she was annoyed by the anxiety she'd let build up in her chest."

"611

They found Hector in his guest room, already awake for them.

“Ah--hello, Your Majesty. And Lynn.”

“We wanted to say farewell before you left,” said the Queen.

“Oh, I see.”

And a long silence followed, wherein Lynnette could only assume that one of the reapers was speaking. Then the Queen went over to talk to Hector’s mother.

Lynnette shook hands with Hector. She wore gloves now, just like he did, only hers were a bit bulkier as they were meant to conceal the bone gauntlet on her left hand. “Looks like this is goodbye for now,” she said.

“Yeah... I’m, uh. I’m kinda sad to be going. I’ll miss everyone.”

“Heh. My family will probably want to come visit you sooner or later.”

“Ah--y-you think so? That’d be awesome! Oh, but, uh--you should hold off on that. This... Warrenhold place sounds, uh... kinda sketchy, so...”

“Right.”

“I need to make sure it’s safe to have guests and... yeah...”

“Well, you have my cell number.”

“Y-yeah. Same to you. Call me if there’s, like... uh... if you guys want my help, I mean.”

“Of course.”

Lynnette looked toward the Queen, but the woman was apparently busy talking to one of the reapers now. She turned back to Hector, who could not meet her gaze, as usual. She felt an awkward tension welling up and decided to rebel against it with the first thing she could think of. “So they’re calling me the White Sword now, apparently.”

“O-oh, that’s... huh. But your sword isn’t even white...”

“That’s what I said.”

“Ah--it sounds cool, though. Makes more sense than mine, at least. I mean, uh... I don’t think ‘darksteel’ is even a real thing.”

"Mm. You think they just chose that because you're black?"

"I hadn't really thought about it, but... now that you mention it... Hmm. Kinda sounds a little racist now..."

She laughed at that. "Sorry."

"I guess 'darksteel' is better than 'blackmetal.' That just sounds like a... funky type of music or something."

"Yeah."

"Coulda been a lot worse, really," said Hector. "Coulda called me, like, the Negro Vigilante."

"Oh, geez, no."

"Or the Darkey Knight."

Her eye widened, and she snorted a sudden laugh. "Wha--?! That's terrible!"

"Ah--too much? S-sorry..."

She just kept laughing."

"612 -- LXXI.

--1st Anniversary Special (day 1/7, page 2/4)--

Hector smiled and looked at Lynnette as her voice died down. "You... y-you, uh... you have a... ah..."

She tilted her head at him, waiting.

"Ah--your... uh... um..." Unfortunately, this time, he reached critical mass and turned away from her again, unable to pull any more words out.

"What were you trying to say?" she asked.

"I-I don't know. Just, uh. N-nevermind."

Her expression tightened. "C'mon, tell me. What were you going to say?"

“Nothing. Really. Just. N-nothing.”

She was now convinced that it definitely wasn't nothing. He'd been talking just fine a second ago, so what the hell changed? “Seriously, just tell me.”

He fell completely silent.

At this point, she was becoming annoyed. She raised her hand and let a bit of purple creep out the back of her glove. “Hector, don't make me wring it out of you.”

Hector's eyes widened. He met Lynnette's gaze evenly. And then he ran out of the room.

She blinked after him, open-mouthed and dumbstruck. He'd actually fled? For a moment, she genuinely considered giving chase.

Hector's mother and the Queen both took notice and came over. “What happened?” the Queen asked.

“I don't know!” said Lynnette. “Or--wait, was that a reaper emergency or something?”

“No. I was talking to Garovel when Hector suddenly left.”

“Then what the--?! Ugh! I can't believe he really just did that!”

Mrs. Goffe had a question as well. “What in the world did you say to him?”

“More like, what did he say?” Lynnette shook her head and eyed Mrs. Goffe. “Please tell your son that the next time I see him, I really am going to wring the answer out of him.”

Chapter Seventy-One: ‘Thine unassailable walls...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘Wow, Hector. And here I thought you were getting better at talking to people.’

‘Shut up, Garovel!’

‘Seriously, what the fuck was that about?’

‘Nothing!’

‘Remarkably, I remain unconvinced of that.’

‘Shut up!’

‘Well, stop running already.’

‘Is she behind me?!’

‘Lynn? No.’

Hector slowed to a walk, looking over his shoulder as he arrived at the palace’s east entrance. When he saw people were staring at him, he pulled down on the brim of his hat and tried to settle his heartbeat.”

"612 -- LXXI.

--1st Anniversary Special (day 1/7, page 2/4)--

Hector smiled and looked at Lynnette as her voice died down. “You... y-you, uh... you have a... ah...”

She tilted her head at him, waiting.

“Ah--your... uh... um...” Unfortunately, this time, he reached critical mass and turned away from her again, unable to pull any more words out.

“What were you trying to say?” she asked.

“I-I don’t know. Just, uh. N-nevermind.”

Her expression tightened. “C’mon, tell me. What were you going to say?”

“Nothing. Really. Just. N-nothing.”

She was now convinced that it definitely wasn’t nothing. He’d been talking just fine a second ago, so what the hell changed? “Seriously, just tell me.”

He fell completely silent.

At this point, she was becoming annoyed. She raised her hand and let a bit of purple creep out the back of her glove. "Hector, don't make me wring it out of you."

Hector's eyes widened. He met Lynnette's gaze evenly. And then he ran out of the room.

She blinked after him, open-mouthed and dumbstruck. He'd actually fled? For a moment, she genuinely considered giving chase.

Hector's mother and the Queen both took notice and came over. "What happened?" the Queen asked.

"I don't know!" said Lynnette. "Or--wait, was that a reaper emergency or something?"

"No. I was talking to Garovel when Hector suddenly left."

"Then what the--?! Ugh! I can't believe he really just did that!"

Mrs. Goffe had a question as well. "What in the world did you say to him?"

"More like, what did he say?" Lynnette shook her head and eyed Mrs. Goffe. "Please tell your son that the next time I see him, I really am going to wring the answer out of him."

Chapter Seventy-One: 'Thine unassailable walls...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

'Wow, Hector. And here I thought you were getting better at talking to people.'

'Shut up, Garovel!'

'Seriously, what the fuck was that about?'

'Nothing!'

'Remarkably, I remain unconvinced of that.'

'Shut up!'

'Well, stop running already.'

'Is she behind me?!'

'Lynn? No.'

Hector slowed to a walk, looking over his shoulder as he arrived at the palace's east entrance. When he saw people were staring at him, he pulled down on the brim of his hat and tried to settle his heartbeat."

"613

--1st Anniversary Special (day 1/7, page 3/4)--

'Really?' said Garovel. 'You're not going to tell me what that was?'

'...Where's my bike?' said Hector.

The reaper was gracious enough to point him in the right direction.

'C'mon, Hector. You know you can tell me anything.'

'I... I know I can. But that doesn't mean I want to.'

'Oh, it's like THAT, is it? Well, damn. What'd she do? Touch your arm unexpectedly? Accidentally breathe within three meters of your face?'

'Hey, Garovel, I've got an idea. How about you go fuck yourself?'

'So hostile. You know you're just making me more curious now, right?'

'Ugh...'

He found his way to the parking garage and decided to wait there for his mother to catch up. It took a while, but when she arrived, she had a small escort of two with her. There was an elderly woman in a faded rainbow dress and a rather tall black man in a white-and-blue guardsman's uniform.

His mother stopped in front of him and stared. "I'm not even going to ask what that was about back there. Lynnette is upset with you, though. She asked me to tell you that."

"Ah... oh..." He figured it best to just take his mother at her word and move on. "W-who are these two?"

The old woman stepped forward to introduce herself first. "Amelia Carthrace," she said, offering Hector a wrinkly handshake, which he eventually took. "At the Queen's behest, I am here to help you manage your affairs from now on. Pleased to make your acquaintance, young man."

The guardsman took his turn next. "I am Jamal Easton. A call went out looking for people to work for the Darksteel Soldier. Seems I was the only one who answered."

Hector looked between the two of them. "Um... I don't, ah..."

"Hector, just go with it," his mother said. "I'm sure we could use the help right now. From the sounds of it, the Queen has gifted you quite the white elephant."

He glanced at Garovel, who just shrugged. "O-okay. Do you guys know the way to this Warrenhold place?"

"614

--1st Anniversary Special (day 1/7, page 4/4)--"Yes, sir," said Jamal. By the look of him, he was in his late twenties and quite solidly built. Rather than a sword like Lynnette, however, the man wore a holstered gun on his hip. "I would be happy to lead the way for you."

It struck Hector as more than a little odd to be called sir by this person. Still, he nodded gratefully. "Th-thank you. Please do."

The three of them piled into the adjacent SUV and pulled out of the palace's garage while Hector followed on his motorcycle. Ms. Carthrace asked him if he would not prefer to simply ride with them so that they could discuss various things along the way, but Hector politely refused. There would be plenty of time for discussion after they arrived.

Slashes of pink and orange painted the evening sky as he rode out into the city. It would be a rather long trip to Gray Rock, he knew, which of course meant that Garovel would have plenty of time to keep bothering him. Even so, Hector recalled a particular something that he wanted to ask the reaper about.

'So, um... I've got a question...'

'Oh, imagine that.'

‘What did you call it? The thing that Harper did?’

‘Pan-rozum.’

‘Yeah. Could you explain that more, maybe?’

‘I could, maybe. If you tell me what made you run away from Lynnette, that is.’

Hector thought about it. ‘...I don’t wanna know that badly.’

‘Oh, come on! I have to tell you about pan-rozum!’

‘Oh well... I guess I’ll just be unprepared in the future. No big deal.’

‘Y’know, you can be a real dick sometimes.’

‘Ah... sorry.’

‘Tch.’ Garovel paused, perhaps gathering his thoughts. ‘Pan-rozum is a hyper state. It is achieved when the reaper and servant merge their souls together via a very high synchronization.’

‘Ah... so it’s not something that you and I can do.’

‘Of course not. It’s not even something that Harper should really be doing, and he has to be at least twenty-five years old as a servant by now.’”

"615

--1st Anniversary Special (day 2/7, page 1/4)--

‘So what does pan-rozum actually do?’ said Hector. ‘Just make the servant faster and stronger?’

‘No. That was a byproduct of Harper’s ability being what it is. Pan-rozum allows the user to assimilate attributes of different ability types. For a brief period of time, that is.’

‘Eh... I’m still not sure what you mean...’

‘Well, for instance, Harper was able to meld the properties of his alteration ability with that of both the transfiguration and the integration types. He took the bodily attribute of transfiguration, as well as the conversion attribute of integration.'

'Uh...'

'In other words, pan-rozum allows a servant to break down the barriers between the different types of abilities and merge them together. That's how Harper's ability could change from just manipulating light to... actually BEING light.'

'Wait, what? You're saying Harper converted his body into... light particles or something?'

'Basically, yes. And not just that, either. Thanks to the integration attribute, he was also able to restore his body back to its original state afterwards, and that's not easy. In fact, nothing about that is. The whole thing is a ridiculous accomplishment. I'm still a bit awestruck, I guess. The amount of training that the two of them must have done... If Harper's really only a servant of his twenties, then that is absolute madness.'

'Couldn't he have joined the Vanguard later, like after being a servant for a while?'

'Possibly. It's uncommon for servants to wait so long to pick a side, but yeah. He does seem to have a special arrangement with his rank, too, so maybe you're right.'

'Hmm.'

'Honestly, with pan-rozum activated, Harper's ability is one of the strongest I've ever witnessed.'

Hector blinked at the long stretch of road ahead of him. 'Really? Three thousand years, and Harper's one of the strongest EVER?'

'That I've personally seen,' Garovel reiterated. 'But yes. I'm not sure you understand the caliber of warrior you've just met and fought alongside. He may be the fastest human being who has ever lived. The speed of light is pretty much the top of the mountain on that one.'"
"616

--1st Anniversary Special (day 2/7, page 2/4)--

'It kinda seemed like Harper was just teleporting around,' said Hector.

‘Well, yeah. As far as human perception is concerned, there would be no difference.’

‘That power is pretty crazy... I mean, how could anyone ever defeat something like that?’

‘I don’t know. You did pretty well against it, though.’

‘Yeah, because he was holding back. If he’d wanted to kill me instantly, he could’ve at any time.’

‘True. At least for now, Harper’s pan-rozum is far from perfect. I think Darsihm is still unconscious from the exertion.’

‘Why’d it affect Darsihm so much more than Harper?’

‘The reaper is the focal point of pan-rozum’s merge. It tends to demand more from the reaper, mostly because it’s just such a complex amalgamation of powers. It’s up to the reaper to make all the chosen attributes fit properly into place so that the newly realized power works as desired. The servant’s job, on the other hand, is more to just accept the power without exploding and killing them both. Which, y’know, is also kinda important.’

‘Eesh...’

‘Also, I should probably mention that pan-rozum isn’t necessarily for everyone.’

‘Meaning?’

‘Meaning, depending on what a servant’s ability is, pan-rozum might not even be that useful. Harper’s ability just happens to work ridiculously well with it, so don’t go thinking it’s always as powerful as that.’

‘Mm.’

‘But there are other hyper states which might suit different people better. For instance, there’s pan-forma, which--’

‘Eh--uh--sorry to interrupt, but, uh, why don’t you save that for another time? I barely even understand what you just said about this pan-rozum shit, so... m-maybe just hold off on lecturing me on all this other stuff that isn’t, uh... I mean, it’s not immediately relevant, right? So...’

'Well, fine. I didn't wanna explain it to you, anyway.'

'Yes, you did.'

'Yes, I did.'

'You love explaining things.'

'Hell yeah, I do.'

Hector laughed.

'And why shouldn't I love it, huh? You get to learn things. I get to sound smart. Nobody gets murdered. Everybody wins, really--I mean, when you think about it, it's pretty awesome.'

"617

--1st Anniversary Special (day 2/7, page 3/4)--

'Were you, like, a professor or something way back when you were alive?' said Hector.

'Not quite.'

'What was it like, living back then?'

'It was shit.'

'Aww, why?'

'Medicine was shit. Technology was shit. Society was shit. Everything was shit wrapped in more shit with an extra shit sandwich in case you were still hungry for more shit.'

'...So wait. Was it shit?'

'Eh, it was okay.'

He chuckled inside his riding helmet. 'I can't tell if you're joking. You've never really told me anything about your past.'

Garovel paused. 'Yeah. Well. Maybe I'll tell you some other time.'

'Why not now? It's gonna take a while to reach Gray Rock.'

'My time spent alive did not make for a pleasant story.'

‘Oh... so it really was shit, then.’

‘Unfortunately, yes.’

‘Why was it so bad?’ said Hector. He waited, and when Garovel didn’t answer, he added, ‘No specifics, then. Just tell me the general stuff.’

‘Like what?’ said Garovel.

‘I don’t know. Like, where were you born? What civilization are you from?’

Garovel was slow enough to respond that Hector was about to ask something else when the reaper finally said, ‘Across the ocean. I’m not sure what the land there is called now, but I think these days, you call my old people the Lyzakks.’

The name actually rang a bell. Hector remembered learning about the Lyzakks in school. He couldn’t recall very much, for the lack of attention he’d paid, but he did know that the ancient civilization was mostly remembered for its brutality. And there was something else-- something about how they’d crossed the ocean and invaded the continent or some such thing.

He wanted to ask Garovel about it, but he hesitated. He wasn’t sure how keen the reaper would be to talk about them, but he figured that Garovel would just come right out and say so if he really didn’t wish to. ‘Uh... didn’t the Lyzakks launch an invasion a long time ago?’

‘I was dead way before that, but yeah. I’m a little surprised you know of it.’

‘Er, so am I.’”

"618

--1st Anniversary Special (day 2/7, page 4/4)--

‘Funny you should bring that up,’ said Garovel. ‘That happens to be one of my favorite pieces of history.’

‘Really? Why?’

‘Well, see, the Lyzakks came to Eloa some 2800 years ago, and as soon as they landed, they stormed across the continent and seized control of everything they saw. Then they reached the center of Eloa and came upon the Armans--the so-called "people of the rain." The Armans stopped the Lyzakks cold, didn't let them take another step west.'

'I guess you're not a fan of the Lyzakks, huh?'

'They were assholes who enslaved millions of people and forced them to fight in their armies for them. The fact that the Armans stopped them was a wildly unprecedented event of the time. Up to that point, the Armans had been a peaceful people, and on top of that, they were insanely outnumbered.'

'So how'd they win?'

'Well, they didn't win. They only forced a draw. But yes, it was remarkable nonetheless. They accomplished it by being incredibly clever. See, they had plenty of warning about the Lyzakks burning across the continent, but rather than flee or prepare tribute for an immediate surrender, the Armans decided to just booby-trap the FUCK out of everything in their land.'

'Oh, geez...'

'It. Was. Amazing.'

Hector shook his head but couldn't help smirking.

'And horrible,' Garovel added. 'Absolutely brutal and terrible. But also completely ingenious. See, most of the Armans lived in the lands where it always rains. Not just frequently or consistently in small amounts. It pours and floods all the damn time. And they turned that into their most potent and infamous trap. They built these dams everywhere and then hid their work, so when the enemy arrived, they would see areas that were clear and dry, seemingly suitable for safe passage or for setting up camp. Then the trap would spring, and they would lose hundreds or even thousands of men to a flash flood.'

'Wow... uh... That's pretty fucked up.'

'Yeah. It was. But the Armans successfully defended themselves from a vastly superior force--and not just once or twice, but dozens of times.'"

--1st Anniversary Special (day 3/7, page 1/4)--
'Did they eventually make peace?' Hector asked.

'Oh yeah. And what was even better was that, by the time the Lyzakks finally lost their war-boner with the Armans, the Armans had already developed into quite the fearsome people. In the beginning, it'd started with just making traps, but as things drew out, they buckled down and got to work learning how to fight, lead, sabotage, and all that good stuff.'

Hector couldn't help laughing. 'So I'm guessing this isn't exactly an unbiased version of events you're giving me...'

'Well, I do feel bad for all the slaves the Lyzakks took, because a lot of them died in the fighting; but when I think about the Armans and everything they did to defend their families and their lands, I really get pulled over to their side. Broadly speaking, that is.'

'Right.' And Hector thought Garovel was done talking about the subject, but after a beat, he realized how wrong he was.

'But anyway, like I was saying, when the Lyzakks decided that they didn't wanna fuck with the Armans anymore, they tried to just leave them alone and pick fights with some other people. But it was too late for that. Everyone else on Eloa had rallied around the Armans already, so wherever the Lyzakks went, the Armans would come over and fuck their day up. It was really great. The Lyzakks had no choice but to just calm the hell down. And after peace was made, the Armans and all their constituents consolidated their power into one huge group, and that's how the Mohssian Empire came about, controlling the whole western half of Eloa for two millennia. Which includes modern day Atreya, by the way.'

'Yeah, I know where Atreya is, thanks. I did manage to make it through third grade, at least.'

'Just saying,' laughed Garovel. 'Anyhow, the Lyzakks gradually turned into the Valgan Empire, and they of course controlled the eastern half of Eloa, but not for quite as long. Regardless, the Mohssians and the Valgans became the primary cultural divide on this continent. I think Sair is the only modern day country that has both of those old bloodlines in large quantities.'"

--1st Anniversary Special (day 3/7, page 2/4)--

'Why only Sair?' said Hector.

'Oh, I don't know. I doubt there's a simple answer to that question. It was where the Armans and Lyzakks first clashed, so maybe that has something to do with it.'

'Hmm.'

'After the two big empires fell, though--that's when things got complicated.'

'Oh, right. Because up until then, everything had been so simple.'

The reaper laughed again. 'Comparatively, yes. The Mohssians gave rise to all these small countries like Atreya and Rendon. It's why, even to this day, you can travel all over western Eloa and never need a translator.'

'We all speak Mohssian, yeah. They don't all speak Valgan in the east, though, do they?'

'Nope. A lot of them do, but they've got a handful of younger languages, too. I believe our friend Karkash spoke one of them.'

'Ah... him.'

'He didn't talk much, but I'm fairly sure that was a Vaelish accent I heard. That, and he looked the part. I think Stoker may've as well, but his clothes were pretty ragged when we found him, and his accent wasn't nearly as strong.'

'I guess that means Abolish is operating in Vaeland?'

'Could be. Easy to believe, too. Vaeland was one of the most dangerous places in the world a few years ago.'

'Gah...' There came a lull in the conversation, and knowing that they still had a good hour or two before they reached Gray Rock, Hector was a bit afraid that Garovel was about to bombard him with still more history lessons, so he tried to steer the conversation elsewhere. 'Uh...

do you know anything else about this Warrenhold place? I forgot to ask before.'

'Not really. I only talked to Voreese about it a little. She mentioned it being even older than Atreya itself, but that's it. She said she would come visit us there a day or two after we arrive.'

'Hmm. Was it just me, or did she seem kind of suspicious when she was telling us to choose the place?'

'Heh. Maybe.'

'You were suspicious, too, actually... You accepted her request pretty easily.'

"621

--1st Anniversary Special (day 3/7, page 3/4)--

'She made me curious,' said Garovel. 'I think you're right, though. I'm guessing there's something in Warrenhold that she doesn't want to talk about in front of Mehlsanz and the Queen--or possibly Harper, because he's Vanguard.'

'What would she want to hide from them?'

'Don't know. I have a few guesses, but I'm hoping for a nice surprise.'

'You couldn't just ask her while no one else was around?'

'I was busy helping the Queen out. And besides, I like surprises, remember?'

'Ugh.'

'Eh, I trust Voreese's judgment. She wouldn't try to surprise us with some pile of horseshit. Probably.'

'If you say so.'

After that, Garovel went back to talking about history, but Hector found it hard to continue listening. As soon as he realized that he was beginning to drift off to sleep, he politely asked Garovel to stop so he could concentrate on the road. The reaper begrudgingly obliged.

When they finally started drawing close to Gray Rock, Hector followed the SUV ahead of him down a side road for a while until they eventually pulled over. Jamal got out and showed Hector the forking path in front of them, the problem being that one of the roads was closed off. Jamal pulled the orange barricades aside as he explained.

"We're nearly there," he said. "A rock slide left the road ahead blocked, but that shouldn't be a problem for you, right?"

"Uh... I-I guess so."

Amelia laughed as she came up behind them. "It seems we are already going to get a demonstration of our young lord's strength."

Hector gaped at her. "L-lord?"

"Of course," she said, blinking. "Were you not told of your accompanying title?"

"Eh... I don't think so..."

"You are the acting Lord of Warrenhold. Or the acting Lord of the Gray Warren, I suppose. Whichever name you prefer. Personally, I like the prior."

"Oh... uh. I guess that... would make sense."

It didn't take much longer to reach the obstacle that Jamal was talking about. There'd been several more roads connecting along the way, and it seemed that this one was the only path forward. It cut through a small hill, wherein a wall of gray boulders now stood in evening darkness."

"622

--1st Anniversary Special (day 3/7, page 4/4)--

Flashlight in hand, Hector eyed the blockage and scratched his head. The rocks at the top were bigger than he was, bigger than his motorcycle, even. "Why wasn't this ever cleared away?" he asked.

Madame Carthrace was the one to answer. "From what I have read, there simply was not enough interest in doing so. Warrenhold isn't famous enough to be very attractive to tourists, and no one has lived there for nearly forty years. Only historians have ever broached the subject of reopening it, but they have never been able to secure funding.”

“I hear it’s an eyesore,” his mother added.

“Yes, I have heard that as well,” said Amelia. “The surface is supposedly a ruin, but the vast majority of the castle is underground. No one has visited since the earthquake, however, so we may come to find that in ruins, also.”

“Great,” said Mrs. Goffe. “Is it haunted, too? Because that would just be icing on the cake.”

Amelia bobbed her head. “There are certain rumors about it.”

“Wonderful.”

“I would not worry about it very much,” said Madame Carthrace. “Any old house that has fallen into disrepair will be seen as an ill omen by some people. Superstitious nonsense, it is.”

‘I like this lady,’ said Garovel.

Hector sensed irony in there somewhere but decided to ignore it. He stretched his arms as he eyed the boulders again, considering how he should approach the problem. Garovel grabbed his shoulder and sent the rush of vigor through his body. Hector wasn’t sure he would need it, though, and simply pressed his hands against the cracked pavement.

Iron grew at the base of the rock wall, weaving through the tiny cracks in its haphazard foundation. He added onto it from the bottom, creating a platform that lifted the whole wall. The weight of the rocks resisted him, demanding much more concentration than any simple platform he’d ever created. He forced it up, and suddenly, one of the giant rocks at the top jostled free and fell toward him.

Hector caught it with both hands, further cracking the pavement beneath his feet. He threw the boulder to the other side of the road, away from everyone. But his aim wasn’t so great. The rock hit a large tree, bounced off, and crushed his motorcycle.

He stared at his work. ‘...Did that really just happen?’

‘It sure did. Good job.’”

"623 -- LXXII.

--1st Anniversary Special (day 4/7, page 1/4)--

'Dammit, I really liked that one,' said Hector.

'Well, maybe it still runs.'

The tree fell on top of the boulder, hammering the motorcycle into the ground. A busted wheel bounded over to Hector and fell at his feet.

'As a unicycle,' said Garovel.

Hector was a bit more careful after that. The blockage went rather deep. He had to raise up ten separate platforms, annihilating holes through them and turning each one into the next section of a large iron tunnel, but eventually, he reached the other side. He wasn't wholly satisfied with this as a permanent solution, though. It would do for now, but he was resolved to come back later and see about removing all the rocks so that he could annihilate the tunnel. That, and he'd have to clean up the pieces of his bike, anyway.

He rode with everyone else the rest of the way, but it only took a few minutes. They passed under a tall gatehouse that had lost its pointed apex, which now lay stuck in the ground by the side of the road.

And finally, they arrived at a clearing and were granted a view of the castle. The central structure seemed largely intact, but it only rose two floors above ground. There were six pallid towers around it, but they had all crumbled to a single story, save one lone champion at the back which still boasted a good four or five floors.

They reached what seemed to be the main courtyard. Everyone exited the vehicle together, and Hector found wild grass and weeds grown to knee-height. Jamal began pulling gear out the back of the SUV-- floodlights, most notably.

"Where shall we begin?" said Amelia.

Hector took a deep breath and exchanged looks with Garovel.

Chapter Seventy-Two: 'Gentle rain, learn well...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Her father had not put the ceremony off a second time. Emiliana was a servant now, and the whole world seemed different somehow. She'd retreated back to her room, happy to finally be away from everyone. Except for this reaper, unfortunately. From the end of her banana-colored bed, she looked at Chergoa with uncertainty."

"623 -- LXXII.

--1st Anniversary Special (day 4/7, page 1/4)--
'Dammit, I really liked that one,' said Hector.

'Well, maybe it still runs.'

The tree fell on top of the boulder, hammering the motorcycle into the ground. A busted wheel bounded over to Hector and fell at his feet.

'As a unicycle,' said Garovel.

Hector was a bit more careful after that. The blockage went rather deep. He had to raise up ten separate platforms, annihilating holes through them and turning each one into the next section of a large iron tunnel, but eventually, he reached the other side. He wasn't wholly satisfied with this as a permanent solution, though. It would do for now, but he was resolved to come back later and see about removing all the rocks so that he could annihilate the tunnel. That, and he'd have to clean up the pieces of his bike, anyway.

He rode with everyone else the rest of the way, but it only took a few minutes. They passed under a tall gatehouse that had lost its pointed apex, which now lay stuck in the ground by the side of the road.

And finally, they arrived at a clearing and were granted a view of the castle. The central structure seemed largely intact, but it only rose two floors above ground. There were six pallid towers around it, but they had all crumbled to a single story, save one lone champion at the back which still boasted a good four or five floors.

They reached what seemed to be the main courtyard. Everyone exited the vehicle together, and Hector found wild grass and weeds grown to knee-height. Jamal began pulling gear out the back of the SUV-- floodlights, most notably.

“Where shall we begin?” said Amelia.

Hector took a deep breath and exchanged looks with Garovel.

Chapter Seventy-Two: ‘Gentle rain, learn well...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Her father had not put the ceremony off a second time. Emiliana was a servant now, and the whole world seemed different somehow. She’d retreated back to her room, happy to finally be away from everyone. Except for this reaper, unfortunately. From the end of her banana-colored bed, she looked at Chergoa with uncertainty."

"624

--1st Anniversary Special (day 4/7, page 2/4)--

To Emiliana’s eyes, the reaper was a glowing blue wisp, a kind of floating ball of cerulean flame. With eyes. And a mouth.

She didn’t like it at all.

But apparently, they were supposed to become friends now.

Chergoa hovered around the room. ‘You really like the color yellow, don’t you?

It was true. Emiliana’s room was distinctly brighter than anywhere else in the house for that reason. She especially liked sunflowers. The one standing in a vase at the foot of her bed was easily the most precious ornament in her room. She used to have a second one, as her lord father had given her two for her seventh birthday, but Marcos ruined that like he did everything else.

She wasn’t interested in telling any of that to Chergoa, however. “Why did Mama and Papa choose you?” she asked instead.

‘A good first question. They chose me because I am an old friend of your father’s reaper, Axiolis.’

“Is that all?”

‘Understand that they did not pick me lightly. They are entrusting their beloved daughter to me, and that is no small thing. Despite my friendship with Axiolis, your parents still corresponded with me for over a year before they became convinced that I would be a suitable partner for you. Us reapers are already rather difficult to come by, but when family is concerned, it is best to be extra picky. Wouldn’t you agree?’

“I guess so...”

From there, Chergoa explained at length about how the regeneration would work, how the enhanced strength would work, and how their souls were now bound together. Emiliana, more or less, knew all of this already, but she just listened quietly until the reaper was done talking.

“Mama said you wouldn’t make me join the Vanguard.”

‘That’s right. Your father asked me to let you live whatever life you wanted for yourself.’

“And you agreed to that?”

‘I did.’

Emiliana breathed. “Thank you...”

‘I will still be making you train, however. That is not up for debate.’

Emiliana wasn’t exactly thrilled, but she supposed she couldn’t complain.”

"625

--1st Anniversary Special (day 4/7, page 3/4)--

‘I hear you are already dreaming about marriage,’ said Chergoa. ‘Is that true?’

Emiliana just averted her gaze, unsure how to answer that.

‘Fourteen is a bit young to be focusing on that, don’t you think?’

She would have liked to tell the reaper that it wasn’t any of her business, but unfortunately, it very much was. Emiliana understood that their lives were bound together now, and throwing a fit about it wouldn't do any good. Her mother had certainly made sure to hammer that much into her.

Still, she found it difficult to say anything. Of course fourteen was young. She was under no illusions that she was older than she really was. But that didn't change the way she felt.

'Hmm,' the reaper hummed, suddenly with the echo that indicated privacy. 'Could it be that you already have someone in mind?'

Her eyes widened, and for a moment, she forgot to breathe.

'Ah. Is that really how it is? You can tell me. I promise not to tell anyone else without your permission.'

Emiliana blushed and looked at the ivory carpet. "Yes..."

'Who is it?'

She exhaled a heavy breath. "Don't make me say..."

'Do you know if they have feelings for you, too?'

"I... I believe he does..."

'Hmm. Is there a significant age difference?'

"Ah... well... he is two years older than me."

The reaper paused. 'It's not Cisco, is it?'

"What?! No! Cisco is my brother!"

'Just checking.'

"That's disgusting!"

'Is it one of Cisco's friends?'

Emiliana abruptly lost her fervor.

'Oh boy. And Cisco doesn't know, I take it?'

"If Cisco found out, I'm afraid he would kill him..."

'His reaper wouldn't let him do that. Might let him break a few of the boy's bones, though.'

Emiliana just frowned.

‘Don’t worry. I’m not going to tell them. If this boy really is such a big part of your life, though, then I would like to see him.’

“Okay...”

‘Does he have a reaper as well?’

“No. But he does know about them... I think Cisco showed off to him once, maybe.””

"626

--1st Anniversary Special (day 4/7, page 4/4)--

Chergoa set her to meditating not long after that. It wasn't Emiliana's first time doing so; her mother occasionally made her do it in the past as practice. The woman seemed to think it good exercise for young people. Emiliana wasn't the only one of the Elroy children to have considered it a waste of time, but it was different now. This was the real thing.

After a while, the meditation put her in the mood to sleep, which was good because there wasn't much left of the evening, anyway. She went to bed, a little nervous about what the next day would bring, but she drifted off soon enough.

In the morning, she readied herself for school and was displeased to find her bras had become uncomfortably snug again. This was the third time in as many months, and dammit if it wasn't unsettling. The rest of her body wasn't growing nearly so quickly. For once, she was grateful for living in a place where it rained all the time, because at least it gave her an excuse to wear bulky clothing.

Then again, she'd heard that boys liked large breasts, so maybe this was good? She hoped that was true, because right now, these damn things just made her feel like a freak. And worse, a lot of the other girls at school seemed to resent her, too, as if she had any control over it. Or maybe they disliked her for other reasons. She couldn't tell anymore. After all, she wasn't the only one going through changes. When did everything get so confusing?

Honestly, if it weren't for her two best friends, she didn't know what she would have done. They were so much more adult than she was-- maybe not so much physically, but definitely mentally. They'd always been able to take things in stride and make light of stuff that would have bothered her. Unfortunately, though, she didn't think she should talk to them about her latest problem. Becoming undead probably wasn't something they were equipped to advise her about, and if they became scared of her... No, it definitely wasn't worth the risk."

"627

--1st Anniversary Special (day 5/7, page 1/4)--

Emiliana attended the same secondary school as Cisco, who had recently gotten his license and was now able to drive them. Back on her first day here, she'd quickly discovered that her brother had a reputation as a bully, which made her a bit reluctant to be seen with him. On the other hand, she found that it also made people she didn't like leave her alone. And after a while, she realized that she didn't really think Cisco could be a bully, either. It was probably just some misunderstanding. That would be more like the brother she knew. He wasn't really mean--just a bit brusque and harsh, most of all towards Marcos, but of course, the little brat deserved it as far as she was concerned.

Chergoa followed her to school as well. Maybe this was just for their first day together, though, because Cisco's reaper wasn't following him around.

Emiliana got through the beginning of the day normally enough, thankful for the routine of it all. Chergoa often wandered off to have a look around and perhaps see what Cisco was up to. It wasn't until they broke for lunch that the next moment that Emiliana had been dreading arrived. Being two years younger, she didn't share any classes with the boy of her affections, but she did share the same lunch period.

His name was Alex Belos, and he was sitting on the other side of the refectory. Emiliana remained with her two friends, but she stopped listening to what they were saying as Chergoa wandered closer to look at him. Thankfully, at least, Cisco had a different lunch period and wasn't sitting right next to him.

'Hmm,' said Chergoa privately. 'I thought he'd just be some pretty boy, but he definitely isn't.'

Emiliana squinted. 'What are you saying?'

'Nothing. Just that I figured a girl your age would go for someone more... handsome.'

'What?! He is very handsome!'

'Eh.'

She wanted to yell, but that would have made a scene, so she settled for a curt breath as her expression of disgust. 'You don't know what you're talking about.'

"628

--1st Anniversary Special (day 5/7, page 2/4)--

'I guess he's alright,' said Chergoa, 'if you're into horsefaces and big foreheads. Handsome in the non-traditional sense, maybe.'

'Shut up! You're an idiot, oh my god!'

'So defensive. You really do like him, huh?'

Emiliana growled under her breath until she realized that wasn't very ladylike. The odd looks from her friends may have had something to do with it as well. She made the excuse that she'd just been trying to clear her throat, which they seemed to buy, more or less.

'What's so great about him, anyway?' asked Chergoa.

She'd been expecting this question for a while. 'He's sweet, thoughtful, gentle, kind, handsome, and smart.'

Chergoa laughed. 'You sure came prepared, didn't you? How do you know that he really is all of those things, though?'

'Because he has been friends with my brother for five years, and I have known him just as long.'

'That doesn't really answer the question.'

'Ugh. You want specific examples?'

'I suppose not. His true nature should be apparent enough if I observe him when he thinks no one is watching.'

'That's... that's horrible. You shouldn't invade his privacy.'

'Shouldn't. But I'm still going to.'

'I'm telling you not to!'

'Good thing I'm the boss in this relationship, then.'

'Agh!'

'He's not even your boyfriend yet, is he?'

'N-no... but...'

'But what?'

'I'm supposed to meet him after school today.'

'Ooh. Why?'

'He said he wants to give me a birthday present.'

'Your birthday was two days ago.'

'Yes, well, we didn't have school two days ago.'

'Sounds fishy. Maybe I should tell Cisco and have him meet you there.'

Her eyes widened. 'Don't!'

'Only teasing.'

'Agh...'

'It's not like Alex could do anything to you, anyway. For his own sake, I hope he doesn't try anything.'

'He wouldn't do something like that.'

'You sound convinced.'

Emiliana returned to listening to her friends. Or tried to. They were talking about the upcoming biology exam, which she wasn't especially interested in. Not because it was boring, but rather because she wasn't worried about it. Biology was one of her best subjects. As usual, they asked her to help them study for it, and she just kind of nonchalantly agreed."

"629

--1st Anniversary Special (day 5/7, page 3/4)--

For the remainder of the school day, Emiliana could hardly focus. She'd been anxious all weekend, wondering what exactly Alex was going to say to her or what his present would be; and now that it was so close to time, it was almost too much for her. Combined with all this talk of dreaming about marriage and her parents letting her live how she wanted, Emiliana's imagination started leaping away from her, wondering what she would do if Alex asked her to marry him. Of course he wouldn't. Not today, surely. But eventually? Was that possible? What would their lives be like? She could be a mother and--

'So how much do you know about your heritage?' asked Chergoa.

The question came out of nowhere and yanked Emiliana back down to Eleg. It took her a moment to realize that the reaper was probably just bored with her geography teacher's lecture and trying to make conversation. 'Why do you ask?'

'Of all the houses and bloodlines in this country, only ten of them are "Rainlords."'

'There are more in Intar.'

'That's true, but the Rainlords of Sair are considered the purest descendants of the old Arman people. I'm just wondering what that means to you.'

Emiliana hesitated. 'Honestly? It doesn't mean much to me at all.'

'Oh?'

'I know I'm probably the only one in my family to think so, but... Elroy is just a name. My ancestry doesn't matter to me.'

'Hmm.'

'What do you think?' Emiliana asked. 'You're ancient and wise, aren't you?'

'Well, I don't think a bloodline makes someone "destined for greatness" or what have you, but I wouldn't go so far as to say that your ancestry is irrelevant, either.'

'Why? I genuinely don't understand what the fuss is about.'

'It has less to do with you individually and more to do with how people see you.'

'Well, that's their business, not mine.'

'And of course, there's also the fact that your family name has given you an overwhelming advantage in life. I hope you're not so spoiled that you don't even understand how privileged you are.'

'I know that.'

"630

'That's what everyone says,' said Chergoa.

Emiliana stiffened her brow. 'What do you want me to say?'

'Something convincing. The Rainlords and Sandlords of Sair are the oldest living bloodlines on Eloa. Your father is granted a seat on the Council of Lords in addition to being a Captain of the Vanguard. If that doesn't mean much to you, then I would wager that you do not, in fact, understand how privileged you are.'

Emiliana rolled her eyes and returned to observing the teacher's presentation. The man was busy talking about the Gulf of Emerson, theorized to be the result of a megathrust earthquake that cut through the continent some ten thousand years ago.

It was one of the rare moments in this class that wasn't just about memorizing the names of cities and countries. She didn't see much point in a geography course when she could look places up on her phone whenever she wanted--or even pull up a map of the entire planet in a matter of seconds. Maybe that was just the "annoying teenager" part of her brain, but this class really did seem like something that only an old person would consider important.

Probably not a thought she should share with Chergoa, she figured.

Finally, her last class let out, and she grabbed her lemon umbrella and made her way around to the far end of the gym. She walked fast. Cisco was supposed to drive her home, so if this took too long, he would start wondering where she was.

She spotted Alex waiting for her beneath an overhang. With a knot in her chest, she approached him.

He smiled at her. "Hi."

She returned one of her own. "Hi."

"Thank you for coming."

"Of course."

At the sudden awkward silence, she couldn't help growing a bit impatient. "Is everything alright?" she asked.

"Sorry," he said, "I'm waiting for one more person."

Her smile waned. She was about to ask who he meant when someone rounded the corner and she saw that it was Cisco."

"631

Emiliana's breath caught, and she turned to Chergoa.

'Hey, don't look at me,' the reaper said privately. 'I didn't tell him. Your boyfriend here obviously did.'

"So what's all this about?" said Cisco. His reaper still wasn't with him. Dennex was always rather dutiful about going out and reaping souls while Cisco was occupied with school.

Everyone's attention was on Alex now, and he shrunk a little, seemingly under Cisco's gaze the most. "I wanted to ask you... well, I wanted to ask her if she would go on a date with me--"

"Excuse me?" said Cisco, while Emiliana's eyes lit up.

--but I want her brother's blessing as well," said Alex. He rummaged through his pocket and pulled out a silver locket, holding it up for them both to see. "A token of my sincerity. So you know that I'm not--"

Cisco grabbed the boy's wrist. Alex flinched.

"Cisco, don't!" said Emiliana.

Cisco eyed the locket. He opened it with his other hand but didn't take it from Alex. There was no picture inside. Not yet, at least. He cocked an eyebrow at his sister. "You like this guy?"

She nodded furiously and with gritted teeth, said, "Don't hurt him!"

Cisco released him and then stared at the both of them with those steely eyes of his. That face owed so much to their father, more so than any of the other Elroy children. His hair, on the other hand, had been taken from both parents. It had their mother's waves and their father's jet blackness. If Cisco ever bothered to run a brush through it, his hair might have been quite appealing, but apparently, he preferred looking like an unkempt beast.

"No," said Cisco.

"What?" said Emiliana.

He stared at her. "No. He's not even brave enough to date you without seeking my permission first. I bet the only reason he asked us both to come is because he was worried I would beat his ass and wanted you here to stop me."

"That's not true!" she said. "Right?"

Alex's face scrunched up, and he just kind of shrugged.
"632 -- LXXIII.

Admittedly, that did dampen her enthusiasm a bit, but she was determined now. "Well, I don't need him to be brave," she said to her brother. "I only need him to be kind and sweet and thoughtful--which he is."

"Yeah!" said Alex. "I'm super nice!"

"Listen," said Cisco. "Alex, you're my friend, and I like you, but you are not a good match for my sister, and I'd rather you stay away from her."

Alex immediately nodded. "Well, okay, if that's how you feel--"

“Shut up, Alex,” said Emiliana. “You don’t need my brother’s permission to date me.”

“That’s true,” said Cisco, making them both blink at him. “But he asked for my blessing. I’m only telling him that I’m not going to give it.”

“So, wait,” said Alex. “If we start dating anyway, then... you’re not going to murder me in my sleep?”

Cisco took his time answering. “Of course not. Don’t be silly.” His words didn’t match the threat on his face and in his voice. “I would never hurt you. You’re my friend.”

“I’m glad that’s settled.” Emiliana took the locket from Alex and enveloped one of his arms with both of hers.

“Eh... y-yeah...”

“Where should we go for our first date, then?” she asked.

“Uh... I was thinking a movie, maybe...?”

“Great! When should we go? How about tonight?”

“Er--if you want, I guess we could--”

“By the way,” interrupted Cisco, “now that she’s fourteen, Emy has a reaper, who will probably be spying on you whenever you think no one is looking. Have fun with that.”

“Cisco!”

‘Hey!’ said Chergoa. ‘It’s no fun if he knows I’m watching! You’re only supposed to ruin your sister’s good time, not mine!’

Alex just gave a nervous laugh.

Chapter Seventy-Three: ‘O, guarded promise...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Luther was relegated to one corner of his cell while the maintenance man worked. Soon, he would have his television, just as David had promised.

David was also present, seated on the other side of the glass and observing the installation. The person seated next to him--Luther recognized her immediately. He'd never actually learned her real name, but the white cloak and sword on her hip told Luther all he needed to know."

"632 -- LXXIII.

Admittedly, that did dampen her enthusiasm a bit, but she was determined now. "Well, I don't need him to be brave," she said to her brother. "I only need him to be kind and sweet and thoughtful--which he is."

"Yeah!" said Alex. "I'm super nice!"

"Listen," said Cisco. "Alex, you're my friend, and I like you, but you are not a good match for my sister, and I'd rather you stay away from her."

Alex immediately nodded. "Well, okay, if that's how you feel--"

"Shut up, Alex," said Emiliana. "You don't need my brother's permission to date me."

"That's true," said Cisco, making them both blink at him. "But he asked for my blessing. I'm only telling him that I'm not going to give it."

"So, wait," said Alex. "If we start dating anyway, then... you're not going to murder me in my sleep?"

Cisco took his time answering. "Of course not. Don't be silly." His words didn't match the threat on his face and in his voice. "I would never hurt you. You're my friend."

"I'm glad that's settled." Emiliana took the locket from Alex and enveloped one of his arms with both of hers.

"Eh... y-yeah..."

"Where should we go for our first date, then?" she asked.

"Uh... I was thinking a movie, maybe...?"

"Great! When should we go? How about tonight?"

“Er--if you want, I guess we could--”

“By the way,” interrupted Cisco, “now that she’s fourteen, Emy has a reaper, who will probably be spying on you whenever you think no one is looking. Have fun with that.”

“Cisco!”

‘Hey!’ said Chergoa. ‘It’s no fun if he knows I’m watching! You’re only supposed to ruin your sister’s good time, not mine!’

Alex just gave a nervous laugh.

Chapter Seventy-Three: ‘O, guarded promise...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Luther was relegated to one corner of his cell while the maintenance man worked. Soon, he would have his television, just as David had promised.

David was also present, seated on the other side of the glass and observing the installation. The person seated next to him--Luther recognized her immediately. He’d never actually learned her real name, but the white cloak and sword on her hip told Luther all he needed to know."

"633

“I am surprised our sister lent you her pet just for this,” said Luther.

“I’m sure she was merely concerned for your safety,” said David. “If you escaped out there into the world, who knows what might happen to you?”

“Ah, so if I were to escape, you are saying that this young lady here would not immediately hunt me down and cut me in two?”

David glanced at her a moment, then smiled at Luther. “I doubt she would need to kill you in order to subdue you. But then again, I have been wrong before. Feel free to give it a try.”

“Hmph. Can she not speak for herself, this one?”

"I am sure she is a lovely conversationalist, but I did not request her company for her verbal skills."

"Perhaps she simply knows better than to talk to us snakes," said Luther. "Smart girl."

The look she gave him was distant, as if she were hardly even paying attention, like Luther wasn't even worth her time. In a way, it was more frightening than if she'd been glaring at him. And more irritating.

The maintenance man finished up and exited the cell. Luther stood to inspect his work. Rather a small screen, he felt, and placed a bit too high up for his liking, but it had all the channels he wanted, which was the most important thing. He looked around. "No remote?"

"You can change it by hand," said David.

"Agh. This must qualify as cruel and unusual punishment, surely."

"You have your television. I have held up my end of the bargain. Hold up yours."

Luther put on a frown. In truth, he was a bit relieved. He'd expected David to come up with some kind of clever catch, but this was just petty nonsense. And he was perfectly fine with that. "Very well. A hint is all I promised--and for this meager display, that is certainly all I will give."

"Out with it, then. If your hint bears fruit, then perhaps this meager display will change."

"634

With all his spare time lately, Luther had been thinking carefully about what type of hint he should give his brother. He could simply lie, of course, but that would no doubt kill any further attempts to barter. Worse, it might even make David refuse to speak with him again, and given that Luther would probably be stuck down here for quite some time, David's traitorous company was one of the few things he actually looked forward to. Not that he could ever let David know this. It would only give the man an advantage.

So he had to tell David something, at least. And he knew what. "The hint, then. The extra precautions I took before the night of my undoing, as it were. I will only tell you that it has to do with money.”

“Ah.” David rubbed his beard. “I suppose that is a satisfactory clue.”

“Unless you give me something else, you will get nothing more from me,” said Luther.

“Okay,” said David. He stood and reached into his vest pocket. He pulled out a small remote. He hit one of the buttons.

The screen on Luther’s television turned to gray static.

Luther folded his arms. “Have you forgotten? You signed a written agreement, and one of the stipulations--”

--“Was to ensure that you be given certain numbered channels, yes. I read it quite thoroughly; I assure you. But if you look closely, you will see that I did give you those channels. For instance, channel six--” David flipped over to the specified channel, wherein the picture returned. “See? You requested this one in particular, and here it is.”

Luther stared at images of an animated sheep walking on two legs through a very boxy-looking city.

“Normally, channel six is merely a boring network with daily soap operas and nightly news programs,” said David. “Fortunately, I knew you would not be interested in any of that, so instead, I had a special receiver installed in your television, and now your channel six is twenty-four hours of cartoons.””

”635

“You--” tried Luther, but David wasn’t done.

“And here, channel eight--oh. Non-stop infomercials. Always something interesting there. Then you have your channel for music videos, your channel for food, your channel for wildlife. And of course, I made sure to include several religious networks as well--I know how pious you are, so I’m sure you will enjoy those. Ah, and my favorite: the crackling fireplace. I am not even sure what you would call this channel, but I find it very soothing.”

Luther just shut his eyes and rubbed his forehead. What a bastard, David was.

Mariana wasn't very fond of unexpected visitors. Perhaps she'd just spent too many years in places where such visits only ever meant that someone had come to kill her. Marriage and children had not softened her in that regard. If anything, they had made it worse. Or better, depending on one's viewpoint. All of her children knew how to hold, fire, and clean a few different types of firearms--even Ramira, who was nine years old.

So when the guards out front radioed in with the message that some woman was requesting to see her and Zeff, it was no coincidence that the first thing Mariana did was slide the speaker box over and reveal a hidden recess in the wall. A handgun lay there, and she grabbed it. It wasn't loaded, of course, but that was why she always carried a spare magazine around with her.

'Would you relax?' said Shenado.

There was a very simple answer to that question, but Mariana decided not to be rude. To her eyes, Shenado and Axiolis were both darkly orange foxes. Each had multiple tails that flickered with ethereal fire, just like their burning eyes.

The speaker box still worked fine in its new position, and Zeff asked the guards, "Does this woman have a name?"

A pause, and then, <"She says it's Salazar. Says you know her.">

Zeff blinked at his wife.

'It's been fifteen years,' said Axiolis. 'What's she doing here?'

Mariana pressed the button and told the guards, "Let her in.""
"636

Juliana Salazar had always been unpredictable for as long as Mariana had known her, so it made a certain amount of sense that the woman would just show up unannounced like this. She was loud, obnoxious, and way too easy-going.

She was also a general of the Vanguard's ground forces, as well as Mariana's previous commanding officer.

As Mariana recalled, the first thing that anyone noticed when they looked at Salazar was her hair, and fifteen years later, she saw that had not changed as Salazar strode into the welcoming chamber with a rainbow falling around her face. On anyone else, Mariana imagined it would have looked ridiculous, but on Salazar, somehow, it seemed all too fitting.

Salazar's reaper followed in behind her. Armengél was this one's name, and even through the filter of perception that was every reaper's appearance, he still managed to look dour. His flaming eyes rounded down, as if sullen about something, but Mariana knew that was just the way he usually was.

The rainbow woman smiled that giant smile of hers as she saw Mariana. "There you are! Oh, and Zeff! How are you?!" She didn't wait for any responses and just moved in for a big hug.

Mariana still had her gun but was able to endure the hug without using it. "We are very well. What brings you here?"

"Why, you, of course," said Salazar. "No offense, but Aguairey isn't exactly my ideal vacation spot. We wanted to talk to you."

'About what?' said Shenado.

"Oh, lots of things. Got any snacks? I could go for some snacks."

Mariana exchanged glances with her husband before waving to the butler by the door. The man scurried off, and they moved their conversation into the next room where they could all sit down on the cushioned furniture with silver embroidery.

'Nice house,' said Armengél. 'You steal it?'

"No," said Mariana. "It's been in Zeff's family for generations."

Salazar clicked her tongue. "Oh, that's right. We never did visit you after the wedding. Always meant to."

"I imagine you were very busy," said Mariana.

"Aren't we all?" said Salazar."

‘It’s always nice to see a friendly face and have a pleasant chat,’ said Axiolis, ‘but I get the impression that’s not really why you’re here now.’

‘It does seem odd that the two of you are traveling alone,’ said Zeff.

‘Why?’ said Salazar. ‘Is it dangerous here?’

‘Even with your level of strength, someone as important as you should have some kind of security detail,’ said Zeff.

That left the General quiet, but after a moment, Armengél responded for her. ‘There aren’t that many people we trust right now.’

‘Why?’ said Mariana.

‘Let’s table that question for a bit,’ said Salazar. ‘There are some other things we should discuss first.’

‘Do go on, then,’ said Shenado.

The butler chose that moment to arrive with the aforementioned snacks, which further delayed the discussion between the three servants as Salazar politely complained that there wasn’t anything alcoholic. The reapers, however, continued talking while Mariana and Zeff just listened.

‘In terms of raw manpower, the Vanguard is stronger now than it has ever been,’ said Armengél. ‘Twenty years ago, we hardly had five thousand active servants, but now we have ten times that. In the past year alone, we’ve gained over three thousand new recruits--many of them, reapers who have never taken on a servant before and therefore require considerable direction.’

‘Startling numbers,’ said Axiolis. ‘Abolish must not be pleased. This business with aberrations has only ended up reinforcing our cause.’

‘Poetic justice for not upholding the Old Law,’ said Shenado. ‘If they keep allowing their pets to break neutrality agreements, Sai-hee might even start helping us out.’

‘You’re being too optimistic,’ said Salazar now that the butler had ventured off again. ‘It’s nice to imagine that the enemy’s plan has blown up in their face, but that’s not exactly the case here, unfortunately.’

‘Explain,’ said Shenado.

“As Armengél said, the Vanguard is larger than ever,” said Salazar. “Too large, in other words. Bloated. And still growing. All these new recruits--who’s to say some of them aren’t Abolish spies?”

‘That is why they are vetted,’ said Axiolis.

‘Which, at best, is a difficult process,’ argued Armengél.”
"638

“Many of the reapers joining us have been in isolation for ages,” said Salazar. “They’ve never chosen a side, because they’ve never needed to. Most of them originally died long before it was common practice for governments to record any meaningful details about the lives that their citizens lived. And as floating, imaginary beings, it’s easy to live beneath everyone’s radar, so a lot of the time, the only thing we have to go on is word-of-mouth: what reapers tell us about each other. And that’s not much.”

‘It’s a simple matter for Abolish to sneak agents in as one of these “unknown” reapers,’ said Armengél.

“The Vanguard may be larger than ever, but it is definitely not stronger,” said Salazar. “It’s disorganized, and corruption has taken full advantage of that.”

Zeff’s gaze hardened. “Corruption? That is a bold accusation, General Salazar.”

“No, it isn’t,” Salazar said flatly. “The Vanguard has always had its share of eccentrics and troublemakers. I’m sure you’ve met plenty of them. They’re valuable assets, but they thrive in chaos. And they make it worse.”

Mariana found herself in agreement there, at least.

Armengél hovered behind his partner, nodding deeply. ‘Ideally, we would slow down the recruiting process in order to give ourselves time to adjust, but saying that now is like telling a dog to chew its food more.’

At the ensuing discomforted silence, Salazar’s expression lightened again. She grabbed a rice cake from the tray beside her and took a bite. "Have any of you heard of the Vahgrakaanas?" she asked.

The word was familiar, but Mariana couldn't place it. She didn't need to, though.

'It's a group of five rogue servants, all of moderate fame,' said Shenado. 'And the name. Vahgrakaanas. It means 'vagrant lords' in Old Mohssian.'

"That's right," said Salazar. "They're still small and comparatively weak, but they're capitalizing on the times and gathering clout right now. A lot of people suspect that they're trying to become a fourth major player, equal to the Vanguard, Abolish, and Sai-hee."

'Five deserters, is what I've heard,' said Axiolis. 'From both the Vanguard and Abolish, supposedly. Not sure I believe that, though.'

"It's true," said Salazar. "But they won't be five for much longer. Because I will be the sixth.""

"639

"What are you saying?" said Zeff. "You intend to abandon the Vanguard?"

'Yes,' affirmed Armengél.

"Come with us," said Salazar.

Mariana could hardly believe what she was hearing. "What? You must be joking."

Salazar looked over everyone again, settling on Mariana. She had a rare gaze, this woman, thanks to her heterochromatic irises. Deeply brown on the left and brightly hazel on the right. "We've been thinking, lately, about who we trust the most," she said. "Shenado and Mariana here came to mind. Maybe things've changed after all this time, but I remember you two being some of the most uncompromising individuals I have ever known. And yes, that made you a pain in my ass on more than one occasion, but it also helped me trust you when things went bad--as they often did."

Armengél nodded. 'We don't know your husband quite so well, but the Elroys are renowned for their sense of duty, and if you were willing to marry him, then it's a fair bet that he is trustworthy.'

'How can you spout such traitorous nonsense?' said Axiolis. 'You're genuinely asking us to leave with you? Just like that?'

"We know it is sudden," said Salazar. "And we know you have a family to think about. Bring them with you. We will keep them safe. We won't force them to fight for us, either."

Shenado seemed more shaken than anyone. 'Why are you leaving? Only because you fear a bit of corruption in our ranks? You're a general! You say the problem facing us is organizational, but aren't you in a position to change that?'

"We've tried," said Salazar. "It's too late."

'That's not good enough!' said Shenado. 'What about Sermung?! Have you even lost faith in him?!'

"Sermung is the most powerful person in the world," the General said. "I still have faith in him. And in three of the top eight. Sanko, Lamont, Jackson. But everyone else? I don't know. And that's not enough anymore, because I no longer have faith in what they've built. I can't tell if the Vanguard is crumbling, but I know that it is at least changing. And not for the better.'"

"640

'You really think the situation is that bad?' said Axiolis.

"When was the last time either of you went on a mission?" the General asked. "Three months? Longer? You're isolated out here, because you have children. But once they're grown, the Vanguard will return you both to active duty, and you'll be lucky to see them once or twice a year."

Mariana was unfazed by her words. "That is what it means to serve."

'You were right when you said that we were uncompromising,' said Shenado. 'That has not changed. In fact, after everything you've just said, we should take you captive and turn you over to our own general.'

That remark left a stinging silence in its wake. For a time, no one moved.

Salazar smiled through the ill atmosphere. "Well, before you do anything you'll regret, allow me to remind you that we are guests in your home. And as you mentioned earlier, we came here alone--which we didn't have to do. We could have brought several followers with us, but we chose not to out of courtesy, respect, and peaceable intentions for you and your family. I would expect the honorable Elroys to not trample on our goodwill." She held up her rice cake. "Not quite a 'shared meal,' but I believe it still captures the spirit of hospitality."

Mariana saw her husband nod.

"That's what I like about you Rainlords," said Salazar. "Observers of the old customs. You take your promises seriously."

"Yes, we do," said Zeff. "Which should tell you that we will not be breaking the ones we have made to the Vanguard, either."

"I figured as much," said Salazar. "But I want you to know that there is no time limit on this invitation. If you change your mind one day, seek me out."

Shenado shook her head. 'I can't believe you're deserting. And why join the Vahgrakaanas, anyway?'

'For the freedom,' said Armengél. 'Even if we managed to get accepted into Sai-hee's exclusive little club, we still wouldn't be able to do what we want.'

"641

Mariana's brow lowered. "And what is it that you want to do?"

"Only to survive and continue protecting people," said Salazar.

'By working with Ex-Abolish,' said Shenado.

"Well, I didn't say it was ideal."

Mariana glowered. The more she thought about it, the less she was surprised by Salazar's decision. There was a reason this person was Mariana's previous commanding officer. When she married Zeff, the couple had been confronted with a choice, because a Vanguardian family was not allowed to have split allegiances. It was either Zeff's commanding officer or Mariana's. And it was not a difficult decision for her. Rather, it was one of the things that had motivated her to finally tie the knot with Zeff.

The memory of that old mission was abruptly vivid in Mariana's mind, a mission that had shaped over a decade of conflict to follow.

The president of Vaeland had only just won his election by a small margin, and his first act was to outlaw the practice of slavery. Noble, perhaps, but foolish, because he did not have the strength to support it.

And so the Vanguard came to his aid. Salazar was the first to arrive in the capital with thirty servants under her command, Mariana among them. The goal was only to hold out until their reinforcements could break through the Abolish-controlled southern isles and link up with them.

From all reports, progress was good. Jackson's men were estimated to arrive in less than ten hours. Salazar's troops had not even seen any fighting yet.

Then a name reached them.

Gohvis. Bearing down on them from the north.

And that was enough to make Salazar retreat without putting up any resistance. She allowed him to take the capital with ease, allowed Abolish to take root in the heart of the country. To the ruin of all its people.

Mariana wasn't a fool. She knew they wouldn't have been able to stop that monster. But they only needed to delay him until Jackson arrived. Yes, it would have been difficult. Yes, many of them would have died. But that was the Vanguard's purpose. Sacrifice was what it meant to serve."

"642 -- LXXIV.

Salazar may have been strong. She may have been clever. She may have even saved Mariana's life along with those of all her comrades.

But when it came down to it, she and Armengél were cowards, and this meeting here today only confirmed that for Mariana all the more.

A part of Mariana wanted to dredge up the past right now and confront the woman about it directly, but she resisted, knowing no good would come of it. She'd already heard Salazar's excuses, anyway.

"How's that daughter of yours?" the General asked, which pulled Mariana back to the conversation at hand. "Gema, wasn't it?"

"She is fine," she said.

"That's good. How old is she now?"

"Eighteen."

Perhaps the woman had been expecting a more elaborate response, because the conversation died there and didn't recover. She looked at the Elroys as the uncomfortable silence returned, perhaps letting it draw out to be sure that they didn't have anything else to say to her. "Ah... it seems we're no longer welcome here, Armengél."

He nodded. 'Well, at least they're not trying to kill us.'

Chapter Seventy-Four: 'O, forsaken sanctuary...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Seven hours after his arrival in Warrenhold, Hector had still not fully explored the castle, and it certainly wasn't for lack of trying.

It was just him and Garovel now. It had taken a while just to find a staircase that led underground, and even then, he'd had to clear away the rubble first. The tall stone doors would hardly even budge, and Hector ended up accidentally busting them down, only to see still more debris in the way. He decided that it was too dangerous for anyone else to venture down with him, so he asked Jamal to escort his mother and Madame Carthrace to a hotel. It was already well into the night anyway, and they all seemed pretty tired. Jamal left him with a variety of supplies, for which Hector was quite thankful.

The castle had its own generator. Somewhere. Until he found it and figured out how to get it working, there would be no electricity. Which meant no light, of course, save only what he brought with him."

"642 -- LXXIV.

Salazar may have been strong. She may have been clever. She may have even saved Mariana's life along with those of all her comrades. But when it came down to it, she and Armengél were cowards, and this meeting here today only confirmed that for Mariana all the more.

A part of Mariana wanted to dredge up the past right now and confront the woman about it directly, but she resisted, knowing no good would come of it. She'd already heard Salazar's excuses, anyway.

"How's that daughter of yours?" the General asked, which pulled Mariana back to the conversation at hand. "Gema, wasn't it?"

"She is fine," she said.

"That's good. How old is she now?"

"Eighteen."

Perhaps the woman had been expecting a more elaborate response, because the conversation died there and didn't recover. She looked at the Elroys as the uncomfortable silence returned, perhaps letting it draw out to be sure that they didn't have anything else to say to her. "Ah... it seems we're no longer welcome here, Armengél."

He nodded. 'Well, at least they're not trying to kill us.'

Chapter Seventy-Four: 'O, forsaken sanctuary...!'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Seven hours after his arrival in Warrenhold, Hector had still not fully explored the castle, and it certainly wasn't for lack of trying.

It was just him and Garovel now. It had taken a while just to find a staircase that led underground, and even then, he'd had to clear away the rubble first. The tall stone doors would hardly even budge, and Hector ended up accidentally busting them down, only to see still more debris in the way. He decided that it was too dangerous for anyone else to venture down with him, so he asked Jamal to escort his mother and Madame Carthrace to a hotel. It was already well into the night anyway, and they all seemed pretty tired. Jamal left him with a variety of supplies, for which Hector was quite thankful.

The castle had its own generator. Somewhere. Until he found it and figured out how to get it working, there would be no electricity. Which meant no light, of course, save only what he brought with him."

"643

Hector's flashlight didn't last very long, and he was forced to carry a floodlight around in one hand like a kind of supercharged lantern. He made an iron harness for the large battery pack that Jamal had left him and strapped it to his back as if it were an oxygen tank.

In the beginning of his expedition, he was predominantly concerned with clearing rubble out of the hallways, which usually meant refilling the holes in the ceiling or the walls and then patching the whole section of corridor over with a layer of iron. It also helped him keep track of where he'd already been, because the place was a damn maze, and Garovel couldn't do much to help him explore it when there was no light anywhere. He found himself sorely missing Harper Norez's company.

The castle itself was not of uniform construction. The first few areas he found were all made of a mixture of wood and concrete, but then he started seeing whole rooms and hallways of tawny sandstone or dark red brick or deeply blue marble. He found one chamber with lavish rainbow tile, though it probably would've looked nicer without the fissures running through its walls. A few other times, rooms were simply small caves with natural rock walls and nothing more.

He tried to explore each floor completely before descending again, but some rooms were so thoroughly destroyed that he couldn't tell if there were any other doors hidden behind all the debris. More things he'd have to worry about later, he figured.

Five floors below the surface, he came out onto a sudden balcony, and for a moment, he thought he'd found a larger cave, but after shining his light around, he realized it was actually just one giant chamber.

'A banquet hall?' suggested Garovel.

Hector took a deep breath of stale air and raised a metal platform up from below the balcony. He climbed on and lowered himself down. He ran his light across the room again, counting eight more doors to choose from--two on each wall. He just sighed."

"644

By now, Hector was getting the distinct impression that he still wasn't even close to the end of this self-guided tour. He supposed that could be a good thing, but on the other hand, even if he only counted everything he'd seen so far, Warrenhold already seemed way too big for four people. And hell, he wasn't sure if Jamal and Amelia were going to live here. The thought of having all this space for only him and his mother was even more daunting. Were all castles this gigantic?

'At least there doesn't seem to be a vermin problem,' said Garovel.

"So far."

'I don't think I've even seen any cobwebs anywhere. Curious.'

"Watch the next room we find be a fucking den of spiders."

'Are you arachnophobic?'

"No. Er... at least, I don't think I am..."

'Oh, that's right. You're not afraid of anything, are you?'

"Uh--I don't know about that. When I saw Harper use pan-rozum, I almost shat myself..."

Garovel laughed. 'Oh yeah? I didn't realize. I suppose I can see why, though.'

He looked around again. "Agh. I wish I at least knew how many floors there are in this place." He'd asked Madame Carthrace for a map or floor plan of the building, but she explained that she'd been unable to procure such a thing despite searching for the past several days.

'Just think of it as an adventure.'

"I feel like I'm gonna get lost down here forever..."

'Don't worry. I can probably guide you back.'

“...Probably?”

‘If not, you can become the Darksteel Mole Man.’

“Fantastic.”

Eyeing all eight doors another time, Hector eventually just shrugged and chose the closest one. It led to another hallway. A very long hallway. There had to be at least another ten rooms to investigate, but he decided to keep going instead. At length, the corridor ended very abruptly, as if the rest of it were missing, replaced by a hole leading to pitch blackness. Hector stepped closer to the edge and shined his light through the hole.

This time, it really was a cave."

"645

Enormous stalactites hung down from above, fervently living up to the name of Gray Rock. He couldn't tell how large the cave was from this angle, but it certainly wasn't small, and it seemed to extend around the castle.

‘There,’ said Garovel. ‘See that rock ledge?’

He did. It wasn't very far, just slightly below him. He made a bridging staircase for himself and descended. His light illuminated an extremely steep drop off as he walked, and when he reached the ledge, he looked back toward the castle, finally seeing it from the outside. Or part of it, anyway.

It almost seemed like the tower was upside down. Wide at the top, it became incrementally thinner in rivets toward the bottom, where it found support from a mound of natural rock. But even now, Hector still couldn't quite see the bottom because of the rocks in the way. Additionally, the hole that he'd exited from was even larger than he'd thought, and it now granted him a view into several different rooms and hallways. A whole chunk of the tower was missing, he realized.

‘That's a little suspicious-looking,’ said Garovel.

“Is it?”

'The center of that hole is about even with the ledge you're standing on now.'

"Hmm."

'I'm wondering if it was really caused by an earthquake. It's fairly symmetrical, too. Makes me think it could've been made by an explosive.'

"You think someone attacked this place?"

'That's often why castles are built, so maybe this is just an old wound that was never repaired. But y'know, I just think the whole earthquake story is strange. I imagine that someone skilled enough to build a place like this would know better than to choose a location that has an earthquake problem.'

"It's really old, though. Maybe the builders just didn't have that kind of... uh... surveying technology? Or something?"

'Maybe. Let's go see what's on the other side of this tower.'

Hector considered his options. The rocks below looked rather perilous, so he figured that materializing a staircase on top of them would be annoying. Instead, he made a single giant platform and jumped to it. The force of his landing caused it to fall forward, but that was as planned."

"646

Hector fell with the platform, and when he neared the bottom, he leapt off again, creating a sudden slide to catch himself. He eased down through the smooth iron tube and landed comfortably on both feet.

Garovel floated over. 'Showing off for me?'

He laughed as he annihilated his work. "Never hurts to practice. Though, to be honest, I was kind of expecting to faceplant on that one..."

'I'm glad you're not one to let a little thing like the threat of grievous bodily harm stop you.'

He held up his floodlight to be sure he hadn't broken it and was glad to find it in working order. "By the way, uh... I'm pretty sure I achieved emergence when I was fighting Harper."

'Oh? That's excellent.'

"Not sure what all I can do now."

'Looks like we'll have plenty of space and opportunity to figure that out.' The reaper floated slowly forward, rounding the base of the tower as Hector followed.

Abruptly, they were confronted with a broad view of what seemed like the entire castle, though the floodlight could only illuminate so much at once. Wide-eyed and open-mouthed, Hector gradually counted eight towers in total, all hanging down from the ceiling in a ring formation directly above him. Cavern rocks rose up from the floor to cradle each structure, save one, which looked to be half-destroyed with a good chunk of its remnants now hanging freely in mid-air. At the top, Hector could see a series of bridging walkways connecting everything and angled support beams for them extending out from each adjacent tower.

"Holy shit..."

'Yeah... I'm starting to see why Voreese wanted this place.'

"People think this is an eyesore? It looks incredible..."

'Hmm.'

The towers varied in size somewhat, but even the ruined one must've still had about ten stories. The largest, though, stood directly in front of him. It didn't grow thinner like the others as it reached the base of the cave, and its stone looked a bit different as well, darker and more intricately carved. By itself, it must have had over a hundred windows just on this side alone, as well as a couple of protrusions into the rock halfway up its massive body."

"647

Hector wondered if the banquet hall from earlier was in that largest tower somewhere, but the more he looked over everything, the more he became convinced that each tower probably had enough space for it.

'All in all, Warrenhold still looks like it's in pretty decent condition from the outside,' said Garovel. 'Apart from that one tower over there, that is.'

"We've been down here for hours already, but there's still so much left to explore..."

'Well, you did spend most of that time clearing hallways.' The reaper paused. 'Hey, do you hear something?'

He listened. Indeed, there was a faint rushing sound, constant like distant static. "Yeah. What is that?"

'I could be mistaken, but it sounds like a waterfall.'

Hector cocked an eyebrow. "What? Underground?"

'It would've been very practical to build Warrenhold near a source of water, and an underground river could very well mean an underground waterfall.'

"That'd be... pretty sweet, actually. Where do you think it is, then?"

'Not sure. Could be on the other side of one of these towers, maybe, behind a wall somewhere. Or it could just be farther down in the cave. Seems like we've found the heart of the castle, but we're still not at the bottom of the cave yet.'

"Geez..."

'Regardless, we should look for that waterfall first. It could lead us to a generator.'

"Oh, you think it's hydroelectric?"

'It's possible. Obviously, the castle is older than hydroelectric power--hell, it's older than the discovery of electricity itself--but if the last resident lived here only forty years ago, then yeah, it could have a generator like that. There's no guarantee it still works, though.'

"Of course..."

At the reaper's request, Hector backtracked a little, just a short ways from the ring of turrets, and found another steep drop off. This one, however, had a decrepit stone wall--an ancient guardrail, seemingly. Hector shined his light over the edge and illuminated a distant bed of dark turquoise.

‘Oh,’ said Garovel. ‘There’s a friggin’ lake right here.’

Hector could see gray objects in the water, poking out above the surface. “Are those... buildings?””

"648

Garovel went over the cliff for a closer look.

“Hey!” said Hector. “Don’t go off on your own!”

‘Relax. I’d be able to sense if there was anything alive down here. Just stay up there and give me light.’

Hector wanted to protest more, but he figured he should probably just trust that Garovel knew what he was doing. He wasn’t particularly happy about it, though.

‘It’s strange,’ the reaper said. ‘Usually, if I concentrate, I can sense even small animals within a hundred meters or so, but I haven’t been able to sense any life at all. No insects or mice in the castle, no fish or anything in this water here, no worms in the dirt, even.’

‘That can’t be right,’ thought Hector. ‘There’s gotta be bugs down here somewhere, right? Maybe your soul radar or whatever is getting screwed up for some reason. You should get back over here.’

‘My sense is fine. I can still sense you perfectly well. You are literally the only living thing in Warrenhold, right now.’

He looked around again. ‘That’s... a little creepy.’

‘These buildings in the water are houses,’ said Garovel. ‘Very old and empty. This used to be a tiny village.’

‘I wonder how it flooded...’

‘Bah. It’s too dark. I can’t see where the lake ends or begins, but it does seem to be flowing east. Wherever that waterfall is, I don’t think it’ll be easy to reach.’

‘What now?’

‘Eh, we’ll explore the water later. You should get back above ground soon and check your messages. I’m sure your cell reception in here is terrible, and the others will be wanting to hear from you.’

‘Alright.’

Garovel was returning now, flying backwards as he looked over the dotted lake. ‘It seems our new home has seen some rough times.’

“No kidding.”

‘It won’t be easy to repair.’

‘That’s, um... yeah. I’m not sure how we’re supposed to afford it. I didn’t even see furniture in any of the rooms, either, so we’ll need money for that, too.’

‘Yeah, and the Queen only gave you three million troas to work with.’”
"649 -- LXXV.

--donation bonus week #1 (day 1/5, post 1/5)--

It took a second for that number to register. “Wait, what?”

‘You didn’t think she’d give us this monstrosity without any funds to get started, did you? This place is probably the biggest money pit I’ve ever seen.’

“But... wha...” He squinted with one eye. “Fucking three million?! You’re telling me I’m a millionaire now?!”

‘Technically.’

“Why didn’t you tell me that earlier?!”

‘I wanted to see the state of things first. And now that I have, I don’t think you should get too excited about your newfound riches. If the rest of Warrenhold is in as terrible a state as everything we’ve seen so far, then three million troas will hardly put a dent in our expenses.’

“But... three million...”

Garovel chortled as they started back toward the ring of towers. ‘Our goal should be to restore Warrenhold in such a way that it will eventually begin to pay for itself.'

"How the hell do we do that?"

'There are all sorts of ways to make money, Hector, especially when you already have some at your disposal. But first, we still need a clearer picture of everything that Warrenhold has to offer. Hopefully, Voreese will give us some juicy details when she visits. The castle is certainly impressive to look at, but I'm not sure that explains why she seemed so set on it.'

"Hmm. Maybe there's a secret treasure room."

'That'd be nice.'

"So secret that we'll never find it."

'Sounds about right.'

Chapter Seventy-Five: 'Son of Water, observe carefully...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ever since school let out for the day, Marcos couldn't quite shake the feeling that he was being watched. It was discomforting, to say the least, like his eyes could see someone recognizable there in the pedestrian crowds, but his brain simply refused to tell him who it was.

He tried to be smart about it and just stuck with his friends. When their basketball game concluded, he asked them if they wanted to come over to his house and play some other games. They agreed but still ended up finding excuses to abandon him along the way. He knew they were just uncomfortable in these fancier neighborhoods, but still. He really wished they would've stuck with him a bit longer."

"649 -- LXXV.

--donation bonus week #1 (day 1/5, post 1/5)--

It took a second for that number to register. "Wait, what?"

'You didn't think she'd give us this monstrosity without any funds to get started, did you? This place is probably the biggest money pit I've ever seen.'

"But... wha..." He squinted with one eye. "Fucking three million?! You're telling me I'm a millionaire now?!"

'Technically.'

"Why didn't you tell me that earlier?!"

'I wanted to see the state of things first. And now that I have, I don't think you should get too excited about your newfound riches. If the rest of Warrenhold is in as terrible a state as everything we've seen so far, then three million troas will hardly put a dent in our expenses.'

"But... three million..."

Garovel chortled as they started back toward the ring of towers. 'Our goal should be to restore Warrenhold in such a way that it will eventually begin to pay for itself.'

"How the hell do we do that?"

'There are all sorts of ways to make money, Hector, especially when you already have some at your disposal. But first, we still need a clearer picture of everything that Warrenhold has to offer. Hopefully, Voreese will give us some juicy details when she visits. The castle is certainly impressive to look at, but I'm not sure that explains why she seemed so set on it.'

"Hmm. Maybe there's a secret treasure room."

'That'd be nice.'

"So secret that we'll never find it."

'Sounds about right.'

Chapter Seventy-Five: 'Son of Water, observe carefully...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Ever since school let out for the day, Marcos couldn't quite shake the feeling that he was being watched. It was discomfoting, to say the least, like his eyes could see someone recognizable there in the pedestrian crowds, but his brain simply refused to tell him who it was.

He tried to be smart about it and just stuck with his friends. When their basketball game concluded, he asked them if they wanted to come over to his house and play some other games. They agreed but still ended up finding excuses to abandon him along the way. He knew they were just uncomfortable in these fancier neighborhoods, but still. He really wished they would've stuck with him a bit longer."

"650

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 2/5)--

On his own now, Marcos attempted to stay near the crowds, which was rather easy, thankfully. Aguary had ample foot traffic despite the constant rains. Temperatures were usually mild enough that walking wasn't terribly unpleasant so long as one had a raincoat or umbrella.

The last leg of his journey proved problematic, however. The Elroy Estate didn't sit on a main road, which meant he would have to abandon the comfort of the crowd in order to actually make it home. But it wasn't that far. He just needed to make it past the madega tree at the end of the next street, round the corner, and then it would be a straight shot the rest of the way.

He gathered his courage and went for it, quick as he dared on the slick concrete. He glanced over his shoulder to see if anyone emerged from the crowd to pursue him. He stopped dead when he instead saw his jackass brother there.

Marcos was at once incensed and relieved. "Cisco! Were you following me?!"

"Maybe."

"Why?!" Marcos had to stifle his next words, realizing they would only have been an admission of fear. He didn't need Cisco making fun of him.

Cisco took his sweet time answering, letting his eyes drift elsewhere, probably talking to his reaper privately like Marcos wasn't even there.

Marcos hated when he did that.

"No reason," said Cisco. "I was just wondering why you're always disappearing.”

“I disappear to get away from you!”

“Good to know.” Cisco closed the distance between them and put an arm around his brother. “Come on. Let’s go.”

Marcos squirmed out of his grasp. “What’re you doing? Don’t touch me.”

“Just move your ass, brat. No one likes a sluggard.”

“A what?”

“It means a slow and lazy person.”

“Then why didn’t you just say that?”

Cisco pushed him forward. “Walk.”

Marcos walked. He didn’t understand what was going through his brother’s head, and he didn’t much care to, either.

They finally reached the gate, and Nico and Jorem welcomed the brothers home. Marcos thanked them for the courtesy, while Cisco only nodded.”

"651

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 3/5)--

Marcos parted ways with Cisco at the first opportunity. He made his way upstairs, looking for the refuge of his room, but Ramira appeared in his path with a question.

“What did you do?” She was a tiny thing, this girl, skinny even for a nine-year-old. Her overalls and wild black hair made her look almost as boyish as he did.

“What are you talking about?” he said.

“You did something bad and got in trouble.”

“No, I didn’t.”

“Liar. I heard Mama telling Cisco to keep an eye on you this morning.

Why would she do that if she didn't think you did something wrong, huh?"

"I don't know. But I didn't do anything wrong."

"Yeah, right. I bet you put a frog in Emy's bed again."

It was actually going to be slugs next for Emy, but Marcos hadn't gotten around to it yet. He'd never been brave enough to try anything on Cisco, but he was thinking it was about time to rectify that. Maybe replace his shampoo with vinegar. Or write him a fake love letter from a secret admirer. And include instructions on where to meet. And then the admirer would turn out to be a bull terrier with a pink bow on its head.

He might've been putting a bit more thought into that second one.

"Tell me," said Ramira. By the eager look in her eyes, she was about to pester him to let her help with his next prank.

"I really didn't do anything."

"Hmph. That's boring."

He tried to move past, and she stepped in front of him.

"Are you going to do anything?" she asked.

"No."

"Really? Because Emy has a boyfriend now, so..."

That caught his attention. "She does?"

"Yeah!"

A beat passed as Marcos stared at his little sister. "Alright, what can you tell me about him?"

"It's Alex Belos. Cisco's friend. His favorite color is green. He has a pet turtle named Frank. He walks to school, because he doesn't like the bus. He hates broccoli, and he's scared of dogs. And Cisco."

"How the heck do you know all this?"

She gave a confident grin. "Because I'm a spy. Duh."

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 4/5)--

"A spy. Right. I forgot. Sorry." He knew that trying to tell her otherwise would only upset her. "Well, I want you to keep spying, then. If we're going to do this thing, then we'll be needing as much intelligence as we can gather."

"Okay!"

He lowered his voice and said, "But keep it a secret. You never know if one of the reapers might be listening."

"I'm a spy. Not an amateur."

"I know. Just don't get caught."

"Duh." She scampered off.

He watched her go. She was going to be a very scary person one day, he thought.

It wasn't much longer to dinnertime, so Marcos just watched television for a bit. Regardless of what Cisco said, Marcos hoped the day would never come when he no longer enjoyed cartoons.

At dinner, there seemed to be a tension in the air that even he noticed. Marcos mostly just kept his head down and peeked around the table from below his bushy eyebrows while he worked on his stew. His father was eventually the one to break the ice.

"I have a small announcement," said Pa, immediately drawing everyone's attention. "My presence has been requested in Rheinhal, so I'll be leaving in the morning."

The children digested his words.

"Are you being given an assignment?" said Cisco.

"Possibly. I don't know. I do know that it will only be for a day or two. I expect all of you to behave in my absence and listen to your mother."

"Yes, ensir," said all four children, nearly in unison.

There wasn't much left to be said after that. A few inquiries into their schooldays, a request to meet this Alex Belos fellow, and nothing else. Marcos was far from an expert on what his mother was thinking, but she didn't look particularly pleased, and her dour mood seemed to permeate the entire dining room. Gradually, the evening drew to a close.

Marcos lay in bed in his odd, brick-patterned pajamas, and he found himself unable to sleep. Something was nagging at him, and all he had now was time to think about it."

"653

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 5/5)--

This business about Ma telling Cisco to follow him around was certainly odd. And if that was really the case, then why hadn't Cisco just told him so? To be a jerk? It seemed like a lot of needless trouble to go through. Cisco must've been tailing him for hours...

Hmm. Had Cisco really been following him that long? Because it would've been impossible unless Cisco had skipped the end of school, which wasn't something Cisco was likely to do. Cisco made no secret of his view that school was an important obligation as an Elroy. Perhaps orders from Ma trumped that, though. But then, there still remained the question of why she would ask Cisco to do something like that when she knew he would be so against it.

At length, Marcos sat up. He rubbed his face. He got out of bed and made his way downstairs, looking for a glass of milk from the kitchen. As he poured, he could hear muffled voices from the next room over. His parents were still awake, it seemed, and curiosity got the better of him, so he wandered closer. Their voices sounded heavy and serious--even more so than usual for his parents.

"...I don't like this, Zeff."

"Neither do I, but what would you have me do? Ignore Lawrence's orders? For what reason, exactly?"

"It just feels very sudden, and after everything Salazar said, I think we should be very cautious. I have little respect for the woman, but I have never considered her to be stupid."

"Well, thankfully, I married a woman who excels at caution."

"Zeff--"

There was a long pause.

"Rallying?" said Pa. "You're starting to sound a bit paranoid. We've no reason to suspect General Lawrence of any wrongdoing."

"No, she's right," said Ma. "It's best to be overprepared."

"Fine, but--"

Another pause, but this time, Marcos heard footsteps moving toward him. He panicked and tried to run, but the door was already opening, and then he heard his father's voice.

"Marcos. What are you still doing up?"

"654

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 1/5)--

Marcos flinched. His father never really yelled, but the man could take a certain tone that made Marcos suitably frightened. He held up his glass of milk. "I'm sorry," he tried. "I couldn't sleep, so..."

"Well, hurry back to bed."

Marcos looked up at his father and frowned. "Pa. Um... are we in danger?"

The man gave a sigh of irritation. "You were eavesdropping."

Marcos looked at the floor.

"It's nothing that you need to worry about," his father said, a modicum more softly. "That's a job for your mother and I."

"But..."

He patted his son on the head. "Marcos. You know the world is dangerous. I can't promise you that nothing bad will ever happen. Your mother would kill me if I lied to you like that." He knelt down to look his son in the eye. "But you are an Elroy. A Rainlord. And what do the Rainlords say? What have we always said?"

"The rain fears not the torch."

"Yes. And what does that mean?"

Marcos remembered asking that same question. He remembered his father's answer equally well and now chose to repeat it. "It means we don't run from danger. We destroy it."

"That's right. All of us. Even while I'm away, your mother will be here, and you know she won't let anything happen to you. Neither will your brother. You understand that, don't you?"

"Yes, ensir."

"Good. Now with that said, we are not in any danger that we know of. I would tell you if we were. Do you believe me?"

He wasn't really sure he did, but he still said, "Yes, ensir."

"There's a good boy. Back to bed now. Off you go."

He nodded and downed the rest of his milk before returning to his room. He didn't feel all that comforted, really, but he still fell asleep after a fashion. When he awoke, he was able to see the Lord Elroy off before school. As he watched the man drive away, Marcos frowned and wondered who would be there to prevent anything from happening to his father."

"655 -- LXXVI.

--donation bonus week #1 (day 1/5, post 2/5)--

Chapter Seventy-Six: 'Thy buried history...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector was glad for Amelia Carthrace's presence. The woman could organize just about anything, seemingly, and she had a handle on his funds. She was almost like an elderly version of Gina, he thought, and he could see why the Queen had asked her to help him out. The only thing he didn't understand was why Madame Carthrace had actually agreed to.

By mid-morning, Warrenhold already had two separate crews onsite. The first was the preliminary reconstruction team, which Amelia tasked with making immediate and primitive repairs to the aboveground buildings. Their primary goal was to have enough rooms with four walls for everyone by the day's end.

The second crew was a team of surveyors, and Hector accompanied them underground. At first, they wanted to split up and go in all different directions to help speed their work along, but Hector wouldn't allow it. He wasn't going to let anyone wander around down here alone until he was more confident in the castle's structural integrity. He knew that these people were professionals, but even so, he doubted that many of them had experience with places quite like this. If a hallway suddenly collapsed on someone, Hector wanted to be right there to shield them in an instant. The surveyors were a bit annoyed at his insistence, but the longer they spent underground, the less that seemed to bother them.

They didn't experience any cave-ins or otherwise have any brushes with death, but that didn't seem to matter. Gradually, the surveyors all took to clustering around Hector, and they became rather fidgety and irritable. They busied themselves with their work, taking measurements, charting the rooms out, inspecting walls and columns for signs of weakness; but not a single one of these people appeared very comfortable in this place now.

"...Are you guys alright?" Hector asked.

The lead surveyor had introduced herself as Sharon Calloway earlier. She took a deep breath and adjusted her hard hat, then her spectacles. "We're fine. Don't worry."

"There's something about this place," said someone else. "I can't put my finger on it, but..."

"It's unsettling," said another."

"655 -- LXXVI.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Hector was glad for Amelia Carthrace's presence. The woman could organize just about anything, seemingly, and she had a handle on his funds. She was almost like an elderly version of Gina, he thought, and he could see why the Queen had asked her to help him out. The only thing he didn't understand was why Madame Carthrace had actually agreed to.

By mid-morning, Warrenhold already had two separate crews onsite. The first was the preliminary reconstruction team, which Amelia tasked with making immediate and primitive repairs to the aboveground buildings. Their primary goal was to have enough rooms with four walls for everyone by the day's end.

The second crew was a team of surveyors, and Hector accompanied them underground. At first, they wanted to split up and go in all different directions to help speed their work along, but Hector wouldn't allow it. He wasn't going to let anyone wander around down here alone until he was more confident in the castle's structural integrity. He knew that these people were professionals, but even so, he doubted that many of them had experience with places quite like this. If a hallway suddenly collapsed on someone, Hector wanted to be right there to shield them in an instant. The surveyors were a bit annoyed at his insistence, but the longer they spent underground, the less that seemed to bother them.

They didn't experience any cave-ins or otherwise have any brushes with death, but that didn't seem to matter. Gradually, the surveyors all took to clustering around Hector, and they became rather fidgety and irritable. They busied themselves with their work, taking measurements, charting the rooms out, inspecting walls and columns for signs of weakness; but not a single one of these people appeared very comfortable in this place now.

"...Are you guys alright?" Hector asked.

The lead surveyor had introduced herself as Sharon Calloway earlier. She took a deep breath and adjusted her hard hat, then her spectacles. "We're fine. Don't worry."

"There's something about this place," said someone else. "I can't put my finger on it, but..."

"It's unsettling," said another."

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 3/5)--

Hector eyed them all again. They each seemed in perfectly good health, still. Just a bit uneasy, perhaps. "Uh... w-would you like to take a break for lunch?"

"Yeah," voted someone.

"Seconded."

"Sounds good to me."

Miss Calloway frowned. "It's early still. We should go on a bit longer--at least until we make it to the bottom of this first tower."

The others didn't argue with her, but Hector could see the reluctance in their faces.

Miss Calloway led the party deeper. They passed a familiar banquet hall, opting to keep going straight down, and then they came upon a peculiar thing. The walls, the floors, and the ceilings were all made of darker stone here, so Hector didn't notice straight away, but the surveyors did.

"What's with this area?" one of them said. "Are my eyes lying to me, or is this place in absolutely pristine condition?"

Miss Calloway ran her hand horizontally across a darkly gray wall. "No, you're right. This stonework is impeccable. Look closely. See the decorative etchings?"

"Beautiful. It's preserved remarkably well."

"How can only this section of the tower be so perfect when the rest is scarcely better than a ruin?"

"Perhaps someone restored this part in secret," said Miss Calloway. "Whatever the case, it's very good news. Unlike everything else we've seen so far, this area is quite inhabitable." She looked at Hector. "You may wish to set up a base of operations here and try to expand the restoration outward."

Indeed, it seemed like a good idea. They walked through the rest of the tower in a state of awe. Hector counted seven perfect bedrooms, two ancient washrooms, a kind of large den with a hearth right in the center, a storage closet, and one long staircase that spiraled between the four adjoined floors. The bottom floor led outside into the immense cavern, allowing the surveyors a good look at the ring of eight great towers.

They marveled at the sight only briefly before deciding that it was time to take that break now. Hector was a little disappointed by their reactions, quite frankly."

"657

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 4/5)--

As they were heading back up, Miss Calloway looked at Hector. "I was hoping to get more done. I apologize for the inconvenience, Mr. Goffe."

"Oh, d-don't worry about it. I'm, uh... er... I mean, there's no rush."

"We've charted out most of the first tower," she said. "You'll be pleased to know that the overall condition isn't quite as bad as it looks. Each area where we've encountered a fracture appears to have been the result of isolated incidents rather than that of a single, greater event."

"Er, you mean... all these collapsed hallways aren't even related?"

"Well, they could be linked in that the same person or group of people created them while moving through the castle, but it seems very unlikely that they were caused by something like an earthquake."

"Oh..."

"And then of course, you have the area with the darker stone, which is in such good shape that I find it slightly baffling. Moreover, I'm not sure what type of stone that was, either. You have a very curious house here, Mr. Goffe."

"Ah... yeah..."

By the time they reached the surface again, Jamal had already gone to fetch food for everyone at Amelia's request. The surveyors mainly just seemed happy to be out in the daylight again.

Hector checked on the reconstruction team. Already, they were making progress. They'd picked the lone tower on the far side of the property to start work on, no doubt because it was the least destroyed out of all of them. When he'd first arrived late last night, this had been the tallest and most impressive tower he saw with its four, arguably five, floors; but now that he'd seen the giants that lay underground, this thing looked like a dwarf.

Hector saw his mother and Amelia sitting together and chatting on a large chunk of overturned stone. He considered venturing over to speak with them, but Garovel got his attention first.

'Ah. I sense Voreese approaching. Brace yourself, Hector.'

That made him smile as he looked up and around. The clear blue skies made it easy to see, and after a moment, he spotted her."

"658

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 5/5)--

From quite high up, Voreese swooped down. She stopped a ways above everyone and looked over the restoration efforts. 'Wow, I didn't think you guys'd be so quick to get started.'

Garovel motioned toward Amelia. 'You can blame the Lady Carthrace there for our productivity.'

Voreese descended the rest of the way until she was about level with Garovel. 'Have you encountered any problems? Any anxiety attacks? Oh, and hello, by the way. Good to see you both.'

'Likewise. And what do you mean? Anxiety attacks?'

'If I'd known there were gonna be so many people here, I would've told you earlier,' she said. 'Warrenhold has a very unique quality to it. The three of us can't sense it, but normal people can. Apparently, it's like a pressure in the back of their minds, and they have no idea what causes it, which makes people very anxious and uncomfortable.'

'We noticed something like that,' said Garovel. 'We were just underground with the surveyors, and they seemed pretty eager to get out of there.'

'There's no actual danger,' Voreese explained. 'The real cause of the feeling is kind of silly.'

'Oh, you know what the cause is?'

"Course I do. It's the stone. All eight towers down there were uniquely constructed. These ones up here weren't, though. They were added later by other people.'

'Ah,' said Garovel. 'Warrenhold was built by a servant, you mean?'

'Yeah, an extremely powerful integration user. Some of the things she could do with her power--I don't even know. I've never seen anyone else able to do what she could. I mean, I understand the mechanics of her work, but I don't know how the fuck she pulled that shit off. Even in terms of servants, she was like a fucking wizard.'

'You knew her well?' said Garovel.

'Fuck yeah, I did. She was my servant for a very long time.'

Hector blinked. He was tempted to join the conversation now, but since he was the only person present who could actually hear these two talking, he figured it would be best to just listen quietly so as not to spook any of the nice people around."

"659

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 1/5)--

'What was her name?' said Garovel.

'Stasya Orlov,' said Voreese. 'I doubt you've heard of her. She never became famous.'

'Why not? If she was as strong as you say--'

'Because people are bastards. We're talking about the early days of the Mohssian Empire here. Not a great time period to have lady parts, you may recall.'

'Ah...'

'She was a genius, that woman. Built incredible things. And history gave her zero credit. Even this place. Officially, Warrenhold is said to have been built by some fucking douchebag.'

'That's depressing. And sadly, also a very common occurrence for historical women. But if what you're saying is true, then the new Lord of Warrenhold would surely be in a position to give Stasya her due reverence.'

Voreese's skeletal grin broadened, and she looked at Hector. 'Oh yeah?'

Hector just kind of shrugged and nodded, deferring to Garovel.

'We can build her a memorial, if you like,' he told her. 'Or just put her name up everywhere.'

'Either of those would earn my eternal affection.'

A construction worker stepped up next to Hector and said, "Hey, wait. You never explained why the stone makes people freak out."

Hector did a double-take. That wasn't a construction worker. That was Roman dressed as one. "What the--?! When did you get here?!"

"A while ago. Told the other guys that I was a volunteer. They didn't seem to mind the extra pair of hands."

Hector had so many sudden questions that he wasn't sure where to begin. "W-why are you dressed like that?"

Roman smiled. "A little anonymity among friends never hurts."

That wasn't much of an answer. Hector glared at Garovel. 'Why didn't you sense him?'

'Oh, I did. I wanted to see how long it would take you to notice.'

'Garovel!'

'Good to see you, Roman. Welcome to Warrenhold.'

"Thanks. I was curious. Voreese? You gonna explain?"

'The stone doesn't make people freak out,' she said. 'It just causes anxiety.'

"Yeah, yeah, whatever. Why, though?"

'It's really just a side effect. Stasya wanted the castle to repel pests.'

She had a real thing about bugs.'

A beat passed.

"Are you kidding?" said Roman."

"660

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 2/5)--

'Nope,' said Voreese. 'Stasya crafted the stone herself. And if you've been down there, then you know that it sure-as-fuck works. Not only does it repel bugs, it repels all wildlife. It even makes humans not want to be there.'

'That doesn't sound like a very comfortable place to live,' said Garovel.

'Well, it doesn't affect us, because the stones use a very faint "taste of death" to repel living creatures. Obviously, we've all had more than just a taste, so our souls are already acclimated to it and don't notice anything strange.'

'Still,' said Garovel. 'We have normal people with us, as well. We can't expect them to live in a place that makes them perpetually uncomfortable no matter what they do.'

'No, no, it's okay,' said Voreese. 'The feeling isn't all that strong, really. As long as you explain where it comes from--that there's no actual danger and that it's just a silly pest control mechanism--then normal residents will get over it. The human brain is sophisticated enough to overcome the feeling with sufficient exposure and understanding.'

'Hmm.'

'If you DON'T explain it to people, though, then it can really start to fuck with them, especially if they happen to have an anxiety disorder or just strange brain chemistry. It's just the not knowing that really gets to people. So, anyone who's going to be spending time here, particularly underground, should be made aware of this. It's very important to their mental health.'

"Ah--okay," said Hector.

'No one's down there right now, right?'

‘No,’ said Garovel. ‘Hector wouldn’t let anyone go in without him.’

‘Good,’ she said. ‘Oh, and also: no pets. Explaining the problem is obviously not going to work with a fucking horse or what have you. They’ll just run away at the first opportunity, and if you try to keep them here, they’ll go batshit crazy.’

“O-oh. Okay...”

‘If you’re disappointed, then just think of Garovel as your pet,’ said Voreese.

“That’s what I do,” said Roman. “To me, Voreese is that tiny dog that everyone knows. The one that never stops barking.””
"661

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 3/5)--

Voreese looked up suddenly. ‘Roman, I think I’m receiving a message from the afterlife. Someone’s traveled for eons upon eons through null space and infinity, doing the impossible, all so they could tell you something...’

“Is that right?” said Roman dryly.

‘They’re saying... that you should... fuck off.’

“Nice.”

‘Now they’re thanking me and telling me how worthwhile their journey was. And now they’re gone.’

“You put way too much thought into that,” said Roman.

‘...Said no one ever in regard to anything you’ve ever done.’

“I don’t overthink things. I’m okay with that.”

‘Oh, yeah. Nevermind that it got you fucking killed before.’

Roman shrugged. “Well, that’s why I have you now.”

A ripple of awkward looks washed over everyone.

“What?” said Roman.

‘That was nearly a compliment,’ said Garovel.

‘Yeah. Don’t compliment me, you fuck.’

“You’re a lovely person, Voreese.”

‘Agh! Quit it!’

“Uh--er... um...”

They all turned to watch Hector struggle through his next sentence.

“Ah, eh... I was just wondering... were there, um... any other reasons why we, uh... er, why you wanted us to choose Warrenhold? Because, er--ah...”

Garovel helped him out. ‘Good question. This place isn’t exactly in the best condition, and it’s going to be extremely expensive to restore. If we’d picked a different castle, then we would’ve had an easier time, I’m sure.’

‘Ha. Well, there are a lot of reasons, but allow me to paint you a picture first. You remember the Redwater Uprising, yeah?’

‘Of course.’ Garovel looked at the two curious servants. ‘An extremely bloody rebellion that went on for more than half a century. It was one of the major contributing factors to the Mohssian Empire’s collapse.’

Hector just nodded gratefully.

‘Yeah, what he said,’ said Voreese. ‘Stasya was long gone by then, but during those fifty years, this fucking castle weathered six different sieges. SIX. Okay? And we’re not talking tiny little fortnight sieges here. We’re talking two or three years each. It was ridiculous. There were three separate kings that took refuge here AT THE SAME FUCKING TIME, because it was basically the only safe place left for them.’

“Holy shit,” said Roman.”

"662

‘Everyone wanted their heads on a pike,’ Voreese went on, ‘and each king had shitloads of competing claimants to his throne, most of whom thought they could win public favor by finally killing these three bastards. So it was safe to say that shit had sufficiently hit the fan for them by that point.’

“And Warrenhold kept them safe?” said Roman.

‘Yeah. One of the kings died of old age; another starved to death; and the last one was only killed because his guards finally decided to just let the enemy in. Unfortunately, that last one also meant that the sixth siege had succeeded, so Warrenhold’s impregnable reputation was spoiled. Which was bullshit, but what’re ya gonna do about it, right?’

Garovel bobbed his skull. ‘So in other words, you’re saying this will be a very safe place to live, once we fix it up.’

‘It already is a safe place,’ said Voreese. ‘On the surface here, yeah, everything is shit and will get fucked up real quick, but underground? There are certain areas of the castle--maybe you saw them--that Stasya made extra special.’

‘Oh, you mean the places with darker stone?’

‘Yeah. Stasya called that stuff “nightrack,” and it’s the reason why Warrenhold is still standing. She spent years JUST crafting nightrack, and she still couldn’t make enough of it for the whole castle. Even with her power, the manufacturing process took forever. She made enough for the Tower of Night, and then decided that it just wasn’t worth the time investment to make enough for seven more towers. Instead, she gave them each a small inner sanctum of it.’

‘I assume this nightrack has special properties?’ Not quite a question, but Garovel asked it like one.

‘Yep. It’s durable as fuck, first of all. Our two servants here? Wouldn’t be able to scratch it. It would take someone like Harper to break through. And then, guess what? Even if you do destroy it, it fucking fixes itself.’

“It regenerates?” said Roman. “You mean, like servants do?”

‘Yup.’

“How the hell...?”

‘Fuck if I know! I told you she was a fucking wizard!’”

"663

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 5/5)--

“Geez,” said Roman.

‘Oh, and on top of all that, the nightrock still repels pests like all of Stasya’s “normal” stone does. So, yeah. It’s good shit, okay? You’re gonna like living here.’

‘Okay,’ said Garovel. ‘I believe you. Were there any other reasons why you wanted us to take Warrenhold?’

And Voreese fell quiet a moment. She looked across her audience again. ‘Well, I guess you’re gonna find it sooner or later.’

‘Find what?’

‘I’ll show you. I was gonna give you a tour, anyway.’ She floated off toward the underground entrance.

Hector gathered up the surveying team again. He did what Voreese told him earlier and tried to explain that the mysterious anxiety was merely a byproduct of pest control.

It took a while.

They weren’t particularly receptive to the idea that mere stone could magically influence people. Hector had to remind them that they were talking to someone who could make metal appear from nowhere. Then he had to reassure them that he wasn’t going to hurt them. Roman tried to help him out but just ended up confusing things more, because no one knew who he was or why they should listen to him.

Eventually, though, they made it underground again. Voreese led the expedition to the network of bridges that connected all eight towers near their peaks. With more light bearers around, Hector realized that in addition to all the crisscrossing paths, there wasn’t just one solid ring of bridges--there were actually three, stacked on top of each other with adjoining staircases intermittently. Much of the uppermost ring was embedded in natural rock, but occasionally, there was an opening that allowed for an incredible view of the greater cavern area.

Hector was a bit concerned that the bridges were unsafe to use, but Voreese assured him that they had lines of nightrock supporting them beneath the otherwise normal stone and were therefore quite sturdy even after all this time.

She rattled off all sorts of information as they made their way toward the Tower of Night. Apparently, the castle had been too large for pretty much everyone who ever owned it after Stasya. Hector was not surprised."

"664

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 1/5)--

Six of the eight towers had names, Voreese explained. There was the Entry Tower, the Bell Tower, the Book Tower, the Star Tower, the Tower of Day, and the Tower of Night. The remaining two had never received names--or at least not ones that Voreese was aware of--because they had never really been used for anything other than storage. Given Warrenhold's size and its ill reputation, excessive visitors had never been much of a problem.

The Entry Tower was not the largest, but it was still the tallest by an extra third, as it was the only tower to reach all the way up to the surface. And according to Voreese, it was also one of the things that made Warrenhold so easily defensible. Any invading force had only two options: storm the bottlenecking Entry Tower or dig through forty-six meters of nearly solid rock.

The Star Tower, on the other hand, was unquestionably the shortest and smallest of the eight. It was the one that was half-destroyed and hanging from the ceiling. Voreese seemed surprised at the sight of it and unfortunately couldn't explain how or when that had happened. Hector shined a light through the hole that was now its belly and could see the mass of nightrock therein, a black box partially suspended in mid-air.

'You don't happen to know where the generator is located, do you?' said Garovel.

She shook her head. 'Sorry. The last time I was down here, that kinda thing hadn't been invented yet.'

'I figured.'

The Tower of Night was surely the most impressive of the eight, Hector felt. Larger than all the others and composed entirely of nightrack, it was still completely intact. Even its doors were nightrack, uniquely made so that they would slide horizontally instead of needing to be pushed or pulled open. Voreese said that Stasya did this because the doors were too heavy for normal people and that the locking mechanism for them had also been quite far ahead of its time.

Voreese guided them down, all the way to what seemed like the bottom of the tower, only to reveal a hidden door in the floor that led deeper still."

"665

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 2/5)--

'Tell them to wait here,' said Voreese, motioning to the surveyors.

Hector hesitated, glancing between her and the others.

'Why?' said Garovel.

'You won't want too many people to know about what I'm going to show you.'

Garovel nodded, and Hector did as she requested. Miss Calloway didn't try to argue with him. Her team was content with just investigating the rest of the tower. They still looked a bit spooked, but curiosity appeared to be getting the better of them now as Hector heard them quietly marveling amongst themselves at the remarkable condition, noting in particular that the floor wasn't even very dusty.

'Roman, guard the door,' said Voreese. 'Make sure they don't follow us. I'll tell you all about it later.'

He frowned but nodded.

Hector proceeded downward with the two reapers. After a staircase, he arrived in a rather large chamber. He shined his light around and found it empty, save a thick lever adjacent the staircase. It was stuck into a bulky gear embedded in the floor.

Voreese pointed at the lever. 'Pull that toward you. You'll need some strength for it.'

Garovel grabbed his shoulder.

Hector inhaled deeply as the vigor coursed through him. He took hold of the lever with both hands and pulled. Even with the enhancements, it resisted him, but he slowly won out. The lever moved, and the gear turned, and Hector heard the scraping rumble of heavy stone sliding open--the same sound that the doors of nightrock made, only this one was much deeper. The sound ceased as soon as he stopped pulling the lever.

'Keep going,' said Voreese. 'Yank the lever free and then put it in the other end of the gear. I know it's annoying, but this is the oldest part of an already ancient castle. You'll have to forgive the primitive design.'

He did as she asked, making two more rounds with the lever and gear.

'That should be enough. You don't need to open it all the way.'

"Open what?" said Hector. He was looking around the room and not seeing anything."

"666 mwahaha

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 3/5)--

'Look down,' said Garovel.

And then he saw it. Part of the floor had slid away, revealing an impressive rectangular slit in the nightrock. At this angle, he couldn't see anything within, only pitch blackness. He stepped closer for a better look.

'Don't fall in,' said Voreese. 'If you do, it'll be two and a half hours before you hit the bottom.'

Hector stared at her. "W-what? What the hell is this?"

'This, dear Hector, is the reason why Stasya built Warrenhold here. As old as this castle is, this pit right here is even older.'

He shined his light through. He could see gray walls in an almost perfect cylinder extending straight downward. And that was it. He couldn't see the bottom. It just kept going. The hole itself was wide enough for perhaps three people to stand adjacent with their arms spread.

‘Where does it let out?’ asked Garovel.

‘Right near Capaporo. You know it?’

‘Yeah. Are you sure it still exists, though? I haven’t been there in, oh, three hundred years, maybe.’

‘I don’t know. It’s been seventy years for me.’

‘Hmm.’

“E-excuse me, but... I don’t understand anything that’s happening...”

‘We wouldn’t expect you to,’ said Garovel.

“Uh... well, what is this hole?”

‘It’s a portal to Hell,’ said Garovel.

Hector just blinked dully.

‘I don’t think he believes you,’ said Voreese.

‘Tch. He probably remembers that I don’t believe in Hell.’

‘Should’ve lied better, then.’ A beat passed as she stared at Hector. ‘It leads to Heaven.’

‘...I don’t think he’s buying it.’

“Agh. Please, just tell me the truth.”

Voreese looked at Garovel, who shrugged. ‘Alright,’ she said. ‘It leads to a second human civilization that diverged from the surface of Eleg so long ago that nobody up here even knows about it.’

Again, Hector just stared.

‘We call it the Undercrust,’ said Garovel. ‘It’s a layer of rock in Eleg’s mantle with caves that make the one here in Warrenhold look like nothing. There were about five hundred million people living down there, last I heard.’

“Wait. Are... are you actually being serious?”

"667

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 4/5)--

Voreese nodded. 'We know it sounds like bullshit to you. You've been taught your whole life that the whole world has basically been explored to its fullest. But it hasn't.'

"H-hold on a second," said Hector. "You're saying... I don't... What?"

'It would help if you asked a clear question,' said Garovel.

"Well, but... I mean, isn't it, like, super hot down there? Molten lava and stuff?"

'Sure is,' said Voreese. 'They've developed a variety of methods for dealing with that. Heatproofing, heat funneling, supercooling--I'm a little curious to see what else they've come up with since I've been gone. It helps that Sermung and Sai-hee both live down there a lot of the time. From what I hear, those two are like walking safe zones. And the same is supposedly true of a lot of their strongest supporters.'

'Some of the residents are also flat out immune to the temperatures,' added Garovel. 'You should close the hole back up now, by the way.'

Their nonchalance was more than a little befuddling. Hector wasn't sure whether to believe them or not. He returned to the lever and started cranking it back the other way. The slit in the floor slowly scraped shut again. "You guys, ah... I really don't see how there could be a whole different civilization living that far underground. I mean, if that's true, then wouldn't we have discovered them by now?"

'It's too difficult to get there from here,' said Voreese. 'That pit right there is almost four hundred kilometers deep. But that kind of vertical distance is difficult to imagine. The tallest mountain in Atreya, for instance, is only about three kilometers high. The tallest mountain in the world is barely ten.'

Hector's brow rose. "Huh..."

'And those mountains are sloped, making them a little easier to climb and descend. This pit goes straight down, more or less. Servants can reach the bottom simply enough by falling to their death and then reviving, but how the fuck is a normal person supposed to make the trip? And supposing they did somehow survive the journey, they'd still have to make it all the way back up again, which is even more difficult.”

"668

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 5/5)--

‘And that’s not even factoring in how a surface-dweller is supposed to deal with the other dangers in the Undercrust,’ said Garovel. ‘The heat alone is problematic enough, but there’s plenty of other shit to worry about, too.’

‘It’s just not feasible,’ said Voreese. ‘It’d be like trying to cross the ocean before boats were invented. Normal people--in either civilization--simply don’t have the technology to use these holes yet. Maybe one day, they will, but until then, it’s essentially a reaper and servant privilege.’

‘And EVEN THEN, not every servant can make the trip, either.’

‘Right, yeah.’

‘Just because the servant can get down the hole doesn’t mean they can get back up. You’d probably be okay, though, since you can just make an infinite platform for yourself.’

He scratched his cheek. “How would I survive the temperatures?”

‘Oh, no, you’d be toast as you are now,’ said Garovel. ‘You’d have to grow a lot more powerful first.’

“Ah...”

‘Believe us now?’ said Voreese.

Hector tilted his head and scrunched his face up a little. “Eh... I just... I don’t know. Don’t they have, like, uh... seismological, er... radar? Or something?”

‘They do,’ said Garovel. ‘But that doesn’t provide the most precise of measurements. Besides, a city-sized hole in the planet would only look like a tiny speck against the gigantic mass surrounding it, and specks can be explained away as any number of other things. I don’t think a seismologist’s first guess would be, “Hey, I bet that’s a city full of people!”’

Hector opened his mouth to give further voice to his doubts but found that he'd run out of counterarguments. He still didn't want to believe them, though. It just seemed too ridiculous.

Garovel laughed. 'Do you remember when you asked me how the Vanguard managed to prevent Abolish from drilling into the planet's core?'

He did remember, and it made him blink a few times as he recalled Garovel's answer, or rather the lack thereof. "You said you didn't feel like telling me... You said it'd make a nice surprise one day..."

'Welp. Surprise!'"

"669 -- LXXVII.

--donation bonus week #1 (day 5/5, post 1/5)--

Chapter Seventy-Seven: 'Lord of the Rain, go calmly...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The rain finally ceased as Zeff neared the decadent mountain town of Rheinhal. It was one of the oldest settlements in Sair, but it hardly showed. A building older than ten years was a rare sight here, and the lush greenery combined with the first sunlight he'd seen in weeks gave the city a lively glow. It was something of a tourist trap, this place. Hotels, casinos, amusement parks, shopping malls, movie theaters, and more than a few out-of-season ski resorts sat under the immense shadow of the Wares Mountains.

They were the more impressive sight to behold, Zeff felt, living well up to their status as the fourth largest range in the world. Harsh silver-gray cliffs occasionally poked out from the otherwise high-reaching forests, only to be capped by snow at their peaks. They were the great dividing line, these mountains, between much of the continent and particularly between western and eastern Sair. The Wetlands and the Drylands. The Rainlords and the Sandlords. Ancient enemies turned modern rivals and kindred spirits.

Zeff's thoughts went to Asad and his family. It had been too long already, he knew. He remembered Asad proposing his son for an arranged marriage with Emiliana, an honorable offer which Zeff found fiercely tempting. Join houses with his old friend? Become the first bridge between the Rain and Sand in history? And he knew that merely by asking, Asad ran the risk of upsetting the other Sandlords. It was not an offer made lightly, so it had been very difficult to tell the man no. That was more than six months ago now, and Asad had still not spoken to him since. Zeff would have to try harder to make reparations upon his next visit to Kuros.

He made his way toward the foot of the mountains, where stood the oldest reminder of Rheinhal's ancestral heritage, Rhein's Keep. Previously, the name Rheinhal belonged solely to the castle itself, but as the city flourished around it and came to be arguably even more famous for its wealth, the castle was renamed Rhein's Keep to avoid confusion."

"669 -- LXXVII.

--donation bonus week #1 (day 5/5, post 1/5)--
Chapter Seventy-Seven: 'Lord of the Rain, go calmly...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The rain finally ceased as Zeff neared the decadent mountain town of Rheinhal. It was one of the oldest settlements in Sair, but it hardly showed. A building older than ten years was a rare sight here, and the lush greenery combined with the first sunlight he'd seen in weeks gave the city a lively glow. It was something of a tourist trap, this place. Hotels, casinos, amusement parks, shopping malls, movie theaters, and more than a few out-of-season ski resorts sat under the immense shadow of the Waress Mountains.

They were the more impressive sight to behold, Zeff felt, living well up to their status as the fourth largest range in the world. Harsh silver-gray cliffs occasionally poked out from the otherwise high-reaching forests, only to be capped by snow at their peaks. They were the great dividing line, these mountains, between much of the continent and particularly between western and eastern Sair. The Wetlands and the Drylands. The Rainlords and the Sandlords. Ancient enemies turned modern rivals and kindred spirits.

Zeff's thoughts went to Asad and his family. It had been too long already, he knew. He remembered Asad proposing his son for an arranged marriage with Emiliana, an honorable offer which Zeff found fiercely tempting. Join houses with his old friend? Become the first bridge between the Rain and Sand in history? And he knew that merely by asking, Asad ran the risk of upsetting the other Sandlords. It was not an offer made lightly, so it had been very difficult to tell the man no. That was more than six months ago now, and Asad had still not spoken to him since. Zeff would have to try harder to make reparations upon his next visit to Kuros.

He made his way toward the foot of the mountains, where stood the oldest reminder of Rheinhal's ancestral heritage, Rhein's Keep. Previously, the name Rheinhal belonged solely to the castle itself, but as the city flourished around it and came to be arguably even more famous for its wealth, the castle was renamed Rhein's Keep to avoid confusion."

"670

--donation bonus week (day 5/5, post 2/5)--

Rhein's Keep stood on a larger hill all to itself, allowing most of the city to see its four massive turrets with round crenellations and flying the blue-and-gold flags of Sair. And of course, as the central Vanguardian stronghold in the nation, the castle remained in immaculate condition despite its age. Pristine, arching windows. Fresh crimson paint for its outer wall. A groomed yard with a madega tree standing in a clear pool. Madegas were certainly not native to this region, which meant it had to have been transplanted here--and recently, too, as Zeff didn't remember seeing it when he visited a year ago.

Axiolis flew close behind him as he made for the castle's northwestern tower. They'd discussed the ambiguous nature of this visit prior to and during the drive. General Lawrence's unexplained order to arrive within twelve hours despite Zeff and Mariana having both been on leave had left everyone a bit unsettled, to say the least, especially after Salazar's departure. Zeff wondered if that was why he'd been called in. Perhaps they wanted information on her; or worse, perhaps they thought he meant to join her and wished to test his loyalty. If so, then he figured that it was going to be a very long and unpleasant couple of days. But as ever, he was prepared.

Familiar faces were everywhere, comrades and friends. The opportunity to see everyone like this had become rather rare for him, and he was glad to see most of them go out of their way to welcome him with a smile and an occasional handshake. He asked what news they had, and among their varied answers was one consistent concern: mounting problems in Calthos. By all accounts, Abolish had gained a foothold there and begun a public defamation campaign against the Sandlords.

Zeff scowled. That had to be one of Abolish's more annoying tactics, surely. The Sandlords were not all Vanguard, just as not all Rainlords were, but they did have strong ties to it. Perhaps that trip to Kuros would happen sooner than he thought."

"671

--donation bonus week (day 5/5, post 3/5)--

Zeff entered Lawrence's office easily enough, passing two silent sentries outside the General's door. He supposed it was a good sign that they didn't stop and search him, at least, but then, it wasn't like General Lawrence needed anyone to protect him from Zeff. In the Vanguard, ranking tended to also denote a person's strength, and Lawrence was certainly not an exception to this.

The office itself was more functional than impressive. Zeff had never known his general to suffer any fools or excesses, and this room very much reflected that, he felt. A simple round chamber with a single window, lamp, filing cabinet, desk, computer, and two chairs. No decorations for either the wood-planked walls or the old cobble floor.

Lawrence stood as Zeff entered. The man's reaper, Dergoz, clung to his arm instead of floating freely. And since Dergoz appeared as a bat, the sight of him looked slightly awkward and terrible at the same time, almost as if the reaper were attempting to bite into the General and drink his blood. With both eyes closed, though, the reaper was probably just sleeping.

"Captain Zeff," said Lawrence. "Thank you for coming." He looked to be in his fifties, but Zeff knew the man's history to be much older than that, spanning upwards of seventy years with the Vanguard.

"Good to see you, ensir."

"Please, have a seat."

Zeff sat, as did Lawrence.

'Is Dergoz alright?' asked Axiolis.

"He is just tired," said Lawrence.

Zeff tilted his head. "Have you recently seen combat, General?"

"It doesn't matter now. I'm sure you're more curious as to why you're here."

Zeff nodded.

"I apologize for not telling you. We were afraid you would not come if you knew."

"Why would you think that?"

"Because it has to do with your daughter. She has become a fugitive from the Vanguard."

Zeff reared back in his chair. A fugitive? Gema might have been reckless, sure, but he couldn't imagine her pulling anything that foolish. Moreover, he was sure that he'd found a very reasonable reaper to help guide her."

"672

--donation bonus week (day 5/5, post 4/5)--

As Zeff eyed the General, he took a long breath before asking, "What did Gema do?"

"She killed someone she shouldn't have."

Zeff shut his eyes a moment. "Who, exactly?"

"An Intarian diplomat," said Lawrence. "She has upset a lot of people, Zeff. I was hoping you could tell me where she is."

"Ah..." Zeff shook his head. He was in for an embarrassing conversation, it seemed. "I'm sorry, but I have no idea. My relationship with Gema is... strained. I've not spoken to her in over two years."

"Please, take a moment to think. This is very important. Anything you can tell us about her whereabouts could be helpful. A hiding place she had as a child, perhaps.”

After a beat, he frowned. “I’m sorry, ensir. I honestly have no clue.”

Lawrence eyed Axiolis.

‘Sorry. I don’t have any idea, either.’

Lawrence threw a quick glance at Dergoz on his arm. “There must be something you two can tell me. You’ve both known her since she was born.”

Zeff wasn’t sure how else he could phrase it, so he just said, “I’m sorry, ensir.”

The General’s expression hardened. “You are putting me in a very difficult position, Captain.”

“I wish we could be more help to you, General, but--”

‘Enough,’ said Dergoz suddenly.

Zeff hadn’t realized the reaper had even been listening.

‘I didn’t think Rainlords were in the habit of lying,’ said Dergoz, not sounding particularly sleepy.

Zeff raised an irate eyebrow. “I am not lying.”

“Dergoz, let me--”

‘Silence.’

Axiolis hovered closer to Zeff. ‘Something is wrong here,’ he said privately.

Zeff was beginning to get that impression, too.

‘It is vital that we find Gema Elroy,’ said Dergoz. ‘You are her father. If you do not know where she is, then who does?’

“I don’t know. She has not been home in over two years.”

‘Yes, I heard you the first time.’

‘You seem rather desperate to find her,’ said Axiolis. ‘If she has broken the law, then let Zeff and I be the ones to retrieve her.’

'No, I do not think that would be wise,' said Dergoz."
"673

--donation bonus week (day 5/5, post 5/5)--

'Then I don't know how else we can help you,' said Axiolis.

'Neither do I,' said Dergoz. 'Not so long as you refuse to cooperate.'

'We are cooperating as much as we can. We can't tell you what we don't know. Why are you so quick to assume we are lying? When have we ever given you cause to think we would?'

A thick silence consumed the office as the reapers stared at one another.

'Allow me to simplify your understanding of the situation,' said Dergoz. 'If you do not tell us where we can find your daughter, then we are going to ask your wife. And then we are going to ask your children.'

Zeff's irritated expression slowly melted away, turning first into blank realization, then gradually into a hard glower.

Dergoz was not finished talking, however. 'You are a good man, Zeff. We do not wish to hurt you or your family. But that is the severity of the matter at hand. Gema Elroy must be found at all costs.'

'Why?' said Axiolis. 'What could possibly be so important about Gema that you would threaten to harm our family? Innocent children!'

'Your children are not innocent. They are Elroys, and all Elroys are Vanguard.'

'Pah! You think having Lawrence as your servant gives you the right to change our laws?! Zeff's children are not Vanguard until they come of age! You are threatening the very people we are supposed to protect, you utter fool!'

"Ax, stop," Zeff said lowly, and the reaper seemed to understand.

Dergoz allowed Axiolis to settle down before resuming. 'Your disapproval is noted. Are you going to tell us where Gema is now? Or do you wish to let the situation run its course?'

Zepp tried to think. He didn't have the information they wanted, so obviously, giving it to them wasn't an option. If he lied, perhaps that would buy time, but how much? And what would he even use that time for?

'Ah, but before you answer,' Dergoz went on, 'I should also mention that we have been shadowing your family in Aguary for the past twenty-three hours.'

"674

Zepp gripped both arms of his chair with white-knuckled hands. "You brought me here to isolate me from them."

'Provided you simply cooperate, then--'

"If you think my wife is going to let you take our children into custody for any reason, then you are sorely mistaken."

'She is no longer in Aguary, either,' said Dergoz. 'As soon as we confirmed that you had left the city, your wife received orders to report to Lagemoor. And we all know how dutiful Mariana is.'

'At least tell us why it is so important that you find Gema,' said Axiolis.

'Why? I am sure you already know.'

'But we don't!'

'More lies.'

Zepp was at a loss, growing equal parts desperate and furious, but he kept his voice steady and quiet. "General Lawrence, ensir, how can you condone this action?"

The older man couldn't meet the Rainlord's gaze.

'I don't believe them,' Ax said privately. 'If Mariana left for Lagemoor while you were away, she would have called and told you.'

Zepp squinted. 'You think she ignored the order?'

'Yes. She and Shenado were already suspicious, so it would make sense.'

Dergoz was becoming annoyed. 'Are you trying to buy time? To what end? I hope you are not thinking of fighting Lawrence. You must know that you stand no chance against him. Especially not here.'

The reaper was probably right, but given that none of Zeff's comrades had acted suspiciously when he talked to them earlier, it was a fair bet that they didn't know about the actions being taken against his family. Once upon a time, Rheinhal had been a stronghold of his ancestors, before House Rhein met its end. That this place was now being used against him only made the circumstances sting all the more. But it also reminded him of something.

"If you seize my family, the other Rainlords will not sit idly by," said Zeff.

'They will if they know what is good for them,' said Dergoz.

'Are you mad?' said Axiolis. 'You would risk war with the Rainlords just to find Gema?'

Dergoz chose not to answer.

'We have to run,' Ax said privately."

"675

Zeff wished he had a better idea, but they were already short on time. And by the strained look on Lawrence's face, the man had probably hoped Zeff would volunteer Gema's whereabouts and thereby avoid a confrontation. Zeff certainly didn't want to fight, either, but he wasn't seeing much choice.

If nothing else, he was sure that Mariana would keep their children safe. That woman was prepared for everything. How he wished that he had stayed in Aguary with her. At least then, they could have faced this together. "Perhaps I should call my wife," said Zeff. "We can hear what she thinks of the situation." He reached for the cellphone in his inner coat pocket.

'I would not advise that,' said Dergoz. 'Lawrence will be forced to stop you.'

"Why? Is she not in Lagemoor like you said?"

Again, Dergoz did not respond.

"Fine. We will tell you what you wish to know. But not here. There are too many people around who could overhear."

Dergoz wasn't buying it. 'I think we will risk it. Tell us where Gema is now.'

Zeff sighed and nodded. He relaxed his grip on his chair and shifted his feet.

The ability to materialize more than a single element was a tremendously rare thing, to be sure. There was no learning it. A person could either do it, or they couldn't. It was hardly a coincidence, however, that Zeff ended up with the ability to materialize hydrogen and oxygen together. His was a historic power, one that cropped up every few generations among Rainlords. The Redwater Twins famously both had it at once.

Zeff flexed both arms where they lay, making minimal movement, and immediately, a white cloud materialized all around him, filling the room in a blink. He leapt from his chair and bolted for the exit, all the while pressing his soul into the cloud. Axiolis latched onto him as he ran.

In front of the door, a sudden wall appeared, brilliantly white and massive. Solid radium, it was. Lawrence's deadly ability. Its pearly surface began to blacken with air exposure, creating an outer layer of radium nitride."

"676

It would take more than that to stop Zeff. He launched a tide of water with enough force to shove the radium wall straight through the door, the subsequent radium-water reaction hissing violently and producing streams of hydrogen gas. A single spark could set the gas off at any moment, but that was the last thing Zeff was worried about as he pressed through.

'Do not let Zeff Elroy leave the premises!' shouted Dergoz for all to hear.

The two sentries from earlier were there in the cloud. Even without a clear view, Zeff was able to materialize ice inside their mouths, and in the next instant, frozen spears burst out of their skulls and killed them both. He mumbled an apology to their on-looking reapers. Any servant without a certain level of passive soul-defense might as well have been dead already for all the threat they posed Zeff. He estimated that there were fifteen servants currently within Rhein's Keep whom he could not kill with this strategy, the most problematic of course being Lawrence.

Zeff made it all the way out to the courtyard before encountering his next resistance.

'All guards!' Dergoz was shouting. 'Take Captain Zeff into custody immediately!'

It seemed to be creating more confusion than anything, and Zeff intended to capitalize. He ran for the main gate.

A radium dome fell over him, which would have encased him in darkness if not for the element's faint blue glow. But after a moment, it wasn't so faint. The thing that made the General's power so dangerous was unquestionably the way the man could strengthen the element's radioactivity by empowering it with his soul. It made the radium decay more quickly, but that was a meager price to pay for the waves of debilitating pressure that it sent through the opponent's body. Already, Zeff could feel the weakening effects, bathing him and Axiolis in so much radiation that his regeneration was having a hard time keeping pace.

Zeff armored himself in ice, empowering it with his own soul as well. It only offered partial protection from the radiation, but he didn't intend to stick around. A string of geysers shot up around him and flipped his radioactive prison into the air. Blood oozing from the eyes and nose, Zeff kept running."

"677

Scores of servants were afoot, and he had each one's attention now. Only moments ago, they'd been in the midst of training or en route to another part of the castle or simply standing guard atop the walls. The latter were the first ones to mobilize, but by then, Zeff had already summoned a tidal wave to clear a path to the gate.

And clear a path, it did. Broad enough to envelope the whole courtyard and taller than the highest tower, only a handful of servants managed to get out of the way. The raging waters consumed everyone else and smashed them against the castle's unflinching walls. And before that was even done, Zeff loosed another wave behind him, just to give Lawrence something to do.

'Can you escape underground?' said Zeff.

'I sense a soul net below us,' said Ax, 'but it only goes as far as the castle walls.'

And the reaper didn't have to explain any further. The most efficient means of escape was to have Axiolis phase through the ground. At full speed, the reaper would be protected by a hundred meters of rock within seconds; and within a minute, he'd be completely out of Lawrence's range, at which point, Zeff would be able to spear himself through the skull and be revived at Axiolis' leisure.

This was the plan. He just had to get Axiolis to the other side of the wall first.

Zeff launched himself into the air with a sudden ice platform. He would have been able to clear the wall then and there if not for the gigantic radium dome that materialized to stop him. There would be no shoving this one out of his way. It covered the entirety of Rhein's Keep, supplanting midday sunlight with a dim blue gleam.

But Zeff had expected as much. Anything less would have been downright lazy on the General's part.

Still mid-flight, Zeff made a fist and half-extended his middle and index fingers. On its own, the hand gesture had no great meaning, but to Zeff, it was a code of muscle memory, a thing that had helped him develop, memorize, and train a particularly difficult usage of his power."

"678

Just beyond the knuckles of his two fingers, a self-sustaining jet of water materialized--thin and precise and inheriting an overwhelming amount of forward velocity. It was a pressurized water drill, strong enough to cut through solid metal under its own power, and when he strengthened it with his soul, even Lawrence's radium would give way. So when Zeff collided with the dome, he pressed the jet into it like a needle into a pincushion.

With nothing to hold onto, Zeff let himself drop back to the ground, but he kept the water jet exactly where it was, and on the way down, made two more and pressed them into the wall as well. He'd created three points of structural weakness, which wasn't much, but it was a start. He knew that if he used only one jet to cut a large enough hole for himself, Lawrence could just fill the thing back in before Zeff even finished cutting. Multiple jets were more efficient and would prove difficult for Lawrence to get rid of, since they would cut through anything they touched. The only difficulty was keeping it all straight in his head. They were tiny burning dots in space, held in place by his mind alone, and he needed more of them, but he first needed to buy more time for himself.

Radium tried to clap around his body, but the ice armor that was already there resisted, and Zeff broke free with a storm of crystalline spikes. He ran alongside the blue wall, throwing another tidal wave with his left hand while readying a fourth jet with his right.

A cliff of radium rose to Lawrence's defense, and the water broke upon it, protecting not just the General but also the other servants rallying behind him. The chemical reaction sent huge, sizzling streams of hydrogen gas into the air. And then, without warning, the gas detonated.

An enormous fireball lit up the whole castle. There was no way to tell what ignited it; many different servant abilities could have been the trigger.

Zeff shielded himself with water."

"679

The force of the blast pushed him back against the dome, but he was far enough away that it didn't even break his concentration. Not everyone was so fortunate. When the air cleared, the castle's barracks were half-gone.

'God, I hope there aren't any normal people here,' said Axiolis.

Zeff took the opportunity to plant more drills. He got out four more within close proximity to one another before a trio of servants attacked him in unison.

‘Don’t kill Axiolis!’ ordered Dergoz. ‘We need them alive!’

Zeff knew each attacker. Oscar Murray, Adam Leroy, Davin Echer. All decent, loyal men in his mind, and unfortunately, they were all too strong for Zeff to kill instantly.

But that didn’t mean they were strong enough to stop him.

Oscar sent a path of destruction at him while Adam and Davin tried to flank him with an arm of freezing gas and a flashy silver sword, respectively.

An ice platform flung Zeff up and over their attacks, and he formed another hand sign--middle and index fingers fully extended, this time with both hands. Literal hand guns, they were, both in shape and in function. Bullets of empowered ice shot out in rapid clusters. His three opponents scattered, but Zeff still mowed down Oscar and Adam. Davin only survived because of sudden silver armor, which had still taken a beating.

‘Look out!’ said Axiolis.

A long stretch of radium reached all the way from across the courtyard, and Zeff used a block of ice to knock himself out of the way. But it wasn’t enough. The radium branched out after him and gored him through the stomach. It continued branching downward, trying to find its leverage against the ground in order to keep Zeff suspended in mid-air.

Again, Zeff had to multitask. A water jet to cut himself free. A shower of frozen bullets to keep Lawrence busy. Zeff hit the ground with a thud and yanked the rest of the radium out of his chest, thankful he couldn’t feel the awful burns it had left in his flesh."

"680

It was time for another tidal wave, he decided. Water raged across the courtyard, dousing scattered fires, tossing rubble and battered servants around.

It bought him the extra bit of time he needed. After one more water jet pressed into the dome, he was at last able to punch through with an icy gauntlet. The castle wall lay on the other side, and he immediately launched himself over. As soon as he landed on the outer steps, he started running. 'Go!' he told Axiolis.

Thankfully, at least, Lawrence's enhanced radiation didn't affect reapers as strongly as living things, so when Axiolis broke away from Zeff, the reaper was only suffering from a bit of ghostly smoldering. He vanished into the ground.

Zeff saw the radium dome disintegrate and knew that Lawrence would be on him any moment. He lowered his own soul defenses in order to be able to kill himself. The ice formed in his mouth, about to pierce his brain.

Instead, a bladed disc sliced through his mouth, severing the top half of his head from the rest of his body. And he saw Lawrence standing there on the wall with a clenched fist.

Still conscious, Zeff could only watch as the radium clapped around his head. Axiolis had escaped. He had not.

--++--++--

Lawrence carried Zeff's radium-coated head under one arm as he reentered Rhein's Keep. Upturned earth, shattered stone, and regenerating bodies abounded. He immediately had Lieutenant Adam Leroy freeze Zeff's head for him--or rather, for Dergoz.

'You let Axiolis get away,' Dergoz said privately.

'Zeff was stronger than I anticipated,' said Lawrence.

'You are lying. You held back.'

'Of course I did. You wanted them alive.'

'That is not what I mean, and you know it.'

General Xavier Lawrence refrained from further argument. He knew there was nothing to be gained from it. And besides, the reaper wasn't exactly wrong. He couldn't disobey Dergoz overtly, but occasionally, small victories were still possible. For all of Dergoz's threats, Lawrence knew that the reaper didn't want to release a servant with his level of power. It would mean starting over from scratch, letting nearly eighty years go to waste."

"681 -- LXXVIII.

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 1/5)--

Dergoz growled. 'Axiolis will contact the other Rainlords and rally them against us. We must acquire the Elroys as soon as possible and interrogate them. If they give up Gema's location, then we can simply surrender Zeff's brain to the Rainlords and avoid unnecessary conflict.'

Lawrence didn't think it would be so easy but decided to keep his opinion to himself.

'I know you are displeased with me and with what I am forcing you to do,' said Dergoz. 'But if we don't find her in time, they will kill us all. Do you understand that? Not just you and me. Our whole division will be destroyed. Everyone who works under us. Extinguished.'

'Then perhaps you are being loyal to the wrong person. If we tried to help the girl--'

'It's much too late for that. When Sermung falls, there will be no one to protect those loyal to him.'

'And if he doesn't fall?'

'Then the Vanguard is doomed, anyway.'

And therein lay the source of their disagreement. Lawrence wasn't in the mood for another futile debate, however, and started back for his office. He didn't want to give the order to take the Elroys into custody, but unfortunately, it wasn't up to him. And knowing that it would take Axiolis at least two hours to reach Aguary--if that was indeed where the reaper was headed--then Mariana and her children would have no warning when the ten servants shadowing them took action.

Lawrence's mood only worsened as he walked.

Chapter Seventy-Eight: 'The undefeated woman...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Mariana sat in the front den, meditating. She'd decided to keep Marcos and Ramira home for the day without explanation. They'd not been terribly upset about it. Emiliana, on the other hand, had been rather insistent about attending school, and since Mariana didn't have an exact reason why her daughter should stay home, she ended up relenting and letting the girl go. And when the Lady Elroy went to tell Francisco to accompany his sister, she found the boy already prepared to leave.

Mariana wasn't given to smiling very often, but that had earned one from her."

"681 -- LXXVIII.

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 1/5)--

Dergoz growled. 'Axiolis will contact the other Rainlords and rally them against us. We must acquire the Elroys as soon as possible and interrogate them. If they give up Gema's location, then we can simply surrender Zeff's brain to the Rainlords and avoid unnecessary conflict.'

Lawrence didn't think it would be so easy but decided to keep his opinion to himself.

'I know you are displeased with me and with what I am forcing you to do,' said Dergoz. 'But if we don't find her in time, they will kill us all. Do you understand that? Not just you and me. Our whole division will be destroyed. Everyone who works under us. Extinguished.'

'Then perhaps you are being loyal to the wrong person. If we tried to help the girl--'

'It's much too late for that. When Sermung falls, there will be no one to protect those loyal to him.'

'And if he doesn't fall?'

'Then the Vanguard is doomed, anyway.'

And therein lay the source of their disagreement. Lawrence wasn't in the mood for another futile debate, however, and started back for his office. He didn't want to give the order to take the Elroys into custody, but unfortunately, it wasn't up to him. And knowing that it would take Axiolis at least two hours to reach Aguary--if that was indeed where the reaper was headed--then Mariana and her children would have no warning when the ten servants shadowing them took action.

Lawrence's mood only worsened as he walked.

Chapter Seventy-Eight: 'The undefeated woman...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Mariana sat in the front den, meditating. She'd decided to keep Marcos and Ramira home for the day without explanation. They'd not been terribly upset about it. Emiliana, on the other hand, had been rather insistent about attending school, and since Mariana didn't have an exact reason why her daughter should stay home, she ended up relenting and letting the girl go. And when the Lady Elroy went to tell Francisco to accompany his sister, she found the boy already prepared to leave.

Mariana wasn't given to smiling very often, but that had earned one from her."

"682

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 2/5)--

'It is a little exciting,' said Shenado, making Mariana open one eye to look at her. 'I don't think we have ever ignored orders like this before. I wonder if we are going to get in trouble.'

'Probably.' She shut her eye again and took a deep breath. 'Whatever the punishment, I will take it.'

'Maybe they didn't realize that Zeff was out of town.'

'They certainly know now that I have told them.'

'Oddly sloppy on their part.'

'Perhaps they don't know you and I very well. Even after all these years in Lawrence's division, I still feel like the oddball out, sometimes.'

'There aren't very many women in his division. I wonder if that has anything to do with it. Fifteen years, and they've assigned you a whole ten missions. Compare that to Zeff, who has had twenty-eight.'

She gave a slight nod. 'It is a bit annoying.'

‘Maybe they think you are the “homemaker” type.’

‘I doubt I give anyone that impression. It is probably more to do with my ability. On paper, my simple destruction type isn’t as impressive as Zeff’s power.’

‘If they only knew.’

She smirked faintly.

‘I expect they’ll have Cisco go on his first mission soon,’ said Shenado.

‘They should. He has been ready for months.’

‘You aren’t worried?’

‘Of course I am.’

‘You don’t act like it. You didn’t act like it with Gema, either.’

‘You would rather I made a fuss?’

‘It would be interesting to see.’

‘I knew what I was signing up for when I joined the Vanguard. And I knew what having children with Zeff would mean. Our role is only to protect them until they can protect themselves.’

Shenado let Mariana return to meditating. After a little while, however, a call came in on the speaker box. The butler moved to answer it for her, but Mariana waved him off.

<“There are two men here to see you,”> said Nico’s voice. <“Say their names are Jonathan Flint and Charlie Day.”>

Mariana squinted, vaguely recognizing the names. She looked to Shenado.

‘I remember them,’ the reaper said. ‘Ask why they are here.’”

"683

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 3/5)--

“What is their business here?” said Mariana.

After a spell, Nico said, <“They say your presence is requested in Lagemoor. They’ve come to escort you there.”>

She exchanged glances with Shenado again. “Inform them that I do not intend to go to Lagemoor so long as my husband is not here to look after our children. As I told the man on the phone, I will depart for Lagemoor as soon as Zeff returns.”

There came another long pause. <“...I’m afraid they are insisting, enma’am. Ah! Wait! You can’t enter through there--oh! Whoa. Uh... I’m sorry, Mrs. Elroy, but I don’t think I can stop them...”>

“It’s fine, Nico. You and Jorem, take the rest of the day off.”

<“Oh, ah. Yes, en--”>

Mariana ended the call and waved the butler over.

‘I don’t like this,’ said Shenado.

Mariana was ahead of her. “Claudio, gather everyone into the panic room immediately and arm yourselves. Inform them that this is not a drill and do not come out until I say so.”

Claudio was a middle-aged gentleman of enduring loyalty, having served the Elroys since Zeff was in his twenties. “Right away, my lady.” He walked briskly off.

‘Jonathan and Charlie should have reapers, but I don’t sense them. They must be keeping their distance.’

Mariana moved to the large sofa and removed the soft cushions. A long metal box lay beneath them. It had no lid or point of entry. She ran her hand along the top, breaking it open with her power and revealing one of several such stashes she had hidden around the house. In this one, there were six grenades, ten knives, two handguns, one semi-automatic rifle, three boxes of ammunition, two small black remotes each with twin red buttons, and a single landmine.

She pulled out her cellphone next and called Cisco, arming herself to the teeth while she waited for him to pick up.

‘They’re at the front door.’

She expected to hear an explosion or someone breaking in. Instead, she heard the doorbell.

Shenado cocked a furry eyebrow at her. 'Little odd.'

Her son wasn't answering his phone, Mariana realized. She tried Zeff."
"684

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 4/5)--

'They're just waiting,' said Shenado. 'It seems they aren't itching for a fight, at least. Perhaps you should answer the door. Cautiously, of course.'

Mariana glared at her phone as it continued ringing. Zeff wasn't answering, either. She made her way to the entrance slowly. She stopped to arm and plant her landmine in a very particular place--in a narrow doorway beneath a Jesbolese rug of just the right weight. It was beautifully woven with blue-gold swirls and dark frills, but she'd bought it for this exact purpose. On its own, the rug wouldn't trigger the mine, but if someone stepped on any part of it, it would go off.

'Don't step on it by accident,' her reaper said privately.

A gun in one hand, Mariana proceeded to the door and cracked it open. The gun was really just a quicker supplement, of course. Her free hand was the much more dangerous weapon, in many ways.

"Lady Elroy, please pardon our intrusion, but we needed to speak with you as soon as possible. I'm Charlie. This is my colleague, Jonathan. May we come in?"

"You may not." From what she could see, both men appeared to be in their mid-to-late twenties. Charlie was the blond one, Jonathan the bespectacled one. They wore very casual clothing, nothing that would make them stand out in a crowd, surely.

'We've met before,' said Shenado. 'Nine years ago. You were both new recruits.'

"Yes," said Jonathan. "We've been assigned to protect you. We didn't mean to startle you, but we really don't have time to dawdle here. We need you to come with us to Lagemoor immediately."

"I am not leaving my children here."

"Oh, of course," said Jonathan. "We're to bring them, as well."

"We've received a credible threat against your family," said Charlie. "We are only here to escort you and your children to a more secure location."

Mariana was far from convinced. "Why did you not simply tell me this over the phone?"

"Time is short," said Jonathan. "Allow us to explain on the way. Please just trust us for now."

"No."

Both men frowned."

"685

--donation bonus week (day 1/5, post 5/5)--

'With respect, we don't know anything about you, so why should we trust you?' said Shenado.

"Please, we're here to help," said Charlie. "Call General Lawrence, if you must. He will confirm."

"I have been trying to call my husband," said Mariana. "Why is he not answering?"

"Captain Zeff was captured," said Charlie.

Mariana's expression flickered. "By whom?"

"A rogue faction within the Vanguard. They want your family, because you have information regarding the whereabouts of your daughter, Gema."

'Why do they want Gema?'

"I'm sorry, but I don't know any more than that," said Charlie.

Shenado paused. 'Where are your reapers?'

"Scouting the area for threats," said Jonathan.

Mariana eyed the two men again, still not opening the door any farther.

Her instincts told her not to trust them, but she knew her instincts to be a bit jaded. Everything they said sounded plausible, at least. And if there really was another threat out there, then ignoring these men might mean putting her children in even more danger. She clenched her jaw at the tense silence, uncertain what to do, and glanced at Shenado for help.

‘Shut the door,’ the reaper told her privately. ‘Tell them you don’t want their help, and then let’s see how they react.’

Mariana closed it and backed away from the door’s treated gray wood. “Thank you for the warning! But I will be protecting my family without your help!”

“No, please, listen to us!” came Jonathan’s muffled voice. “We’re only concerned for your safety!”

“I appreciate that! You can tell General Lawrence I refused your assistance!”

They pleaded a few more times, but Mariana said nothing further. She kept backing up, consciously stepping closer to her covered landmine, and tried Cisco again while she waited. Still no answer.

When the pleas stopped, Mariana hunkered down and listened intently.

‘They’re moving away from the door,’ Shenado informed her. ‘They appear to be leaving... Hmm. We’ll wait a bit more before going after them.’ Abruptly, however, the reaper’s head twitched to the side. ‘I sense three more souls entering the property from the rear. I don’t recognize them.’”

"686

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 1/5)--

They’d only sent three servants to retrieve her? If it came to a fight on her own land, three random Vanguardian lackeys did not concern her very much. As she cut through the Main House toward the courtyard, she couldn’t help feeling a little underwhelmed.

‘Oh, I sense two more,’ Shenado added. ‘One each for the east and west wings. I don’t recognize them, either.’

Mariana was now sufficiently whelmed. She slowed her pace to look at her cellphone. There was certainly no chance of help arriving before the fighting broke out, but she wasn't above asking. The first Rainlord in her contact list was Joana Cortes--formerly Joana Elroy. A bit obnoxious, perhaps, but still a good woman, in addition to being Zeff's sister.

'Charlie and Jonathan are returning now, too. Front entrance like before.'

Okay. Seven opponents was quite enough for her. Thankfully, Joana picked up after the second ring.

<"Mary! Hey!">

"Joana, shut up and listen. My house is under attack. There are seven servants here. Charlie Day and Jonathan Flint are two of them. I am not joking. I need assistance right now. Do you understand?"

There was no reply.

"Hello? Joana?" The call had dropped, she realized. She growled and tried the number again, but it wasn't even ringing this time. There was no telling how much Joana had heard. Mariana was kicking herself for not making the call sooner. If she'd known that she really was under assault and not just being extra paranoid, she definitely would have.

'No good?' said Shenado.

"It's being jammed."

'They've probably already cut the landline, then. Ah--no time to check. They are getting very close now. Dead ahead.'

Mariana pocketed her phone, exchanging it for one of the small remotes she'd taken from her weapons cache. Its two red buttons were unlit. She pressed the left one, then right one, then both together, then right, then left, then left again. The arming sequence. Both buttons lit up now.

She stopped at the door to the rainy courtyard and looked through. She pressed the right button and was pleased to see four automated turrets pop out of the stony half-pillars around the center pool. As she'd hoped, whatever was jamming her phone didn't have the right frequency for this."

"687

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 2/5)--

Mariana left the courtyard behind and headed for the eastern wing. 'Is everyone in the panic room?'

'Yes. I can sense Ramira, Marcos, and all the staff there.'

Good news, at least. Her one and only objective right now was to protect that room at all costs. It sat in the center of the Main House, and though it was designed to take a beating, defending it from four different directions at once was going to be difficult by herself. Her first priority was to get all the turrets set up. As an extra safety measure, she needed to be within five meters to activate them. She hadn't wanted them to trigger unless she could see everyone currently standing in their line of fire. A bit inconvenient, perhaps, but she did want her children to live here after all.

As she neared the eastern garden hall, she heard a muffled crash from the front of the house.

'Jonathan and Charlie have broken in.'

A booming thud followed, making the floor and walls tremble around her.

'...Well, Jonathan is dead.'

She'd hoped the landmine would claim them both, but she supposed that was expecting too much. She reached the unwallled garden hall and activated the turrets there. They descended from the light fixtures in the ceiling. She could hear the turrets back in the courtyard opening fire as she ran for the western hall next, intending to intercept Charlie along the way. Her turret remote was exchanged for a handgun.

'He's about to be straight ahead of you. Attack now.'

Mariana clenched her fist and summoned the path of destruction. It tore a triangular hole into the door, large enough for her to jump through, and ripped its way across the chamber, blowing a hefty table to pieces. Charlie was indeed there, but he managed to roll out of the way at the last moment.

She was already firing at him, catching him in the shoulder and in the neck. He pointed with one finger. Mariana jerked left behind the sofa, but the flesh in her gun arm began to boil, and the sleeve of her overshirt burst into flames."

"688

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 3/5)--

Mariana decided that burning alive wasn't enough to stop her from popping out of cover and ripping the air apart with her ability again.

Charlie lost an arm fleeing back the way he came. Mariana tossed a grenade after him and then dropped to the floor, trying to pat the flames out as she rolled.

'You didn't get him,' Shenado told her in private. 'He's by the northern stairwell. I'm not sure what his power is yet, but it seems like an alteration type.'

Pushing him back would have to do. If he really did have alteration, then he would probably try to keep his distance from her, and she simply didn't have the time to deal with that right now. The western hall needed its turrets first. Half-scorched, she picked herself up and ran as hard as she could.

'Too late. Go to your right.'

That led to the kitchen. Mariana immediately saw the enemy servant entering from the western hall, and she destroyed half the room with her attack. The bulky man tried to cancel it out with his own path of destruction, but it certainly didn't go in his favor. Her path plowed through his and claimed an arm and a chunk of his ribcage. While he staggered from the impact, she launched another wave. He tried to dodge this one, but having anticipated as much, Mariana's closed fist opened into a hook-shape. Her path curved mid-flight and obliterated the rest of the man's body, save only his head. She didn't hesitate to grab him by his long black bangs and carry him off with her.

Rather than returning to the courtyard again, she elected to go straight to the panic room.

'There are only three left,' said Shenado. 'Two coming in from the courtyard, plus Charlie from the front.'

Three was a much more manageable number, of course, but Mariana knew better than to relax too soon. If these three had survived her booby-traps, then they were probably the strongest of the seven. And there was still the matter of the others coming back to life if she let this fight drag out too long."

"689

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 4/5)--

The panic room was embedded in the floor beneath the dining hall. Shenado warned her that the two unknown servants were also about to enter the same chamber through the southern door, so when Mariana arrived, she flung their comrade's severed head at them. And they probably weren't expecting that, because it stole their attention long enough for her to launch a large wave of destruction.

They dove in opposite directions, the two men. A thin one and a short one. That was about the extent of her distinction between them as she whipped out her semi-automatic rifle and showered the short man with gunfire.

She'd apparently chosen poorly, however, as the man covered himself in a shiny gray metal, making her bullets bounce off and ricochet around the room. The thin man threw his own path of destruction--but not at her. It went for the floor, beneath the long banquet table in the middle of the room, and Mariana's eyes widened, instantly launching her own wave to intercept.

The distorted spaces collided. Hers won out, but a chunk of the floor was gone. She couldn't tell how deeply the man's path had cut through. The panic room's walls were strong, but they couldn't have withstood that attack.

She didn't have time to worry, however. The short man was charging her now, which was a strangely foolish thing to do--unless he was only trying to distract her.

'Charlie on your right,' Shenado warned.

Mariana ran left for the thin man, as he was the priority now and needed to at least be kept busy so that he didn't attack the panic room again. She didn't see Charlie miss with his attack. His almost invisible power collided with a rosewood cabinet, instead, and gouged a smoking hole into it, hardly a centimeter wide.

She launched another wave at the thin man, who fled around the banquet table while the short man tried to get in her way. His metal arm swung at her. She slid past it, gathered her power into her fist, and punched the man's shoulder clean off."

"690

--donation bonus week (day 2/5, post 5/5)--

The metal man flew back, leaving his arm behind--which she discovered was not merely coated in metal but actually made of it, extending partway into the muscle tissue.

Her three opponents rallied together on the other side of the room, stepping carefully so as not to be too close to one another and thereby render her job easier. For a hesitant moment, they merely looked at her, and she stared them all down from beneath her harsh eyebrows.

"This doesn't have to get any uglier," Charlie tried. "We are not going to hurt your children. If you would just come with us--"

The wave made them scatter as it annihilated the table down the center and punched an isosceles hole into the wall. The ceiling shifted from the impact, and Mariana tossed a grenade after Charlie while pressuring the thin man. She threw a distant punch at thin air, feigning another wave attack. The thin man took the bait and dove right, and Mariana used her other hand to throw a follow-up punch, this time using her power. Her rifle was ripped to pieces as that was the hand she'd held it in, but it was a worthwhile sacrifice, because the path blasted forth and obliterated the thin man completely.

The short man barreled into her, trying to knock her off balance, but Mariana managed to grab him and bring him along for her tumble across the floor. She rolled over him and pinned him down. A burning hole pierced her back and set her on fire again. She ignored it and took the opportunity to remove the metal man's head from his neck. He still had plenty of blood on the inside.

She yanked her flaming overshirt off and threw it aside. Her long hair had caught fire as well, but that didn't matter so much. When she stood back up, Charlie was no longer in the room. She queried Shenado with a look.

'He is retreating,' the reaper said.

Surprising, but wise. She didn't have time to question it, though."

"691

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 1/5)--

She'd only managed to decapitate two of the seven, the first of which had already regenerated down to his shoulders. She fixed that real quick, then proceeded to the speaker box by the southern doorway.

"Can you hear me?" she said. "Is everyone alright?"

<"Lady Elroy..."> It was Claudio's voice, slow and grave. <"Marcos is very badly wounded...">

Her breath caught. Marcos? She didn't understand. "Open the door," was all she could think to say.

The floor groaned and split beneath the decimated banquet table. It separated straight down the center, gradually revealing the thick silver door.

She saw the gaping hole in its nearest corner.

The door pushed open from below, and Claudio's head appeared. His expression was grim. She followed him down the ladder.

And there her son lay, bunched up in the corner next to a chunk of debris and one of the maids. His neck was twisted grotesquely. Blood gushed from his head wound. His eyes were still open, but only just, and they moved to her, holding on her, recognizing his mother.

The boy could only let out a whimper.

Mariana went to him. She could still hardly breathe, and her hands trembled as she touched his shoulder. Her horrified eyes looked at the maid by his side. The young lady had first-aid training, Mariana knew, but this was certainly beyond her.

'Mariana,' Shenado said. 'I know it's terrible, but we have to go. If we stay here, they'll just keep coming.'

Mariana gnashed her teeth. She wanted to argue, wanted to scream, wanted to go back up there and hunt down all their reapers and kill them for good. But Shenado was right, damn her.

She stood. She went to the panel by the ladder. The number pad blurred together as she looked at it. She hadn't cried since she was a girl. She remembered wondering if she even could cry anymore, but that was certainly not in question now. She couldn't stop the tears or the snot or the ragged breaths and just tried to wipe her face so that she could see what she was doing."

"692 -- LXXIX.

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 2/5)--

Mariana punched the numbers in and then waved at everyone to back up toward the walls, completely unable to tell them with words.

The floor pulled away below them, revealing an even deeper hole. This one led beneath the platform--the massive structure holding up the entirety of Agquarey. Lights flicked on around the hole, illuminating the dark waters below. As well as a large motorboat.

Mariana wiped her face another time and then returned to Marcos. She was afraid to ask Shenado the obvious question, but before she decided to move him, she needed to know for certain. 'Is he going to die?'

'...Yes. I'm sorry.'

It was dizzying, almost. She'd seen people die before. Of course she had. Seen friends fall in battle. Been forced to kill them after they'd lost their reapers. She was no stranger to death. But this was something else entirely. This was her son. Her baby boy. He was only twelve, for god's sake.

Shenado had to nudge her along. 'Mariana....'

She bent down and took Marcos into her arms. At his pained groans, she whispered, "Shh... It's okay. You're going to be okay."

And she was not lying. She was not going to let him die. The look she gave Shenado seemed enough for the reaper to understand the truth of this promise as well.

Chapter Seventy-Nine: 'He who burns fiercest...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

As he leaned against the wall, Cisco browsed the news on his phone. It was early in the day still, not even past lunch yet, and he hadn't attended either of his morning classes so far. Nor did he plan to attend any of the others.

Dennex floated next to him, restless as ever. 'Why do these school days last so long?' he said privately.

'Good question.'

To Cisco's eyes, reapers were hulking, skeletal wolves wreathed in black fire in place of flesh or fur. Their flames flickered and waved constantly but made no sound whatsoever, and their big eyes burned yellow with white at the center. Needless to say, Dennex looked woefully out of place in the middle of a school hallway."

"692 -- LXXIX.

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 2/5)--

Mariana punched the numbers in and then waved at everyone to back up toward the walls, completely unable to tell them with words.

The floor pulled away below them, revealing an even deeper hole. This one led beneath the platform--the massive structure holding up the entirety of Aguary. Lights flicked on around the hole, illuminating the dark waters below. As well as a large motorboat.

Mariana wiped her face another time and then returned to Marcos. She was afraid to ask Shenado the obvious question, but before she decided to move him, she needed to know for certain. 'Is he going to die?'

'...Yes. I'm sorry.'

It was dizzying, almost. She'd seen people die before. Of course she had. Seen friends fall in battle. Been forced to kill them after they'd lost their reapers. She was no stranger to death. But this was something else entirely. This was her son. Her baby boy. He was only twelve, for god's sake.

Shenado had to nudge her along. 'Mariana....'

She bent down and took Marcos into her arms. At his pained groans, she whispered, "Shh... It's okay. You're going to be okay."

And she was not lying. She was not going to let him die. The look she gave Shenado seemed enough for the reaper to understand the truth of this promise as well.

Chapter Seventy-Nine: 'He who burns fiercest...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As he leaned against the wall, Cisco browsed the news on his phone. It was early in the day still, not even past lunch yet, and he hadn't attended either of his morning classes so far. Nor did he plan to attend any of the others.

Dennex floated next to him, restless as ever. 'Why do these school days last so long?' he said privately.

'Good question.'

To Cisco's eyes, reapers were hulking, skeletal wolves wreathed in black fire in place of flesh or fur. Their flames flickered and waved constantly but made no sound whatsoever, and their big eyes burned yellow with white at the center. Needless to say, Dennex looked woefully out of place in the middle of a school hallway."

"693

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 3/5)--

'I would rather be reaping souls right now,' said Dennex.

'I know you would, but it's just for today.'

'Is it?'

Cisco looked up from his phone. 'Probably. I guess it just depends on how Ma and Shenado feel tomorrow.'

The reaper sighed.

‘You really enjoy reaping souls, don’t you?’

‘It is very important work. And sadly, it is increasingly overlooked as time goes on. Reapers get too caught up in their dealings with their servants and neglect the suffering of the deceased.’

‘If that’s how you feel, then why did you agree to join the Vanguard with me? Sai-hee’s group is the one that deals the most with reaping, right?’

‘That is exactly why. Sai-hee’s group doesn’t need anyone to remind them of its importance. The Vanguard does. And this way, I also get to fight Abolish a lot more.’

‘Ah. Does Abolish bother to reap souls at all, you think?’

‘I know some of them do. It’s part of their shared belief system. Giving souls to their “Void” consciousness.’

‘Right.’

‘But I also know that some only gather souls in order to feed them to their aberrations. Those are the ones I would most like to kill.’

‘Preying on the helpless.’

‘I can think of nothing more disgusting.’

Cisco could only nod in agreement. He knew the Vanguard had an entire division devoted to hunting down aberrations, and Dennex had told him on their first day together that he intended to join it when Cisco grew strong enough. Once he’d been a servant for four years, he would be able to request a transfer out of the division of his parents, but he would probably need more time than that, he figured. The aberration hunters were renowned for their strength.

He returned to his phone, just waiting for the bell to ring so that he could follow his sister to her next class. She hadn’t been too pleased with his decision to shadow her all day, but he didn’t really care about her opinion. Ma wanted him to look after her, and that was exactly what he was going to do."

"694

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 4/5)--

Cisco had the hallway all to himself while he waited, so whenever someone exited one of the nearby classrooms, he could easily see who it was. Fellow students, mostly. Bathroom breaks and so forth.

At length, he grew bored of the news and began browsing other things on his phone, but when he noticed someone else walking down the hall, he had to look up from his articles and image galleries about various breeds of puppies.

It was a grown man that he saw turning the corner and then stopping when he noticed Cisco standing there. Cisco didn't recognize him, but the man held his gaze longer than seemed normal for a total stranger. Then the man left back the way he came.

He glanced at Dennex. 'Did you see that?'

'I did.'

'Who was he?'

'No idea,' said Dennex. 'Why don't you come stand over here?' He nodded toward the other side of the classroom door, where a fire alarm was embedded in the wall.

Cisco understood and did as the reaper asked.

A few minutes later, the stranger returned, this time with a teacher.

Mrs. Rio walked straight up to him. "Why are you not in class, Mr. Elroy?"

Cisco ignored the question and squinted at the person behind her. He could see a guest's badge hanging around the man's neck, so he probably wasn't a member of the school's faculty. "Mrs. Rio, who is that?"

"Don't try to change the subject. Why are you not in class?"

He eyed her flatly and shrugged. "Because I'm a bad student."

'Really?' said Dennex. 'That's how you're going to play this?'

But the reaper didn't know very much about Cisco's school life, or about Mrs. Rio here. Normally, young teachers were pretty nice to their students, but this woman was a rather well-known hardass in spite of that. Cisco had been stuck with her during his first year, which he hadn't minded so much, until after he'd started gaining a reputation as a bully. Her dislike for him became quite apparent, then."

"695

--donation bonus week (day 3/5, post 5/5)--

The difficult thing about being labeled a bully in one's first year was that it became extra difficult to shake. The person he'd "beat up" had, in truth, been trying to bully him. He was never really sure why. Maybe the kid had a problem with Rainlords; maybe he thought Cisco would be easy prey, because he was so scrawny back then; or maybe he just didn't like Cisco's face--he'd heard as much before. It seemed to intuitively annoy certain types of people, like they thought he was silently judging them. Though, in all fairness, sometimes he was.

Moreover, since the real bully had also been a first-year, none of the teachers knew he was a bully, which made it all the easier to lay the blame on Cisco. And after that, Cisco often attracted the kinds of people who thought being a bully was cool. Just as often, rather than making friends, he would tell them to go screw themselves.

That hadn't done him many favors, either. Alex Belos was one of only three friends he'd ever made at this school.

But it was fine. Cisco didn't care that much. He had more important things on his mind, anyway. Maybe if Gema had stayed and finished school here, things would have been different for him, but Cisco doubted it. She never gave him the time of day, really. Always too self-absorbed to worry about anyone else. He never understood why Marcos seemed to idolize her--maybe just because the brat didn't actually know her.

"Return to your class," said Mrs. Rio. She held out her hand. "And hand over your phone while you're at it."

That wasn't going to happen. "No."

"Excuse me?" She reached for his phone to take it herself.

Cisco didn't let her. "If you're going to give me detention, then just do it and leave me alone. I'm only here today in order to look after my sister. Not to attend classes."

"Perhaps you would rather I fetch the principal and see what he thinks?"

"Mrs. Rio, you can fetch the Mayor of Agquarey for all I care. I'm not moving."

"696

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 1/5)--

The teacher's eyes narrowed, and Cisco thought she might actually yell at him, but after a moment, she relented. "Very well. Two weeks' detention it is, then."

"Fine." Cisco already knew his parents wouldn't be upset with him.

Mrs. Rio turned to leave, and when the strange man held up a hand in protest, she just shrugged and kept walking. After she was gone, the man looked at Cisco again.

"Who are you?" said Cisco, no longer leaning against the wall.

The man hesitated, then glanced at Dennex, which was enough to confirm Cisco's suspicion that this person was indeed a servant. "My name is Louis Ferrage. I've been ordered by General Lawrence to escort you and your sister to Deynos for your own safety."

'Why?' said Dennex. 'What is the danger?'

"I'm sorry, but that is all I was told."

"Well, I can't just leave with you," said Cisco, raising his phone. "I'll call my mother, and if she says it's okay, then--" His phone was suddenly coated in a silvery-white metal.

"I'm sorry," Louis said with a raised hand, "but I can't allow you to do that." And two more men arrived around the same corner, along with their three accompanying reapers. "Please come quietly."

Cisco eyed the three pairs. 'Are there any more of them?'

'I don't sense anyone else in the hallways around us,' Dennex said privately. 'Seems Louis here was sent to retrieve Emiliana, while those two in the back probably went to your class, thinking you'd be there.'

One of the other men stepped forward now. "My name is Randall Pierce. I know this is sudden, but I assure you, we mean you no harm."

'And if we refuse?' asked Dennex. 'Are you going to attack us in the middle of a public school? Innocent people might get hurt. Children.'

"That is why you should not refuse," said Randall.

'This is ridiculous,' said Dennex. 'You call yourselves Vanguard? I want to talk to your superiors. Get them on the phone right now, and then we can sort all this out properly. This is probably just some misunderstanding, actually. I bet if we--'

As the reaper blabbered on, Cisco realized that was his cue. He pocketed his useless phone, took a deep breath, and then hit the fire alarm. Blaring noise filled the hall."

"697

Surprisingly, the trio of servants didn't look terribly upset by the alarm. People began filing out of the classroom, and the Vanguardians just let them go, standing still and silent as they waited for the uninvolved to pass. Cisco looked for Emiliana among the other students, but even after the classroom had emptied, he still hadn't seen her. He saw Dennex smirk.

'The girl jumped out the window!' said one of the other reapers.

Louis ran for the door.

Cisco felt Dennex empower him with vigor, and he grabbed Louis' head with one hand. Cisco shoved the man back, and Louis fell on his ass, a smoldering handprint burned into his face.

"You've yet to do us any harm, so I will grant you this one warning," said Cisco, his hand trembling as the smoking flesh of his palm regenerated. "Try to touch my sister again, and I will kill each and every one of you."

'Chergoa heard enough to know that they should flee,' said Dennex privately. 'It seems Axiolis chose a wise partner for your sister.'

"You don't want to do this," Randall said darkly. "We know who you are, Mr. Elroy. You've only been a servant for two years. I've been one for four. My friends here, three and five. Do the smart thing and surrender."

Cisco pulled off his coat and started rolling up the sleeves of his gray undershirt. "You know who I am, do you? If that were true, then you would be running away like the cowards you are. I am Francisco Elroy, fools. I am a Rainlord of Sair. The blood of the Armans runs through my veins."

"You are a schoolboy with a famous name," said Randall. "Is that name of yours worth dying for, I wonder?"

"Of course it is. But I wouldn't expect someone who tries to abduct young women to understand the first thing about honor or integrity."

"We understand duty, Mr. Elroy. It seems you're still too young to know the difference." Randall looked to Dennex. "Talk some sense into your servant."

"698

Instead of answering Randall, Dennex chose to speak only to Cisco. 'Kill Louis first, or he'll use his metal to protect the others. These men were chosen to fight you, so you probably won't have a natural advantage over any of their powers.'

Their intentions were clear enough now, and as he was already outnumbered, Cisco decided it wouldn't be wise to keep waiting for them to attack him all at once. He would make the first move.

The primary reason why Cisco needed the area clear of all bystanders was because of his own ability. Dennex had instilled in him very early on that it was never to be used around normal people. Even low levels of exposure could prove fatally toxic. When it came to servants, however, Cisco would of course require a bit more potency.

Held behind his back, Cisco's arms melted as his flesh converted to fluorine, finding hydrogen atoms in his skin to bond with. Hydrogen fluoride was a colorless gas--invisible--which made it seem like his arms were quietly dissolving into nothing. The hydrogen-fluorine reaction was not normally so silent, but he had enough control to keep it muted.

Dennex was gracious enough to blabber on a bit more while Cisco worked. 'You're right, of course,' he said publicly. 'We probably stand no chance against you. You will have to forgive my friend, Cisco. He is rather hot-tempered. Brash. You understand. But he will listen, assuming you guarantee--'

On contact with tissue, the hydrogen fluoride decomposed into hydrofluoric acid. Cisco hadn't infused it with his soul so as not to alert the other reapers to its presence, but it had an extremely pure acidic concentration, which was plenty strong enough for Cisco's purposes. The three servants doubled over in agony. The gas destroyed their corneas, and the acid boiled their skin, filling the corridor with pungent fumes.

Cisco dove headfirst into the gas without concern. It was his own fluorine, after all. He could control how--or even if--it reacted with his body. The only worry was that someone else could instigate a violent chemical reaction with it, but that would be a rare thing, and the Vanguard wouldn't likely send someone who would needlessly increase the risk of collateral damage. And besides, the three men were rather preoccupied at the moment."

"699

With full strength, Cisco landed a punch that crushed Louis' skull and sent him bouncing down the hallway. But Cisco was not done. Louis' unnamed reaper had been right beside him, trying to empower him for the fight, so Cisco leapt up and snatched the skeletal beast out of the air with his other hand. The other two reapers scattered, their servants now strengthened.

Still obviously disoriented, Randall rounded on Cisco and swung wildly at the air, sending a wave of destruction after him.

Cisco slid right on by, wrapped his arm around Randall's head, and twisted it off like a giant bottle cap. He landed on both feet again, his battered arms in the midst of regenerating. In each, he had a different prize--a reaper hostage and Randall's head. He leveled a stare at the final servant, waiting to see if the man intended to flee now.

Alas, that did not seem to be the case. "Is this the 'honor' you were talking about?" the man asked, fully regenerated. "Taking advantage of your opponent's demonstration of courtesy to catch them off guard. We told you we meant you no harm."

Cisco nodded slightly. "Yes, well, I did warn you. And I'm being kind, too. This reaper in my left hand? I haven't killed him yet. Your friend Louis will be fine. Randall, too."

"A sucker punch. Not that it matters, I suppose. I'm still stronger than you are."

"Confident," said Cisco. "Then tell me your name before we proceed."

"I am Dunstan Rofal, Lance Corporal of the Seventh Watcher's Unit under General Lawrence."

'A watchman,' said Dennex. He clung to the back of Cisco's neck. 'You lot are better at scouting than at fighting.'

"We are multitalented," said Dunstan. His black eyebrows had sharp arches to them, and his harsh cheekbones could have been weapons unto themselves. He didn't look all that much older than Cisco. Early twenties, at most. "I may not have your esteemed heritage, but you do not have my training."

"You've obviously never met my mother." Cisco set Randall's head aside."

"700

Dunstan charged him head on. Cisco sacrificed his right forearm to bathe the man in acid. Dunstan reached right through it and grabbed Cisco by the neck. Dunstan's flesh was missing, but it wasn't boiling. The acid had just splashed right off, as if by some invisible barrier.

Knowing that he could lose his head in an instant, Cisco had to respond quickly. He yanked himself back with a somersault, up and around Dunstan's arm in order to leverage his whole body weight against his opponent and drag them both to the ground together. They tumbled, and Cisco ended up atop Dunstan's arm. He tore it off and rolled away, giving himself some space to reevaluate the situation.

Dunstan was just as quick to return to his feet as Cisco, and the bloody gash on his shoulder closed itself before fresh bone and tissue began to grow out again. Curiously, the match had become one arm versus two and a half--soon to be three once Cisco's wrist and hand regenerated.

'He's transfiguration, too,' Dennex observed privately. 'He's using one of the noble gases, I'd wager. There are few elements that wouldn't react with hydrofluoric acid or the air at room temperature.'

Dunstan took the opportunity to attack again, but Dennex didn't stop explaining. Cisco struggled to dodge and keep listening.

'It seems acid won't work on him so long as he's paying attention. You'll have to overpower him or catch him off guard.'

Dunstan caught Cisco's chest with two fingers' worth of superheated gas, twin jets of searing pressure. Cisco swung for the man's face, but Dunstan ducked under and then thrust his hand upward, burning through Cisco's neck and head as if he were cutting through cardboard. Cisco barely pulled away in time to avoid having his skull split in two. Instead, he'd only earned a giant gash from sternum to ear, flesh and bone hanging loosely from his face as blood gushed forth.

Cisco tried to back off, but his opponent didn't seem interested in letting up. 'You might want to flee now,' he told Dennex.

'I'm not going anywhere without my servant. Chergoa and Emiliana can warn everyone else.' The reaper sounded much too relaxed for Cisco's liking."

With Dunstan neutralizing Cisco's fluorine, the fight descended into a contest of grapples, slickened and more dangerous from all the blood they were both losing.

Cisco swung Dunstan's severed arm like a sword. Dunstan slipped under it, and then wrapped himself around Cisco's arm, trying to position Cisco for a piercing blow to the temple. Instead, Cisco took the opportunity to force them both into a spin with himself at the center. He swirled Dunstan around, and when the man's grip loosened, Cisco flung him straight at the wall.

Incredibly, Dunstan flipped in mid-air and caught himself on the wall. And for a moment, he actually stayed there, both feet planted vertically against the cracked plaster while his hands gripped the burning holes they'd made for themselves.

Still half-dizzy from spinning, Cisco could do little more than gawk at what he'd just witnessed.

Dunstan launched himself from the wall like a missile, destroying it and barreling into Cisco. They tumbled together, Dunstan shoving Cisco's face into the blood-streaked floor, and Cisco could feel the freezing temperature encroaching upon the back of his head.

"Well fought, Mr. Elroy," were the last words he heard before losing consciousness.

--++--++--

Dunstan tried to wipe the blood from his face as his flesh finished regrowing. Transfiguration was certainly not the cleanest of abilities. He'd already taken Dennex hostage, merely holding the reaper with his soul-empowered right hand. In his left, he held Cisco's frozen head.

Randall Pierce and Louis Ferrage had still not yet regenerated, and their accompanying reapers, as well as Dunstan's, had already flown off after Emiliana Elroy. Cisco had delayed them, but with any luck, they would have the girl in custody within a few hours.

'What is your element?' asked Dennex, not sounding particularly upset with his newfound captivity.

Dunstan eyed him. Normally, reapers were pitch dark wraiths with tattered, flowing bodies and glowing red eyes, but at the moment, all he saw was a kind of amorphous shroud staring up at him from around his hand. "I'm a little surprised you didn't try to flee," said Dunstan.

"702 -- LXXX.

'You weren't trying to kill us,' said Dennex. 'And you seem like an honorable gentleman.'

"Even so. In your position, I'm sure a lot of reapers would have abandoned their servant."

'A lot of reapers are stupid.'

"Does the young Mr. Elroy mean that much to you?"

'He does, but that's not the only reason. I don't intend to end up trapped indefinitely without a servant, and I'm curious to find out who sent you and why.'

"You're a strange reaper."

'Honesty makes me strange?'

Dunstan looked around the corridor again. Their battle had been fairly short, but the aftermath might have suggested otherwise. And with toxic chemicals in the air, he would have to see to it that the area was quarantined before any of the normal people were allowed back into the building. Furthermore, the school's staff might not feel like listening to him, given that he was covered in blood.

On second thought, the Elroy girl might just get away. Orders or no orders, Dunstan wasn't about to let innocent bystanders get hurt because of him. Randall probably wouldn't agree, but then again, Randall was an idiot who'd gotten himself killed.

'Is it argon?' said Dennex. 'Come on, tell me what your element is. It is argon, isn't it?'

Dunstan stretched his neck. He probably shouldn't tell the reaper, he figured, in case he ended up having to fight Cisco again, but he decided to, anyway. Something about the reaper's candor made him feel like returning the favor. "It's krypton, if you must know."

‘Ah. I was close.’

Dunstan started looking around for a bag to place Cisco’s head in. Diplomacy would only be made more difficult if people saw him carrying it around like some lunatic.

Chapter Eighty: ‘O, monstrous child...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana had never run so fast in her life. She wasn’t at all accustomed to her new physical prowess. Chergoa told her not to slow down for anything, but it was difficult with so many people around--and in the rain, too? She tried to stick to grassy areas as much as possible because the pavement seemed too slick."

"702 -- LXXX.

‘You weren’t trying to kill us,’ said Dennex. ‘And you seem like an honorable gentleman.’

“Even so. In your position, I’m sure a lot of reapers would have abandoned their servant.”

‘A lot of reapers are stupid.’

“Does the young Mr. Elroy mean that much to you?”

‘He does, but that’s not the only reason. I don’t intend to end up trapped indefinitely without a servant, and I’m curious to find out who sent you and why.’

“You’re a strange reaper.”

‘Honesty makes me strange?’

Dunstan looked around the corridor again. Their battle had been fairly short, but the aftermath might have suggested otherwise. And with toxic chemicals in the air, he would have to see to it that the area was quarantined before any of the normal people were allowed back into the building. Furthermore, the school’s staff might not feel like listening to him, given that he was covered in blood.

On second thought, the Elroy girl might just get away. Orders or no orders, Dunstan wasn't about to let innocent bystanders get hurt because of him. Randall probably wouldn't agree, but then again, Randall was an idiot who'd gotten himself killed.

'Is it argon?' said Dennex. 'Come on, tell me what your element is. It is argon, isn't it?'

Dunstan stretched his neck. He probably shouldn't tell the reaper, he figured, in case he ended up having to fight Cisco again, but he decided to, anyway. Something about the reaper's candor made him feel like returning the favor. "It's krypton, if you must know."

'Ah. I was close.'

Dunstan started looking around for a bag to place Cisco's head in. Diplomacy would only be made more difficult if people saw him carrying it around like some lunatic.

Chapter Eighty: 'O, monstrous child...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana had never run so fast in her life. She wasn't at all accustomed to her new physical prowess. Chergoa told her not to slow down for anything, but it was difficult with so many people around--and in the rain, too? She tried to stick to grassy areas as much as possible because the pavement seemed too slick."

"703

--donation bonus week (day 4/5, post 2/5)--

It didn't end. She just kept running. Her schoolbag slapped against her back, and her folded umbrella pattered uselessly against her so that it wouldn't catch the air and slow her down. Through alleys, over fences, under madega trees, across streets and yards and parks and empty lots. She didn't know where she was going. She only knew that she had to get away. Strange men had come to abduct her, and Cisco had protected her from them.

She tried to reach her mother, but the call wasn't going through. Her father wasn't answering. She was panicking. Everything was wrong. She didn't understand how Chergoa was able to keep so calm, but she certainly appreciated it.

'Can you call any of the other Rainlords?' the reaper was asking.

'Uhh--' Emiliana tried to sift through the numbers in her phone while she splashed through a series of ponds. She would've really liked to have even one of her parents' Vanguardian friends listed, but she'd never gotten to know any of them well enough to exchange personal information. The other Rainlords, she barely knew--but no, wait. She'd met lots of their children. A couple of them were even her cousins. If she called them, maybe they could tell their parents? Did she have any of their numbers?

She had three, she realized. Selena Cortes, Ester Zabat, and Alicia Redwater. She went for Alicia's number first, as it was the only one Emiliana remembered calling at all in the last three months. And as she waited for it to ring, she tried to think about where she was in relation to the Redwater family. The main branch lived on the other side of Aguary, as she recalled. House Cortes was the same, and the Zabats lived all the way in Luzo, so Alicia was probably her best bet after all.

Mercifully, Alicia picked up. <"Hi, Emy. What's up?">

A beat passed, and she just blanked. How was she supposed to explain this without sounding utterly ridiculous?
<"...Hello?">

'Talk!' Chergoa yelled at her. 'Say things!'"
"704

Emiliana snapped back, and the words just poured out her. "Alicia! I'm here! I'm in a lot of trouble! These men came to my school to abduct me, and I don't know what's happening, and Cisco stayed behind to fight them! And I--I don't--"

<"Whoa, whoa, slow down,"> Alicia said. <"Men came to your school?">

“Yes! I tried to call my parents, but neither of them are answering, so I called you! Please help me! I’m really scared!”

<“O-oh! Okay, hold on a second! I’m at school, right now, but just--stay on the line.”> There came a brief rustling noise. <“Hey! Let me borrow your phone! Yes, I need two phones! This is important! Shut up, and just--! No, just give it here!”> A feminine screech broke out, followed by a beat of silence. Then, a bit haggard, Alicia said, <“You still there?”>

Emiliana had slowed down a little. “Er--”

‘Don’t stop running,’ said Chergoa. ‘I still sense the three reapers from the school following us.’

She picked up her pace again, continually marveled by how she hadn’t grown winded or tired at all. “Yes, I’m here!” she said to Alicia.

<“Good! I’m calling my grandma now! She’ll help you for sure!”>

“Uh--your grandma?”

<“Yeah! Don’t even worry about it! Oh, and can you tell me where you are?”>

Chergoa was floating near enough to overhear the question. ‘Tell her you’re heading north toward the Great Madega.’

Emiliana relayed the information.

<“Okay, got it. Ah, hold on a second.”> Then, slightly muffled again, <“Fuck off! I’ll give your phone back in a minute! Go ahead! I don’t care who you tell! Stay back! I swear, I will bite y--Oh! Grandma! Yeah, it’s Alicia! Listen, I just got a call from Emy Elroy, and--”>

As she listened to the girl’s secondhand explanation, Emiliana threw repeated glances at Chergoa.

‘How well do you know this Alicia girl, exactly?’ the reaper asked.

‘Uh. Not that well. She’s a little younger than me, and I thought she was a nice girl, but she sounds kind of--er, “louder” than I remember...’

‘Ah.’

‘Not that I’m complaining...’

<“Alright, Grandma is headed your way,”> Alicia reported. <“You should be okay now.”>

“Thank you!”

<“How many bad guys are there? Do you know?”>

“Three, I think. But my brother delayed them. It might just be the reapers following me now.”

<“Alright, just keep heading to the tree. Grandma will find you in no time. I’ll stay on the phone with you until--AGH, FINE! TAKE YOUR FUCKING PHONE BACK! BITCH!”>

Chergoa raised a wispy eyebrow. ‘What is Alicia’s last name, by the way?’

‘Redwater.’

‘Wow, you called one of the Redwaters?’

‘Yeah, why?’

‘Oh, right. You’re not much of a history buff, are you?’

‘Uh--’ Emiliana didn’t get a chance to ask what she was talking about, because Alicia interrupted.

<“Sorry about that. I’m still here.”>

“Ah, g-good. Thank you.”

<“So do you have any idea who these men are?”>

“Well, they said they were Vanguard, but... uh--”

<“What? Vanguard?”>

“I don’t really understand it, either.” She explained what she and Chergoa heard Dennex rambling about through the wall. Chergoa had considered it entirely intentional on Dennex’s part as a means of telling them to flee without alerting their enemies. Emiliana hadn’t been quite so convinced of this at first, but she’d since warmed up to the idea after being chased by reapers for the past ten minutes straight.

She could see the Great Madega Tree now. Taller than most of the buildings around it by a third, it was one of the most famous places in Aguary--or in all of Sair, even. The Great Madega was one of the largest trees in the world, rivaled only by the monstrous Jaskadan Forest across the sea. And the people of Aguary did not squander this natural wonder. Rather, they turned it into a leisure center, of sorts. A narrow walkway spiraled around its huge gray-brown trunk, and a climate-controlled observatory sat within the grip of its sprawling crown of foot-sized blue-green leaves. Additionally, a plethora of high-end shops sat around its base for the many tourists it attracted."

"706

The crowds thickened as Emiliana neared the tree, creating a kind of moving ceiling of umbrellas for her as she pushed her way through. And because she didn't really know how strong she'd become, she was extra careful not to accidentally shove anyone and instead chose to just press forward with her body only. It made the going a bit slower, but the last thing she wanted to do was hurt some poor bystander.

"I'm at the tree," she said into the phone.

<"Go up,"> said Alicia. <"It'll make it easier for Grandma to find you.">

Chergoa nodded, and Emiliana proceeded up the metal walkway. It seemed solidly constructed, but there was only enough space for two people across--a line going up and a line going down.

When she reached the observatory, she found herself waiting a while, nervous and uncertain. Whoever was following her was sure taking their sweet time. Alicia was trying to keep her calm with small talk, but Emiliana was only half-listening. By now, she probably could have called the police and had them come get her. Though, if those men were really Vanguard, then obviously, the police wouldn't have been able to do much.

In some spots, the observatory offered a wide view of Aguary, but in others, tall hotels and office buildings stood in the way. She wasn't looking at the city, however. She was paying much closer attention to everyone else who entered the observatory after her.

She spotted an elderly woman with a cane among the entrants, but the woman spared her a glance and nothing more. Having never met Alicia's grandmother before, Emiliana had no idea what to look for, but she kept her eye on the elderly woman, anyway, not seeing any other likely candidates. The old gal seemed more interested in the television monitors mounted in the center of the broad chamber, and after a second look, Emiliana saw why.

'Reported chemical incident at local high school,' the news line read. The reporter was talking about how the authorities were still unclear whether it was an accident or not."

"707

Only two students were so far unaccounted for, apparently. After a minute, Emiliana saw her own name there alongside her brother's. And not long after, she was staring at helicopter footage of her own house and listening to the reporter talk about how the rest of her immediate family was also missing. The news line soon changed to, 'Assault on Rainlord family?'

It did nothing to ease her mind. She didn't want to hang up on Alicia, but she had to try calling her parents again.

A vain attempt. Her father still wasn't answering, and the call still wasn't reaching her mother. Her hands trembled as she made to try Cisco next.

Her vision began to blur, in and out of focus. She squinted at her phone as her fingers started to burn--and then, so did her face. She couldn't hold back her pained groans, and she dropped her phone as she watched her fingers contorting strangely against her will.

'Ch-Chergoa!' she thought, hardly able to think straight. 'What--?! What's--?!'

'Emiliana! Oh sh--! It's okay! No, this is fine. Just try to calm down.'

It felt like thick needles were digging into her face. Or out of it, rather. Her forehead, both cheeks, and her left eye all burned like fire. 'What is this?! What's happening?!'

'It's okay. I'll tell you exactly what's happening, but first I need you to try and relax. Just close your eyes and listen to my voice. You're okay.'

Do you understand? You're fine.'

She did as the reaper said, or tried to. She could still feel her own racing heart and stunted breaths. And her whole body shook, small tremors running through her, up and down and back and forth all at once.

But after a spell, the feeling slowly melted away, leaving only a few lingering shivers.

'Alright,' said Chergoa. 'Now when you open your eyes, you're going to see some changes. You're a little different now. But I don't want you to panic, okay? I need you to trust me. I'll explain everything. I promise.'" "708 -- LXXXI.

Hesitant, Emiliana opened her eyes. The first thing she noticed was that the vision in her left eye was dimmer. Cloudier and darker, and the eye itself just felt stiffer, like it took more effort to move.

And then she saw her hands. Specifically, the tips of her fingers. They'd all become dark as coal and hard like rocks. And more than that, some of them had grown outward, gnarled and pointed like misshapen claws. Two on her right hand, three on her left.

She remembered her face next, how it had burned as well. Wide-eyed, she searched around for a mirror but didn't see one. But she could see the changes just barely in the corners of her vision. Small protrusions from her flesh. Stubby horns, they felt like. Dark and hideous.

She was about ready to lose her mind. 'What the hell happened to me?!

'Your ability has manifested,' said Chergoa. 'You're a mutation type.'

Chapter Eighty-One: 'What it means to serve...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana moved toward the glass wall, just wanting to get away from the other people before they noticed they were standing next to some kind of freak. She stared at her hands in horror. 'I'm going to be like this for the rest of my life?'

'Yes and no,' said Chergoa, still trying to sound gentle. 'You can't exactly undo what's happened, but you can make further changes to yourself and potentially counteract any negative effects they've caused.'

Emiliana touched her face another time. Her rocky fingertips had lost all sensation, but with her palm, she could feel four little horns on her head--one on each cheek and then two on her forehead. Her reflection in the window was faint, but she could see enough to know that she already hated what she'd become.

'Mutation is the least understood type,' said Chergoa. 'I know that might not inspire much confidence, but luckily for you, I've studied it quite a bit, so I know more about it than most reapers probably do.'

Emiliana wanted to scream at her. It was disgusting. How could her parents let her become a servant if they knew something like this could happen?"

"708 -- LXXXI.

Hesitant, Emiliana opened her eyes. The first thing she noticed was that the vision in her left eye was dimmer. Cloudier and darker, and the eye itself just felt stiffer, like it took more effort to move.

And then she saw her hands. Specifically, the tips of her fingers. They'd all become dark as coal and hard like rocks. And more than that, some of them had grown outward, gnarled and pointed like misshapen claws. Two on her right hand, three on her left.

She remembered her face next, how it had burned as well. Wide-eyed, she searched around for a mirror but didn't see one. But she could see the changes just barely in the corners of her vision. Small protrusions from her flesh. Stubby horns, they felt like. Dark and hideous.

She was about ready to lose her mind. 'What the hell happened to me?!

'Your ability has manifested,' said Chergoa. 'You're a mutation type.'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Emiliana moved toward the glass wall, just wanting to get away from the other people before they noticed they were standing next to some kind of freak. She stared at her hands in horror. 'I'm going to be like this for the rest of my life?'

'Yes and no,' said Chergoa, still trying to sound gentle. 'You can't exactly undo what's happened, but you can make further changes to yourself and potentially counteract any negative effects they've caused.'

Emiliana touched her face another time. Her rocky fingertips had lost all sensation, but with her palm, she could feel four little horns on her head--one on each cheek and then two on her forehead. Her reflection in the window was faint, but she could see enough to know that she already hated what she'd become.

'Mutation is the least understood type,' said Chergoa. 'I know that might not inspire much confidence, but luckily for you, I've studied it quite a bit, so I know more about it than most reapers probably do.'

Emiliana wanted to scream at her. It was disgusting. How could her parents let her become a servant if they knew something like this could happen?"

"709

Her parents.

Emiliana remembered.

Where were they? She wanted to yell at them. And cry at them. Most of all, she wanted to stop worrying about them. About herself. About everything. She pressed her hands against the window and dropped to her knees. Her claws left scratches in the glass, and she could not have cared less.

She settled wearily into a heap on the floor, letting her roiling thoughts slowly diminish. And perhaps it was the agonized wonder for her parents only a moment prior that was responsible for the sudden and inexplicably clear reminder of her mother's words.

Sacrifice is what it means to serve.

The woman had said it enough times that Emiliana nearly came to hate the phrase, but dammit if she hadn't also come to understand its meaning. Her mother wasn't just talking about being in the Vanguard. She was talking about being a servant. The power and responsibility it granted, the unwanted attention. Sacrifice was inevitable, and oftentimes, unknowable. The only thing to be done was to attempt to prepare for the worst.

And annoyingly, Emiliana abruptly remembered her mother doing exactly that. The Lady Elroy had indeed explained about the mutation type, along with the other five categories of abilities. She'd warned her of the possibility, told her to keep a clear head if the time ever came, even told her that might not be possible due to the way abilities tended to manifest via stress--and that, nonetheless, it was still necessary.

"Because you are an Elroy," her mother had said. "One day, someone will attempt to hurt you for no other reason than that."

It wasn't fair, Emiliana felt. The only thing she wanted to do right now was blame her parents. And she couldn't bring herself to.

Chergoa was still trying to soothe her, Emiliana realized. 'I know this seems horrible right now, but you're okay. Trust me.'

Emiliana didn't even have the energy to glare at her.

"Are you unwell, child?"

Emiliana turned and saw the elderly woman from earlier standing there.

She was a tiny thing, even shorter than Emiliana and certainly more shriveled. When she saw Emiliana's mutated face, however, she didn't flee or yell. Instead, she merely raised an eyebrow at the girl."

"710

Emiliana stood to her feet. She went straight for the first question she could think of. "Are you Alicia's grandmother?"

"I am indeed," the woman said. "I apologize for not telling you right away. I was hoping to catch your pursuers when they revealed themselves, but it seems they intend to remain hidden."

'Ah, I sense them fleeing now,' said Chergoa.

'That would explain it,' said a new reaper, phasing up through the floor behind Madame Redwater. 'I suppose Octavia and I have become a bit too famous to employ such discretion.'

"How dull." Octavia offered Emiliana a pert smile. "They never tell you that once you grow powerful enough, people tend to stop trying to fight you. I have not had a real fight in four years.""

'Six, actually,' her reaper said.

"Really? Huh." The old gal shrugged. "Glad it only seemed like four."

'It's a pleasure to meet you both,' said Chergoa. 'I've heard of Octavia Redwater, of course, but not her reaper. What is your name? Mine is Chergoa, and this is Emiliana Elroy.'

'I am Wendissofigelroc,' he said.

"Just call him Wendy," said Octavia.

'Please don't. I hate that name.'

Octavia shook her head. "He never learns. No one is ever going to call him Wednesdaywafflerocks."

'Wendissofigelroc.'

"Whatever, Wendy."

'Ugh. Wendy is a girl's name. At least tell them to call me Wen.'

"When what?" And the smirk grew slowly into Octavia's face.

Wendy only returned a flat stare.

"Get it? When what? That was a joke."

Wendy just sighed and floated away.

"Anywho..." Madame Redwater turned to Emiliana again. "You are safe now. Let us go find the rest of your family, shall we?"

Emiliana wanted to hug her, but she only managed a weak nod.

--++--++--

Mariana had to keep to an exact path. If the rain hadn't been strong enough that day, certain areas below the platform wouldn't be flooded enough for the boat to pass over.

It was a long while before they reached the edge. Beneath Aguary, the persistent darkness was only occasionally offset by pillars of light and their accompanying waterfalls, both of which were provided by the few drains that weren't connected to the city's greater sewage system."

"711

By the time they saw the gray sky again, Marcos had died. And the clock was ticking. Mariana had about eighteen hours to find the boy a reaper before his soul decayed too greatly and became unusable.

'Think this through calmly,' said Shenado.

Mariana didn't want to be told that. She was perfectly calm. She'd already cleared her head and saw the situation exactly for what it was.

But Shenado was insistent with her attempts at comfort. 'We can find a reaper for him. If we explain that it is an emergency, the other Rainlords will be able to recommend someone for him.'

There were multiple problems with that, Mariana knew, chief among them being the fact that she wasn't at all sure who among the Rainlords should be trusted. What little faith she had in her allies had already been shaken today. 'We rule out any family that has ties to the Vanguard,' she said.

Shenado frowned. 'I understand your caution, but that eliminates almost everyone in Intar. And half of us in Sair.'

'I'm not willing to risk contact with anyone in Intar, anyway. The Vanguard monitors all long-distance communications there.'

'True. They could be monitoring Sair, too. They don't have permission, but given what we've seen today, that probably wouldn't stop them.'

And they wouldn't need to monitor the whole country, either. Just the Rainlords.'

Mariana pulled out her phone. Now that they were out from under the platform, she finally had a signal again, but that wasn't why she'd held onto it all this time. She only wanted to see if she had any missed calls. And she did, all of which were from Emiliana. The temptation to call her back immediately was strong, even knowing that someone else could be listening.

Thankfully, it wouldn't be necessary. Mariana tossed the phone overboard and kept going, leaving Aguary behind. She knew the exact coordinates of her destination even without Shenado reminding her, and after a while, she saw it there, bobbing up and down in the water. It was a boathouse and safe house all in one, tied to a tall pillar in the water."

"712

In this area, the waters often receded enough to reveal the bare ground, and the boathouse was designed with that in mind, bearing a foundation that could stand or float equally well in exchange for sacrificing most of its aquatic mobility. It also wasn't terribly large. Even the few people she'd brought with her wouldn't be able to stay here comfortably, but it would have to do for now. She pulled up beside it and had everyone else board it first, then carried Marcos' body over with her.

The remote location was ideal for the current circumstances. Due to all the souls in Aguary, Shenado hadn't been able to identify any of the reapers who'd been pursuing them; but now that they were far enough away from the city, any reaper stupid enough to have kept following would be immediately sensed and memorized by Shenado. Unfortunately, none of the enemy reapers had been that stupid.

'Whoever they were, they've given up chasing us,' the reaper said. 'Seems their reapers value their anonymity. I'd say that confirms that it's a watcher's unit, then. And that Charlie Day fellow--strange for an alteration type to be used as a watchman, but it might make sense if he had power over radio waves. Would also explain the heat he could produce and perhaps even the jamming of your cellphone.'

Right now, the only thing Mariana needed from this place was the encrypted satellite phone. It required a bit of setup, but she had it working within a few minutes.

‘Who are you calling first?’ Shenado asked.

‘Emiliana.’ She didn’t need Shenado to tell her the girl’s number. She tapped it in from memory. It took a little while to connect and start ringing.

Emiliana picked up immediately. <“Mama?”>

Mariana exhaled a long breath. “Yes, it’s me.”

<“Oh, thank god!”>

“Are you alright? Are you safe?”

<“I am. I’m with Octavia Redwater. I called her granddaughter for help, and then she came to get me herself.”>

“Good! Smart girl. I’m proud of you. Is Francisco with you?”

She paused. <“No... He stayed behind to fight, I think. I don’t know what happened to him. I’m sorry...”>

"713

Mariana’s expression softened. “Don’t apologize, mijara. You didn’t do anything wrong. Is Octavia there right now?”

<“Y-yes...”>

“Let me speak with her.”

<“Mama... I...”>

“What?”

<“Ah...”> Her voice was shaking. <“My power manifested. I’m a mutation user...”>

Mariana stopped to digest that information as she looked around the cabin. The sloped windows all around her offered a full view of rolling hills among the flooded lowlands. Aguarey stood high to the south, appearing to almost float above the waves.

"You will have great need of that power, Emiliana," said Mariana. "I know you may not want it now, but one day, it will save you and those you care about. Remember that, mijara."

Emiliana didn't respond.

Mariana had to press her onward. "We'll talk more when I see you again. Put Octavia on the phone, please."

<"...Yes, enma'am.">

There came a brief rustling, and then, <"Lady Elroy, hello."> The old woman's airy voice was familiar and welcome. <"I am glad to know you are alive.">

"Not as glad as I am to know you have my daughter," said Mariana. House Redwater was one of the few she was inclined to trust. Of all the Rainlord families in both Sair and Intar, the Redwaters were probably the proudest and definitely the most famous. They were troublemakers, historically, not given to taking orders from anyone other than themselves.

<"Is your husband with you?">

"No. I don't know where he is. I fear the worst."

<"I see. I have already sent word out to look for him. I will let you know as soon as I hear anything.">

"Unfortunately, I have a problem which takes precedence even over finding Zeff."

<"Not having a very good day, are you?">

Mariana nodded tiredly to herself. "My son Marcos is dead."

<"Ah... I am so sorry.">

"I require a suitable reaper for him. I was wondering if you might know of one."

Octavia was slow to answer. <"That will be difficult. I have a network of contacts, as I'm sure you do as well, but any reaper without a servant is also without a means of getting in contact with them.">

“I am aware,” said Mariana. “I was hoping you would have someone already nearby.”

<“I’m sorry. Several candidates come to mind, but I don’t know where to find them. You know how reapers are, especially without a servant tying them down.”>

“I thought as much. It was worth asking.” Searching for any single reaper could take months or even years, she knew. It was not uncommon for them to disappear, particularly after releasing a long-held servant. For many, replacing their servant meant replacing their very best friend. It wasn’t a thing they liked to rush into. Or, depending on their circumstances, some reapers might go into hiding while they built up a new servant’s power.

<“I’ll make some calls to the other families and see if any of them have someone lined up for your son. With any luck--”>

“You would only be wasting your time,” said Mariana. “Unless you give me your word that you have met the reaper personally and would entrust them with your own child’s life, then I will certainly not be entrusting them with mine.”

There came a long pause. <“I see. And you are planning to...?”>

“Yes.”

More quietly, Octavia asked, <“What can I do for you?”>

“I would like to see Emiliana. Did you take her to Red Lake Castle?”

<“I did. Can you make it here safely?”>

“Yes, that shouldn’t be a problem. I will be there shortly.”

<“Very well.”>

“Thank you for all your help, Octavia.”

<“Ah, before you go--do you know why your family has been targeted? Your daughter mentioned that the assailants were Vanguard.”>

“No, I don’t know. I will see you soon.” She hung up.

Shenado floated in front of her.

And Mariana could see her son's soul in the reaper's grasp. It was a faint, bluish thing to her eyes, a somehow pyramidal liquid, impossibly holding its shape with slow, trembling effort. She remembered the first time she'd started seeing souls, after years of being a servant already. It was unequivocally strange, suddenly being able to see what Shenado saw. The only apparent difference seemed to be that Shenado could see them even before a person had died, while Mariana could not--with the exception of aberrations, which were suddenly quite easy to pick out of a crowd."

"715

Shenado looked like she had something to say, but she remained quiet.

Mariana made a few more calls. She tried Zeff and Francisco without success, and then she rang Joana Cortes again to inform the woman of what had happened. House Cortes was a burgeoning Rainlord line, an offshoot of House Elroy started by Joana herself. She'd chosen to take her commoner husband's name--a decision which had upset Zeff to no end--but Joana had at least made it clear that she still intended to carry on their bloodline with children of her own.

It was a particularly delicate issue for Zeff, because for many years, aside from him and his sister, there had been no other Elroys left. Zeff had inherited his family's fortune when he was only fifteen. And not due to peaceable circumstances.

At the moment, though, Mariana didn't have the time or patience to listen to Joana's questions or ramblings. As soon as Joana confirmed that she did not have a reaper for Marcos, Mariana hung up and called three other Rainlord families. House Garza, House Merlo, and House Delaguna. They were the only other ones without ties to the Vanguard, but as Mariana had expected, none of them had any reapers available, either. The tradition of turning one's own children into servants was a custom exclusive to the Vanguardian Rainlords, so it was unsurprising that they were not keeping any spare reapers around. Supposedly, House Blackburn had cut ties with the Vanguard a few years ago, but Mariana didn't know that family well enough. This matter was too important to entrust to strangers.

With no other calls to make, it was time to leave. Mariana knew that Zeff and Axiolis might turn up here looking for her, so she scribbled a quick note and left it at the helm. Then she gathered everyone back into the boat again, topped off its gas tank, and set out for Red Lake Castle. It was an easy place to reach, as the castle sat on the farthest northwestern edge of Aquarey's platform and doubled as a gigantic support column."

"716

Red Lake Castle was a hulking, crimson structure with a tower on its northwestern corner that rose much higher than any of its others. The castle also had a port all its own, hidden away beneath the platform, allowing Mariana to take her boat right into its welcoming underbelly. She found Emiliana waiting for her inside, along with Chergoa and Octavia.

Emiliana looked relieved to see her mother. Until she saw Marcos' body.

"He is going to be fine," said Mariana. The four small horns on her daughter's face did not escape her notice, but reacting to them now would serve no purpose, she felt. Instead, she turned to Octavia. "I would like to speak with my daughters in private. Do you have a room we can use?"

"Of course. Follow me." The old woman led Mariana's group to a nearby elevator.

Ramira hadn't said a word this whole time. Mariana shifted Marcos over to her right arm and held her left hand out for the girl. Ramira took it and walked with her.

The journey was painfully quiet.

Shenado took the opportunity to ask a private question. 'So when are you going to ask me to release your soul?'

Mariana only glanced at her.

'I know you're considering it,' the reaper said.

'I am more than considering it.'

‘Oh, so you didn’t think you needed to ask, then. You’re just assuming I have no problem with letting you go and taking on your son as my servant, is that it?’

‘I do not see many options, Shenado.’

‘Yes, but are you sure this is the best one?’

Mariana gave the reaper a hard look. ‘You are telling me to let my son die.’

‘I am telling you not to abandon the rest of your children. The whole reason you chose to stay in Aguary today was because you refused to leave them alone while Zeff was away. And now? We still don’t know what has become of him. They may have already lost their father. Are you going to deprive them of their mother, as well? They need you now more than ever.’”

"717

Mariana had to turn away as she listened. There was truth in Shenado’s words. She knew there was. And it gave her pause. The choice in her head wasn’t quite so clear anymore.

‘I know it is difficult,’ Shenado went on, ‘but think about this carefully. Yes, Marcos is only twelve. But Ramira is only nine. Emiliana is confused and distraught and looking to you for guidance. We don’t even know where Francisco is. Hopefully, only captured. And then there’s Gema. Obviously, she’s gotten herself involved in something big and terrible. Wherever she is, I’m sure she could use your help, too.’

That argument almost convinced her. Almost. She steeled her expression. ‘I am not going to let Marcos die. And I am not abandoning them. I am leaving them in your care.’

It was Shenado’s turn to hesitate.

‘They won’t need me to guide them when they have you,’ said Mariana. ‘They’re practically your children as much as mine. It won’t just be Marcos. Not really. You’ll take care of them all. I know you will.’

‘I can’t protect them from physical threats.’

‘Yes, you can. Not with your body, but with your mind. By being smart. And by teaching them to be just as much so. We’ve already started. They know how the world is. Now, they will see it firsthand. And you will be there for them.’

‘Mariana...’

‘Please, Shenado. I’ve made up my mind.’

‘...And what if I refuse?’

‘Then I will never forgive you for as long as I live. And you might as well find a new servant, anyway, because I will never listen to any requests you make of me ever again.’

‘...I thought you would threaten to kill me.’

‘I would have been bluffing, and you would have known it. But make no mistake, if there ever came a day when the rest of my children were finally out of danger, I would certainly kill you for letting Marcos die today.’

Shenado sighed publicly, drawing looks from Emiliana and Octavia as they proceeded down a long hallway together. ‘Fine,’ the reaper said privately. ‘I’ll release you. You were always mean to me, anyway.’

‘Thank you.’

‘I bet Marcos will be nicer.’”

"718

Octavia showed them into a vast, windowless chamber with a high ceiling. Beds sat on either side of the room, each one neatly made. Octavia had her housekeepers show Mariana’s own staff to different rooms on the same floor. Ramira and Emiliana didn’t leave their mother’s side, but Emiliana was eyeing one of the beds as if it might be holding all the secrets of the universe. Mariana certainly understood the impulse. The fatigue was weighing on her, and her clothes were still smote and ragged from earlier.

She’d been struggling to think of what to tell her girls. Before she could even get started, however, Wendy phased through the ceiling and floated down toward everyone.

‘Our other guests have begun to arrive,’ the reaper said.

“What other guests?” said Mariana.

“I called an emergency meeting,” said Octavia. “We will be needing a plan of action, of course.”

Three more reapers descended from the ceiling after Wendy. Mariana recognized all of them. Lonogren, Jostomere, and Mevox. Each one belonged to a different Rainlord family--House Merlo, House Zabat, and House Delaguna, respectively. Their servants were all the heads of their houses.

‘So what’s all this then?’ said Mevox. He stood out a little from the other reapers in that his fox fur had a faint luster to it.

“If you would please wait upstairs with your partners,” said Octavia, “Mariana and I will be with you in a mome--”

‘Nah,’ said Mevox. ‘I wanna know what’s goin’ on right now.’

‘We know the Elroys were attacked,’ said Lonogren. ‘We would like to hear the full details from Mariana and Shenado. I am sure we can all agree that this is a matter of great urgency.’

“We should at least wait until everyone has gathered,” said Octavia.

‘Hell with that,’ said Mevox. ‘No need to wait for their slow asses. Talk to us, Mariana. We’re here to help.’

Octavia looked at the Lady Elroy with sympathy. “We’ve an impatient lot here, it seems.”

Mariana took a haggard breath. She only wanted to talk to her daughters, but she supposed there was still plenty of time for that. Regardless, Shenado was gracious enough to speak up for her.”
"719

‘The Vanguard sent seven servants to our house,’ said Shenado. ‘They claimed they only wanted to “escort” us safely to Lagemoor, but when we refused to go with them, they attacked us. One of Mariana’s sons was fatally wounded in the battle. Another is missing. As is Zeff.'

Mevox drifted closer to Mariana and her children, poking his head forward curiously. 'Why were they tryin' to escort you to Lagemoor?'

'We're not sure,' said Shenado. 'They mentioned something about wanting to find Gema, Mariana's oldest daughter, but that might have been just another lie. Not that it matters much, because we don't know where Gema is. Even if we were of a mind to turn her over to them, we wouldn't be able to.'

"Are you of a mind to do that?" said Octavia.

"No," said Mariana.

'Damn right,' said Mevox. He turned to Jostomere, who'd thus far remained silent. 'What're you thinkin'? Your family works for the Vanguard, too. I suspect you've got a more difficult decision to make than the rest of us here do.'

'That is true.' Jostomere's burning eyes fell upon Marcos' body. 'But this is plainly unacceptable. And if it can happen to the Elroys, it can happen to the Zabats. You can expect our full support.'

'Ours as well,' said Lonogren. 'Which already puts us at five of ten.'

'Six, actually,' said Shenado. 'House Cortes is guaranteed to help. Joana is Zeff's sister.'

'Ah, that's right,' said Lonogren, nodding.

'We can ask the Intarians for help, too,' said Wendy. 'They might turn us down, but there are thirty more families there. At least a few will agree to help, I'm sure.'

'Worth asking,' said Mevox. 'Where was Zeff's last known location?'

"Rheinhal," said Mariana. "He was ordered there by General Lawrence."

Octavia's brow twitched. "Xavier Lawrence, you mean?"

Mariana nodded.

Octavia pursed her lips. "The Blue Bear, huh? I didn't realize he was the one they had stationed in Sair."

‘Do you know him personally?’ asked Shenado.

“Not well,” said Octavia. “We crossed paths ages ago. Very polite, as I recall. A real gentleman. His reaper, less so. I haven’t heard his name in years. Thought he might have been killed.”

"720

‘If it’s only a single general and his underlings we have to worry about, then I’m not too concerned,’ said Mevox. ‘Problem is, you Vanguardians like to send reinforcements.’

‘Indeed,’ said Jostomere.

Soon, more Rainlords began to arrive, and Octavia decided to move the conversation upstairs. Mariana still hadn’t set Marcos down or left her daughters alone, wanting the girls to hear everything that was discussed.

Mariana knew that Zeff was well-loved among the other Rainlords, but even so, she was still a bit surprised by everyone’s readiness to support her. Only House Blackburn and House Stroud did not have representatives here today, but among the other eight family heads, none even humored the notion of handing Mariana and her children over to the Vanguard. At first, Mariana thought they were just holding back while in her presence, but more and more, she became convinced that was not the case.

“I can’t believe they had the gall to attack you in your own home,” a lumbering man was saying. He was the largest person in the room by a head and had the bulk of two men put together. Salvador Delaguna was his name, and just like his reaper, he was prone to ‘listening to his passions’ as Octavia had once put it. “We should go to Rheinhal this very moment and demand they return Zeff to us.”

‘Sounds good to me,’ said Mevox.

Abel Sebolt shook his head. “We all care for Zeff, but let’s not be rash,” he said. The Lord of House Sebolt reminded Mariana of Zeff in many ways. They had the same kind of naturally cold expression, though Abel was slimmer. “We are still immensely outnumbered, you realize.”

“So were our ancestors,” said Joana Cortes.

“Hear hear!” said Salvador.

As they talked, Mariana noticed a maid enter the room and rush to Octavia’s side, whispering in her ear. After a moment, Octavia nodded and whispered something back. The maid exited, and Octavia stood to address everyone.

“I’ve just received word from Asad Najir. Apparently, Axiolis is with him.”

That caught everyone’s attention.

“Zeff?” said Mariana."

"721

“Let us see,” said Octavia. She reached toward the middle of the broad table and lifted the receiver on the conference phone there. She put it on speaker for all to hear. “Lord Najir, are you there?”

<“I am,”> came the Sandlord’s voice.

“Is this line encrypted?” Mariana asked.

<“It is. And before you ask, no, Zeff is not here with me. Only Axiolis escaped.”>

Mariana’s heart sank a little. But at least now she knew he wasn’t dead.

Salvador puffed up with visible irritation. “Why would Axiolis go to you and not us?”

<“Ah, is that you I hear, oaf?”>

“It is! Answer my question, desert rat!”

<“Axiolis feared that going to you would be too predictable. So he came to me, knowing the enemy would not think to intercept him on the way here.”>

“Hmph.”

<“Don’t feel bad, oaf. I’m sure Axiolis would have gone to you right away if he needed any big rocks turned into small rocks.”>

“Ha! Will you be delivering Axiolis to us in person, then? Please tell me you will be.”

<“Axiolis says he will stay here and attempt to recruit more of the Sandlords with me.”>

Mariana’s brow rose. “You have already decided to help us?”

<“Of course.”> The man said it like it was the most obvious thing in the world.

Mariana knew Zeff and Asad were close, but considering they hadn’t spoken to each other in months, she would have expected some hesitation, at least. Certainly, the other Sandlords would not be so easily convinced. “I must thank you, Asad.”

<“You are welcome. How is the situation in Agquarey? I have seen the news.”>

Mariana brought him up to speed in detail. The attack on her house, her subsequent escape, Cisco being unaccounted for, and Marcos. The boy’s lifeless body was already becoming stiff. Mercifully, the stench of death was not as bad as she knew it could be.

<“Terrible. I am so sorry. Do you have a reaper for him?”>

“...I do not,” she said. “Do you happen to have one there with you now? If you send them to Agquarey right away, they could make it here in time.” Axiolis, of course, was not an option, as he could not release Zeff without making contact again.

<“...I am sorry, Mariana. There are no such reapers here.”>
"722

‘Alright, then, who here has a reaper for her son?’ Mevox looked across the room at everyone present. Cortes, Garza, Delaguna, Merlo, Redwater, Sebolt, Zabat, and Elroy.

None answered him.

‘Oh, come on. There are eight families here--nine, including Asad’s.

You tellin' me none of us can help her?'

'We all know reapers who could fill the role,' said Shenado. 'The problem is contacting them in time. Do you have a solution to that, Mevox?'

Mevox looked over everyone again and frowned. His head dropped a little. 'Well, then... is there a servant here willing to give up their life for the boy?'

"Stop," said Mariana. "I appreciate the sentiment, but you all have families of your own to protect. If anyone is to give their life for my son, it will be me." She heard the intake of breath from Emiliana. "Instead, after I am gone, I ask that you watch over my children until my husband is free."

"We are not out of time yet," said Salvador, though not with his usual vigor. "A reaper might still be found..."

Mariana leveled a stare at the huge man, which was enough to make him shift uncomfortably in his chair. "Yes, well... if such a miracle does not occur, then please consider that to have been my final request."

The table fell briefly silent.

Joana placed a hand on her shoulder. "Oh, Mary... of course we will take care of them."

"As if they were our own," said the Lord Sebolt.

The others all nodded in agreement. Lady Rayen of House Merlo, Lady Socorro of House Garza, Lord Santos of House Zabat, and Salvador and Octavia as well. Their reapers acknowledged the promise, too.

There wasn't much left to be said after that, but the conversation lasted a while, anyway. They came to a rough consensus that an immediate assault on Rheinhal was not the right course of action and that a non-violent resolution to this conflict was still possible, though unlikely. First, they would send formal word to General Lawrence demanding Zeff's release, and while they waited for the man's response, they would muster all available forces and begin calling in favors from allies abroad."

"723

The Rainlords dispersed, but no one left the castle just yet. Everyone promised to call around for any available reapers. Mariana almost told them not to bother, but the desperation of her circumstances had begun to weigh on her, finally. And in the past couple hours, her trust for everyone in that room had grown immeasurably.

In truth, even after all these years, even after giving birth to five new Rainlords, she'd never quite felt like a Rainlord herself. She'd only married into the title, not been born with it.

But today, she felt it. That companionship. Ancient and bloody and fierce and warm. And so very welcome.

The rest of the day drew out slowly. Mariana waited as long as she could, spent as much time with her daughters as she could, and hoped silently that someone would walk through that door with a reaper for Marcos. But no one did.

The girls had been quiet, perhaps afraid to ask their questions, perhaps just knowing that their mother would talk to them in her own time. Mariana thought at length about what she should say to them, what her last words should be.

It wasn't easy.

"You will be safe here. I wouldn't leave you if I thought otherwise. Red Lake is one of the most secure castles in all of Sair." Mariana paused, her expression spoiling slightly. "But I don't know what the future holds. Something could happen. Even if I remained here with you, something could happen. Do you remember what I taught you? The most important lesson?"

"Always be prepared," Ramira piped up.

Mariana smiled tiredly. "Yes."

"Think, plan, and act ahead of time," added Emiliana.

"That's right. You are smart girls. I have confidence in you both. Look out for one another. Listen to one another. And protect each other. Do you understand? The time for childishness is past. It is unfair, but both of you must grow up quickly now. That means you will have to give up on many of the things you desire. Possibly forever. You will come to accept this, or you will get someone killed. Perhaps someone you love very dearly. Perhaps yourself. Perhaps both."

The looks on their faces were stern, and Mariana knew they understood. Or hoped they did, at least."

"724

"And don't you dare blame Marcos for my death," Mariana went on. "And don't let him blame himself. None of this is his fault."

Emiliana frowned. "It's not yours, either, Mama..."

Mariana blinked at her. She exhaled a curt breath and took Emiliana's face in both hands in order to kiss her on the forehead, just above the horns. Then she knelt down and hugged Ramira more tightly than she'd ever hugged her before.

"Mama--that hurts..."

Mariana released her. "I'm sorry, mijara."

"It's okay."

Time was running short, she knew. Mariana composed herself and considered what else she needed to say. She eyed the two reapers present. "Listen to Shenado and Chergoa," she told her girls. "They are both wiser than I could ever be. They will guide you well."

"What if they don't agree with each other?" said Emiliana.

"Then listen to Shenado."

'Hey,' Chergoa pouted.

Shenado smirked. 'Seniority rules.'

'Ugh, you sound like my brother.'

Everyone but Ramira looked at her.

Chergoa cocked an eyebrow. 'What?'

"You said that as though your brother was still alive," said Mariana.

‘He is. At least, the last time I checked, he was.’ She squinted. ‘It’s been a while, though. I suppose he could’ve gotten himself killed. Sounds like something he’d do.’

‘That is very rare,’ said Shenado. ‘You truly have a living sibling? Why did you never mention him before?’

Chergoa shrugged. ‘Didn’t think to. I have no clue where he is. Haven’t seen him in... a while, like I said. I did tell Axiolis about him, though.’

“Your brother is a reaper, too?” Emiliana asked.

‘Yeah, of course.’

‘What is his name?’ said Shenado.

‘Garovel. You know him?’

‘No.’

‘I figured.’

The reapers’ chatter lasted a bit longer, only continuing to lose poignancy and relevance as it dragged on. It seemed apparent to Mariana that they were just trying to delay the inevitable now. Oddly childish of them, she thought--but not altogether unexpected. In her experience, most reapers tended to hold onto that quality in some small way. She always figured it was just something they did to help keep themselves sane."

"725 -- LXXXII.

At length, Mariana finally had to urge the reapers along. “Shenado...”

‘I know,’ the reaper said, turning heavily toward her. ‘We are out of time.’

Mariana breathed deeply and took a seat next to the hearth. She gazed into the fire therein. She’d lit it herself. She hadn’t sat next to an open flame like this in years. The crackling warmth summoned images of her childhood, of her humble parents, of their quaint home, of a plump mass of fur called Polly with those floppy ears and big, soft eyes. ‘Thank you for everything you’ve done for me,’ Mariana thought. ‘I never did say that enough.’

‘You never needed to,’ said Shenado, wrapped in the echo of privacy. ‘Do you have any last words?’

Mariana considered turning to her girls right then and telling them that she loved them. But she didn’t want to. She’d never liked saying it, which was perhaps a shame, because saying it now would only make things harder for herself. And for the girls, too, probably. And it didn’t really matter, anyway. Because they already knew. They had to. So she decided to hold her tongue. Instead, she thought, ‘For Zeff, if you ever see him again, tell him... I’ve decided that it wasn’t a mistake.’

‘What wasn’t a mistake?’

‘He will understand.’

Shenado nodded solemnly. She moved closer.

Mariana watched the fox’s claws reach toward her face. And as she felt her life leave her, she heard Shenado’s tremulous parting words.

‘Goodbye, my sweet girl...’

And the echo faded.

Chapter Eighty-Two: ‘Precious might, accrue now...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a nice change, being able to return from a night’s patrol without having earned himself dozens of blood stains and bullet holes. He’d been starting to run out of wearable clothes again.

“Welcome back, sir.”

“Oh, ah... th-thank you...” Hector stopped in the doorway to pull his dark coat off. He was surprised to find Jamal still awake at this hour. “You, um... you really don’t have to call me sir, Mr. Easton.”

The tall guardsman looked at him evenly. “Begging your pardon, sir, but I disagree.”

Hector frowned and tilted his head at him. “Why?”
"725 -- LXXXII.

At length, Mariana finally had to urge the reapers along. “Shenado...”

‘I know,’ the reaper said, turning heavily toward her. ‘We are out of time.’

Mariana breathed deeply and took a seat next to the hearth. She gazed into the fire therein. She’d lit it herself. She hadn’t sat next to an open flame like this in years. The crackling warmth summoned images of her childhood, of her humble parents, of their quaint home, of a plump mass of fur called Polly with those floppy ears and big, soft eyes. ‘Thank you for everything you’ve done for me,’ Mariana thought. ‘I never did say that enough.’

‘You never needed to,’ said Shenado, wrapped in the echo of privacy. ‘Do you have any last words?’

Mariana considered turning to her girls right then and telling them that she loved them. But she didn’t want to. She’d never liked saying it, which was perhaps a shame, because saying it now would only make things harder for herself. And for the girls, too, probably. And it didn’t really matter, anyway. Because they already knew. They had to. So she decided to hold her tongue. Instead, she thought, ‘For Zeff, if you ever see him again, tell him... I’ve decided that it wasn’t a mistake.’

‘What wasn’t a mistake?’

‘He will understand.’

Shenado nodded solemnly. She moved closer.

Mariana watched the fox’s claws reach toward her face. And as she felt her life leave her, she heard Shenado’s tremulous parting words.

‘Goodbye, my sweet girl...’

And the echo faded.

Chapter Eighty-Two: ‘Precious might, accrue now...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was a nice change, being able to return from a night's patrol without having earned himself dozens of blood stains and bullet holes. He'd been starting to run out of wearable clothes again.

"Welcome back, sir."

"Oh, ah... th-thank you..." Hector stopped in the doorway to pull his dark coat off. He was surprised to find Jamal still awake at this hour. "You, um... you really don't have to call me sir, Mr. Easton."

The tall guardsman looked at him evenly. "Begging your pardon, sir, but I disagree."

Hector frowned and tilted his head at him. "Why?"

"726

"It's for the people around us, sir," Jamal said. "It demonstrates to them that I think you are someone deserving of my respect. And that affects how they see you. For the better, I should hope."

"Uh... o-okay... but no one else is even awake, right now."

Jamal paused. "Well, it may also be force of habit, sir."

Hector smiled meekly and proceeded into the kitchen to grab something to eat. As usual, he was both exhausted and hungry. He still hadn't replaced his motorcycle yet, so he'd been doing his crime fighting on foot. He'd been trying to develop a more efficient means of getting around using only his materialization. Garovel had a few suggestions for him, but they required considerable practical experience. Hector had taken more than a few bone-breaking tumbles over the last few days.

Gray Rock was a nice city, he thought. The crime here didn't seem quite as bad as other places, perhaps because the police force was so vigilant. He'd encountered them several times, and while they hadn't been especially pleased by his presence, he was just happy they weren't shooting at him. Now that the nationwide manhunt for him had been called off by order of the Queen, Hector hoped to eventually form a working relationship with the Gray Rock Police Department. After two weeks here, he still wasn't quite sure if that was feasible or not.

As for Warrenhold itself, Madame Carthrace's troupe of construction workers had already managed to rebuild three of the six aboveground towers. Hector had also offered some assistance on that front, able to save them some time with the heavy lifting. The workers had quickly grown to appreciate Hector's metal power, as he could use it to create a kind of short-range transport line for huge stacks of materials. He would lay down a long, solid strip of metal, have the materials placed at one end, and then push them along with a continuously materializing wall. And not coincidentally, this was similar to the method by which he'd been attempting to transport himself around the city."

"727

The underground reconstruction, however, had barely started. The surveyors had only just completed their work, but at least now, Hector had a rough map of the grounds and quick sketches of all the floor plans. He'd learned that the eight underground towers all boasted twenty-four floors, with the exception of two--those being the Star Tower, which only had its top nine and a half floors, and the Entry Tower, which required thirty-two in order to reach the surface.

Expectedly, the Tower of Night was shown to be the largest with an average of twelve rooms per floor compared to the others' averages between seven and ten. In total, the castle had seventy-one lavatories, twenty-five hearths, six gathering halls, four kitchens, four adjacent bathhouses, one multilevel library, eight rainbow shrines, and then about six hundred empty rooms of undesignated function. This was not counting any of the buildings above ground or in the lake below Warrenhold.

The numbers left Hector a bit overwhelmed, to say the least. This wasn't a house. It was a town. He couldn't imagine ever needing this much space for anything. When he asked Voreese why Stasya had made it so gigantic, the reaper said that it was because she'd hoped Warrenhold would one day become a center of commerce between the surface world and the Undercrust.

'And she specifically wanted it to be a fortress so that it could protect itself from all manner of exploitation by external forces,' Voreese had said. 'When she was building it, Stasya considered Warrenhold to be an investment in humanity itself. She wanted this place to change the world.'

Hector could see why Voreese seemed to remember the woman so fondly.

And yet, he only had to look at Warrenhold now in order to understand what had become of Stasya's dream. It was a sobering realization, that. Hector would have liked to know the full story of how Stasya had died, but he couldn't bring himself to ask. He didn't see how it could be anything other than sad. Voreese never brought it up, either, but that might have only been because she hadn't stuck around very long. She and Roman had their own matters to attend to, of course."

"728

Between the repairs to Warrenhold and the patrols around the city, Hector had plenty to do. It was a rare moment when Garovel allowed him to just relax and eat a quiet meal like this. And even more than the food, Hector was looking forward to sleeping. The bed in his temporary room was waiting for him, he knew.

But as he sat across from his guardsman, Hector recalled a question that he'd been meaning to ask ever since they left Sescoria two weeks ago. He wasn't sure when he might get another opportunity to pose it. "Mr. Easton... why did you volunteer to work for me?"

"There were many reasons, sir."

"...Well, I'm listening."

A woman's voice interrupted. "Oh, are we sharing our stories now?" The Lady Carthrace entered through the door behind Hector. Her silken pajamas bore wild streaks of bright red, and for a second, Hector thought she was covered in blood and was duly relieved to realize it was only the woman's vivid taste in clothes. She made her way to the counter for a glass of water. "Do go on, Mr. Easton. I would like to hear this as well."

Jamal leaned back in his chair. "Only if you promise to go next, milady."

She smiled. "Little old me? How could I be of any interest?"

"I'm curious why a member of the richest family in Atreya would accept a job babysitting a teenager." He glanced at Hector. "No offense, sir."

Hector laughed faintly with a raised eyebrow. "None taken... I guess."

Amelia joined them at the table and sipped from her glass. She nodded and then motioned for Jamal to proceed.

Jamal looked at Hector again. "Milord is from Brighton, yes?"

It still took Hector a moment to realize who milord referred to. "Er, I... yes?"

"That is where I am from as well," said Jamal.

"Oh..."

"As it happens, I have a very good friend who still lives there. We haven't seen each other since we were about your age, but she and I have stayed in touch all these years. And grown quite close, I suppose. I still consider her to be my best friend."

Hector exchanged uncertain looks with Garovel."

"729

"But sometimes," Jamal continued, "I'd worry about her. She's a very... self-conscious person. And... lonely. She has an unfortunate tendency to attract certain types of men. Ones who try to take advantage of her. I knew all of this, but even still, I never imagined she would encounter that type of man..."

Hector scratched his cheek. "Uh... I'm sorry. I'm not sure I follow--"

Jamal held up a hand. "When she told me she'd nearly been the victim of a serial killer, I thought she was joking. But she wasn't. And then she told me about the person who'd saved her." The man's smile was a faint thing, and it almost seemed like it didn't belong on his face. "She actually said that, at first, she thought it was me. And in fairness, she hadn't seen me in years, and she doesn't know very many black people. And being mistaken for a hero--certainly not the worst kind of racial profiling I've ever experienced. But when she got a good look at you, she realized that you were too young to be me. And apparently, you also had a knife in your chest which didn't seem to be bothering you very much."

'Holy shit,' said Garovel. 'He's talking about the woman you saved on your very first night as a servant, isn't he?"

Hector blinked at Jamal, unsure of what to say.

"And not long after that, the media started talking about a vigilante with remarkable power. The coincidence did not escape my friend's notice. It was a traumatizing experience for her, but I think knowing that someone like you was out there helped her cope. She isn't the same person that she used to be."

"W-what... um. Oh... well, I'm glad she's doing okay..."

"You remember her?"

"Y-yeah. But... uh, I never learned her name."

"Jessica Paulson," said Jamal.

"Ah..."

"She's a big fan of yours, by the way. She was really upset when they started calling you a murderer and a criminal."

"Oh..."

Garovel was laughing his ass off. 'A fan! Oh, I would pay good money to watch you have a conversation with a fan. You should invite her to Warrenhold. Oh! Maybe Jamal is about to ask you that! Say yes, Hector. As your reaper, I command it.'

"730

"Anyway, the point is, Jessica is the reason I believed you would be a trustworthy person, despite your... turbulent relationship with the law. However, in the interest of full disclosure, sir, that was not what prompted me to give up my old job and come work for you. The truth of the matter is that I simply did not like being a member of the Queen's Guard."

Amelia pitched in now. "Why not? It was a fairly prestigious position, no?"

"It was. But most of the other guards were pompous, insufferable bastards. Excuse my language."

"Really? Did you, ah... er, what about Lynn? Did you think she was like that, too?"

"Oh, that's right. You fought alongside her, didn't you?"

"Er, yeah."

"She never bothered me. She seemed a bit full of herself for someone so young, but at least she took her job seriously. Most of the Queen's Guard would slack off and then lord their status over anyone who wasn't famous or rich. It wasn't until after the assassination attempt that they finally started getting their act together and behaving like real soldiers should."

"Were you in the castle during the Abolish occupation?" Amelia asked. She threw a look at Hector. "That was the name, yes? Abolish?"

Hector nodded.

Jamal's expression hardened. "Yes, I was there."

"Weren't you frightened?" said Amelia.

"I was."

They waited, but the man seemed to have nothing else to say on the matter.

Perhaps sensing the growing awkwardness in the air, Amelia decided to move on. "Well, my reasons for joining our young lord are somewhat similar, though not quite so harrowing, I admit. I suppose it is only to be expected that all three of us here be veritable black sheep, in our own ways. I also came here to escape a number of intolerable individuals."

"Who do you mean?" said Jamal.

"My many nephews and nieces. It is a rather long story and one I am sure would bore you, but the short of it is that--though you were correct in your assessment of my family's wealth--for a variety of very old reasons, I inherited the Carthrace name but none of its fortune."

"731

“None of it?” said Jamal. “You upset your parents that much?”

“Oh yes,” Amelia laughed. “You know that rebellious phase that young people go through? It was not a phase for me. My parents and I saw the world in vastly different ways. And they passed that on to my brother and sister, who then passed it on to all of their children. In their eyes, I was always the corrupting aunt. They thought me a nuisance, at best. An opponent, at worst.”

“Er... an opponent?” said Hector.

“In their power games. The Carthraces and the Lumenbels have a long-enduring rivalry with one another. And now, with so many of those Lumenbel boys dead, I am sure my nephews are seeing it as a great opportunity to further our family name. Unfortunately for them, the Queen has no obvious successor with whom they may attempt to arrange another marriage. In theory, if both Helen and William were to die tomorrow, rule would pass to the already-married firstborn son of her oldest brother. There is also the very likely possibility that the Queen has preemptively appointed someone else in secret--someone who will only be revealed should such a crisis ever arise. As you might imagine, the political seas in Sescoria are rather stormy, right now. I am most glad to be here with you fine gentlemen, instead.”

Garovel floated over Amelia. ‘Hmm. Ask her what the origin of this dispute between the two families is.’

With effort, Hector managed to.

“Oh, I could not tell you. That was before even my time. But it has sustained itself over all these years due to continually renewed feelings of ill will. In recent memory, there was the matter of Prince David upsetting my niece Delilah so much that she plainly refused to marry him no matter how my brother attempted to coerce her. Which was no small feat, mind you. My brother could have given lessons to mules on stubbornness. Even on his deathbed. The doctors said he had three days left, at most. He didn’t let go of this mortal coil for another month.””

"732

Hector’s brow receded. “Wow... uh... w-what did Prince David do to upset your niece so much?"

Amelia gestured with an open hand in front of her. "That, I don't know. She has never provided details. Popular theory was that he blackmailed her in some way."

Hector wondered if Prince David was capable of such a thing. It seemed rather extreme, but then again, blackmail wasn't nearly as bad as what he already knew certain other royals to be capable of.

"Regardless, it was a shame," said Amelia. "That marriage was an attempt to settle our past differences and bring the two families together. Instead, it made matters worse. A few years later, they tried again with a new couple. Sarah and Luther." She frowned. "Their union appeared to be more successful... but recent events would suggest otherwise."

It was a strange thing to think about, Hector felt--that all of the horrible things Atreya endured over these past few months might have never happened if Prince Luther had married differently. He wasn't sure he believed that. It seemed too simple. But then, he certainly didn't believe it was fate, either. And he didn't see much room for a middle ground on that point. Events were either fated to occur, or they weren't--and trying to game the system and say that events were fated but still part of multiple "possible fates" was definitely bullshit, he thought. Something to consult Garovel about later, he decided. Though, he already had a pretty good idea of what the reaper would say.

Jamal had more questions for the Lady Carthrace. "So is that your only reason for accepting this position? To get away from your family?"

"Is that not reason enough?" she said.

"It seems to me that someone of your status would be able to find opportunities to flee almost anywhere," said Jamal. "Why choose Lord Goffe?"

Hector doubted he would ever get used to that.

"I had Helen's word that Hector was a trustworthy young man," said Amelia. "And if she trusts him, well... If earning my trust were like learning how to swim, then earning her trust would be like learning how to breathe underwater.""

Their conversation went on for a little while longer as they discussed the next stage of their plans for Warrenhold's restoration. The matter of the hydroelectric generator was nearly resolved, thankfully. Hector had finally found its location a few days ago, buried beneath one of the unnamed towers. The survey team hadn't been able to find it, because it sat on the far end of a flooded hallway in a room as big as a house.

Simply enough, Hector had been able to fill the room with iron and thereby push out all the water. It had proved slightly annoying, since Hector didn't know how to swim--a thing for which Garovel surprisingly did not make fun of him--but he managed. A replacement generator was already scheduled to arrive as early as next week. It was easily their most expensive purchase yet, but they decided trying to fix the one already here would likely prove problematic in the long-term, given how many years it had gone without any maintenance whatsoever.

As for the flooding issue, it turned out to be the fault of a large crack in the generator room's wall. Hector patched it up with metal easily enough, and afterwards, he was able to follow the hydroelectric generator's actual water intake stream and discover the location of something else that had been eluding the surveyors: the waterfall.

When standing in the middle of all eight of Warrenhold's great towers, anyone could hear the waterfall's faint white noise, but the cavernous echoes made it impossible to use the sound as any kind of guide. Until then, they hadn't been able to find the path that lead to it, and Hector discovered that was because the path went through the bathhouses, which were even more problematic than the generator room. The bathhouses weren't merely flooded; they were flooded with searing hot water. Apparently, Warrenhold had its own natural hot spring.

That was Hector's current project. He and Garovel had been trying to render the bathhouses usable once more--or at the very least enterable. So after getting some much needed sleep, Hector went back to it. So far, he'd managed to remove much of the excess water, but the heat was still unbearable."

Hector looked around the bathhouse another time. Aside from his pair of flashlights, he'd brought some candles with him this time. Given how damp the place was, he didn't think a bunch of light bulbs would've been a good idea. And unfortunately, as Garovel had explained to him, the floodlights he'd been using before were not named such because they were supposed to be used in flooded areas but rather just because of how they flooded an area with light.

Of course, electrocuting himself wasn't a big concern--especially considering all the times he'd been struck by lightning--but he figured it best to exercise caution in case anyone else happened to wander in while he was working.

This particular bathhouse was almost all one giant chamber. Half of it had been carved out of natural rock, and a tall divider cut right down the middle, perhaps meant to separate the male side from the female side. The big tub in the center could have probably held fifty people comfortably, and its hard perimeters of rectangular rocks gave way on the side nearest the entrance for long, flat steps that eased gradually into the water.

'Welp, I finally found the problem,' said Garovel. He'd been wandering blindly through the pitch darkness of solid rock in search of the source of the hot spring's heat.

'What is it?'

'A shitload of magma.'

Hector's eyes widened. 'How much is a shitload?'

'More than a crapload, less than a fuckton.'

'...So helpful.'

'It's pretty far down here. Won't be easy for you to reach.'

'Hmm...'

'I see two options. You can dig down here and divert some of the magma. And probably burn yourself to death at least once or twice. Or, you can try to add more layers to the hot springs in order to absorb more of the heat before it reaches the water--possibly employing some type of heat-resistant material.'

'Ugh...'

‘What?’

‘It’s just... I mean, obviously, there’s not supposed to be that much magma down there, or else the temperature up here wouldn’t be so fucking high...’

‘Indeed. It’s probably the result of that earthquake the Queen mentioned, just like all the other flooding we’ve seen.’”

"735

‘But it’s not like the quake created the magma,’ said Hector. ‘It just bridged two pools together, right? Or streams... or whatever.’

‘Yep. Which means there’s almost certainly even more magma down here somewhere. And depending on how much there actually is, the shift in heat pressure from that earthquake might one day lead to brand new volcanic activity. Which wouldn’t be very good for us.’

‘No kidding.’

‘So you’re thinking that just adding layers to the tubs wouldn’t fix the real problem.’

‘Pretty much, yeah...’

‘How do you intend to dig down here, then? Brute force? Even with enhanced strength, that’ll take you a while.’

‘Well... I don’t see any other options...’

‘Alright, then let me have a look around for the best point of entry.’

‘Okay.’

Hector exited the bathhouse, having to go all the way through the Tower of Day’s ground floor and out into the greater cavern area before finally finding a lungful of genuinely cooler air.

He decided to practice with his metal while he waited. He hadn’t been training with his metal as much as he would’ve liked. Or at least, he hadn’t been experimenting with it as much. He’d of course been getting plenty of practical experience in his almost daily patrols around Gray Rock, and while that was certainly helpful for honing his existing skills, it didn't help much with developing new ones. He knew that he needed to set aside some time soon and really see what else he was capable of now. For the moment, however, these brief periods of downtime would have to suffice.

He extended his arm out fully and concentrated. There was only one thing he wanted, and he envisioned it in his head.

The metal ball materialized in an instant, just in front of his open palm. But rather than falling straight to the ground, it popped outward first, as if it had been gently tossed. He annihilated it before it touched the ground.

It wasn't much velocity, of course, but it was a start. And he was sure he could do more, still, if he could only get a better feel for it in his mind. It was just such a newly applied concept that he was having difficulty wrapping his head around it."

"736

Hector experimented with a few different methods of imagining the moving metal into existence. First, he just tried to envision it as 'already in motion' before creation, like Garovel had mentioned. That idea seemed to be the key, making the added velocity possible in the first place. Then, to see if he could increase the speed, he tried imagining the metal as if it were the tip of a spike, growing out of a base that just wasn't there. He knew that he could create spikes very quickly, so he'd hoped that would have an impact, but if it did, it was negligible.

Now, he was just trying to imagine everything with more precision in his mind. Clarity had always been a big factor in the past, so he figured this was probably no different. He'd been trying to research movement as a whole. He'd never gotten around to taking a physics course in high school, but he wasn't sure it would have mattered anyway, not without this desire which now possessed him.

It was also of enormous benefit to carefully observe objects in motion. A thrown ball, a dropped ball, a launched ball, their differences mattered, just as the ball itself mattered. Momentum, inertia, weight, surface area--for a subject that seemed so basic and intuitive in nature, he found the mechanics actually quite complicated and engrossing.

Strangely, it didn't feel like homework, even though he knew that it basically was. Instead, it just felt valuable and necessary--like growth. Plus, it was exciting to think about all the different ways he might be able to apply movement to his metal.

'I think I found a good spot,' said Garovel, bringing Hector back to the task at hand. 'There's a small room below the Tower of Day. Seems to be the closest.'

Hector soon found the room he was talking about. It was a storage closet, he guessed, assuming they had things like that in ancient times. He couldn't imagine why they wouldn't.

Garovel empowered him with strength and pointed at the room's bottom right corner."

"737

Hector rubbed his hands together, making fresh iron gloves for himself and then connecting them both to the handle of an oversized pickaxe. Wielding it like a sword, he pressed his soul into it for extra oomph, and then slammed it against the wall with all his might.

A huge chunk of stone broke away from the wall and shattered into a hundred pieces. And so did the tool. And so did both of his arms.

'Hmm. I'm not an expert, but I don't think you're doing it right.'

Hector watched his elbows snap back into place and his torn flesh close itself up again. "Might've used a little too much force there..."

'Might've. Or maybe next time, you can try to swing it so hard that you break your LEGS. Wouldn't that be cool?'

He rotated his arms, stretching and flexing. He annihilated the remains of the pickaxe and created it again from scratch. He set to work again, this time with a finer touch.

'Now might be a good time to bring up the topic of passive soul defenses.'

Hector didn't stop swinging. "Passive what now?"

‘As your soul power grows, you’ll be able to naturally increase the resilience of your own body. So things like just now, they won’t happen anymore--or at least, they won’t happen quite so easily.’

“Oh. So a stronger soul makes my body tougher?”

‘Yeah. In two separate respects. First, there’s “resilience,” which is basically the same as how you strengthen your metal. You just apply it to your body instead, and as you get stronger, it begins to happen on its own, constantly applying that extra strength to your body--albeit not as powerfully as when you apply it yourself.’

“Huh...”

‘Passive resilience becomes a really big deal, eventually. Powerful enough servants can even deflect bullets with their bare skin.’

He stopped picking to throw a look at Garovel. “A-are you serious?”

‘Oh yes. Not that bullets would even give them a hard time in the first place, but you get the idea, right?’

“Eh, y-yeah...”

"738

‘It tends to cause a huge disparity in power,’ said Garovel. ‘It makes it so that certain servants can’t even be wounded by anyone who isn’t close enough to their level in strength. They can just mow down hordes of lesser servants without a care in the world, pretty much.’

“Fuck...”

‘Yeah. Few things are as terrifying to see bearing down upon you on a battlefield.’

Hector returned to his crude tunneling. Its downward slope was perhaps a bit too steep, he thought, and he started trying to curve it more.

‘Anyway, soul resilience is only the first means of passive defense. The second is “field density,” which is similar but a little less intuitive.’

“Field density...? I can’t even imagine what that would refer to.”

‘Mm. It’s also called soul pressure, which might be easier to conceptualize. It’s a defense against abilities being used within your own personal space. For instance, a materialization user might try to use the orifices of the human head to create the base of a spike that then shoots straight into the brain and kills their opponent instantly. But with strong field dens--’

“Oh!” Hector stopped picking again and blinked. “I didn’t even think of trying something like that...”

‘It’s a very advanced technique, not easy at all, especially on a moving target--but that’s neither here nor there. I’m saying that one’s field density offers a kind of constant defense against that sort of thing. It’s a lot like how you couldn’t coat Karkash in metal due to his magnetism. Same concept, only applied more broadly.’

“Hmm. How does that work?”

‘By preventing the USE of the abilities in the first place. Materialization won’t accumulate properly. Destruction won’t tunnel properly. Integration won’t fuse. And alteration users, they’re fucked, too. Only transfiguration and mutation are immune, because those powers are strictly limited to the user’s body, where one’s own field density is strongest, so it doesn’t matter how oppressive their opponent’s soul pressure is.’

Hector scratched his head. “You weren’t kidding about it being less intuitive than the other thing...”

‘Soul resilience.’

“Yeah, the other thing.”

Garovel exhaled a nonexistent breath."

"739

“So, uh... you’re saying this field density thing protects the body, but it can also double as a kind of weapon? I mean, suppressing the opponent’s power seems pretty potent...”

‘Yep. That’s generally how the terminology is handled. “Field density” is defensive; “soul pressure” is offensive. But they both refer to the same thing.'

"I'm... not gonna remember that."

'You will, eventually. In the meantime, I'll remember for you.'

"Right, thanks." He was nearly waist-deep in the hole now, and the heat only seemed to be growing stronger. "But, um... was there a reason why you brought this stuff up now? I'm still too weak to use it, aren't I?"

'For passive defense, yes, you're still too young. But you could try actively applying the resilience to your body. Might help you cope with the heat a little better.'

"Really? How much better?"

'Oh, not much at all. You might be able to get a few centimeters closer to the magma before the heat convection melts your face off.'

"Well, that's nice..."

'It's to be expected. Our souls have only had six months to synchronize.'

That made him stand upright. "Six months..." He pressed a hand to his forehead, partly to wipe the sweat away, partly just thinking back. "It's only been six months?"

'Six and a half, to be precise.'

"That's still ridiculous..."

'Hopefully, the next six won't be quite so hectic. You've got a pretty good handle on your power now, and you're a much better fighter. We've even made a few good allies. Oh, and let's not forget our new base of operations. Seems like it's already time to start thinking about the next step.'

"The next step? What do you mean? You have something in mind?"

'As a matter of fact, I do. We should begin fostering a network of reliable contacts.'

"Oh... y'know, Roman mentioned something like that, too."

'Did he? When?'

"It was just before that big fight. The one at, uh..."

'Rathmore's Gate?'

"Yeah. He said, ah... networking is really difficult."

'He's not wrong.'

"His previous allies kinda fucked him over, didn't they?"

'Seemed like it.'

"740 -- LXXXIII.

"But, uh... Roman said if we ever find someone we can really trust, we should take good care of them. He said something like... if I don't have room for them in my life, then I should get a bigger house."

'Heh, is that so?'

"And... I think he was talking about Colt. Like he was implying that I shouldn't have let Colt leave."

'Ah. Hmm.'

"Er... maybe I was just reading too much into it, though..."

'Well, once we finish sprucing this place up, perhaps we should give Colt a call. Check up on him, at least. But I won't force you to offer him a room. I know you two have your differences. And he IS a murderer.'

"Yeah..." Hector stopped digging again to look at Garovel. "I don't know if I'll ever forgive him for that..."

'...But?'

He sighed. "But I don't know. And besides, he probably wouldn't even want to live here."

'Ah, it just occurred to me that we don't know how Warrenhold affects children. Voreese said the unsettling feeling could be explained away, but obviously, that's not going to work with babies.'

"You think this place has an age restriction? Seems like Voreese would have mentioned that.”

‘Maybe. No harm in asking her next time.’

Hector was up to his shoulders in rock now. He took a hard breath and rested his pickaxe on his shoulder. “Geez... how much farther down is it?”

‘Only a few more meters.’

“Meters?! How many?!”

Garovel shrugged. ‘Nine or ten? Or... fifteen? Could be twenty, I suppose.’

“Fuck, man...”

‘Hey, you try measuring while you float through complete darkness without any sense of motion around you.’

He rolled his shoulders. “This sucks. I thought hot springs were supposed to be relaxing...”

Chapter Eighty-Three: ‘Relations from afar...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It was nearing the end of Lynnette’s shift. For the first couple weeks, it had been just her on round-the-clock guard duty, sleeping only rarely. After Harper was back on his feet, however, the man was gracious enough to begin trading off with her, since there was no one else in Sescoria who could really protect Queen Helen.”
"740 -- LXXXIII.

“But, uh... Roman said if we ever find someone we can really trust, we should take good care of them. He said something like... if I don’t have room for them in my life, then I should get a bigger house.”

‘Heh, is that so?’

“And... I think he was talking about Colt. Like he was implying that I shouldn’t have let Colt leave.”

‘Ah. Hmm.’

“Er... maybe I was just reading too much into it, though...”

‘Well, once we finish sprucing this place up, perhaps we should give Colt a call. Check up on him, at least. But I won’t force you to offer him a room. I know you two have your differences. And he IS a murderer.’

“Yeah...” Hector stopped digging again to look at Garovel. “I don’t know if I’ll ever forgive him for that...”

‘...But?’

He sighed. “But I don’t know. And besides, he probably wouldn’t even want to live here.”

‘Ah, it just occurred to me that we don’t know how Warrenhold affects children. Voreese said the unsettling feeling could be explained away, but obviously, that’s not going to work with babies.’

“You think this place has an age restriction? Seems like Voreese would have mentioned that.”

‘Maybe. No harm in asking her next time.’

Hector was up to his shoulders in rock now. He took a hard breath and rested his pickaxe on his shoulder. “Geez... how much farther down is it?”

‘Only a few more meters.’

“Meters?! How many?!”

Garovel shrugged. ‘Nine or ten? Or... fifteen? Could be twenty, I suppose.’

“Fuck, man...”

‘Hey, you try measuring while you float through complete darkness without any sense of motion around you.’

He rolled his shoulders. “This sucks. I thought hot springs were supposed to be relaxing...”

Chapter Eighty-Three: ‘Relations from afar...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

It was nearing the end of Lynnette's shift. For the first couple weeks, it had been just her on round-the-clock guard duty, sleeping only rarely. After Harper was back on his feet, however, the man was gracious enough to begin trading off with her, since there was no one else in Sescoria who could really protect Queen Helen."

"741

As ever, Lynnette observed Her Highness's meetings in silence. Deliberations with the Minister of Defense took up most of the evening, as the man was--perhaps understandably--concerned about the troubling developments and conflicting reports in Sair. Lynnette imagined that the sudden talk of a possible civil war was unsettling to just about everyone on Eloa, so the fact that two entire countries, Lorent and Callum, both stood between Atreya and Sair was probably of little comfort to the minister.

The Queen, however, seemed as calm and collected as ever, and even though it took a while, she convinced the man that she would not overlook the matter, despite the Agency of Foreign Affairs still being in a questionable state after she had all but dismantled it.

Soon enough, Harper arrived to take her place.

Lynnette stood for a quick handshake. "Sleep well?" she asked him.

"Sure di--" The man broke himself off, glancing to his side and then back to Lynnette. "Darsihm says there's something strange about you, Miss Edith."

Lynnette eyed the Queen, who spared them a look before returning to her mountain of reading and paperwork. Lynnette stepped into the quiet hall so as not to disturb her, then addressed Harper again. "...Darsihm? Ah, is that your reaper friend?"

"Yeah. He's been unconscious 'til now, so he's never seen you before."

"Oh, I see." She pulled off her glove to reveal her bone half-gauntlet. "Then, I'm sure he is sensing this. It apparently spooked Garovel and the others as well, but none of them could tell me anything about it that I don't already know. I was meaning to ask you about it when your reaper woke up."

"Oh! Shoulda shown it to me earlier. I know just as much about it as Darsihm does. Where'd you get it from, by the way?"

"A division of the Vanguard in Callum," said Lynnette. "They were doing experiments on it. I didn't intend to steal it from them, but... it just sort of... worked out that way."

A grin split Harper's flat face. "Might not wanna be so forthcoming with that information the next time someone asks. Lotta my colleagues are a touch stingy, you know, and they generally frown upon thievery-- particularly of a thing like that.""

"742

Lynnette pursed her lips at the man. "Well, I'm glad you're not upset."

"Oh, you can blame that on Darsihm. I used to be a real stick in the mud--not very lenient or understanding of other folks' plights. But as I get older, I find his laidback disposition to be a more agreeable means of continuing through this dimly lit passage we here call existence."

Lynnette just kind of looked at him.

Harper returned a chuckle. "Pardon my sophistry."

"I suppose what I want to know most is whether or not I should expect any kind of drawbacks to wearing this gauntlet. So far, it's been surprisingly easy to control."

"Aha. Wondering what the catch is, huh? As far as I know, there isn't one." A beat passed, and then Harper added, "Well, apart from not being able to take it off."

"So there really is no way to remove it?"

"Not without taking your arm with it. Oh, and I guess that leads to another downside, doesn't it? Certain folks will try to kill you for it. Because it's so rare and powerful, you see."

"Right... Do you know why it can't be removed normally?"

"That's an easy one: because it's not just bound to your arm. It's also bound to your soul. It gives your soul physical weight relative to your own body. Like superglue. Except not really. In fact, forget I made that analogy. I suck at analogies. Dunno why I even tried."

"Uh...?"

"Oh, and another downside I forgot about. Er--sort of. You might consider it a good thing, I guess."

She waited with a disjointed expression.

"You can't have kids," said Harper. "Your living shadow will prevent your eggs from being fertilized."

Lynnette's eye widened.

"It's weirdly sexist, too, because when it's bound to a man, the shadow doesn't prevent the guy's sperm from fertilizing an egg. I guess it's a matter of protection versus penetration? Or maybe it just has to do with bodily proximity. Very odd either way, if you ask me."

She still didn't have a response for him."

"743

"On the plus side," said Harper, "it means you don't need to worry about using contraceptives. That's neat, right?"

Lynnette just squinted at him. She was wondering if he was about to admit to joking, but apparently, he was being serious.

"Then again, if you really want to give birth, you could amputate your arm. Or try a surrogate. Personally, though, I'd just recommend adopting. Not enough people adopt, you know. The world already has plenty of kids in need of a good parent, but hardly anyone considers adopting unless they can't have kids of their own. It's a real shame." Another beat passed as he watched Lynnette's face. "Before you ask, yes, I've adopted many children."

She wasn't going to ask that.

"They're all grown up now. It's why I like to travel so much. They live all over the world. I've been thinking of doing it again, but now that I'm with the Vanguard, raising a child would be more complicated. Could also be more exciting, though." He smiled and let his eyes wander upward a little. "Could take 'em with me wherever I went and keep 'em safe while I show 'em the world. Fantastic, that'd be."

Lynnette hadn't realized Mr. Norez could speak at such length so easily. She was starting to think he'd just keep talking unless she stopped him.

"Anyhow, you're still young. Probably haven't given any real thought to such things, have you?"

She would have liked to say he was wrong, but he wasn't. Lynnette had never been the type to fantasize about being a mother or a wife. If it happened, it happened. She didn't see much reason to dwell on it any more than that. But now, apparently, her options had already dwindled without her knowledge.

An unsettling realization.

She resolved to think about it later. There was still an important question she needed to ask this person. "Can you tell me how to use Incineration?"

Harper briefly turned to the empty space next to him. "Are you talking about your glove's hidden ability?"

She cocked an eyebrow. "Hidden? I only heard it mentioned in Callum. I don't know anything else about it."

"744

"Ah... well, unfortunately, neither do we. I've heard that these items have secondary powers, just like aberrations themselves do, but I've only met a handful of people who are actually using them like yourself. And what's more, I think only two or three of the ones I've met had managed to draw the power out. I didn't think to ask for an explanation as to how they did it. Sorry."

"Mm."

"Having said that, though, I could point you toward some folks who can tell you more. There're a few in Callum, but I'm guessing you'd rather not speak to those.”

“Preferably not.”

“Then, I know a fellow named Haqq Najir who’s been studying aberrations since they first started appearing. Crazy smart, that guy. And not a member of the Vanguard, either, so he definitely won’t rat you out for stealing.”

“How do I contact him?”

“I could call him right now, if you like. Knowing him, he’s probably still awake at this hour. Thing is, I’m sure he’ll want to meet you. He’s very... enthusiastic about his research. He’ll probably drop whatever he’s doing and--”

The sight of Prince David caught their attention. He did not seem to be in possession of his usual humor, hardly even acknowledging their presence before proceeding into the Queen’s chambers.

Lynnette eyed Harper. “Perhaps now isn’t the best time.”

“Perhaps not.” Harper placed a hand on the door but didn’t follow David just yet. “I’ll call Haqq in the morning, then. Go get some sleep. You look tired.”

She rubbed below her one eye and squinted. “Will do. And tell me what they’re getting up to in there, yeah?”

“Sure thing.”

--++--++--

Until now, Helen hadn’t had the time for this meeting, nor had she been particularly looking forward to it. She hadn’t seen Luther in person since fleeing Sescoria, but after her conversation tonight with David, Luther had jumped to the top of her priorities.

Luther smiled upon seeing her, David, and Harper approaching. “Ah, there she is. Finally, the prodigal sister deigns to grace me with her presence.””

"745

As she looked at him, she could hardly believe this was the same man. The face belonged to him, but the expression seemed nothing of the sort. He was pleased. And she had a pretty good idea why.

David, Meriwether, and even Mehlsanz had told her about this-- Luther's madness. But even so, she'd felt as though they must've been exaggerating the point somewhat. Even after everything that had happened, it was still a difficult thing to take someone's word for.

"And what, may I ask, is the purpose of your visit?" said Luther. "At this time of night, it must be urgent."

Helen pressed the button on the speaker box to allow her voice through. "It seems that the Minister of Finance and the Lord High Treasurer have both inexplicably left the country tonight."

"Oh?" said Luther. "How curious."

"What do you know of this matter?" Helen was not in the mood to mince words, but she doubted that would make much difference to Luther right now.

Luther took a seat on his milky white bed. His prisoner's uniform was also white, but the thick vertical stripes of orange ensured plenty of visibility. "What makes you think I know anything?"

"I have multiple reports stating that you frequented the Royal Treasury over the past eighteen months," the Queen said.

"It is an interesting place."

"You also claimed that your contingency plan involved money."

Luther looked at David with false shock. "You told her? Brother, how could you?"

David merely observed their conversation in silence.

"Luther, what have you done?" she tried. "Tell me."

"Is it not more fun for you to guess?" he said. "You will find out sooner or later, regardless. In fact, sooner, from the sound of it."

Helen eyed his cell. "You want something in exchange, then."

"I understand why you would think that, but the truth is, you have nothing I desire. Apart from my freedom, I suppose, but I suspect that is not on offer.” His eyes briefly went to David again. “And after the stunt with my television, I have no wish to make any more deals.””

"746

Helen squinted. “I do not understand your purpose in doing any of this.”

“Then perhaps that is the question you should be asking me,” said Luther. “The crown has made you very demanding, sister. It is unbecoming. A lady should try to be more understanding of others’ feelings.”

“Explain, then. Why did you betray me?”

“Because this country needed me to,” said Luther. “There are over 150 sovereign nations in the world, and yet only ten of them have monarchs. And of those ten--”

--only four possess virtually unchecked power as I do,” finished Helen. “I am aware.”

“Do you see no problem with that, sister?”

It was an argument she’d been hearing since childhood, an argument she’d once believed in herself. “So, rather than speak to me of your concerns, you decided that it was better to force a regime change by having me assassinated and plunging Atreya into a war with its neighbors. I fail to see how you could believe these actions would benefit the country.”

“Necessary change is often the most painful.”

“I suppose you would have Atreya be coddled by the illusion of a republic or democracy, instead?”

Luther only tilted his head at her.

“Do you honestly believe such governments can last in earnest? They can be founded on such idealism, perhaps, but it is inevitable that they will give rise to new royalty and be ruled by it. The only difference is that the kings of democracy can hide themselves behind a veil of elected figureheads.”

The man was quiet a moment as he blinked slowly at her. He looked at David another time. "Did you know she was this cynical?"

"Yes, I did. You would have known as well, if you had ever bothered to get to know her the way a brother should."

"It seems we are guilty of that on both counts," said Helen. "If I had known Luther's heart even just one year ago, we would not have these problems now. And our family might still be together."

Luther exhaled a short laugh and shook his head at her. "You genuinely believe that a monarchy is the best method of governance?"

"747

"In this instance, 'best' is a term of gross oversimplification," said Helen. "Monarchy is a high-risk, high-reward system. Under the right leadership, it can be more efficient, moral, and just than any other; under the wrong, it can destroy its people. That is why the most important decision a monarch will ever make is choosing his or her successor."

"I suppose the person with all of the power would believe that," said Luther.

"I did not come here to have an adolescent debate with you," said Helen.

"No, you came here, because you had no choice."

"Tell me what you have done to the nation's finances, Luther."

"Or what? You will have me tortured? How mundane."

The Queen rolled her eyes and sighed. "I outlawed torture three years ago."

"Is that supposed to mean something to me?"

"You might hold my word in low regard, but it does not matter. You will have plenty of time to see the truth for yourself."

"Torture or not, I see no reason to tell you anything."

"Hmm. You have a point."

Luther cocked an eyebrow at her.

Helen turned to the others. "Please leave us," she said.

David and Harper both hesitated at that request. Darsihm and Mehlsanz were also present, but their ghostly expressions remained unfazed.

"I am in no danger," Helen assured them. "You can wait for me upstairs, if you prefer."

Harper glanced at Darsihm, who shrugged and floated off, after which Harper soon followed. David frowned but did as she asked. Only Mehlsanz remained behind, floating silently by the Queen's side.

And perhaps he sensed an unfavorable change in the atmosphere, because Luther backed away from the glass of his prison cell.

Helen iced her expression. She'd hoped she wouldn't need to resort to this tactic, but it seemed there was no helping it. "One of the reasons I have taken so long to come visit you is because I wanted to do my homework first. It may not make up for years of inattentiveness, but on the other hand, I feel it grants me a bit of perspective."

"748

"What are you talking about?" said Luther.

"David told me that your categorical hatred of royalty is due to our father, but that is not the whole story, is it?"

Luther lowered his face a little but didn't remove his gaze from the Queen.

"This was not the first time you have attempted to destroy a government," said Helen. "Nineteen years ago in a tiny country called Snider--that was your doing, was it not?"

Her brother chose not to answer.

"The King of Snider had a reputation for brutality, but nonetheless, Father was on good terms with him. You spent only a single summer there, supposedly enjoying a leisurely time as any prince would. And yet, no more than six months after your visit, the King of Snider was overthrown in a bloody conflict. One might call that a coincidence and be satisfied, but for two entire years after that rebellion, there were several other families attempting to seize power--and all of their efforts were in vain. In fact, each claimant to the throne died rather gruesomely or mysteriously. Or both. Until, finally, democracy took hold."

Luther was expressionless. "You believe me responsible for all of that? Perhaps I should be flattered."

"Mm. It was quite difficult to find out the details of that summer visit of yours. You were careful, even then, but you were young. I have spoken with several of your attendants from that time, and they all mentioned your habit of disappearing. For me, however, the truly convincing piece of evidence was the girl."

Luther turned away and paced toward the wall.

"I have her name written down." She reached inside her flowing coat and pulled out a notepad. She flipped through the pages. "Lila Vance. She was only six when the King of Snider had her parents executed for blasphemy. She was only seven when you met her, no? Despite lacking the means, she was able to move out of Snider after your visit but before the rebellion. She has lived quite comfortably in Kahm ever since, under the name Lila Demitri. She is but a simple flower vendor, and attributes her wealth to her rich uncle.""

"749

Luther spun around to confront his sister again. "Enough of this. What is your point? Are you trying to make me believe that you will hurt Lila if I do not cooperate? Do not make me laugh, Helen."

"She has a husband and two daughters now," the Queen continued, "but I am sure you knew that already."

Luther looked at her coolly. "I know you are bluffing, sister. You would never do such a thing."

Helen expected this. Now she had a choice to make about how best to convince him that she was not bluffing. The temptation, of course, was to stare him down and tell him he was wrong to doubt her with as much severity as she could muster, but she did not believe that would work on this person. This was a man who held no respect for her whatsoever. No, the best tactic here was surely just the opposite. She had to be nonchalant, as if taking the life of an innocent person was of no consequence to her, as if Luther's suspicion made no difference at all. And that meant she could show no hesitation.

"My only dilemma now is that I have four candidates to choose from," said Helen. "I assume you care for the husband the least, so I shall begin with him and work my way toward Lila. I am sure you will understand my conviction by the time I reach her. Or would you prefer that she die second as a small measure of mercy for her children?"

"You would never harm a child."

Helen kept her expression utterly flat. "There are over forty million people in Atreya. Roughly one quarter of them are children. How many of those would die if I were unwilling to take the lives of two foreign girls? I wonder."

Luther clenched his jaw and squinted at her.

"Perhaps I should start with the daughters, then, and spare the husband. That way might prove more expedient."

"You wouldn't--"

Helen returned the notepad to its place inside her coat. "I will bring them here to visit you so that you can see with your own eyes that I am not playing a trick with corpses. You will exchange words with them, confirm their identities for yourself, and then watch them die."

"750

"Fine," said Luther, "you win. I will tell you what I have done."

Helen's gaze flickered. She hadn't expected him to give in so quickly. He didn't look especially unsettled by Helen's threats, either.

"There is nothing you can do," he said. "That is why I am telling you. Because it is already too late."

Helen merely waited.

"You see, I have discreetly removed all of the money from the Royal Treasury and replaced it with borrowed funds. Atreya now holds nothing but debt." He didn't smile. If anything, he only looked even more callous than before. "You think you have won your kingdom back, sister? Far from it. Atreya belongs to over a dozen other countries."

She said nothing, still, only letting her eyes drift vacantly to the side a little. If he was lying, then she would confirm it easily enough; but Luther would know that, of course, which meant that, for now, it was a safe assumption that he was telling the truth.

"They will come to you soon in search of their money," he said. "Some may be understanding of your circumstances, but I do not think Intar, Horsht, Korgum, or Dozer will be very agreeable. You owe them quite a sum, and any one of them might become upset when they learn that you have done business with the others."

Intar, Horsht, Korgum, and Dozer. Intar was difficult to deal with on a good day, but the other three were easily the most volatile nations on the continent. As soon as he uttered their names, there was no hope of Helen concealing her exasperation. She shut her eyes and turned away from Luther to press a hand to her forehead.

She needed to think. She'd expected the problem to be bad, but this? Could anything even be done? If the Royal Treasury really only contained borrowed money now, then everything would be made more difficult.

Whatever the case, she had to start asking questions. She required information, and Luther was perhaps the only person who could give it. "You are talking about nearly two hundred billion troas. How could you have possibly removed that much money from the Royal Treasury without anyone noticing?"

"751

"Have you not realized by now?" said Luther. "Someone did notice. In fact, not only did they notice, they helped me. But not because they wanted to, of course."

Helen put it together. This was why the Minister of Finance and the Lord High Treasurer had fled. Luther bribed or coerced them. Either way, it didn't make much difference now. She moved on to a more important question. "What did you do with the money you removed?"

"That was the real challenge. I had no great need of the money, myself. If anything, it was a burden and a risk to keep around. I considered throwing it all into a volcano, but that would have required quite a bit of manpower, and frankly, I doubted that any reasonable person would perform such a task for me without succumbing to temptation. In the end, I gave some of it away to the less fortunate. I would have liked to give more, but too much would have surely drawn attention from the media, so the rest went to Abolish for their services. It would seem I did not get my money's worth on that front, but then again, I knew I was overpaying from the beginning."

Abolish. She would have liked to go a while longer without hearing that name again. If they had the money, there was no telling where it was now. She didn't even know if any of them had survived the Battle at Rathmore. Harper hadn't been able to tell her how many he killed.

She intended to press Luther for details, but she didn't expect to learn anything else of use, and indeed, that proved to be the case. She decided to leave before Luther wasted any more of her time.

Mehlsanz followed her up the prison stairs. "What are you going to do now?"

'...I am open to suggestions.'

'Wow. It's that bad, huh?'

'If you have any ancient wisdom for me, now would be the time.'

'I'm not sure I have any ancient wisdom that's worth two hundred billion troas.'

'I thought as much.'

"752 -- LXXXIV.

'Perhaps we should find someone who can materialize gold or silver,' said Mehlsanz.

Helen stopped climbing the steps to look at her reaper. 'Do you know of such a person?'

'No, but I'm sure they exist.'

She started up the steps again. 'Yes, well, when you find someone like that, let me know.'

'Knowing our luck, they probably work for Abolish.'

Chapter Eighty-Four: 'With thy shroud, endure...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As she stared into the mirror, Emiliana tried not to hate what she saw. She hadn't been confident in her looks even before growing horns in the middle of her face and losing some of the vision in her left eye.

Chergoa and Shenado kept telling her that this mutation ability wasn't as bad as it seemed. Emiliana did not believe them, frankly. And she wanted to say as much to their faces, too. She wanted to argue and complain and even throw a tantrum like a child. But she never could quite bring herself to. Each time the anger welled up, heating her face and chest with irritation, something in the back of her mind always got in the way. It felt like a pit, dark and endless, and it swallowed her every feeling, good or bad.

She knew what the pit was. There was only one thing it could be. A wound, without a doubt. Still so fresh that hardly anything else even seemed to matter by comparison.

Before leaving the bathroom, she put her mask back on. Essentially, it was just a simple, jet black plate, convexly curved so that it didn't require an indentation for her nose and bearing two long, flat slits for her eyes. Along with her dark gray hoodie, she'd taken to wearing it wherever she went, sometimes even when sleeping--not that she'd slept much, of late.

The mask certainly attracted its fair share of attention from the attendants around Red Lake Castle, but it was still better than the kind of attention that her horns attracted. It made being seen by strangers bearable again. Already, she'd begun to wonder if she would end up wearing it for the rest of her life."

"752 -- LXXXIV.

‘Perhaps we should find someone who can materialize gold or silver,’ said Mehlsanz.

Helen stopped climbing the steps to look at her reaper. ‘Do you know of such a person?’

‘No, but I’m sure they exist.’

She started up the steps again. ‘Yes, well, when you find someone like that, let me know.’

‘Knowing our luck, they probably work for Abolish.’

Chapter Eighty-Four: ‘With thy shroud, endure...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

As she stared into the mirror, Emiliana tried not to hate what she saw. She hadn’t been confident in her looks even before growing horns in the middle of her face and losing some of the vision in her left eye.

Chergoa and Shenado kept telling her that this mutation ability wasn’t as bad as it seemed. Emiliana did not believe them, frankly. And she wanted to say as much to their faces, too. She wanted to argue and complain and even throw a tantrum like a child. But she never could quite bring herself to. Each time the anger welled up, heating her face and chest with irritation, something in the back of her mind always got in the way. It felt like a pit, dark and endless, and it swallowed her every feeling, good or bad.

She knew what the pit was. There was only one thing it could be. A wound, without a doubt. Still so fresh that hardly anything else even seemed to matter by comparison.

Before leaving the bathroom, she put her mask back on. Essentially, it was just a simple, jet black plate, convexly curved so that it didn’t require an indentation for her nose and bearing two long, flat slits for her eyes. Along with her dark gray hoodie, she’d taken to wearing it wherever she went, sometimes even when sleeping--not that she’d slept much, of late.

The mask certainly attracted its fair share of attention from the attendants around Red Lake Castle, but it was still better than the kind of attention that her horns attracted. It made being seen by strangers bearable again. Already, she'd begun to wonder if she would end up wearing it for the rest of her life."

"753

These past two weeks, she'd really just wanted to be left alone, and for the most part, she'd been granted that. It was just too much. Everything. She wasn't ready to think of herself as the responsible one, as the one who had to try to fill the unfillable chasms left by Mama and Papa and Cisco and even Gema. It was all wrong. All of it.

And then there was this training. It was the only thing she knew how to do, the only thing that seemed even remotely worth thinking about. And yet, her ability still terrified her. She hadn't dared try to invoke it again, even though she knew that was the end goal here.

Training meant more than just meditating, however. It also required laborious study of anatomy and physiology. She'd always enjoyed biology, but she'd never studied it with this much rigor or sense of obligation.

Mutation was so strange. Unlike transfiguration and materialization, it didn't rely on any particular elements. Rather, it stemmed from the formation and manipulation of biological molecules--proteins, in particular. Hers had manifested with keratin, according to Chergoa, which was apparently a common starting point for mutation users.

'Some people call mutation "the anything power," because in theory, you can use it to modify your body in any way you can imagine,' the reaper had told her. 'Now, that's not QUITE true, but the sentiment is fairly accurate. For instance, with proper control, you could grow entirely new limbs--even wings, if you wanted. You could breathe fire. You could sharpen your senses, your reflexes, even make yourself more intelligent, potentially. Though, don't try that last one, unless you're extremely confident in your capabilities. Messing with your own brain is probably the most dangerous thing you can possibly do.'

Emiliana was in no rush to mess with anything.

'Oh, and when you think you're ready, you should start practicing on your non-dominant hand. I know it sounds kinda terrible, but at least that way, if you make a mistake, the damage won't be too bad."

"754

Emiliana didn't love the idea of having to sacrifice a hand just to practice, but she supposed the reaper had a point. Her hands couldn't be made much worse than they already were, anyway. She'd tried to hide them with gloves, but when her claws didn't get stuck on the cloth, they just ripped right through it. Instead, she'd gotten into the habit of hiding them in her pockets.

Aside from training, there wasn't much else to do. Emiliana wasn't allowed to leave the castle, nor did she wish to. Her thoughts often went to Alex. She'd only gone on one date with him before everything happened. Now, she could hardly imagine what he must be thinking. She hadn't even spoken to him since then, but he'd surely heard the news about her family. Perhaps he thought she was dead. No, it was probably too soon for him to believe that.

"Hey, Emy," came a distant voice from below. "What are you doing up there?" It belonged to Alicia Redwater, Octavia's granddaughter.

Emiliana looked down from her high perch among the West Hall's shadowy rafters. Lately, it had been difficult to find places where she could be alone. Red Lake Castle had felt huge and empty at first, but now, people were everywhere, most of them members of the gigantic Redwater family. Even Octavia and Wendy seemed to have trouble keeping track of them all. The vast majority of them, however, were non-servants like Alicia here.

"...How did you find me?" Emiliana asked.

"Your little brother," said Alicia. "He's worried about you."

That stung. He was worried about her? She'd heard Marcos thrashing around in his bed at night, heard him whimpering and crying in his sleep. The brat had his own problems. He wasn't supposed to be worrying about hers.

"I just wanted a quiet place to meditate," said Emiliana.

Alicia squinted and turned her ear up toward her. "I can barely hear you. Would you mind coming down? How did you even get up there?"

Emiliana shifted her leg over the beam. ‘Chergoa,’ she called. ‘I’m done.’”

"755

‘Alright.’ The reaper appeared after a few moments and grabbed Emiliana’s shoulder.

With the vigor burning through her, she swung down and around the beam and then flung herself toward the ridged pillar she’d used to climb up. Her claws scratched against the old red-and-gray stone as she alternately slid and dropped her way to the floor. The maneuver earned her a few gawkers among the many passersby, but most acted like it was nothing special. No doubt, they’d seen much crazier things in their time.

“Wow,” said Alicia. “That was impressive.” She was the one looking down at Emiliana now, though not for lack of sincerity. At thirteen, she was a year younger, but her height suggested otherwise. It seemed strange that she could be related to such a tiny woman as Octavia.

Emiliana adjusted her dark mask and buried her claws in her pockets.

“I think you scuffed up the pillar, though,” Alicia added with a smirk.

She saw the faint claw marks. “Ah... I’m sorry. I used your madega last time and accidentally tore out a few chunks of the bark. Your gardener was upset.”

Alicia laughed. “It doesn’t matter. If anyone gets mad at you, just send them to me.”

They started walking together, with Chergoa following quietly.

“Anyway, it’s not just your brother, you know,” Alicia said. “Your sister is worried about you, too. And so am I.”

“...I appreciate your concern, but I am fine.”

“Have you eaten anything today?”

“...What day is today?”

“Friday.”

"Then, no."

"Agh, aren't you in training? How do you expect to keep up your strength if you skip meals?"

Emiliana didn't answer that and just followed Alicia to the refectory. The lunch crowd had diminished somewhat, but there were still way too many people around for Emiliana's liking. Alicia offered to sit and eat with her, but Emiliana grabbed a sandwich wrap and an iced tea to go. She wasn't interested in removing her mask in order to eat in front of all these people.

Alicia kept following her, anyway."
"756

'C'mon,' Chergoa urged. 'Alicia's trying to look out for you. The least you can do is try to carry a conversation with her.'

The reaper was right, Emiliana knew. She attempted a question of her own. "Are all of these people really your family?"

"Ah--well, some of them just work for us, but basically, yeah. Grandma only had one child--my papa--but her sister had nine. So I have a lot of cousins. Or rather, 'second cousins once removed,' technically." She paused. "I looked it up after the last time they visited."

"Wow..."

"Yeah. And then, as if that weren't enough, Grandma and her brother had cousins with the name Redwater who also had children and grandchildren, so there are even more branches of my family out there. It's super confusing. I honestly couldn't tell you exactly how I'm related to ninety percent of the people here."

"How many members of your family have reapers?"

Alicia bit her lip. "Oh, I should know this, um...I know it's only a small fraction of our total number. I wanna say... twenty? I don't think it's more than thirty people."

"That's still a lot."

“Yeah. I think only the Sebolts have more than we do.”

“Right.” Emiliana considered bringing up the more pressing subject of negotiations with the Vanguard, but she doubted that would do much to lighten the mood. And besides, she was sure that she already knew more about it than Alicia did. Chergoa had been keeping her apprised of developments--not that there had been very many. General Lawrence had not returned Zeff to Aguary, and the Rainlords had yet to take aggressive action. Lawrence had, however, made it known that Cisco and Dennex were in his custody at Rheinhal. Apparently, he’d offered them as trade for either one of Axiolis or Shenado.

The allied Rainlords responded by sending him an umbrella.

When they reached the large guest room, Ramira immediately ran up to Emiliana and hugged her.

“What’s the matter?”

“Stupid!” Ramira said. “You were gone way too long!” It didn’t seem like much of a reason, but she sounded genuinely upset about it.

Emiliana couldn’t recall the girl ever hugging her before.”

"757

Ramira didn’t let go of Emiliana, instead just looking up at her and squinting. “Quit leaving me alone! I don’t know any of these stupid people!” She tossed a glance at Alicia. “No offense.”

Alicia just shrugged.

“I thought you liked being alone,” said Emiliana.

“Yeah, well, I don’t!”

“Then why are you always wandering off and eavesdropping on people?”

“Because that’s what spies do! It’s my job! That doesn’t mean I want you to disappear for nine hours!”

“Hey, I wasn’t gone that long.”

“Whatever!”

Alicia interjected. “You’ve been eavesdropping on people?”

Ramira looked at her blankly. “...No.”

“Right,” said Emiliana. “Did you learn anything juicy during this eavesdropping that you didn’t do?”

The little girl frowned. “Not really. With all these people around, you’d think there would be more going on, but no. It seems like everyone gets along really well. It kind of creeps me out... No offense.”

Alicia just shrugged again.

“I think it’s because everyone knows that there are invisible reapers all over the place who could be watching their every move and listening to all of their suspicious conversations,” said Ramira. “I think I might have to start going through their mail next.”

“That would be a federal crime,” Emiliana told her.

Ramira’s face scrunched up. “Federal? What does that mean?”

“It means both the Rainlords AND the Sandlords would be upset with you. And you’d go to prison for a really long time.”

Ramira squinted. “Nuh-uh. They wouldn’t put me in prison. I’m only nine.”

“Hey, I don’t make the rules.”

“You’re lying! You shouldn’t lie to me! I’m young and impressionable!”

Chergoa burst into a laugh. ‘She makes a good point. Don’t confuse your sister like that. Could cause her problems later. And when she finds out the truth, she’ll probably make you regret it. If I were her, you’d be waking up with glue in your hair the next day.’

The reaper made a compelling argument. “Okay, you wouldn’t go to prison. But you would get in a lot of trouble, so don’t open other people’s mail. Understood?”

“Fiiine...”

"758

Emiliana took another look around the room. "Where is Marcos?"

"He said he was tired of meditating and went to explore the castle," said Ramira.

Chergoa's wispy eyes closed, and it took her a while before she could say, 'He's three floors below us. Shenado's with him.'

Emiliana nodded. She took a seat on the end of her bed and removed her mask in order to eat. Ramira and Alicia sat with her and continued chatting, mostly about Ramira's espionage. Alicia seemed rather keen to hear about what certain cousins of hers were up to. Emiliana could see a shady partnership being born. She shared her silent amusement with Chergoa.

As the day drew on, however, Emiliana found herself growing more and more restless. And she began to understand why. Her mother's words were there in the back of her mind, urging her quietly onward. Grow up quickly. Be prepared. Protect what is important. Who is important.

Mask on, she looked across the room at her little sister one more time before heading off to the solitude of the lavatory. She asked Chergoa to come with her.

She locked the door behind her. There was plenty of room to work with in here. Three pristine silver sinks. A pair of toilets, each one with its own offshoot room for extra privacy. A large ceramic tub with a separate shower. Ample floor space with a shaggy rug.

She took a seat on the broad edge of the tub and stared at her left hand, flexing her fingers in anticipation. She breathed deeply, clutched her wrist with the other hand, and concentrated on what she wanted. Flat subtraction was impossible, of course, otherwise that would have been her goal.

Her fingertips burned as she watched the claws grow longer, thicker, sharper. Just as she'd imagined them in her mind. She hadn't thought it would be so easy. She had to stop before they became blades unto themselves.

She inspected her work. They weren't so gnarled anymore. Rather, they had hooking curves to them, and their lengths were almost uniform, boasting a good five centimeters or so. Compared to her right hand, the difference was unmistakable."

"759

‘Nice work,’ said Chergoa. ‘That’s a good start. You should see if you can do something new now. Try manipulating a part of your skin--the knuckles, maybe. An application of keratin could make it more resilient.’

Emiliana made to respond, but when she looked up from her work, her eyes widened behind her mask as something else demanded her attention.

A pitch dark figure was suddenly there before her, taller than any person she had ever seen. But this wasn’t a person, seemingly. Rather, it looked more like a monster, covered in black scales and even bearing a tail in spite of its bipedalism. Its lithe torso seemed vaguely human, as did its folded arms and huge hands with long, gangly fingers, but its head was still a matter of debate. It appeared to have no mouth, somehow--or at the very least, no lips. A small protrusion in the scales suggested that the nasal passage was where it should be, but the eyes--those were piercingly reptilian, glowing faintly crimson, and most unsettling of all, staring right at her.

Emiliana was without a voice.

The creature was certainly alive and breathing, but it said nothing. If it even could. For a long moment, it only watched her, until it slowly turned its head and looked around in silence.

‘You okay?’ Chergoa asked privately. She’d been hovering next to Emiliana the whole time but didn’t seem especially perturbed by the monster’s presence.

Finally, Emiliana found the proper question. ‘What the HELL is that thing?!’

Chergoa hesitated. ‘What thing?’

‘That giant monster! Right in front of us!’

‘Uh...?’

‘How can you not see it?! It’s right there!’

‘I don’t see anything,’ said Chergoa. ‘I don’t sense anything, either.’

‘What? Then...?’

The monster didn’t move. It only lingered there mutely, until at length, it faded away into empty space, dispersed like a whiff of smoke, leaving Emiliana to wonder if it had even been there to begin with.

‘It’s gone now... You really didn’t see anything?’

‘I really didn’t. You really saw a monster?’

She put a hand to her head. ‘I... I thought I did... What’s happening to me? Am I hallucinating?’

‘Hmm.’”

"760 -- LXXXV.

Chapter Eighty-Five: ‘Thine ancestral blood...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Marcos moved through the gallery with slow wonder. Elaborate artwork filled the chamber, huge paintings framed in brass and steel. Each one depicted some historical event, only a couple of which he recognized, but Shenado was more than happy to answer his questions. To his eyes, the reaper was an eagle with a white tail and splotched brown-gray body. She would have looked like a normal animal, if not for the smoldering black eyes.

He stopped in front of a particularly violent image. In it, two men in shimmering red armor clashed against a roomful of opponents. Spears of ice filled the scene, skewering ten men in golden armor and coloring the walls with their blood.

‘Whoa,’ said Marcos. ‘What’s this one?’

‘Read the title at the bottom,’ said Shenado.

‘Umm... ‘The Redwater Twins Declare Independence.’ Oh!’”

‘Do you see the man in the back? The one wearing a crown?’

He searched among the carnage. “Yeah.”

‘He was the first and last ‘Rain King,’ sent by the Mohssian Emperor of the time to rule over all the Rainlords. He was seen as nothing more than a pawn, but nonetheless, he made many unreasonable demands, which led to what we see here.’

“What kind of unreasonable demands?”

‘Taxes, for one. Poverty was already a difficult issue when he arrived, and he only made it worse. And there was also the not-so-small matter of trying to take multiple wives, which wasn’t a tradition that the Rainlords appreciated, especially because many of the women he pursued were Rainlords themselves. The final straw was an eight-year-old by the name of Nereida Redwater. Girls often married extremely young in those days, but even then, eight was outrageous. Nor did it help matters that the so-called Rain King was already in his forties.’

“Eww.”

‘Nereida’s father was Lluc Redwater.’

“Oh, I definitely know who he is.”

‘I should hope so. He and his brother were probably the most famous Rainlords who have ever lived.’

Marcos looked at the painting another time. Lluc and Marcelo Redwater were the two men at the heart of it, the conductors of this immortalized bloodbath."

"760 -- LXXXV.

Chapter Eighty-Five: ‘Thine ancestral blood...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Marcos moved through the gallery with slow wonder. Elaborate artwork filled the chamber, huge paintings framed in brass and steel. Each one depicted some historical event, only a couple of which he recognized, but Shenado was more than happy to answer his questions. To his eyes, the reaper was an eagle with a white tail and splotched brown-gray body. She would have looked like a normal animal, if not for the smoldering black eyes.

He stopped in front of a particularly violent image. In it, two men in shimmering red armor clashed against a roomful of opponents. Spears of ice filled the scene, skewering ten men in golden armor and coloring the walls with their blood.

“Whoa,” said Marcos. “What’s this one?”

‘Read the title at the bottom,’ said Shenado.

“Umm... ‘The Redwater Twins Declare Independence.’ Oh!”

‘Do you see the man in the back? The one wearing a crown?’

He searched among the carnage. “Yeah.”

‘He was the first and last ‘Rain King,’ sent by the Mohssian Emperor of the time to rule over all the Rainlords. He was seen as nothing more than a pawn, but nonetheless, he made many unreasonable demands, which led to what we see here.’

“What kind of unreasonable demands?”

‘Taxes, for one. Poverty was already a difficult issue when he arrived, and he only made it worse. And there was also the not-so-small matter of trying to take multiple wives, which wasn’t a tradition that the Rainlords appreciated, especially because many of the women he pursued were Rainlords themselves. The final straw was an eight-year-old by the name of Nereida Redwater. Girls often married extremely young in those days, but even then, eight was outrageous. Nor did it help matters that the so-called Rain King was already in his forties.’

“Eww.”

‘Nereida’s father was Lluc Redwater.’

“Oh, I definitely know who he is.”

‘I should hope so. He and his brother were probably the most famous Rainlords who have ever lived.’

Marcos looked at the painting another time. Lluc and Marcelo

Redwater were the two men at the heart of it, the conductors of this immortalized bloodbath."

"761

'In this painting, Lluc is the one on the left,' said Shenado. 'He always wore his hair longer than Marcelo so that people could tell them apart.'

"Did you know them?" Marcos asked.

'Personally? No. I've heard Axiolis talk about them at length, but I didn't get involved with you Rainlords until after your parents met.'

"Oh, right..." That subject hollowed out his expression as it brought him back to the present. However, he was resolved not to dwell on it, and instead attempted to spin it around to the past again. "It's weird to think that Papa has their power now."

'Legendary people are still people.'

'Indeed, they certainly had their flaws,' came another reaper's voice. It belonged to Wendy, entering the room behind Octavia Redwater. 'Lluc and Marcelo were identical in more ways than one. They were like wild horses, those two. You never knew what they were going to do next. And neither did they, I am convinced.'

"Are you enjoying the gallery?" Octavia asked. She never seemed to need her cane at all, making Marcos wonder if she just carried the thing around for show. "I have not been down here in ages."

'It's lovely,' said Shenado, 'even if some of the images are a bit unsettling. I was surprised to find no one else here.'

"Ah, well, family members generally aren't interested in this place. The youngins hear about it all their lives, I suppose. Nereida wanted this room to be an intimate shrine to our family's legacy, but I'm afraid it has become more of a tourist attraction than anything. And of course, we're closed to the public at the moment. So you see. Empty."

Marcos was more interested in what Wendy had been saying. "You knew the Twins?"

'I did,' he said. 'In terms of personality, they could not have been more UNLIKE your father, I should think.'

“Really?”

‘Yes. They were impulsive, loud, obnoxious, and foolish.’

“Don’t listen to him,” said Octavia. “I didn’t know them, obviously, but I know Wendy, and he has always been a party pooper.”

‘Lluc was your great great grandfather, wasn’t he?’ asked Shenado.

“That, he was.”

"762

Marcos hesitated. “Were the Twins not heroes?”

Wendy paused to mull the question over. ‘They were good in a fight, I suppose. And their hearts were generally in the right place. And they were natural leaders. In those regards, at least, I’d say they weren’t entirely dissimilar to Zeff. But I certainly don’t think they were deserving of the fame and affection that history has afforded them.’

‘Few people are,’ said Shenado. ‘And many deserving people end up all but forgotten.’

‘True. But I will always reserve the right to complain about it.’

‘Ha. Fair point.’

Octavia made her way toward the next painting over. She nudged Marcos with her elbow as she passed. “Wendy can be a real downer sometimes, but he’s not wrong. See this one here? I commissioned it a few years ago.”

An enormous canvas depicted a castle engulfed in flames. As he looked closer, he realized that the silhouette within was the same as that of Red Lake. And above it, a rift in the deeply gray clouds allowed sunlight to shine through. The title at the bottom read, ‘The Day of Clear Sky.’

Marcos tilted his head. “What is this?”

Madame Redwater placed both hands on the top of her cane as she looked up at the sprawling work. “Everyone remembers the Uprising. Of course they do. It ultimately brought down the empire. But people often forget that the Uprising itself was a grisly failure. All of the Rainlords suffered terribly, but my family had the worst of it. Only a handful survived this attack you see before you.”

Wide-eyed, Marcos only listened.

“The Redwaters were the first to truly stand against the empire,” Octavia went on. “The Twins’ early victories inspired people across the continent and sparked dozens of other rebellions, which tend to get lumped in as all being part of the Uprising, too, but they weren’t. Not really. You see, because we went first, we received the full weight of the empire’s military strength. So this painting--it’s a bit of an eyesore once you know what you’re looking at, but this gallery would be incomplete without it, I feel.””

"763

‘Even this painting is a bit misleading, if you ask me,’ said Wendy. ‘The Twins could have avoided this. They had ample warning that the enemy was coming to their doorstep, but their pride wouldn’t let them retreat like they should have. They could have lived to fight another day, but this painting implies otherwise by glorifying their deaths.’

“It doesn’t glorify anything,” said Octavia, furrowing her brow. “You know that’s not why I had it painted.”

Wendy just ruffled his feathers at her.

“It’s a reminder that theirs was a cautionary tale,” said Octavia. “It’s so we don’t forget the consequences of our actions. My family has always been too reckless for my liking.”

‘I don’t know how much good it’s done,’ said Wendy.

For a moment, Octavia just glared at him. Then she wiped her face clean and looked at Marcos again. “Anyway. What do you think? Are you disappointed to hear that they weren’t quite the heroes that everyone claims they were?”

Marcos blinked. “Disappointed? Not really. Even if it’s not as nice or... as comforting, I’d still rather know the real story. Otherwise, it just feels like I’m being lied to.”

She broke into a wide grin and laughed faintly. “I don’t know if your father ever told you this, but when he was younger, he and his sister lived here at Red Lake for a few years.”

He thought back. “Oh... yeah, I think he mentioned that.”

“Did he? I’m surprised. Regardless, the point I was trying to make was that when he first came here, he and I had much the same conversation as this one. And he said almost exactly the same thing as you did just now.”

Wendy intervened with a nod. ‘I remember it perfectly. His exact words were, ‘I would rather find more pain in the truth than any solace in a lie.’”

Octavia chortled. “That’s right. He was pretty intense for a fifteen-year-old.”

‘Of course he was,’ said Wendy. ‘He’d just been through an ordeal of his own, remember?’

“I do,” she said, and her smile waned.

Marcos had an inkling of what they were talking about. “What ordeal?””
"764

It was Octavia’s turn to hesitate. “Did Zeff ever tell you what happened to the rest of his family?”

It was as Marcos thought. He gave a weak nod. “He didn’t mention it much, but... they were all killed, weren’t they?”

“Yes. He and Joana were the only ones to survive. Afterwards, they lived here at Red Lake until they turned eighteen. I didn’t want them to rejoin the Vanguard, but they wouldn’t listen to me.” Her expression weakened, eyes glazing over with distant memory. “I was very upset by that decision. I should have been more understanding. Instead, they pushed me away, and I just... let them.” She closed her eyes and rubbed her brow with one hand.

Marcos frowned. The old woman had been so cheerful from the first moment he’d met her. He’d wondered if nothing ever fazed her or if she simply didn’t care. Seeing her like this evoked a strange mixture of worry and gratitude. He was slow to ask his next question. “He never really went into much detail about how they died, so... can you tell me what happened?"

Octavia looked at him heavily, then at Shenado.

'Axiolis told me about it, but I'd like to hear your version of events, if you don't mind.'

Octavia gave a slow nod. "Very well." She took so long to gather her thoughts that it seemed like she might have changed her mind. "...Zeff and Joana had no other siblings. Their parents and grandparents were all members of the Vanguard, as were many of their cousins. Zeff was on his way to joining the Vanguard as well. He'd been with Axiolis for over a year, already."

She paused again, biting her lip as she chose her next words. "The attack happened very suddenly. The Elroys were having a large family gathering out on a lake up north. About thirty miles from here. Almost all of them were present, including Zeff and Joana. The few who didn't attend were later found dead elsewhere. I didn't know anything had happened until Zeff showed up on my doorstep with Joana in his arms. She was unconscious but still alive. She didn't have a reaper yet, so Zeff had carried her all the way here on foot."

"765

Octavia seemed to have trouble continuing her story. She glanced at her reaper another time, and Wendy helped her out.

'Axiolis and Zeff were both able to identify the attackers as members of Abolish,' he said. 'Zeff recognized them from photographs, while Axiolis had actually fought against them with his previous servant. We sent a team to the lake in order to look for any other survivors, but there weren't any. Octavia and I visited as well in order to make sense of what had happened. It was very unsettling to us that Abolish could make it this far into our territory undetected while still having enough power to wipe out over two dozen servants--some of whom were quite powerful. We didn't find any answers, but it has always bothered me.

'After that, all of the Rainlords gathered to mount a counterattack, along with the Vanguard's assistance. We knew who the enemy was, where they were located, and had solid intel on most of their members. On paper, at least, they DID have enough power at their disposal to have conducted such an attack, and we had several reports that they'd been in frequent conflict with the Vanguardian units to which the Elroys belonged. So, despite the strange circumstances, there was no doubt that they were the ones responsible, and at that point, we were all brimming with righteous fury. We fully intended to obliterate them from the face of Eleg.

'However, when we reached their base of operations, there was almost nothing left. Instead of a large military complex, we found a smoldering crater. A chasm. So deep that we could barely see the bottom. And all around it, were the heads and mutilated corpses of everyone we knew to be responsible for the attack--as well as a few we DIDN'T. Some were very surprising, being well-known and high-ranking members of Abolish who might have given us real trouble in a direct conflict. As you might imagine, we weren't sure what to make of it. And thirty years later, we still aren't.'

"766

'That is about the same as what Axiolis told me,' said Shenado. 'I've always thought that story was a little strange.'

'You are not the only one,' said Wendy. 'Octavia and I wondered if the Vanguard was somehow behind the attack on the Elroys, but we never found any evidence proving so. And of course, Zeff and Axiolis saw the attack happen and were convinced it was Abolish, so I don't think they ever doubted the Vanguard like we did. Or perhaps that was their reason for rejoining: because they thought it would help them find answers.'

‘If they ever had such suspicions, then they never told me about them,’ said Shenado. ‘I think they genuinely believe it was Abolish’s doing. And to be frank, I trust their judgment more than I trust yours.’

Wendy ruffled his feathers again. ‘I do not blame you, I suppose. But you must admit, recent events have cast a new light on that old one.’

Shenado made no response.

“If the Vanguard betrayed my family thirty years ago, then why would they wait so long to try and finish us off?” said Marcos.

Everyone blinked at him collectively.

“What?” he said.

‘Nothing,’ said Wendy. ‘That was a very level-headed question and well-posed. We have been wondering the same thing, but just because we don’t currently have an answer doesn’t mean there isn’t one.’

Shenado came to land on Marcos’ shoulder. ‘It hardly makes much difference at this point. We’re in a fight now whether we like it or not. How goes the gathering of the allies, by the way?’

“Fairly well so far,” said Octavia. “Our conflict has gained quite a lot of attention. The fearmongers are saying a war in Sair would destabilize the entire continent, so there are a number of parties interested in preventing it.”

‘And a few in exacerbating it,’ added Wendy.

“Of course.”

“Do you think it will really come to war?” asked Marcos.

“If Lawrence continues to ignore our demands, then yes. Soon enough, we’ll have ample strength to lay siege to Rhein’s Keep.””
"767

‘The Vanguard will have a real problem on its hands if that happens,’ said Wendy, ‘because it won’t just be us. There will be dissenters to deal with as well. We’ve sent word to all of the Vanguardian leaders, explaining our circumstances, and we’ve received word back from

Field Marshal Sanko stating that, if the situation continues to escalate, she will come to Sair personally and order General Lawrence to stand down.'

Shenado perked up a little. 'Sanko, huh? That's excellent news, but I don't think Lawrence will listen to her. She may outrank him, but his boss is Lamont. Is she the only one you've heard from?'

Octavia nodded. "The others have all been irritatingly quiet. We're not even sure if our message reached Sermung."

'I'm not surprised,' said Shenado. 'His whereabouts are often kept secret. Even if he did receive your message, he probably won't answer you.'

"So we've been told."

'Truthfully, I wouldn't have expected any of them to answer,' said Shenado. 'Sanko is really willing to go against her own comrades for our sake? That is a very bold decision on her part, especially considering she doesn't have any ties to the Elroys that I know of.'

'Believe it or not, some people in positions of power still give half-a-damn about the rules,' said Wendy.

Octavia breathed a curt laugh. "When I was younger, I was quite keen to meet all of the strongest women in the world--or at least, all of the ones who wouldn't kill me for looking at them the wrong way. So naturally, Wendy and I have met her before. A few times, in truth. Not very friendly, that woman. I don't think she likes us much. But I've never gotten the impression that she cares about anything more than she cares about justice and the rule of law."

'I've heard others say as much about her as well,' said Shenado. 'But you'll have to forgive me if I'm a bit more skeptical than usual.'

'Of course. We're in no rush to trust anyone from the Vanguard, either.'

"768 -- LXXXVI.

Chapter Eighty-Six: 'Turn toward the needful...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The police presence here wasn't as strong as the rest of Gray Rock, and Hector had ended up visiting this area frequently during his patrols. Just in the past three days, he'd thwarted two attempts at robbery, one at rape, and another at murder. At the moment, however, he wasn't here on patrol. Garovel had a different task for him now that the sun had risen.

The unmarked building on the featureless street corner had taken a while to find. He barely noticed the small sign by the front door. 'Free breakfast,' it said in thin letters.

He proceeded inside and found it just as rundown as the exterior, though the smell was slightly more welcoming. The very first chamber was a large refectory with a crowd of disheveled persons afoot. Hector had tried to match attire in order to blend in, but now that he got a good look at what they were wearing, he was starting to think he'd gone a bit overboard. Sure, none of them seemed to be wearing fresh clothes, but they weren't in rags like him. After silently consulting Garovel about it, he decided to pull off the most shredded pieces and trash them before he attracted too much attention. He kept his hat and ridiculous mustache, however.

There was a line for hot food at the counter, but Hector just took a seat at one of the empty tables. 'So now what do I do?' he asked.

'Just observe and listen,' said Garovel. 'The first step is establishing a presence. It'd be a little off-putting if you just walk up to them and start asking about their lives.'

Hector saw a few people eyeing him oddly. 'You really think this is going to work?'

'No idea. Could be a total waste of time.'

He shot the reaper a look. 'Garovel, what the hell? Are you serious?'

Garovel snickered and shrugged. 'Relax. Just think of it as getting more acquainted with your local community.'

'This "local community" is on the other side of the city.'

'Semantics.'

"768 -- LXXXVI.

Chapter Eighty-Six: 'Turn toward the needful...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The police presence here wasn't as strong as the rest of Gray Rock, and Hector had ended up visiting this area frequently during his patrols. Just in the past three days, he'd thwarted two attempts at robbery, one at rape, and another at murder. At the moment, however, he wasn't here on patrol. Garovel had a different task for him now that the sun had risen.

The unmarked building on the featureless street corner had taken a while to find. He barely noticed the small sign by the front door. 'Free breakfast,' it said in thin letters.

He proceeded inside and found it just as rundown as the exterior, though the smell was slightly more welcoming. The very first chamber was a large refectory with a crowd of disheveled persons afoot. Hector had tried to match attire in order to blend in, but now that he got a good look at what they were wearing, he was starting to think he'd gone a bit overboard. Sure, none of them seemed to be wearing fresh clothes, but they weren't in rags like him. After silently consulting Garovel about it, he decided to pull off the most shredded pieces and trash them before he attracted too much attention. He kept his hat and ridiculous mustache, however.

There was a line for hot food at the counter, but Hector just took a seat at one of the empty tables. 'So now what do I do?' he asked.

'Just observe and listen,' said Garovel. 'The first step is establishing a presence. It'd be a little off-putting if you just walk up to them and start asking about their lives.'

Hector saw a few people eyeing him oddly. 'You really think this is going to work?'

'No idea. Could be a total waste of time.'

He shot the reaper a look. 'Garovel, what the hell? Are you serious?'

Garovel snickered and shrugged. 'Relax. Just think of it as getting more acquainted with your local community.'

‘This “local community” is on the other side of the city.’

‘Semantics.’”

"769

Alone at his table, Hector just tried to make himself comfortable. Despite all the people, the place remained fairly quiet, and no one seemed interested in approaching him. Garovel wandered around, eavesdropping on their hushed conversations.

‘Let’s see. These guys are talking about the food. Seems they’re enjoying it. Over here, they’re talking about the weather. Cold front coming in, apparently. Next, we’ve got a conversation about Madison Reach. This guy thinks she’s super hot.’

‘I don’t even know who that is,’ said Hector.

‘Doesn’t matter. Boring topic. Ah, these people are talking about you. Vigilante in Gray Rock. They’re scared. That’s too bad. What else we got? Hmm... Oh, here we go. This guy’s talking about himself. His buddy just called him Frank. Sounds like Frank used to be a carpenter. Strange. You’d think that would be a pretty stable line of work. Maybe he got injured.’

Hector continued listening for a while longer. After an hour, he wasn’t sure they’d made much progress. Most of these people were only here to eat breakfast after all, and that didn’t exactly require them to volunteer their life stories to one another. He and Garovel departed for Warrenhold soon afterward.

It was a ways back, and after armoring up, Hector took the opportunity to practice with a couple different methods of transport. The first was a kind of self-propelled, one-seater train. Essentially, he just materialized an iron track with a chair on it and then pushed the chair along by adding metal from the backend. From there, he could lay more track as he went while simultaneously annihilating the metal behind him.

He thoroughly enjoyed traveling with this method, if only because it allowed him to sit down and basically float toward his destination like a magician; but in practice, he found it rather unwieldy to navigate around pedestrians and cars. He tried doing it over the tops of buildings instead, but that meant constantly materializing bridges, which were not only more complicated but also required support structures, and he couldn't very well create a metal column in the middle of a busy intersection. And apart from all of that, as a general means of travel, it was just slow. He hoped to improve on all of these things as his proficiency increased, but it seemed like that might take a while."

"770

The second method of transport that Hector tried was a bit more haphazard. It consisted of launching himself into the air with iron platforms and then trying to break his fall instead of his body. He was often unsuccessful. On the plus side, super jumping over buildings was fun as hell, as was improvising ramps and slides and arching platforms to catch himself. It was just that the priorities, of course, were always to avoid endangering bystanders or destroying property, which ended up translating into an abundance of faceplants and pratfalls for Hector.

As he waited for his spine to realign and his arm to start bending the right way again, he let out a heavy groan and annihilated the twisty ramp he'd created for himself on the way down. Perhaps he'd made it a little too twisty. 'Garovel... I'd really like a new motorcycle now...'

The reaper snorted a laugh.

'Do I really have to wait until I get a license?' said Hector.

'It's for the best. Just bear with it for now. We'll find you a new bike soon.'

Hector grumbled and started walking. He'd made the ramp spit him out on the edge of a grassy park, and there were more than a few onlookers for his graceless landing. At least these people didn't look too scared of him. One kid even gave a big wave and shouted, "Yo, Darksteel!"

Hector smiled inside his helm and returned a more hesitant wave of his own.

Garovel was still up high and didn't notice, probably looking elsewhere in case of fresh trouble that might have needed their attention. 'On the bright side, this is really good practice. Maybe you can't tell, but I've seen you improving each day. In fact, I think you should keep traveling like this even after you get a new bike and just have the motorcycle in reserve for long trips.'

'Ugh...'

'Trust me. The less reliant you are on technology, the better.'

He knew Garovel had a point. And training wasn't supposed to be easy, anyway.

Eventually, they made it back home, and Hector was ready to help out the reconstruction crew again, but when he made his way through the dilapidated front gate and up the main path, he spotted a cluster of unfamiliar vehicles.

They were all news vans, he realized. 'Oh... fuck!'"
"771

'Wow, look at 'em all,' said Garovel. 'I guess it was only a matter of time until people found out that Warrenhold has a new owner.'

'Shit shit shit shit.'

'Relax, they haven't spotted you yet. And hey, at least they're not too scared to ask you for an interview.'

'Agh...'

'Y'know, you could just go up and talk to them.'

'Fuck no!'

'C'mon, it's only a few cameras and potentially millions of people watching your every move.'

'Fuck you!'

'Alright, alright,' laughed Garovel. 'Then just treat the cameras the same way you treat guns.'

'That... that's a good idea.'

'Of course it is. My ideas are always good.'

Hector shifted his grip on the rucksack over his shoulder. He'd brought it with him today in order to hold a change of clothes along with the hat and mustache he'd been wearing earlier. He took a deep breath and started toward the central building's front entrance.

As soon as they noticed him approaching, the reporters crowded around and stuck microphones up to his helm, asking so many simultaneous questions that he couldn't hear any single one clearly.

When he clapped iron around their cameras, everyone went abruptly quiet. To their credit, however, that wasn't enough to deter them for very long.

"Mr. Goffe, why have you come to Gray Rock?"

"He's a lord now, you idiot. Lord Goffe, what do you have to say to the people who still believe you are a criminal?"

"Can you give us your personal accounting of the events of the Calman High Massacre?"

"Imbecile! Don't ask him that!"

"Lord Goffe, what is the nature of your relationship with the royal family?"

'Y'know, you could just tell them to get off your land,' said Garovel.

Hector considered that, even opened his mouth to do so, but unsurprisingly, he struggled to say anything at all. After a few more moments of listening to their bickering noise, he decided to just push through and go inside. He annihilated the metal around their cameras right before he closed the tall door behind him and barricaded it with a wall of iron. He could still hear their muffled shouts from the other side."

"772

'That wasn't so bad,' said Garovel.

Hector destroyed his helm and rubbed his face.

The repairs to this old antechamber had come along nicely. It was mainly just simple wood and stone, but Hector didn't think anything fancier would have suited him. He was mildly surprised to find no one immediately around.

‘Hmm,’ said Garovel, his skull twitching to the side. ‘It seems those weren’t our only guests. Prince Meriwether is here.’

‘What? What’s he doing here? And why would he show up unannounced?’

‘And there’s someone else... someone I can’t quite... Oh, wait, no. That’s Lynn.’

Hector froze up.

‘Her weird aura is like a fog. I can’t pinpoint her location. I just know that she’s around here somewhere. She’s probably with the prince, though. I doubt she’d be wandering around on her--’ Garovel stared at him. ‘Hector? You okay there, buddy?’

‘Lynn’s really here? Why would she--? Agh... You’re sure?’

‘Mmhmm.’

He could feel himself already beginning to panic. He started pacing between the room’s pair of wide staircases. ‘What do I do? Oh no, oh fuck...’

‘Alright, Hector, what’s going on? Is this gonna be a constant thing with you and Lynn?’

‘Uh... mgh...’

‘Oh, c’mon. Don’t start this hesitation-business with me again. We’re past that, aren’t we? Just tell me.’

‘Ah... ergh...’

‘Do you want me to guess? We could turn it into a game. Quack if your problem with her involves a duck-billed platypus in some way.’

‘Garovel, what the--?’

‘Ponies! She told you she hates ponies, and now you don’t think you can be friends with her anymore! I’m right, aren’t I?! Man, I’m good at this!’

‘You’re an asshole...’

‘Hector. Obviously, I can’t help you if you don’t tell me what’s wrong. And since you’re about to go talk to her, now might be a good time to ask me for advice. Unless you’d rather handle it on your own, that is.’

‘Y-you... I... ugh. Y-you can’t tell anyone. Ever.’

‘Okay.’

‘I mean it, Garovel. You can’t. If you do... I’ll... fucking... I don’t know-- just don’t!’

‘Alright, geez. What, do you have a crush on her or something?’

Hector’s brain decided to stop letting him form words. His face flushed red, and he had to avert his eyes.

For a moment, the reaper just stared at him awkwardly. ‘Oh.’ Another beat passed. ‘Seriously?’”

"773

Rather than answering, Hector merely leaned on the nearest wall for support.

‘Huh,’ said Garovel. ‘Um. Okay. I’m guessing you don’t intend to tell her how you feel.’

‘Of course not. Are you kidding me?’

‘That’s fine, then. If you don’t plan on confessing, then there’s really nothing to be freaking out about, is there?’

Hector squinted and scratched his forehead.

‘Just remain calm and collected. She’s not going to figure it out unless you tell her, and it’s not like I’m going to tell her, either. Your secret is perfectly safe. Just remember, you’ve dealt with many high-pressure situations before. You can handle a normal conversation with Lynn.’

‘Uh... you’re not gonna try to convince me to confess? That’s what everyone says to do, isn’t it? Don’t drag things out, ‘cuz it just gets... er... more painful over time or some shit like that?’

‘Well. Ideally, you would do that as soon as possible and see what happens, but--and you can correct me if I’m wrong about this--but I suspect that a physical relationship with someone would be a very big deal for you. It’s a big deal for most people, obviously; I’m just saying it’d be even more so for you.’

‘Er...’

‘Because you’re just such a special snowflake, Hector.’

‘Fuck you...’

The reaper laughed again. ‘You understand what I’m saying, though, right? You’re very young, and so is she. And given your social difficulties, I wouldn’t want you to rush into anything. You can if you want to, though. Just let me know, and I’ll advise you as best I can in that regard.’

‘Y-you’re talking like I don’t even have to worry about being rejected...’

‘Oh, rejection would make things so much simpler. Hector, if she rejected you, yes, it would suck, but then you could move on and stop worrying about your feelings for her, because you’d know that nothing could ever come of them.’

‘Eh... I don’t think it’d be that easy for me, Garovel...’

‘I think you’d be surprised. Rejection is very straightforward. No one likes it, but it’s way less complicated than acceptance.’”

"774

‘...I didn’t realize you were such an expert on romance,’ said Hector. ‘Do you even... I mean... do reapers even... er...?’

‘No. We lose all sexual desires when we lose our bodies. And personally, I’m glad, because that shit sucked. Thank you, biology.’

‘So in other words... you don’t really know what you’re talking about.’

‘Hey, I had my share of relationships while I was alive.’

‘Yeah, back when clubbing someone over the head and dragging them into a cave was considered a first date.’

‘First of all, that’s historically inaccurate. The Lyzakks were not cavemen. And secondly, what you’re describing is basically rape, which I have never approved of, thank you very much.’

‘Well, that’s good to know.’

‘Would you just listen to my advice? I’m old and wise, dammit.’

‘I don’t think an old and wise person would need to say that.’

‘Hmm. Maybe I can convince you with an impression, then. HEY, EVERYONE, I’M THE DARKSTEEL SOLDIER. I’M SUPER SHY AND MODEST, BUT LOOK AT ALL THE SHIT I’M STILL MANAGING TO GIVE MY REAPER. AREN’T I AWESOME? How was that? Pretty accurate, right?’

And maybe it was the way Garovel had phrased it, or maybe it was just the big dumb voice the reaper had used, but Hector broke down into a fit of laughter. It hit him so suddenly and so strongly that he had to lean against the wall again in order to stop himself from doubling over onto the floor. He tried to keep his voice down, but that only seemed to make it even funnier.

Garovel couldn’t help absorbing a few chuckles via proxy. ‘Wow, that really got you, didn’t it? I’ve never seen you laugh this hard before.’

Slowly, Hector composed himself. He thought he was okay, but as he looked at Garovel again, he found the laughter creeping back into his lungs.

“What’s so funny?” came Lynn’s voice.

Hector turned and saw her standing there in the eastern doorway. His body tried to freeze up on him again, but a lingering cluster of amused rumbles prevented it. “It’s--ah-ha... i-it’s nothing. G-Garovel was just... aha--being Garovel...”

"775

Lynn just leaned against the doorframe and folded her arms. She had a new eye patch, Hector realized. This one was white like her cloak, and it made the bronzy flesh tones of her face stand out all the more. And with her deeply black hair, her Intarian heritage had never been more apparent.

Hector was losing his humor now as he very successfully tried not to stare at her.

‘Ask her what brings her here,’ Garovel told him.

“Uh... w-what brings you to Warrenhold?”

“Her Highness gave me a mission and told me to ask you for your assistance.”

“Oh.” He cleared his throat. “What kind of mission?”

“I’m escorting Prince Meriwether to Sair. He and I both have business there. His is more urgent than mine, though.”

‘Sair?’ said Garovel. ‘Hmm.’

“What do you... er, why do you need my help?”

“You’d be my backup,” she said. “Sair is a little unstable right now, so Her Highness said I should take someone else along if possible. But Roman is out of the country, and if I took Harper, then there wouldn’t be anyone in Sescoria capable of guarding the Queen. That leaves you. So here I am.”

“Ah... you could have just called.”

“And give you the chance to run away from me again? I don’t think so.”

Hector winced. He’d hoped she’d forgotten about that.

“Why did you run away? It’s been bothering me.”

‘Garovel, help...’

‘Tell her you had a poop-related emergency.’

Hector’s eyes widened, and he rubbed his forehead in order to hide his expression. ‘Are you fucking kidding?! That’s the stupidest thing I’ve ever heard!’

‘Is it stupid? Or is it genius?’

‘It’s stupid!’

‘Well, phrase it more diplomatically, then. Don’t say you almost shat yourself. Say you had an upset stomach.’

‘You--!’

‘Quickly now. She’s waiting for an answer.’

He grit his teeth. “I... uh... I had... ah...”

She stepped a little closer. “You...?”

“I... I had an upset stomach, so... I kinda... uh... needed to leave.” He chanced a look, but he couldn’t tell if she was buying it or not.”

"776

“Are you lying to me?” said Lynn with a narrowing eye.

He was all in now. “N-no...”

“Because at the time, it seemed like you were trying to avoid my question.”

“Er... I was just... embarrassed. I still am, actually, so... p-please stop asking me about it...”

‘Ooh, that’s good. Nice touch.’

“Fine,” she said. “Then what was the answer to my question before? You were about to say something before suddenly telling me it was nothing and then leaving.”

“Uh...”

‘You don’t remember,’ said Garovel.

“I don’t remember,” said Hector.

Lynn looked annoyed with him. But after a moment, she relented.

“Well, whatever. I guess it doesn’t matter.”

Hector would have breathed a huge sigh of relief if she hadn’t still been watching.

“So do you want to come to Sair with us?” she asked. “It’s not a royal order, if that's what you were thinking. I'm sure I can protect the prince on my own just fine."

Hector hesitated again and glanced at Garovel for another assist.

'Ask for more information first. I'd like to know what the Prince's urgent business is before we commit to an impromptu trip out of the country.'

That seemed incredibly obvious now, and Hector wasn't sure why he'd needed Garovel to explain it to him. "Can you tell me about, um... more about why you're going to Sair? It's kind of sudden, isn't it?"

"We're going to meet the Sandlords. Prince Meriwether's wife happens to be one of them. She recently returned to Sair on her own at her family's request, and now Her Highness is sending the Prince as an ambassador to assess the situation there. And to negotiate something, I think. I didn't follow everything she told him. She talked to him for a long time."

"Huh. I, uh--I see. And you said... you have your own business in Sair, too?"

"Yeah, I'm going to meet a man named Haqq Najir. He's a Sandlord, too, and a friend of Harper's." Lynn held up her left hand, the one wearing the bone gauntlet beneath her dark gray gloves. "I talked to him over the phone the other day, and he said he would tell me how to unlock the full potential of this thing if I pay him a visit."
"777 -- LXXXVII.

"Full potential?" said Hector. "Oh, so... you're going there to get stronger?"

"That's the hope."

'What do you think, Hector?' said Garovel. 'Want to go with them?'

Hector turned away from Lynn and rubbed his neck as he eyed the opposite doorway. 'I really DON'T, actually.'

'Why not?'

'Because it means I'd... I'd have to be around... her.'

‘But I thought you really liked her.’

‘Yeah! That’s why I don’t wanna be near her!’

‘I’m not sure you understand what “like” means, Hector.’

‘Ergh, I need an excuse to stay here...’

‘Sure, Hector. It’s no big deal. The woman you care about is venturing into a volatile country where she’ll probably face all kinds of danger. There are bound to be many innocent people there in need of help, as well. And this Haqq Najir fellow probably has all sorts of useful information. Not to mention that you’d be helping your country and that the Queen requested it. But y’know, just forget all that. It’s obviously more important that we stay here so that you can... help some construction workers do their jobs slightly faster.’

‘I... I stopped a murder the other day...’

‘And that was very good, Hector. Gold star for you.’

He looked at Garovel, then back at Lynn. ‘...Dammit.’

Chapter Eighty-Seven: ‘Thy bitter heart, bear down...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Despite how spacious it was, Vanessa Goffe’s private chamber was almost full. Boxes from the old home in Brighton had arrived a few days ago. Most of them, she didn’t know what to do with. Part of her just wanted to burn everything and forget about it, but her less impulsive side fought against that notion.

There was still no electricity. According to Madame Carthrace, the new generator would arrive in a few days, but Vanessa wasn’t terribly bothered about it. She’d always liked candlelight well enough. It reminded her of her childhood. The quieter moments of it, at least.

Without a working television to occupy her attention, Vanessa had taken to reading. It didn’t really matter what the book was, nor did it matter if she retained any of it. Just the distraction of fresh words in her mind was enough. This current one about war during the last century was a morbid bore through the majority of its pages, but the part about the Jungle Wars managed to hold her interest. She recalled Mr. Norez mentioning them at their dinner with the Queen."

"Full potential?" said Hector. "Oh, so... you're going there to get stronger?"

"That's the hope."

'What do you think, Hector?' said Garovel. 'Want to go with them?'

Hector turned away from Lynn and rubbed his neck as he eyed the opposite doorway. 'I really DON'T, actually.'

'Why not?'

'Because it means I'd... I'd have to be around... her.'

'But I thought you really liked her.'

'Yeah! That's why I don't wanna be near her!'

'I'm not sure you understand what "like" means, Hector.'

'Ergh, I need an excuse to stay here...'

'Sure, Hector. It's no big deal. The woman you care about is venturing into a volatile country where she'll probably face all kinds of danger. There are bound to be many innocent people there in need of help, as well. And this Haqq Najir fellow probably has all sorts of useful information. Not to mention that you'd be helping your country and that the Queen requested it. But y'know, just forget all that. It's obviously more important that we stay here so that you can... help some construction workers do their jobs slightly faster.'

'I... I stopped a murder the other day...'

'And that was very good, Hector. Gold star for you.'

He looked at Garovel, then back at Lynn. '...Dammit.'

Chapter Eighty-Seven: 'Thy bitter heart, bear down...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Despite how spacious it was, Vanessa Goffe's private chamber was almost full. Boxes from the old home in Brighton had arrived a few days ago. Most of them, she didn't know what to do with. Part of her just wanted to burn everything and forget about it, but her less impulsive side fought against that notion.

There was still no electricity. According to Madame Carthrace, the new generator would arrive in a few days, but Vanessa wasn't terribly bothered about it. She'd always liked candlelight well enough. It reminded her of her childhood. The quieter moments of it, at least.

Without a working television to occupy her attention, Vanessa had taken to reading. It didn't really matter what the book was, nor did it matter if she retained any of it. Just the distraction of fresh words in her mind was enough. This current one about war during the last century was a morbid bore through the majority of its pages, but the part about the Jungle Wars managed to hold her interest. She recalled Mr. Norez mentioning them at their dinner with the Queen."

"778

Forty years, those conflicts had lasted, each one progressively bloodier and more expansive than the last, and all stemming from the same dispute over the Corvana Jungle. Apparently, the land had been thought worthless by all seven of the countries through which it extended, until someone discovered a network of diamond mines therein. Of those seven countries, only Jesbol, Melmoore, and Corrico still existed today. The successive wars ruined all of the others.

Vanessa rested the book on the nightstand by her bed and rubbed her eyes.

She didn't often leave this dark room. Some days, she didn't even get out of bed. Sleep was perhaps the only thing she actually looked forward to anymore. It was the easiest way to avoid thinking about Samuel.

More than once, she'd considered ending her own life. Maybe burn herself along with all of those boxes. Poetic, but probably a terrible way to go. In the end, she realized that, regardless of the method, she simply didn't have the conviction. And she didn't know why, either. She didn't feel afraid of dying, necessarily, and if there was any point left in living, she couldn't tell what it was; but even still, she didn't want to go through with it. Maybe it was just the natural human impulse. Or maybe it was the knowledge that Samuel wouldn't have approved.

Suicide would have been difficult, anyway. For whatever reason, Amelia Carthrace seemed to think it necessary to keep Vanessa apprised of the reconstruction's progress on a daily basis, and Jamal Easton checked in even more frequently. The man never said so, but Vanessa was fairly certain that Hector had ordered him to make sure that she was eating. She had lost quite a bit of weight recently--not that it was any of that stupid boy's business.

Hector rarely came to her himself. She couldn't tell if he was just that busy or if it'd finally sunk in that she didn't want to see him. Regardless of the cause, today proved to be an exception.

The knock at her door stirred her out of her flat-eyed daze.

"...Mom? Can I come in?"

There wasn't much point in refusing, she felt. "Yes."

Hector entered. He looked around her room, taking in the mess and probably judging her for it. "I'm going to Sair for a little while," he told her. "I'll be back soon."

"779

Vanessa eyed her son for a long moment, debating whether or not she wanted to respond. She decided against it.

Hector didn't seem to appreciate her silence. His annoyed stare was something she had become well-acquainted with during their few recent encounters. "I came to see if there was anything you needed before I leave," he said.

The lack of hesitation in his voice did not escape Vanessa's notice. He was telling her that he was going to leave the country. Telling her. Not asking for permission. Not even hoping for approval, by the sound of it.

He was changing. She could see it with each new visit he paid her. The young Lord Goffe. It seemed like he was genuinely starting to believe himself worthy of the title.

How ridiculous everything had become.

"I don't need anything from you," she said blankly.

That wasn't enough to get him to leave, however. "...How have you been doing? Mr. Easton said you haven't left this room in almost a week."

Her eyes glazed over. "It's comfortable."

"Mom, I... I worry about you."

Her eyes narrowed at him. Her impulse was to ask why, but she already knew what he would say. The same thing as before--because she was his mother and because he loved her.

And she did not wish to hear that again.

It made no sense whatsoever. How could he love her? After everything that had happened, everything she'd said to him, how the hell could that be possible?

She'd always found it strange. Mothers were supposed to feel something different for their children, weren't they? Maternal instinct? Where was hers? She'd never felt it. From the moment she first realized she was pregnant, she'd kept expecting something to change, some switch to be flipped inside of her. She thought, surely, she would be able to feel it when she held him in her arms for the first time. It was the only thing that let her endure those nine horrific months. But no. All she'd felt was relief that it was finally over. And afterward, she thought it might come when he took his first steps. Or when he could feed himself. Or dress himself. Or go to school on his own.

But nothing. Not really. He was just some child. No different from anyone else's. The only distinction was that she had a societal obligation to this one. So she pretended. She played the role as best as she was able."

"780

She had never loved him, not truly. And yet now, he was the only family she had left. Worse, he was the only person to whom she had any meaningful connection. Friends? She'd never excelled at making those in the first place, but the few she'd possessed had abandoned her the second they learned her son was a fugitive.

It was all his fault. He'd ripped her out of the world and placed her here. She'd already decided that she would never forgive him for that. She knew she would carry that grudge all the way to her grave.

However.

There was still... something. A conflict. She'd realized it after Hector returned from his fight with Abolish.

If he died, she would be entirely alone.

Even if he was to blame for everything, even if she didn't want to be around him, Hector really was all she had now. Vanessa genuinely didn't know what she would do if Hector died, too. Pitiful as it was, she didn't think she had it in her to go back out into the world again and build a new life for herself from scratch.

A small part of her wanted to admit this to him right now. The notion flared up in her mind, and for a terrible moment, as Hector again stood there waiting for her response, Vanessa wasn't sure what was going to come out of her mouth.

But she struggled in silence for long enough that Hector apparently took it to mean that she wanted him to leave. "Alright," was all he said as he turned for the door.

"Hector," she blurted.

He stopped and looked back at her.

She hesitated, unsure of what she was about to say. "...Is your trip going to be dangerous?"

The question seemed to confuse him. "Um... probably, yeah."

"Then... be careful."

Hector stared at her like she'd just confessed to murder.

She immediately regretted what she said and looked away, filling her vision with the empty wall next to her.

"...I will. Th--uh... th-thanks, Mom..."

She shut her eyes and rubbed her forehead as she listened to him leave.

--++--++--

The helipad atop Rhein's Keep hadn't been used in a while. It was mostly reserved to non-servant VIPs, which they hadn't had many of, as of late. Today was different, however.

Lawrence's blue tie lashed against the wind as he waited by the staircase. He checked his watch. It wasn't like Parson Miles to be late."
"781

--donation bonus week (day 1/7, page 1/3)--

Dergoz sat on Lawrence's shoulder, fidgeting impatiently. 'Why did it have to be Parson?' he said privately.

'Could be worse,' said Lawrence. 'Could have been Jackson. Or Sanko.'

'We might end up seeing the latter anyway, if this conflict doesn't get resolved soon.'

'Something to look forward to.'

'You do realize that she will kill us both if she learns of our involvement, right?'

'Of course. I was being facetious.'

'Hilarious.'

'Perhaps Parson will protect us.'

'Now I know you're joking.'

There came the sound of a distant tearing, that of a jet through the sky, and Lawrence searched the eastern horizon. Sure enough, he saw the speck there on its rapid approach. Rather than a jet, however, it was just one lone man.

Parson didn't need to slow down at all. He just stopped in an instant and was standing right there on the helipad. And after a beat, a surging gale caught up to him, so strong that it might have knocked Lawrence off his feet if he hadn't braced himself.

Part of the man was missing. His white-and-gray airman's uniform flapped against the wind where his legs and arms should have been. After a couple blinks, however, the limbs returned to him--but not by way of regrowth. Rather, the flesh swirled back into existence, as if springing from the wind itself.

As the air settled down again, Lawrence approached to greet him.

Captain General Parson Miles grinned as soon as he saw Lawrence, but before they could exchange words, he held up a hand. His ragged overcoat was still flapping wildly, and Parson reached into it to retrieve something. He pulled out a localized vortex, at the center of which were two undisturbed, double-scoop ice cream cones. His reaper melted out from his back. Overra was her name.

"Pretty good, right?" said Parson. "Now, I know what you're thinking, and the answer is yes, the second one IS for you. You're welcome." He offered an ice cream to Lawrence.

Dergoz sighed publicly, but Lawrence just shrugged and accepted Parson's generosity.

'C'mon,' said Overra, 'you gotta admit, it's pretty impressive. He picked 'em up in Kuros, and they're not even melting.'

'What?!' shouted Dergoz. 'You stopped in Kuros along the way?! Why?!'

"Uh, to get ice cream. Duh. We were already running late, so I figured a quick pit stop wouldn't matter."

'Tell me you are joking!' said Dergoz. 'If you stopped in Kuros, then the Sandlords almost certainly know that you are in Sair now!'"

"782

--donation bonus week (day 1/7, page 2/3)--

Parson was busy licking his ice cream. It had chocolate sprinkles.

"Yeah, so?"

'So?! So we're about to go to war with them, you jackass!'

"I thought it was the Rainlords we were having problems with," said Parson.

Dergoz had to take a moment to calm himself. 'There is a very real possibility that they could forge an alliance with each other. Which means you've just revealed your location to the enemy. For an ice cream.'

"Oh." He still hadn't stopped eating. "Well, I'm sure it'll be fine. And besides, the Sandlords make really good ice cream. Surprisingly good, in fact. You'd think they'd stink at it, right? Being all about heat and sand and everything."

'Agh! Why did you even come here?!'

"Just following orders."

"From Sermung?" asked Lawrence, figuring it was time to intervene.

'Lamont, actually, but same difference,' said Overra.

Lawrence eyed them both up and down. At a glance, Parson was an unassuming young man with golden brown hair and terrible posture. He was one of the oldest servants in the world, but Overra had never let him physically age. Or perhaps he'd asked her not to age him. Either way, it was the kind of thing that tended to make a bad first impression with the other old servants. Lawrence, however, was long past such trivialities with this man. "Why are you alone? I expected you to be in company."

"Oh, yeah. My awesome tiltwing was shot down in Calthos. Thing was brand new, you believe that? Nearly lost one of my airmen, too, so I decided to make the rest of the trip on my own. Also, I wanted ice cream."

'Apologies,' added Overra. To Lawrence's eyes, she was quite a strange thing. She was a tornado, compacted in scale but constantly and silently whirling, while also bearing a mouth and eyes that consisted of nothing more than dark splotches. 'We would have been on time, otherwise.'

"Yeah. You know she hates that sort of thing."

"It's no trouble," said Lawrence, tasting his own ice cream now. Parson hadn't been wrong about its quality.

They started down the stairs together.

"So where's Zeff's head?" said Parson.

Lawrence was expecting that question. Parson had always had a tendency of somersaulting over the pleasantries and bringing up the most sensitive topic as if he were merely asking about the weather.

And it was sensitive, Lawrence knew. Especially for Parson, because Zeff had worked directly under him before Lawrence took over his position here in Sair."

"783 -- LXXXVIII.

--donation bonus week (day 1/7, page 3/3)--

Without a doubt, Parson's connection to this place and to Zeff was the biggest reason why Dergoz was displeased by his presence. Lawrence couldn't decide if he was pleased that Zeff couldn't be revived and interrogated.

"We're keeping his head in cold storage," said Lawrence. "We've been hoping to ship him out of the country, but the Rainlords are watching us too closely. They've been searching every vehicle that leaves this building."

"Ah. And if you tried to take it yourself, they'd seize the castle, instead."

"Assuming they don't gang up on me."

"Right. I suppose I could take it while you hold down the fort."

'We probably shouldn't remove our one real bargaining chip from the table,' said Overra. 'If worse comes to worst, we may need it.'

"True. What about the Elroy kid? You have both him and his reaper, right?"

"Yes. They have already been interrogated, but if you would like to do it yourself, I will arrange a room for you."

"Maybe. Haven't decided yet."

'What of Gema Elroy?' said Dergoz. 'Any developments?'

‘No. Apparently, she just disappeared. Even the watchers haven’t been able to track her down. The only thing that seems clear is that she must have someone helping her.’

‘They could be hiding her in Aguary,’ said Dergoz.

‘Doubtful. We’re fairly certain that she’s still in Intar somewhere. But it’s always possible that she slipped past our net.’

“Invading Aguary without rock solid intel would be a gigantic mistake,” said Parson.

‘Yes, of course.’

‘Tell me,’ said Overra, ‘have any of the Rainlords sided with us?’

Lawrence shook his head. “None in Sair, no. The Blackburns are the only one who haven’t declared for either side.”

‘The Blackburns, huh? Now, that is interesting. I think Parson and I will go talk to them.’

‘Are you kidding?’ said Dergoz. ‘They might take you prisoner!’

Parson shrugged. “Eh, I’m sure it’ll be fine.”

Dergoz kept his sigh private. ‘How in the world did this man become a captain general?’

Chapter Eighty-Eight: ‘The land that breeds austerity...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had never been on a plane before, much less an international one--or royal one. He didn’t think that the Lumenbel family’s private jet was providing him with a very typical first experience. Something about the giant seats and minibar tipped him off.

Their entourage was extremely small. It really was just him, Garovel, Meriwether, Lynn, and a pair of pilots on board. He supposed any extra bodyguards for the Prince would have just meant more people for Hector and Lynn to protect, but he had at least been expecting a couple more ambassadors to come along."

"783 -- LXXXVIII.

--donation bonus week (day 1/7, page 3/3)--

Without a doubt, Parson's connection to this place and to Zeff was the biggest reason why Dergoz was displeased by his presence. Lawrence couldn't decide if he was pleased that Zeff couldn't be revived and interrogated.

"We're keeping his head in cold storage," said Lawrence. "We've been hoping to ship him out of the country, but the Rainlords are watching us too closely. They've been searching every vehicle that leaves this building."

"Ah. And if you tried to take it yourself, they'd seize the castle, instead."

"Assuming they don't gang up on me."

"Right. I suppose I could take it while you hold down the fort."

'We probably shouldn't remove our one real bargaining chip from the table,' said Overra. 'If worse comes to worst, we may need it.'

"True. What about the Elroy kid? You have both him and his reaper, right?"

"Yes. They have already been interrogated, but if you would like to do it yourself, I will arrange a room for you."

"Maybe. Haven't decided yet."

'What of Gema Elroy?' said Dergoz. 'Any developments?'

'No. Apparently, she just disappeared. Even the watchers haven't been able to track her down. The only thing that seems clear is that she must have someone helping her.'

'They could be hiding her in Aguary,' said Dergoz.

'Doubtful. We're fairly certain that she's still in Intar somewhere. But it's always possible that she slipped past our net.'

"Invading Aguary without rock solid intel would be a gigantic mistake," said Parson.

'Yes, of course.'

‘Tell me,’ said Overra, ‘have any of the Rainlords sided with us?’

Lawrence shook his head. “None in Sair, no. The Blackburns are the only one who haven’t declared for either side.”

‘The Blackburns, huh? Now, that is interesting. I think Parson and I will go talk to them.’

‘Are you kidding?’ said Dergoz. ‘They might take you prisoner!’

Parson shrugged. “Eh, I’m sure it’ll be fine.”

Dergoz kept his sigh private. ‘How in the world did this man become a captain general?’

Chapter Eighty-Eight: ‘The land that breeds austerity...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had never been on a plane before, much less an international one--or royal one. He didn’t think that the Lumenbel family’s private jet was providing him with a very typical first experience. Something about the giant seats and minibar tipped him off.

Their entourage was extremely small. It really was just him, Garovel, Meriwether, Lynn, and a pair of pilots on board. He supposed any extra bodyguards for the Prince would have just meant more people for Hector and Lynn to protect, but he had at least been expecting a couple more ambassadors to come along.”

"784

--donation bonus week (day 2/7, page 1/3)--

Hector had a corner booth all to himself. He could see Prince Meriwether sleeping in the center of the plane. The man must have been tired, because it was barely past midday. They’d set out almost as soon as Hector agreed to go with them.

‘Hey, when’s your birthday?’

Hector blinked at the sudden inquiry. ‘Uh... why?’

‘Just curious,’ said Garovel. ‘It’s gotta be soon, right? Or did I already miss it?’

‘No, ah... it’s next month, actually.’

‘Aha. What day?’

‘The twenty-fifth.’

‘You’ll turn seventeen, right?’

‘Y-yeah...?’

‘I guess it’s a good time to bring up the topic of aging.’

‘What do you mean?’

‘I mean, do you want me to stop your body from aging physically?’

His eyes widened. ‘Uh...’

‘I can keep you eternally youthful, is what I’m saying.’

‘I... uh... hell, I don’t know.’

‘Personally, I think you should at least wait until your late twenties before having me press the pause button, but I figured I should ask in case you really like being a teenager.’

A beat passed, and Hector eyed Garovel. ‘Why the FUCK would I like being a teenager?’

The reaper snorted a laugh. ‘Well. I don’t know. You’d get to feel young. And. Spritely?’

‘Ugh. Screw that. Now that I think about it, uh... I think I’d rather age normally until I’m, like, fifty or something.’

‘Really? Well, we’ll see how you feel in a few years.’

‘Hmm.’

‘That’s actually a pretty common sentiment, though. You’d think more servants would want to be eternally young, but as it turns out, most sixty-year-olds don’t want strangers treating them like they’re twenty-year-olds.’

‘Choosing to be eternally young seems kind of... douche-y.’

Garovel laughed again. ‘Maybe it is.’

‘How the hell do you prevent aging, anyway?’

‘Magical reaper juice.’

‘...Ew.’

‘Nah, it’s just a kind of smaller-scale extension of the ability to regenerate your body. I actually don’t know the exact reason why it works, because no one knows what causes aging in the first place. There are lots of interesting theories about it, though!’

‘Please, no--’

‘There’s one theory that aging is caused by reproductive hormones that promote growth early in life but end up driving the body into decline later on, because they’re still trying to maintain reproduction despite it no longer being possible. There’s another theory that it’s selected genetically, like a literal “biological clock” embedded into your DNA. Then there’s the one regarding the progressive shortening of telomeres--’

‘Alright, alright, I get it. Shit is complicated.’

‘It is. By the way, Lynn is staring at you.’”

"785

--donation bonus week (day 2/7, page 2/3)--

Hector had been trying not to look at her since takeoff. He glanced at Lynn from across the cabin, and sure enough, her one eye was indeed locked on him.

‘Maybe you should go talk to her.’

‘Maybe I shouldn’t.’

‘Oh, look, she’s coming over to talk to you instead.’

‘Fuck!’

She sat down across the table from him, resting her sheathed blade by her side. "So how have things been going in Gray Rock? I never asked."

"Er... uh..."

'Relax. Tell her things are going fine.'

"Th-they're going fine."

"What's your new castle like? I didn't really get to see much of it."

"Oh, uh... m-most of it is underground."

She cocked an eyebrow at that. "Underground? Oh, I guess that's why they call it Warrenhold, huh?"

"Yeah. It's a lot bigger than I, um... er, there's a lot more space than I was expecting."

"Sounds cool. Hope I get to see it later."

"Uh... hah..." He scratched his chin as his eyes searched for something to latch onto. 'Garovel, what do I say?'

'Tell her you think she has a rockin' body.'

'Garovel!'

'Sorry. Ask her how things are in the capital.'

"H-how are things in Sescoria?"

"Non-violent, at least. The Queen's been busy navigating a political minefield, instead."

"It must have been hard on her. Losing, uh... I mean, the way she lost so many of her brothers at once." Hector eyed the unconscious prince again.

"They've all been working hard," said Lynn. "While we're going to Sair, Prince David is headed to Intar."

"By himself?"

"Intar isn't as dangerous as Sair is right now, but he does have some normal bodyguards with him." She paused. "All of this is a state secret, by the way, even the nature of our visit to Sair now. I'm not sure if I made that clear earlier. So don't go telling people about it when we get back."

Hector managed a weak laugh. "The last thing you need to worry about is me talking to people..."

That seemed to amuse her. "I noticed you had some reporters nosing around."

"Er, yeah... Did I mention how good your timing was?"

"Heh, maybe not that good. They bothered us on the way in. Why were they there, anyway?"

"I... I think they wanted an interview."

"Ah. You've sure gotten popular."

"Egh..."

"Better than them being afraid of you, I guess. Progress."

"That's what Garovel said."

She leaned back in her seat. "Maybe their fear is starting to shift over to me."

"786

--donation bonus week (day 2/7, page 3/3)--

Hector looked up at her for a change. "Why would they be afraid of you?"

She motioned with her left hand. "Apparently, this thing makes people uneasy."

"Oh... but, uh... I'm pretty sure people consider you a hero. Er, h-heroine...? I mean, the White Sword doesn't really sound like a name that they'd give to a villain..."

"Ha. That's a good point, I guess. It's just that I've started noticing a lot of people acting uncomfortably around me lately. Though, you're the only one who's actually run away from me."

“But, er--that wasn’t because I was scared of you.”

‘Not in that sense, at least,’ said Garovel.

Lynnette just smirked and nodded.

Through the window, Hector could see barren lands stretching below him. Far into the western horizon was a sprawling mountain range, much larger than any he’d seen in Atreya.

From the air, the city of Kuros seemed to sparkle and burn under the strength of the sun. Almost every building was pure white, and the only place Hector saw any greenery was directly adjacent a shimmering oasis at the heart of town. The buildings grew taller there as well, often needle-like in design, making the area look like an enormous bed of spikes.

Soon enough, the plane touched down, and Lynn took point, exiting the aircraft first while Hector followed after Meriwether.

The heat was overwhelming, at first. Perhaps he was just accustomed to Atreya’s temperate climate, but this place felt like an oven to him. It was a strange sensation, breathing air that was already warmer than his lungs.

A group of four were there to greet them on the tarmac, all garbed so heavily in white and gold that Hector couldn’t even guess their genders. Three of them carried large parasols, seemingly for the benefit of the one in the middle.

Hector immediately noticed a reaper floating behind one of the parasol-wielders. And they certainly noticed him and Garovel, too--as well as Lynn after another moment.

Meriwether approached them and spoke first. “Hello, Nasira.”

“Welcome, my dear husband,” said the apparent woman in the center. She kept her face bowed and her hands hidden in her robe’s huge sleeves, but with how much taller she was than Meriwether, she was nearly meeting his gaze anyway.

Hector didn’t think they looked terrifically pleased to see one another.

Their two parties became one as Nasira brought everyone to a silver limousine."

--donation bonus week (day 3/7, page 1/3)--

"How have you been?" Meriwether asked his wife.

"Very well, thank you," she said. Her Valgan accent was faint enough that Hector hadn't noticed it at first. He only recognized it from its prevalence in television and movies. "How is your sister?"

"She has been quite busy proving herself more capable than my brothers and I ever dared imagine."

"I am sorry I could not stay longer in Atreya. My father was very insistent that I return home."

"You told me before. There is no need to explain again. How are the children?"

"They have missed you. Rashad, especially."

"I see."

It hadn't even occurred to Hector that Meriwether's wife had brought their children to Sair as well.

After that, the ride in the limousine became distinctly uncomfortable. The married couple exchanged no further words, leaving a heavy silence in their wake. Hector's eyes drifted to the sight of increasingly taller buildings through the window. Many of the streets were covered with huge tarps, offering plenty of shade to the legions of palely-dressed pedestrians afoot.

Since no one else in the car was speaking, Garovel apparently took that as his cue to speak with the other reaper present. 'It's a pleasure to meet you. I'm Garovel, and this is Hector. Might you tell us your names?'

The other reaper seemed hesitant but said, 'Emerix. And this is Badat of Hahl Saqqaf.' He motioned to the person on Nasira's left.

'Ah, I see.'

With only the dark eyes to go on, Hector still couldn't tell if Badat was a boy or a girl. Badat sounded like a masculine name to him, but given how unfamiliar he was with this culture, he decided not to assume anything. 'Hall Sock-off?' he asked Garovel.

"Hahl" is a Valgan word referring to a noble family,' Garovel explained privately. 'Like the word "House" in Mohssian. He's saying that Badat here is a Sandlord from the Saqqaf family.'

Hector had to consciously avoid nodding. Another heavy intermission passed, and Hector thought Garovel might revise his previous introduction to add that Hector was also the new Lord of Warrenhold, but apparently, the reaper didn't find it necessary. And Hector was glad for it, frankly. He didn't want to try to seem more important than he really was.

After a while, Garovel tried again. 'I don't suppose you feel like giving me a brief rundown of what's causing the recent instability in Sair, do you?'"

"788

--donation bonus week (day 3/7, page 2/3)--

'What difference does it make to you?' said Emerix. 'You are only here to guard your prince, are you not?'

'That, we are. I'm mainly just curious. No need to answer if you don't want to.'

Emerix mulled it over a bit, then said, 'The Vanguard attacked a Rainlord family.'

It was Garovel's turn to hesitate. 'What? Are you serious?'

'I am, indeed.'

And to Hector's surprise, Garovel had nothing else to say. He expected him to inquire further, but the reaper merely remained silent instead.

As they finally drew close to their destination, Hector couldn't help gawking a little through the window.

The Golden Fort. Even Hector had heard of this place. It wasn't difficult to see why it was one of the most famous fortresses in the entire world. He'd heard that it was constructed from pure gold, but seeing it now, that couldn't possibly be true. It seemed obvious that the building's yellow hue came from its gigantic sandstone walls. Swirls of golden paint ran all along them, becoming particularly ornate around the main gateway, and tall white turrets rounded off every corner, hanging golden banners from their topmost windows like fluttering tongues against the constant wind.

In the main courtyard, however, there truly did stand an immense statue of solid gold. It depicted a kind of strange plant--an octet of arching leaves, each one large enough to shield a grown man from the punishing sun.

Hector exited the vehicle last and then followed everyone else inside. From what Prince Meriwether had told him before leaving, their primary goal was to meet with Nasira's father. He now wondered how plausible that would be. The castle was brimming with people, and Hector kept seeing even more reapers among the crowd as they proceeded on.

'How many servants do they have here?' asked Hector.

'Don't know,' Garovel said privately, 'but we've only been here a few minutes, and I've already counted nine.'

'Geez... And they're all crazy strong, I bet...'

'Not necessarily. Most reapers and servants don't go looking for trouble like you and I do, so they don't grow as quickly as you have over these past seven months.'

'Hmm...'

'And even the ones who DO look for it like we do probably still don't find as fucking MUCH of it as we always seem to.'

'Y-you think so?'

'Yeah. Because if they did, they'd probably get fucking killed.'

'...Was that supposed to be comforting?'

"789

‘Maybe a little comforting, yeah,’ said Garovel. ‘But please don’t pick a fight with anyone here. There are most definitely servants here who really ARE way more powerful than you.’

‘R-right.’

‘I’m almost certain that Nasira’s father is one of them. And if he is, then he’s probably near Harper’s level of strength. At least.’

‘Aw, fuck... why did we come here, again?’

Meriwether’s entourage was shown to a large guest chamber, where Nasira asked the three of them to wait. She, Badat, and Emerix disappeared afterward. The Prince took a seat by the empty fireplace and turned on the adjacent television. He started flipping through the channels, only about half of which seemed to be in Mohssian.

Hector and Lynn both remained standing, which drew Meriwether’s curious look. “I appreciate your diligence, but you are both a little too on edge, I think. I understand that you might find Sandlords somewhat intimidating, but they are not going to harm us. I assure you.”

“You seem certain, Your Highness.”

“I lived in this very castle for several years when I was younger,” said Meriwether. “I consider the people here as true and dear to me as my own family.”

That sounded like a loaded statement, considering everything Hector knew about Atreyan royalty.

‘Hmm. Ask him if he’s always known that they had reapers.’

“Uh, Prince Meriwether, sir, ah...”

“Yes?”

“Have you always known that, um... that the Sandlords have reapers on their side?”

“Not as such, no. I have always known that the people here possess special powers, of course, but I never imagined that... deathly phantoms might be the source of said powers.”

Lynn looked at Hector. “Have you already seen them around?”

He nodded. “G-Garovel has already counted nine. Er--not including himself. And, uh--we're pretty sure there are more than that."

Lynn did not seem pleased by that news.

Meriwether, on the other hand, didn't seem particularly fazed by it. "Relax yourselves," he said. "You do not need to follow me everywhere around the castle. This place is quite safe. As long as you do not leave the grounds without me, we will be fine. You have your own business to attend to, do you not?"

"I do, but--"

Meriwether stood up again and pulled a bulky ring off of his left index finger. It featured a silvery bell with a sapphire at its heart. He offered it to Lynn. "If anyone questions why you are here, show them this.""

"790

--donation bonus week (day 4/7, page 1/3)--

Lynn's eye widened. "I can't take this, Your Highness! It's worth more than everything I own!"

"Well, be sure to return it to me later, then."

Lynn was incredulous.

Meriwether pressed onward. "Lord Haqq said he would meet you in this castle, yes?"

She managed a nod.

"Knowing him, he will probably be in the basement studying one thing or another."

"He told me where he would be."

"Ah. Good, then." The Prince turned to Hector next, making the young man tense up. "If you can, please have your reaper speak to the others around here and find out as much about the current circumstances in Sair as you can. Then report back to me. I may have need of such information."

"Ah--" Hector glanced at Garovel, and when the reaper nodded, he said, "Y-yes, Your Highness."

"Thank you," said Meriwether. "I will remain here while I wait for Lord Abbas to see me. I suspect it will be a while. I will call Ms. Edith here if anything urgent should arise."

The Prince all but pushed them out of the room after that. Hector and Lynn exchanged looks before rejoining the crowd of people in the curved hallway. They made for the basement first, which wasn't the easiest thing to find, but Garovel was able to petition a couple of passing reapers for directions.

Hector wanted to ask Lynn more about this Haqq person, but with all the people around, he couldn't bring himself to. Instead, he settled for another private conversation with Garovel while they walked.

'Who owns this fortress?' Hector asked. 'Do you know?'

'It belongs to the Saqqaf family. My understanding is that they are the most influential of the Sandlords.'

'But Haqq Najir isn't one of them.'

'No, he would of course belong to the Najir family.'

'Okay...'

'It would be nice if we could make allies with these people.'

'Even though they're fighting the Vanguard?'

'That's not what Emerix said. He said the Rainlords are fighting the Vanguard. He didn't say the Sandlords had joined them.'

'Oh...'

'But yes, it does give me pause. I don't think the Vanguard would attack anyone without good reason. At least, I hope they wouldn't.'

'What'll happen if the Sandlords do join in?'

'Hard to say. I don't think the Rainlords can stand up to the Vanguard on their own.'

'Hmm.'"

"791 -- LXXXIX.

--donation bonus week (day 4/7, page 2/3)--

‘Either way, it’s not really our concern,’ said Garovel. ‘We’re here to protect the Prince and gather information, not get involved in someone else’s war.’

Hector threw another glance around the hallway. ‘But I thought it was our job to stick our noses where they don’t belong.’

‘Ha. Well, in this case, we don’t even know which side to help. Just because we happened to meet the Sandlords or the Rainlords first doesn’t mean they’re more deserving of assistance than the Vanguard is.’

‘...I guess things were a lot simpler when everyone was fighting Abolish.’

‘Indeed.’

Beneath the fortress, the halls became narrower, perhaps because they didn’t need to hold so many people. Hector saw guards in front of every door. Only a few of them had reapers by their side, but he noticed cameras around every corner instead.

Lynnette stopped in front of the door marked Research & Development 4. “I think this is the place,” she said.

One of the men standing guard held up a hand to bar their path. He said something in Valgan, and even though Hector didn’t know the words, he was pretty sure the man was telling them that they weren’t allowed in.

“We’ve come to meet with Lord Haqq Najir,” said Lynn. “Could you please inform him that Lynnette Edith is here to see him? He should be expecting me.”

The guards waited so long to respond that Hector wasn’t sure they’d understood her, but at length, the one on the right nodded and entered on his own. After a minute, he returned with a man in a lab coat.

“Are you Lord Haqq?” Lynn queried.

“I am.”

Chapter Eighty-Nine: 'Answers ye seek...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

The Lord Haqq Najir had perhaps the strangest eyes Hector had ever seen. They were yellow. And the man's round glasses only served to magnify them. "Show me this gauntlet of yours," he said.

Lynn pulled her glove off to reveal the bone wrist guard. She held it out for him to examine.

"Excellent. Come with me." He ushered them past the guard and into the laboratory. The walls were filled with machinery while the center of the room hosted six full tables with more men in white coats laboring over them.

A particular sight caught Hector's attention as they passed it. A full suit of armor, it was, embedded into the eastern wall and looking like the most complicated piece of technology in the room."

"791 -- LXXXIX.

--donation bonus week (day 4/7, page 2/3)--

'Either way, it's not really our concern,' said Garovel. 'We're here to protect the Prince and gather information, not get involved in someone else's war.'

Hector threw another glance around the hallway. 'But I thought it was our job to stick our noses where they don't belong.'

'Ha. Well, in this case, we don't even know which side to help. Just because we happened to meet the Sandlords or the Rainlords first doesn't mean they're more deserving of assistance than the Vanguard is.'

'...I guess things were a lot simpler when everyone was fighting Abolish.'

'Indeed.'

Beneath the fortress, the halls became narrower, perhaps because they didn't need to hold so many people. Hector saw guards in front of every door. Only a few of them had reapers by their side, but he noticed cameras around every corner instead.

Lynnette stopped in front of the door marked Research & Development 4. "I think this is the place," she said.

One of the men standing guard held up a hand to bar their path. He said something in Valgan, and even though Hector didn't know the words, he was pretty sure the man was telling them that they weren't allowed in.

"We've come to meet with Lord Haqq Najir," said Lynn. "Could you please inform him that Lynnette Edith is here to see him? He should be expecting me."

The guards waited so long to respond that Hector wasn't sure they'd understood her, but at length, the one on the right nodded and entered on his own. After a minute, he returned with a man in a lab coat.

"Are you Lord Haqq?" Lynn queried.

"I am."

Chapter Eighty-Nine: 'Answers ye seek...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

The Lord Haqq Najir had perhaps the strangest eyes Hector had ever seen. They were yellow. And the man's round glasses only served to magnify them. "Show me this gauntlet of yours," he said.

Lynn pulled her glove off to reveal the bone wrist guard. She held it out for him to examine.

"Excellent. Come with me." He ushered them past the guard and into the laboratory. The walls were filled with machinery while the center of the room hosted six full tables with more men in white coats laboring over them.

A particular sight caught Hector's attention as they passed it. A full suit of armor, it was, embedded into the eastern wall and looking like the most complicated piece of technology in the room."

"792

--donation bonus week (day 4/7, page 3/3)--

Hector had a certain appreciation for armor, and he would have liked to stop and examine it, but now didn't seem to be the appropriate time. However, he was not the only one who noticed it.

'What is that thing?' asked Garovel. 'Some kind of battle armor?'

"Ah," said Haqq. "Abbas may not look like it, but when it comes to inventing, he is nearly my equal. That over there is a joint project of ours. You should count yourselves lucky if you never learn what it is capable of."

Hector and Garovel exchanged looks.

Haqq led them into a rear room, much larger and longer than the previous one thanks to the firing range at the back. Ringed targets stood on the far end, and another man in a lab coat was busy fiddling with a bulky firearm.

A new reaper floated up behind Haqq and said something to him in Valgan.

"Yes," said Haqq. "This is Lynnette Edith and..."

'Hector and Garovel. A pleasure to meet you both.'

'Likewise,' said the other reaper. 'I am Sazandara. I hope Haqq has not been frightening you too much.'

'On the contrary, I am quite interested in his work,' said Garovel.

That earned a smile from Haqq before he returned his attention to Lynn. "Now, I shall perform some preliminary tests to gauge how strong your gauntlet is currently." He tossed a glance at Hector and Garovel. "This may take a while, so you'll probably want to go do something else."

It was Hector and Lynn's turn to exchange looks now.

"I, uh... I think I'll stick around, if it's all the same to you..."

Haqq had already moved on. "Please stand by the door and extend your shadow as far as you are able."

The man had not been exaggerating, however. It did take a while. He measured the maximum length of Lynn's violet shade, tested how much pressure it could withstand before she felt even the slightest discomfort, gave her instructions on complex shapes to mold it into, timed her speed around the room when using only the shadow to transport herself, and then began asking her questions pertaining to her mental state.

"Have you noticed any increased aggression since you started wearing it?" Haqq asked.

"No... why? Should I have?"

"Oh, no, these are just precautionary questions," said Haqq. "You understand, yes?"

Lynnette only gave an uncertain nod."

"793

--donation bonus week (day 5/7, page 1/3)--

"To be frank," said Haqq, "we do not want you inheriting any of the psychological tendencies that belonged to the previous owner of those bones. There is no evidence to support the idea that this is even a possibility, but I believe the worry is still quite reasonable, don't you?"

"I guess..."

"So, no strange or unexplained mood swings since you began wearing it?"

"No."

"Good. That is very good." He scribbled something into his notes.

Behind him, the man with the gun from earlier fired off a rocket that soared across the chamber and obliterated a target dummy with an explosion so large that it shook the whole room. Flames and gnarled metal spikes leapt across the firing range, taking down several additional targets and even bounding back and cracking the safety glass directly behind Haqq.

Everyone turned to the stranger, who seemed quite pleased with himself until he noticed their stares.

"It works," the man said in his thick accent.

Haqq just glared at him.

“I will go make adjustments.”

“You do that,” said Haqq. He returned to his notes once the other man was gone.

‘Our apologies,’ Sazandara said to Hector and Garovel. ‘The young ones are always so enthusiastic about their work.’

Lynn took the opening to interject with her own question. “So how do I use Incineration?”

Haqq looked up. “Ah, yes. I did promise to tell you. You may not like the explanation, however.”

She merely folded her arms as she waited.

“In order to invoke the secondary ability, you must be in the correct emotional state. Which, simply put, is happiness. You must be enjoying yourself.”

It took Lynn a moment of blinking to respond. “What? I have to be happy?”

“Correct. There are two things required to invoke it. The first is enjoyment, and the second is intent to use it. Rather simple, really. The problem, of course, is that whenever you want to use the power, you will naturally be in the middle of a fight, which is a difficult environment in which to find enjoyment.”

Lynn still didn’t seem like she understood, and Hector couldn’t blame her. “Wait a minute,” she said. “I have to be... so... what?”

“It is the same as how aberrations themselves harness it,” Haqq explained. “They all have a very strong bloodlust. It is part of their nature, which as it turns out, plays a key role in their power.””

"794

“I’m not sure I can do that,” said Lynn. “I’ve always been trained to keep a cool head during a fight. Be as close to emotionless as possible.”

"That is understandable," said Haqq, "but you see, it is also your problem, not mine."

Lynn's mouth flattened.

"Regardless," Haqq continued, "after your power grows again, I would appreciate it if you paid me another visit so I can take new measurements."

"I don't think I'll be doing that," said Lynn. "It sounds like your problem, not mine."

They exchanged irate looks.

And for some reason, no one else seemed to be asking the obvious question, so Hector had to force himself to interject. "Uh... Mr. Haqq, uh... you said, Lynn's power can actually grow? H-how?"

"By absorbing human souls, of course. The same as with aberrations themselves."

Hector saw Lynn's expression sour.

"I suppose that I should also mention that your secondary ability is your only means of absorbing souls," said Haqq. "Incineration, you said it was?"

Lynn nodded. "What does Incineration actually do?"

"It ignites anything your shadow touches. And the ensuing flames cannot be extinguished by any physical means. Only yourself or some overwhelming soul pressure will be able to put them out. And to absorb a soul, you would only need to set a person on fire."

'Would it work on servants?' asked Garovel.

"No, it cannot absorb a servant's soul. But the flames will certainly cause them difficulty. And of course, it can still absorb a reaper's soul. When you set about testing it, I suggest you be extremely careful. If you hurt any innocent people in our territory, accident or not, we will hunt you down and take that gauntlet from you by whatever means necessary."

Lynn looked rather displeased by all of this information, and Hector didn't feel much differently. He did not envy her position. If the only way to grow his power was to consume human souls, he wasn't sure what he would do. Even if someone was a bad person, did they deserve to have their soul eaten?

“What happens to the souls I absorb?” Lynn asked.

Haqq tilted his head slowly. He looked like he wanted to ask what she meant, but after a moment, his expression settled, and he seemed to get her meaning. “There is no scientific evidence to support the idea that the souls you absorb retain any kind of consciousness.”

"795

--belated donation bonus (day 5/7, page 2/3)--

“So you don’t really know,” said Lynn.

“If it is such a moral quandary for you, then you can simply avoid absorbing souls,” said Haqq. But at Lynn’s persistent look, he added, “Yes, we do not know, because there is currently no way to know. There exist no scientific instruments which can aid us in studying souls.”

‘None that WE know of at least,’ corrected Sazandara. ‘Haqq is very intelligent, and you should listen to him, but he is also more of a hardware man than anything. We haven’t devoted much time to studying souls other than to observe the enhanced physical properties they may provide for our technology.’

Lynn, of course, heard nothing of what the reaper said, and Haqq didn’t seem too keen to reiterate it to her, so Hector had to struggle through it. Sazandara helped him out by repeating a few of the things she said.

In the meantime, Garovel took the opportunity to address Haqq again. ‘I was wondering if you might do me a small favor.’

“What sort of favor?”

‘My servant is a materialization user. Would it be possible for you to confirm his element for us? We believe it to be iron, but we’re not one hundred percent certain.’

Haqq eyed Hector with an overwhelming degree of disinterest. Then he held out his hand. “Make a flat disc for me, just small enough to fit in my palm here.”

With hesitance, Hector did so. The metal accumulated in the man's hand and formed a perfectly smooth and round disc.

Haqq cocked an eyebrow at the metal. Perhaps he'd been expecting something shoddier-looking. Or perhaps he thought Hector wouldn't even be able to do it in the first place. Haqq lifted the disc to his ear and rapped a knuckle against it, listening to the ring. After a moment, he tossed the disc back to Hector. "You were right. It is iron."

Hector annihilated the disc instead of catching it.

'I was hoping for something a bit more rigorous and definitive,' said Garovel, eyeing Sazandara. 'Not that I don't trust your servant's ear.'

Haqq gave an irritated sigh.

'Haqq would be delighted to assist you,' said Sazandara. 'He will perform an emission spectrometric analysis for you. Isn't that right, Haqq?'

The man had nothing to say.

Sazandara's skeletal grin widened. 'It shouldn't take him very long. He's very skilled. Come back tomorrow.'

'Much appreciated,' said Garovel."
"796 -- XC.

Hector gave Haqq another metal disc for examination, and the man just pocketed it and returned to asking Lynn questions, this time concerning her family's medical history. Her very apparent Intarian heritage had not escaped Haqq's notice, and she had to explain that she was indeed born in Atreya.

Hector's attention was divided when yet another reaper appeared, this time descending from the ceiling.

'Haqq, it's almost time for the assembly meeting. Asad wants you to join him.'

Haqq rolled his eyes. "He still thinks he can convince Abbas?"

‘He does. And so do I.’

“Well, of course you do.”

The reaper’s skeletal face twisted impossibly with annoyance. After a moment, he eyed Haqq’s guests. ‘Hello. I do not believe I have seen any of you here before.’

“Agh, don’t bother them, too,” said Haqq.

Garovel jumped at the chance for another introduction. ‘We’re from Atreya. It’s a pleasure to meet you. I’m Garovel, and this is my servant, Hector Goffe, along with our comrade, Lynnette Edith.’

‘Atreya? Interesting. I am not exactly from around here, either. My name is Axiolis.’

Chapter Ninety: ‘The bridge between the Two...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘Oh?’ said Garovel. ‘Where are you from, then?’

Axiolis seemed about to answer when he stopped himself, hollow eyes narrowing. ‘You said... your name is Garovel?’

‘I did, yes.’

The reaper’s odd reaction had even gained Haqq’s attention. ‘Then,’ said Axiolis, ‘are you Chergoa’s brother?’

Hector blinked and turned to stare at Garovel, who took his sweet time answering.

‘...Yes, I am. How do you know Chergoa?’

‘She is an old friend,’ said Axiolis. ‘I happened to cross paths with her a few times before really getting to know her. The first was some three hundred years ago in Ardora. She was trying to have her servant dig a new well for a village that was struggling through a drought. It made a favorable impression on me.’

‘Yeah, she has a good heart,’ said Garovel. ‘Usually.’

‘When she first told me that she had a living sibling, I thought she was joking.'

'I don't blame you,' said Garovel. 'Is Chergoa here in Kuros, then? I don't sense her nearby.'

Axiolis' expression somehow darkened. 'Oh... you do not know, then. I thought that perhaps she got word to you herself.'

'Please explain.'

'My servant is a Rainlord,' said Axiolis, sterner now. 'His name is Zeff Elroy. He was captured by the Vanguard, which is why I am here seeking aid from the Sandlords. Chergoa's current servant is Zeff's daughter, Emiliana Elroy.'"
"796 -- XC.

Hector gave Haqq another metal disc for examination, and the man just pocketed it and returned to asking Lynn questions, this time concerning her family's medical history. Her very apparent Intarian heritage had not escaped Haqq's notice, and she had to explain that she was indeed born in Atreya.

Hector's attention was divided when yet another reaper appeared, this time descending from the ceiling.

'Haqq, it's almost time for the assembly meeting. Asad wants you to join him.'

Haqq rolled his eyes. "He still thinks he can convince Abbas?"

'He does. And so do I.'

"Well, of course you do."

The reaper's skeletal face twisted impossibly with annoyance. After a moment, he eyed Haqq's guests. 'Hello. I do not believe I have seen any of you here before.'

"Agh, don't bother them, too," said Haqq.

Garovel jumped at the chance for another introduction. 'We're from Atreya. It's a pleasure to meet you. I'm Garovel, and this is my servant, Hector Goffe, along with our comrade, Lynnette Edith.'

‘Atreya? Interesting. I am not exactly from around here, either. My name is Axiolis.’

Chapter Ninety: ‘The bridge between the Two...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

‘Oh?’ said Garovel. ‘Where are you from, then?’

Axiolis seemed about to answer when he stopped himself, hollow eyes narrowing. ‘You said... your name is Garovel?’

‘I did, yes.’

The reaper’s odd reaction had even gained Haqq’s attention. ‘Then,’ said Axiolis, ‘are you Chergoa’s brother?’

Hector blinked and turned to stare at Garovel, who took his sweet time answering.

‘...Yes, I am. How do you know Chergoa?’

‘She is an old friend,’ said Axiolis. ‘I happened to cross paths with her a few times before really getting to know her. The first was some three hundred years ago in Ardora. She was trying to have her servant dig a new well for a village that was struggling through a drought. It made a favorable impression on me.’

‘Yeah, she has a good heart,’ said Garovel. ‘Usually.’

‘When she first told me that she had a living sibling, I thought she was joking.’

‘I don’t blame you,’ said Garovel. ‘Is Chergoa here in Kuros, then? I don’t sense her nearby.’

Axiolis’ expression somehow darkened. ‘Oh... you do not know, then. I thought that perhaps she got word to you herself.’

‘Please explain.’

‘My servant is a Rainlord,’ said Axiolis, sterner now. ‘His name is Zeff Elroy. He was captured by the Vanguard, which is why I am here seeking aid from the Sandlords. Chergoa’s current servant is Zeff’s daughter, Emiliana Elroy.”

"797

Hector wasn't sure he'd followed all of that, but the strained look on Garovel's face told him more or less everything he needed to know.

‘In other words,’ said Garovel, ‘Chergoa is right in the middle of this war of yours.’

‘I am afraid so.’

Garovel kept his next word between him and Hector. ‘Fuck.’

Hector had to unburden himself of his questions. ‘You have a fucking sister?! I mean--?! How is that even--?! Why didn't you ever--?!’

‘I'll tell you later,’ was all Garovel offered him. And then publicly, he said, ‘I would very much like to know more about the Rainlords' current circumstances.’

‘Then I shall very much like to tell you,’ said Axiolis. However, he was distracted when he noticed Haqq quietly stepping for the door. ‘Haqq, don't think I've forgotten about you. You need to join your brother upstairs.’

‘I would love to, but I am quite busy here,” said Haqq. “Your new friends here have tasked me with a critical analysis of great urgency.”

‘Leave him be,’ said Sazandara. ‘He will not be much use to Asad, anyway. I will go with you.’

‘Very well,’ said Axiolis. He turned to Garovel. ‘I would like you and your servant to attend as well.’

‘Of course,’ said Garovel. ‘I was hoping you'd invite us.’

The reapers led the way, and Hector tried to explain where they were going and why to Lynn as she just followed with that resigned look on her face that he'd seen several times before. By now, she must have gotten accustomed to being left in the dark about half of the things going on around her.

During the trek back upstairs, Axiolis continued with his story.

'We still do not know why they decided to attack us,' he said. 'Zeff and I have been with the Vanguard for over twenty-five years. I am still having a bit of difficulty realizing that I no longer work for them. Part of me is hoping that this is all just some kind of gigantic misunderstanding.'

'I would have expected you to sound angrier,' said Garovel.

'Oh, I am. But I am also... very confused. I cannot imagine what could have motivated them to betray us the way they did. Zeff and I are-- were--believers. In the Vanguard. In everything it stood for and tried to accomplish. We devoted ourselves to it. We devoted our FAMILY to it. Can you understand that, I wonder? Have you ever believed in your cause so fiercely that you would devote not just your life to it but also the lives of your loved ones?'

'I'm afraid I haven't,' said Garovel."

"798

'Then you are wiser than I, it would seem.' Axiolis fell quiet a moment as they reached the elevator once more. 'My servant's wife is dead now because of what the Vanguard did to us. His wife. Practically my daughter. When I think about that... I become much less confused.'

'I'm sorry to hear that,' said Garovel.

'When Zeff and I were interrogated, their questions seemed to be most concerned with the oldest of Zeff's daughters, Gema. It appears as though the Vanguard is quite desperate to find her.'

'Did they tell you why?'

'Supposedly, she killed an Intarian diplomat, but I do not think that would evoke the level of aggression they have shown toward the rest of the Elroys. I sense a greater plot behind all of this. At a guess, I would say that Gema has become involved in some kind of power struggle. I only wish we knew where she was.'

'Tell me more about these Elroys,' said Garovel.

'Very well.'

The Golden Fort's assembly hall was a domed chamber of formidable size, naturally lit during the daytime by two high-placed rows of elliptical windows. Gold-and-white banners hung from the ceiling as yet another reminder of Hahl Saqqaf's presiding ownership.

Asad had been waiting all afternoon for another chance to speak. Abbas and the others had heard his arguments four times previously, and still no decision had been made. The routine had begun to wear thin.

As he sat listening to a lesser lord from Egas drone on about rural livestock, he just tried to resist the urge to rub his forehead and sigh. Thankfully, at least, his red cowl allowed him to hide his expression. He was the only one of the eight Sandlord heads garbed in crimson today, as he was the only one intending to speak before the assembly. It made him stick out in the line of seated white robes, but he was accustomed to such things by now. His golden yellow eyes and black full body tattoos had never made it very easy for him to conceal himself, even among his brethren here.

'Not much longer now,' said Qorvass in Valgan. 'Just be patient.'

To Asad's eyes, each one of the eight reapers present was a large insect--a scorpionfly, more precisely. Their long wings, however, consisted of burning flames, and their bulbous eyes held a dark glow."

"799

Asad appreciated Qorvass's attempt at encouragement. He wasn't sure what he would do if he couldn't convince the other heads to help. The Rainlords would attack Rheinhal any day now. Hell, they could be launching their assault this very moment. Octavia Redwater hadn't been keen to share that particular information with him, and Asad didn't fault her for it, not when he couldn't even guarantee that the Sandlords would help her.

It was reaching the point where he was beginning to consider doing something that he knew to be very stupid. If Abbas and the others refused to help, then perhaps he would just go in on his own. Of course, if he took the full strength of Hahl Najir with him, it would undoubtedly come back on the others and put his own family in danger, but if he acted independently, that wouldn't be an issue. It also meant he would be much more likely to get killed. Hence, the stupid part.

He'd already talked to Qorvass about it, and while the reaper was certainly not thrilled by the idea, he hadn't entirely dismissed it, either. They hadn't seen Zeff in months, due to an argument that Asad couldn't even rightly recall now, but the mere thought of the man's family being betrayed by their own comrades, of Mariana dying for it, of Zeff being held captive, and of their children suddenly without parents-- it was all more than enough to anger Asad past the point of conventional wisdom.

After the Egasi lord concluded, Abbas began assuring the man of what would be done to address his agricultural concerns. Asad noticed the new group of onlookers enter from the far end of the room. Three reapers, and two young foreigners. Sazandara was among them, but Haqq was not. He should not have been surprised, he realized. His brother was many things, but a concerned citizen of the world was not one of them.

When the time finally arrived for him to speak, Asad stood and circumnavigated the long desk in order to reach the room's center platform.

All of the Hahls were represented here today, which was a rare thing, and Asad knew the reason for it was due to the perfect split between their allegiances. Hahls Najir, Shihab, Duxan, and Saqqaf were all independent, while Hahls Haayen, Kattan, Mateen, and Dagher all worked for the Vanguard."

"800

It was no coincidence that all seven of his esteemed peers were male. Kurosi law plainly forbid women from holding positions of political power. It was often conflated as a law of all Sandlords, but it really was a regional matter. Asad had lived in Kuros for nearly twenty years now, and at this point, his youth spent growing up in Moaban seemed almost like someone else's life, but he still clearly remembered his mother being the unquestionable head of Hahl Najir when she was alive. It was difficult to imagine her bending to anyone else's will, regardless of what the law might have told her.

Asad pulled down his red hood, revealing his bald head to the audience. His tattoos extended there as well, four black lines inked into the naturally dark tan of his bare pate. Such were all of his tattoos-- nothing but ornate lines across his whole body, all bearing intermittent protrusions that looked vaguely like tiny thorns or knots. They'd become something of a cosmetic nuisance as he'd grown older, thinning and stretching over time, but he was entirely unashamed of showing them off.

"My fellow lords," Asad began in Valgan, "you know what I am here to say. I am unsure of how else I can convince you. It is painfully obvious that our country, our comrades, and our people have all found themselves in the sudden grip of danger and war. I firmly believe that inaction during this time is a mistake, and I urge you to support our western brothers before it is too late."

An audible snort rose from the far left side of the desk, pulling Asad's eyes to Lord Hamza of Hahl Dagher. A thin man, his ivory robes nearly swallowed him whole, offering only a small view of the man's sharp nose and gray eyes. "'Western brothers'?" he said. "You overstate our relationship with the wet monkeys."

"We share the name of our land with them," said Asad. "We share our people and the responsibility that accompanies them. And financially, they are our brethren as much as any lord here."

"Sharing a war against the Vanguard is not the same thing as sharing food and money for our subjects," said Lord Abbas of Hahl Saqqaf. He was the oldest person in the room, though it hardly showed. The few gray streaks in his dark beard were quite faint, and his sky blue gaze didn't match his weathered features, making him look somehow younger."

"801

Asad frowned and prepared his rebuttal, but he must have been taking too long, because Qorvass stepped in to help as Axiolis floated up behind them both.

'The Rainlords are our allies,' said Qorvass. 'It is as simple as that. We may have had our difficulties with them in the past, but that was generations ago. We have moved beyond it. And now, we are confronted with a test. We should do for the Rainlords what we would want the Rainlords to do for us.'

"And if we assist them now," Asad added, "it will solidify the bond between us more strongly than ever before. And it is a bond that all of us here--all of our fathers and grandfathers, even--have been nurturing for centuries. Consider what that would mean for our children! Consider what an unshakeable foundation of camaraderie it would establish!"

Abbas' reaper drifted forward. Worwal was his name, and Asad was not looking forward to what he was about to say. The reaper had proved to be their most difficult obstacle in each of their previous meetings. 'The vengeance seekers would have us believe they are instead aspiring to greatness.' Worwal's tone was not one of condescension or mockery. It was only flat and cold observance.

Asad couldn't entirely refute the statement, either. So he didn't try. "It is true that I want vengeance for the Elroy family. My friendship with Zeff is no secret." He paused, considerate of his next words. He was abruptly reminded of what his fight with Zeff had been about. "What is a secret, however, is my proposal to join my family with his."

That sent a ripple through his audience. Asad could already see the disapproving looks on their faces.

'What are you doing?' Qorvass said privately.

Asad ignored the question. "Yes, it is true. I made such an offer to him several months ago. My son Midhat with his daughter Emiliana. But perhaps you will be relieved to hear that he refused me." He paused again to observe their expressions. "I am telling you this now because it has been my hope for many years that our two peoples be united as one." He eyed Worwal. "So you see, while I do want vengeance, it is not instead of any aspiration. I want both."

"'United as one'?!" said Hamza. "Now you are just speaking nonsense!"

"802 -- XCI.

Asad gave a slow nod. "You may be right, Lord Hamza. Perhaps it is nonsense. I will not claim to know whether or not such unity is truly possible. But that is a discussion for another time. Here and now, I am only trying to inform you of my intentions. My sincerest hopes.”

Hamza didn't have anything to say to that.

But Abbas did. “Asad. That is all very nice. On the whole, I agree with your sentiments. A better relationship with the Rainlords would go a long way. But we cannot forget that we have problems of our own and that our first obligation is to our subjects. The current state of Calthos is particularly troubling to me.”

“I understand that,” said Asad. “But we could still provide the Rainlords with some support, if not our full strength. I will volunteer myself, of course.”

‘It is simply unwise,’ said Worwal. ‘We would be jeopardizing our relationship with the Vanguard while Abolish is practically knocking on our door.’

A chorus of concurring grumbles arose from the men and reapers.

He was losing them, Asad knew. Worwal's point was a good one. But as Asad was about to voice his counterargument, the golden phone on Abbas' desk rang.

Everyone turned to watch him answer it. The man listened, thanked the person on the other end, and hung up again. He stood and placed both hands on his desk. “Word has just arrived from Rheinhal. The Rainlords have begun their assault.”

Chapter Ninety-One: ‘When the Lake is quiet...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Red Lake Castle retained less than a third of its occupants from the previous day. Emiliana had known that a lot of people would be leaving all at once, but even still, the sudden change was a little unsettling, especially when she considered that many might not return.

These last few days, she'd been trying to stop being so reclusive, trying to get to know more of the people who were laying down their lives to protect her family, but now, it seemed like too little too late. There were so many servants whom she'd barely even met, and only a handful of them had stayed behind. Aunt Joana was still here, thankfully, as were a few of the Redwater servants and the apparently well-known Dimas Sebolt, tasked by Lord Abel Sebolt with protecting the Elroy children while the strongest Rainlords were away."

"802 -- XCI.

Asad gave a slow nod. "You may be right, Lord Hamza. Perhaps it is nonsense. I will not claim to know whether or not such unity is truly possible. But that is a discussion for another time. Here and now, I am only trying to inform you of my intentions. My sincerest hopes."

Hamza didn't have anything to say to that.

But Abbas did. "Asad. That is all very nice. On the whole, I agree with your sentiments. A better relationship with the Rainlords would go a long way. But we cannot forget that we have problems of our own and that our first obligation is to our subjects. The current state of Calthos is particularly troubling to me."

"I understand that," said Asad. "But we could still provide the Rainlords with some support, if not our full strength. I will volunteer myself, of course."

'It is simply unwise,' said Worwal. 'We would be jeopardizing our relationship with the Vanguard while Abolish is practically knocking on our door.'

A chorus of concurring grumbles arose from the men and reapers.

He was losing them, Asad knew. Worwal's point was a good one. But as Asad was about to voice his counterargument, the golden phone on Abbas' desk rang.

Everyone turned to watch him answer it. The man listened, thanked the person on the other end, and hung up again. He stood and placed both hands on his desk. "Word has just arrived from Rheinhal. The Rainlords have begun their assault."

Chapter Ninety-One: 'When the Lake is quiet...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Red Lake Castle retained less than a third of its occupants from the previous day. Emiliana had known that a lot of people would be leaving all at once, but even still, the sudden change was a little unsettling, especially when she considered that many might not return.

These last few days, she'd been trying to stop being so reclusive, trying to get to know more of the people who were laying down their lives to protect her family, but now, it seemed like too little too late. There were so many servants whom she'd barely even met, and only a handful of them had stayed behind. Aunt Joana was still here, thankfully, as were a few of the Redwater servants and the apparently well-known Dimas Sebolt, tasked by Lord Abel Sebolt with protecting the Elroy children while the strongest Rainlords were away."

"803

Emiliana was surprised to see that so many of the non-servants had accompanied Octavia and the others to the battlefield.

'They'll leave the fighting to the servants, of course,' Chergoa explained. 'Instead, they'll provide operational support. Things like keeping civilians away from the battle, maintaining supplies, organizing teams and strategies--that sort of thing. Normal people can be particularly helpful when they observe the battle from a distance and feed information to the combatants via radio. Signal jammers are often deployed as a disruptive countermeasure, and then it usually becomes a contest of which side can neutralize the others' jammers first. And that's because in a fight between two forces of roughly equal size and strength, the more organized one almost always wins.'

Emiliana couldn't help wondering something as she listened. 'How many battles have you been in?'

'Enough to make me stop counting.'

That made her think of another question. 'Why did you decide to be my reaper?'

Chergoa paused. 'Well, you and I were supposed to join the Vanguard. That was my reason for wanting a new servant. It was less about you specifically. I did observe you for a little while, though. You seemed nice enough.'

'That is it? We're bound together for the rest of my life, and that is all the thought you put into it?’

‘What can I say? I’m not very picky. So long as you’re not a violent psychopath, I’m not bothered about it.’

‘Wow... then, why did you decide to join the Vanguard?’

‘Ah. It was Axiolis who convinced me. He’d been trying to convert me for ages. Finally wore me down.’

‘You must be regretting it now.’

‘Pfft, no. Maybe it’s hard for you to believe, but I’m glad I’m here with you.’

Beneath her dark mask, Emiliana’s expression distorted. ‘Why?’

‘Well, if you didn’t have me, you could’ve ended up stuck with some dumbass who gives horrible advice. And then what would you do?’

‘Are you... making a joke?’

‘Yes, Emiliana. Yes, I am. Good catch.’

‘I was hoping for an actual answer...’

‘It WAS an actual answer,’ said Chergoa. ‘And it was also a joke. Multitasking, you see.’

‘I don’t understand...’

Chergoa gave a faint laugh. ‘Holy shit, girl. I’m saying that I’m glad I can be here with you while you weather this storm of bullshit. Don’t think for a moment that I regret taking you on as my servant.’”

"804

Emiliana wasn’t sure she believed Chergoa. The reaper didn’t seem like she was lying, but all the same, it was difficult to tell what went on in the mind of someone thousands of years old.

She tried to go about her day as normal, but it was impossible. Knowing that the siege of Rheinhal was beginning today left her in a constant state of worry. There would be no meditating, she realized, so she spent her time just trying to stay close to Marcos and Ramira. She wasn't letting them out of her sight. Not today.

Collectively, the Elroy children ended up mostly hanging around Diego Redwater or Dimas Sebolt, as Marcos had taken a liking to them both due to their relative fame among the Rainlords.

In a very short time, Emiliana had come to know more about the distribution of power among her brethren than she ever had before. According to Shenado, the title of the strongest living Rainlord was a matter of dispute with four possible candidates: Octavia Redwater, Rayen Merlo, Melchor Blackburn, and Xuan Sebolt. Strangely--at least to Emiliana--Melchor and Xuan did not serve as the heads of their families, instead yielding the responsibility to their younger cousins.

Including those four, Shenado proceeded to rattle off the names of the strongest twenty servants, and while Emiliana didn't remember most of them, she'd taken particular note of her father being ranked as eighth. Dimas Sebolt, Diego Redwater, and Joana Cortes had been ranked as tenth, eleventh, and fourteenth, respectively. Emiliana wondered where Shenado would have ranked her mother, but she didn't have the heart to ask.

With everyone gathered in the Red Den, Emiliana chose to stand in the corner with Chergoa, looking through the panoramic windows that made up the chamber's eastern wall. They offered a clear view of the endless rain and flood waters, while the windows on the other side of the room displayed the vast cityscape of Aguary.

"Is it true that you once took on thirty Abolishers all by yourself?" Marcos was asking.

"...Yes," was all Dimas said. He was a statue of a man, tall and solidly built and always wearing a dark suit with a black tie. Whenever Emiliana saw him, he never spoke unless spoken to, which translated to him only speaking when Marcos and Ramira pestered him with questions.

"And you beat them all?" said Ramira.

"...Yes."

“Was it scary, fighting so many servants at once?” asked Marcos.

“...A little.”

“Why did you have to fight them?” asked Ramira.

Dimas turned to his reaper, the blue wisp floating over his shoulder.

‘Don’t look at me,’ said Iziol. ‘If I tell the story, Ramira won’t hear it.’

Dimas’ face remained entirely unreadable as he turned back to his young audience. “...They were attacking a village. I stopped them.”

‘Wow,’ said Iziol. ‘I think they were hoping for a bit more detail.’

“...It was snowing.”

They waited in vain for him to continue.

“What a conversationalist,” said Diego Redwater. He lay on the couch across from Dimas with his hands behind his head.

Dimas had no retort.

Diego was a man of his early thirties, if appearance was to be trusted, sporting a simple blue t-shirt and gray shorts. He was one of the very few Rainlords with red hair, which he kept in short curls. His reaper hovered over him. Yangéra was her name, but Emiliana hadn’t heard her say a single word so far. Not that the reaper needed to. Diego was vocal enough for the both of them. “C’mon, Marcos. Why don’t you ask me about some of my great deeds? I’ve got all sorts of stories.”

Marcos smirked and looked back at Dimas. “Do you think you could beat up Diego?”

“...Certainly.”

Diego sat up. “Whoa, whoa, whoa...”

Their conversation gained a bit of vigor after that, but Emiliana had already lost interest and stopped listening. Instead, she just let her mind wander as she stared out across the waves in the dreary blue horizon.

Her thoughts drifted to the monster she saw before. Or hallucination. Or whatever that thing was. She’d asked both Chergoa and Shenado about it, but neither one could tell her anything. She was still trying to decide if she should ask someone else, trying to decide if she really wanted to know the answer.

The more troubling possibility had certainly crossed her mind. She might genuinely be going crazy. The mutation ability could do that, couldn't it? She could have accidentally mutated a part of her brain when her power manifested. The horns on her face--two of them were right there on her forehead. It seemed entirely possible that they might have grown not just out from her skull but also into it. And if that was the case, then the horns could have done... something to her brain. Changed it. Broken it."

"806

It was horrifying to think about. And confusing. She didn't feel different. Not really. But then again, there was that emptiness, that pit in the back of her mind. But that was just... loss. Wasn't it? Psychological. Not physical, surely.

She was beginning to dread finding out.

Perhaps it didn't matter, though. She hadn't seen the monster again. Perhaps she never would. Perhaps it was just a one time thing. A freak event of some kind.

Wishful thinking, she decided. She wasn't sure optimism suited her, anyway.

'Hey,' Chergoa said privately, pulling Emiliana out of her daze. The reaper's glowing eyes pointed her toward the others.

Everyone had stopped talking, Emiliana realized. At the heavy silence, she stepped closer.

Dimas and Diego both stood.

"Is something wrong?" Emiliana adjusted the edges of her hoodie to make sure she could hear them, but Shenado was the one who responded.

'We have an unexpected guest at the front gate. He seems to be alone, apart from his reaper. I sense Joana moving toward them.'

Chergoa drifted up behind her servant. ‘You recognize them?’

‘It’s Melchor Blackburn,’ said Shenado.

Emiliana understood the sudden tension in the room now. The Blackburns had been the only one of the ten who hadn’t joined in the campaign against the Vanguard. And that name. Melchor. It hadn’t been very long since she first heard it.

Without warning, Iziol brushed up against Dimas and then bolted from the room, phasing straight through the glass wall.

‘Where’s he going?’ said Chergoa.

“...Only being cautious,” was all Dimas said.

Emiliana watched Iziol shrink into the horizon.

‘Joana is bringing Melchor here,’ informed Shenado.

They waited. The two men took up positions facing the Red Den’s northern door, Dimas in front of Marcos and Ramira while Diego covered Emiliana.

At length, the door opened, and Joana entered first, followed by a long-faced man whom Emiliana didn’t recognize and a host of Redwaters whom she did.

Joana started them off. “Lord Melchor says he has received word of an imminent assault on Red Lake. So he has come to help us guard the children.”

“How generous of you,” said Diego. “Who told you they were here?”

“No one,” said Melchor with his reaper right behind him. He had a hard voice, the kind that carried easily through the air and bit at one’s ears.

“We merely guessed that you would be keeping them here.””

"807

“Lucky guess,” said Diego.

“Not really,” said Melchor. Like Dimas, Melchor also wore a suit, though his wasn’t quite so dark, and he’d left the jacket unbuttoned to let his tie dangle freely. "I've known your grandmother for many years, Diego. She considers this castle to be the safest place in Sair. And if it were fully occupied, herself included, I might agree. But since that is not the case, I am certain that Red Lake is too vulnerable a place for the Elroy children at the moment."

Having taken up a position between the two bodyguards, Joana responded for the group. "I suppose it just depends on who is coming to attack us."

Melchor paused to look over his audience, letting his emerald eyes do most of the work while his head hardly moved.

The man's reaper spoke up for him in a flat, dry voice. 'We're sensing a bit of hostility.'

"It's nothing personal," said Diego. "The Elroys have had a touch of bad luck with unexpected visitors, lately. You'll have to excuse us if we're not entirely thrilled to see you right now."

'Of course,' the reaper said. 'However, Melchor and I did come here by ourselves. If we wanted a fight, we would have brought backup.'

"We appreciate that," said Diego. "And yet, here you now stand, in the middle of our castle with your eyes on the children. Perhaps you're under the mistaken impression that you're strong enough to kidnap them and fight your way out on your own."

"Rather than that," said Melchor, "we were hoping you would all return with us to Luzo. House Blackburn will protect the children while the siege is underway."

"A generous offer," said Joana, "but I think we will remain here at Red Lake."

'Please reconsider,' said Melchor's reaper. 'We have reason to believe that Captain General Parson Miles will be here within the hour with a siege party of his own.'

That left an unsettled quiet in its wake.

'You do not have the strength here to repel him. But with the full might of the Blackburns behind you, he will be no threat.'

"Why would Parson be coming here when Rheinhal is under attack?" asked Joana.

'I cannot rightly say. Perhaps it is a testament to how badly the Vanguard wants to capture the Elroys, or perhaps they have reinforcements already en route. We have sent word to Octavia as well, so I'm sure she will be prepared for whatever happens.'"

"808

Shenado was the one to speak up next. 'If you have proof of your claim, then present it now. Otherwise, fuck off back to your marshes.'

Everyone looked at her.

Emiliana was more than a little surprised by the reaper's aggressive language. She'd barely heard anyone use the f-word before, and Shenado had just dropped it in front of Marcos like it was no big deal.

'Have we done something to offend you?' asked Melchor's reaper.

'Yes,' said Shenado. 'If you wanted to look after the children, you should have discussed it with Octavia, Rayen, and Xuan beforehand. Instead, you decided to come here while they are busy defending the Rainlords' honor--something your family elected not to participate in.'

'There was no time. We only received word of Parson's assault twenty minutes ago. We would have called, but we feared it being intercepted.'

Emiliana watched Shenado's burning eyes narrow.

'I understand that you may be suspicious of us,' the other reaper went on, 'but please, try to see reason. Don't allow Mariana's death to cloud your judgment. The children's lives--'

The flames of Shenado's cerulean body flared up. 'I have already asked you to provide proof. Seeing as you have not done so, when will you be fucking off? I hope it is soon.'

"We are only trying to help," said Melchor.

'If that's true, then you can wait outside the castle,' said Shenado. 'And when Parson arrives, you will be close enough to assist us.'

'You're being unreasonable--'

'I do not believe I am.' Shenado looked to one of the Redwaters behind Melchor. 'Send word to Octavia of this supposed assault. Let's see what she and the others think about it.'

The servant nodded and made for the door.

Melchor's reaper vanished into his body. The man's eyes became silvery marbles, dark with a metallic luster, and in an instant, the floor and walls were all covered with metal. "We did not come here to fight," said Melchor, apparently still quite conscious. His voice, however, was suddenly different, because it wasn't just his. Emiliana could hear his reaper speaking in unison. Two voices, one aloud and one in her head. "Please reconsider."

The metal beneath her feet was whiter than that of the man's eyes, she noticed, and after a moment, she realized that it was frozen.

'Mercury,' Chergoa assessed privately, calm as ever. 'Get to Ramira. It'll be hazardous to her if it melts.'

"809

Emiliana moved to do what Chergoa said, but Marcos was closer and reached Ramira first. With a bit of help from Shenado, the boy lifted his little sister off her feet. Ramira didn't seem to appreciate being carried, but Emiliana was too distracted by the adults in the room to keep watching.

"Why are you doing this?" Diego asked, all sense of leisure gone from his voice now. He'd taken a wider stance, half-crouched with his arms hanging loosely in front of him.

"Duty," said Melchor and his reaper. "We will not harm the children. We simply need them to come with us."

"But why?" said Joana.

"Old mistakes," was all Melchor offered.

"That's not good enough," said Diego. "This is your last chance, Melchor. Either explain yourself or leave peacefully."

The Lord Blackburn did not move.

The ensuing silence was perhaps the heaviest thing Emiliana had ever experienced. Everyone remained perfectly still, even Marcos and Ramira. Emiliana counted seven Redwaters standing behind Melchor. Not a single one of them looked pleased to be there. Emiliana flexed her one clawed hand unconsciously.

‘Get ready to run,’ came Chergoa’s echoing voice.

‘There’s nowhere TO run.’ So long as the chamber remained covered in Melchor’s soul-empowered mercury, even the reapers wouldn’t be able to leave, Emiliana knew.

‘That’s why you need to be ready when there is,’ said Chergoa. ‘And don’t resist. If Diego and the others lose, just surrender.’

‘I can fight.’

‘You can’t fight THAT.’

Melchor’s mercurial eyes had not changed, but his skin flashed intermittently between pale normalcy and waves of shining metal. Flesh one moment, metal the next, and then back to flesh again. If the man meant the display as some kind of warning, it didn’t seem to be working.

And then, everyone moved at once.

Diego’s reaper Yangéra vanished into his body as well, which caused Melchor to lunge for him. But Melchor’s movement wasn’t anything human. Instead, the man’s whole body turned to liquid mercury and surged forward as if expelled from a fire hose. His suit still stuck vaguely to him, giving an uncertain sense of where his body might be in the middle of that lustrous glob.

Diego didn’t need to protect himself, however. Dimas did that for him, putting both hands forward and shoving Melchor’s liquid mass entirely off course from across the room.

Emiliana had heard about Dimas’ fearsome alteration ability: gravitation."

"810 -- XCII.

Melchor was not long delayed. The Redwaters all pounced on him at once, their mixture of powers accumulating into a confused frenzy of attacks. Their varied crystals and metals and gases all combined and ignited, engulfing the man's liquid body in flames while simultaneously bombarding him from every conceivable direction.

And Melchor ignored them. He pressed through their combination attack as if it were nothing more than smoke. He went for Diego again.

Diego was ready for him, though. Emiliana knew his power as well: nitrogen transfiguration. A surge of mercury came for his head, but Diego ducked right under it and gripped Melchor's amorphous body with both arms, going for a ride as Melchor kept leaping across the room like a wild bull. Emiliana could see him attempting to slow Melchor down with a bath of liquid nitrogen as he flailed, struggling to hang on.

Dimas took the opportunity to rear back from across the room and punch a hole into the south wall. Emiliana saw the air visibly distort as the impact shattered Melchor's frozen mercury. "Go!" the man yelled.

Emiliana turned to run, only to find Joana already pulling her and Marcos along. But it made no difference. Before they could reach the hole in the wall, the mercury filled back in, leaving them still trapped in the room with everyone else.

The group of Redwaters moved to attack again, but two broad pillars of mercury converged on them, one down from the ceiling and the other up from the floor, meeting each other like the teeth of a giant's jaw. Emiliana could hear their bones crunch and see their blood go flying as the frozen mercury claimed five servants at once.

Chapter Ninety-Two: 'The weight of the rain...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Dimas Sebolt glanced at the dead. He'd never seen Melchor's power firsthand like this, but he'd heard Xuan speak about it at length. It was only supposed to be mercury transfiguration, but the man's mastery of pan-rozum completely changed the equation. In Dimas' mind, Diego's earlier confidence had been entirely unfounded. Being outnumbered meant virtually nothing to someone like Melchor Blackburn.

Fool that he was, however, Diego could still prove invaluable in this fight, Dimas knew. Diego himself had control of pan-forma, a kind of simpler hyper-state exclusive to transfiguration and materialization users only. It was much less versatile than pan-rozum, not breaking down the barriers between ability classes and instead affording three blanket enhancements to durability, regeneration, and connectivity." "810 -- XCII.

Melchor was not long delayed. The Redwaters all pounced on him at once, their mixture of powers accumulating into a confused frenzy of attacks. Their varied crystals and metals and gases all combined and ignited, engulfing the man's liquid body in flames while simultaneously bombarding him from every conceivable direction.

And Melchor ignored them. He pressed through their combination attack as if it were nothing more than smoke. He went for Diego again.

Diego was ready for him, though. Emiliana knew his power as well: nitrogen transfiguration. A surge of mercury came for his head, but Diego ducked right under it and gripped Melchor's amorphous body with both arms, going for a ride as Melchor kept leaping across the room like a wild bull. Emiliana could see him attempting to slow Melchor down with a bath of liquid nitrogen as he flailed, struggling to hang on.

Dimas took the opportunity to rear back from across the room and punch a hole into the south wall. Emiliana saw the air visibly distort as the impact shattered Melchor's frozen mercury. "Go!" the man yelled.

Emiliana turned to run, only to find Joana already pulling her and Marcos along. But it made no difference. Before they could reach the hole in the wall, the mercury filled back in, leaving them still trapped in the room with everyone else.

The group of Redwaters moved to attack again, but two broad pillars of mercury converged on them, one down from the ceiling and the other up from the floor, meeting each other like the teeth of a giant's jaw. Emiliana could hear their bones crunch and see their blood go flying as the frozen mercury claimed five servants at once.

Chapter Ninety-Two: 'The weight of the rain...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Dimas Sebolt glanced at the dead. He'd never seen Melchor's power firsthand like this, but he'd heard Xuan speak about it at length. It was only supposed to be mercury transfiguration, but the man's mastery of pan-rozum completely changed the equation. In Dimas' mind, Diego's earlier confidence had been entirely unfounded. Being outnumbered meant virtually nothing to someone like Melchor Blackburn.

Fool that he was, however, Diego could still prove invaluable in this fight, Dimas knew. Diego himself had control of pan-forma, a kind of simpler hyper-state exclusive to transfiguration and materialization users only. It was much less versatile than pan-rozum, not breaking down the barriers between ability classes and instead affording three blanket enhancements to durability, regeneration, and connectivity."

"811

Mercurial spikes erupted from Melchor's body, skewering Diego through the eye socket and finally throwing him off. Bloody and full of holes, Diego managed to catch himself on the bookshelf in the middle of the room, sliding across the top and freezing it with the residual liquid nitrogen still present in his arms. By the time his feet touched the floor again, his wounds had already healed, even the one that had undoubtedly pierced his brain.

Diego didn't have to dive back into the fight. Melchor came for him first, which Dimas found quite telling as to which opponent the Lord Blackburn was most concerned about. Surely, if Diego managed to freeze enough of Melchor's body at once, it would be problematic for the man, but even with Diego's soul-empowered liquid nitrogen, the freezing process would require more than just a few seconds. Melchor's passive soul defense was not something to be overlooked. Diego wasn't going to get that much time unless Dimas and Joana provided it for him.

Dimas pointed a single index finger at Melchor. Much as he would have liked to, he couldn't simply crush the man with overwhelming gravitational pressure. Melchor's passive soul resilience and field density were both too powerful for such a tactic. However, Dimas could still reverse the gravity around Melchor in order to disorient him. So he did.

In an instant, Melchor was flung toward the ceiling, splattering against it briefly before recovering and crawling around like some kind of hideous liquid spider.

Joana took the opportunity to launch a flurry of thick chromium spears, all barbed and razor sharp. They pelted Melchor, some bouncing off, some sticking in, and his body shuddered and morphed before it could expel the chromium back out again.

Dimas didn't let up either. With one hand, he kept intensifying the gravity around Melchor in order to slow him down, and with the other, he fired off a series of gravity bullets--invisible pockets of supercondensed pressure that carried enough speed to pierce steel at fifty meters.

Mercury splashed violently with each impact, but Melchor weathered that assault, too, though not quite so effortlessly as before. His liquid body contorted and swirled as he moved out of the way.

Diego, in the meantime, had been prepping three of his fingers. No doubt, he feared using any more than that in the presence of his allies. Dimas knew what he was crafting. He'd seen him do it before. Soul-strengthened nitroglycerin, it would be."

"812

It was probably the most difficult compound that Diego could construct within a reasonable timeframe. All in all, it only required hydrogen, oxygen, and nitrogen, but the structure of the hydrogen and oxygen molecules was no simple thing to achieve, needing to be organized into three hydroxyl groups and then merged with white fuming nitric acid. Certainly, it wasn't Dimas' area of expertise, but he at least had to give Diego credit for being able to pull something like that off in the middle of combat.

And of course, even after construction, nitroglycerin was wildly unstable. Mishandling was liable to get himself killed, so it was a testament to his confidence that he would do it now, when a mistake would mean harming Yangéra as well.

Dimas just tried to focus on pinning Melchor down while Diego worked.

It was nearly impossible. The two remaining Redwaters tried to assist again, but a ceiling of spikes finally claimed them. And it would have claimed Dimas and Joana, too, if he hadn't slowed its descent with a gravitational wall.

As Melchor reared back for another attack, Diego lobbed his three severed fingers at him. One missed, but the other two were on target, making contact with the tattered suit that still clung to Melchor's vague form.

All three explosions went off at once. They were even stronger than Dimas anticipated. The chamber didn't just tremble; it spasmed, violent enough that Dimas nearly lost track of everyone despite the gravitational shield he'd placed over himself and the children. A wall of chromium stood before them as well, thanks to a crouched and cringing Joana, and Dimas could see Emiliana covering Marcos and Ramira with her own body.

The shock wave had smashed Diego against the rear wall, but the man was already picking himself up and healing so rapidly that, in a moment, he'd only have earned himself a bit of mussed hair and a few blood stains on his t-shirt.

An impressive hole now lay in the upper corner of the room, ushering smoke to the outside. The lamp that had been providing light was in pieces as well, leaving only the rainy gray sky for illumination. Diego ignited his fingertips in order to supplement that.

Dimas could see Melchor's form through the smoke and dust, still alive and churning. He made a fist and punched through the south wall again, knowing that the best possible use of this downtime was to ensure that the Elroys escape."

"813

The mercury crumbled against the gravitic impact, but before Dimas could tell the children to flee, it filled right back in.

Melchor's dual-voice rose through the chamber. "No one leaves," he said. "Not without our guidance."

Dimas and Diego both inched closer, not wanting to give the man enough time to recover but also not wanting to walk into a trap. Dimas could see a few thick puddles of mercury that had been severed from the rest of Melchor's body.

"The three of you will become great pillars of the Rainlords one day," said Melchor. "We do not wish to kill you here and now."

"You don't say?" said Diego, also bearing a second voice with Yangéra. "Then let's all just relax and talk this out over a nice game of hopscotch."

Melchor did not seem amused by the suggestion. He was the first to begin moving again.

Dimas and Joana tried to slow him down as Diego moved to freeze the severed puddles of mercury. It would be a long process of whittling away at Melchor's body, but Dimas didn't see another way of defeating the man when they didn't have the power to simply overwhelm him. Dimas could try smothering him with hypergravity, but that would be dangerous for everyone else, and the idea was to protect the reapers and children, not turn them all into meaty spaghetti.

More spikes came for him, this time too many to simply dodge. So he didn't. Dimas inhaled deeply as he focused for the increase that he wanted. The gravitational bubble appeared around him and stopped the spikes dead, cracking and shattering them before they could reach him. Their broken pieces flew away from him and dug into the walls, letting a bit more light peer through fresh holes before Melchor covered them back up again.

It had grown dark, the only physical light source being that of Diego's ignited fingers, but Dimas didn't strictly require it. He could see the vague outline of souls. While they were still attached to people, souls were a kind of faint fog spread thinly through the body and only really noticeable in the darkness. A dim glow, essentially.

And then, in a fleeting moment when he wasn't being attacked, he noticed something horrific.

There were too many souls. There was a second Melchor in the room."
"814

Melchor's liquid mass had split, and now both parts were moving independently of one another. The chaos and low visibility of the fight had been concealing it from Dimas.

Perhaps the split had only just occurred, because Shenado chose that moment to warn them. 'There are three of him now! Be very careful!'

Three?

A surge of mercury blindsided him, throwing him off his feet while still clinging on to him, quickly consuming his whole body, no doubt wanting to crush him and prevent regeneration.

Every single one of his muscles flexed at once, and the gravity stopped him in mid-air. An invisible bubble exploded outward and tore the mercury off of him as he floated there.

Indeed, he could see all three hulking blobs looming in the darkness now. The one that had attacked him was already moving toward Joana and the children.

Dimas fired off a round of gravity bullets as he propelled himself closer. Joana pierced the liquid beast with a giant chromium spear, adding spiked branches to it and shredding mercury with each new growth. The clone writhed and squirmed away from her, only to immediately circle back around and try for her again. Dimas gathered enough force into his fist and barreled through the clone, expelling increased gravity upon the moment of impact.

Globs of mercury splattered everywhere but didn't settle. Instead, they scuttled away like ants, retreating back into a pool nearer the other two clones. Dimas reversed gravity beneath them, wanting to keep every droplet suspended in the air and isolated from one another, but it didn't matter. They didn't need the floor. They could move under their own power, no doubt due to Melchor's additional mastery of materialization's velocity states.

A muffled explosion shook the chamber, pulling everyone's attention back to Diego. While they'd been busy with a single clone, Diego had been dealing with two. And it was not going well, Dimas saw. He rushed to assist the man, but the mercury was already smothering him, and after another moment, Dimas heard the crunch. That wouldn't be enough to truly stop Diego, of course, but Melchor also ripped Yangéra free of the man's body, using the mercury as a physical filter through which to separate the two. And even while Melchor endured a storm of gravity bullets and chromium spikes, the liquid coffin tightened another time, ensuring that Diego remained dead."

Dimas expected to see Melchor kill Yangéra as well, but the man did no such thing, instead choosing to hold her out in front of him as a shield. Dimas and Joana both had to stop attacking.

"It is over," said Melchor. "Diego was your only hope of escaping this room, and now that I have Yangéra, you cannot even attack me freely. Please cease this pointless struggling and surrender."

Dimas couldn't see Joana's face in the darkness, so he looked to her reaper and then to Shenado. Indeed, this battle was undoubtedly lost now. Close-quarters combat didn't suit him, and without Iziol present, Dimas had an observational disadvantage. There was nothing for it.

'We've lost,' thought Dimas. 'Self-destructing now.'

'Understood,' came Iziol's voice. By now, he must have been a quarter of the way to Rheinhal.

And as Dimas prepared both hands with gravitic orbs, he took a deep breath so that he could raise his voice for all to hear. "...I will return for you all very soon."

By now, Melchor had no doubt realized what he was doing, and Dimas could see the soul-empowered mercury rushing to stop him.

Dimas placed his head in his hands and let the force smash his skull to pieces.

Chapter Ninety-Three: 'The code of the shield...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector sat quietly in the unlit guest chamber. Lynn and Prince Meriwether were both asleep. Hector had volunteered to stay up and keep watch since he didn't require sleep as much as Lynn did. She agreed, as long as he woke her up early so that he could get some rest in the morning.

It had been an eventful evening. He'd watched the entirety of Lord

Asad's discussion with the other Sandlords. Garovel had been kind enough to translate what they were saying into Mohssian for him. By the end, it was quite clear that Lord Asad had been unable to convince them of anything.

After that, Axiolis introduced them to Asad and Qorvass, who were both much more courteous than Asad's brother, but once the pleasantries concluded, the conversation still proved itself considerably more troubling than the one with Haqq.

"We are going to Rheinhal," Asad had said quite fluently in Mohssian. "Abbas and the others have chosen not to help, but I cannot remain idle."

'You are welcome to come with us,' said Qorvass. 'Any friend of the Elroys is a friend of ours.'
"815 -- XCIII.

Dimas expected to see Melchor kill Yangéra as well, but the man did no such thing, instead choosing to hold her out in front of him as a shield. Dimas and Joana both had to stop attacking.

"It is over," said Melchor. "Diego was your only hope of escaping this room, and now that I have Yangéra, you cannot even attack me freely. Please cease this pointless struggling and surrender."

Dimas couldn't see Joana's face in the darkness, so he looked to her reaper and then to Shenado. Indeed, this battle was undoubtedly lost now. Close-quarters combat didn't suit him, and without Iziol present, Dimas had an observational disadvantage. There was nothing for it.

'We've lost,' thought Dimas. 'Self-destructing now.'

'Understood,' came Iziol's voice. By now, he must have been a quarter of the way to Rheinhal.

And as Dimas prepared both hands with gravitic orbs, he took a deep breath so that he could raise his voice for all to hear. "...I will return for you all very soon."

By now, Melchor had no doubt realized what he was doing, and Dimas could see the soul-empowered mercury rushing to stop him.

Dimas placed his head in his hands and let the force smash his skull to pieces.

Chapter Ninety-Three: 'The code of the shield...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector sat quietly in the unlit guest chamber. Lynn and Prince Meriwether were both asleep. Hector had volunteered to stay up and keep watch since he didn't require sleep as much as Lynn did. She agreed, as long as he woke her up early so that he could get some rest in the morning.

It had been an eventful evening. He'd watched the entirety of Lord Asad's discussion with the other Sandlords. Garovel had been kind enough to translate what they were saying into Mohssian for him. By the end, it was quite clear that Lord Asad had been unable to convince them of anything.

After that, Axiolis introduced them to Asad and Qorvass, who were both much more courteous than Asad's brother, but once the pleasantries concluded, the conversation still proved itself considerably more troubling than the one with Haqq.

"We are going to Rheinhal," Asad had said quite fluently in Mohssian. "Abbas and the others have chosen not to help, but I cannot remain idle."

'You are welcome to come with us,' said Qorvass. 'Any friend of the Elroys is a friend of ours.'

"816

That was the part that had stuck with Hector. These people were ready to trust him despite knowing nothing about him other than that he was Garovel's servant. Apparently, that was the only thing that mattered. It was easy to forget, sometimes, that Garovel wasn't just his friend but also his greatest connection to the world. And it was more than just how Garovel was keeping him alive physically; Hector hadn't forgotten that it had also been Garovel's connection with Mehlsanz that had allowed him to work with Lynn and the Queen so easily. And now, again.

He supposed it was only natural that Garovel would have ties to a shitload of people, but even still, he certainly hadn't been expecting a sister.

'I would've told you about Chergoa eventually,' Garovel said privately. 'We just hadn't gotten around to that conversation yet.'

'Uh-huh...'

'Look, I haven't seen her in... uh... I'm actually not sure how long it's been. Four hundred years, maybe.'

'Four hundred?!'

'Possibly five. Time is such a blur.'

'What the hell? Why so long? Did you have a falling out or something?'

'If by "falling out" you mean I was being kind of a dick to her, then yes. That is exactly what happened.'

'Ah... w-what'd you do wrong?'

'Well. Um. When you spend as much time with someone as I've spent with Chergoa, it becomes pretty easy to get on each other's nerves. And we're siblings, so that just made it worse. Even when we agreed on something, we'd still find a way to argue about it.'

'...This sounds an awful lot like an excuse, Garovel.'

'Oh, no, I fucked up. I'm getting to that part. Don't worry. I'm just giving you a bit of context.'

Hector smiled faintly in the darkness. 'Okay...'

'You have to understand, Chergoa and I have known each other for thousands of years. Just think about that for a moment. We have one of the oldest relationships in the world. Even among reapers, few have known each other THAT long. So to try to sum up our relationship in a concise way is just... it's basically impossible.'

'The two of you have seen some shit.'

'...Yes, Hector. Eloquently put, thank you.'

'Sure thing.'

‘The point is, Chergoa and I have often taken long breaks from one another. We’ve spent entire lifetimes apart and thought little of it when we saw each other again.’”

"817

Hector could hardly imagine it, seeing someone again after seventy years and feeling as if that was normal.

‘There’s also the fact that it’s very difficult to stay in touch with other reapers, just in general,’ Garovel went on. ‘We tend to wander, especially when we don’t have servants keeping us in one place. When you don’t make plans to meet up again, it becomes very difficult to do so. And since Chergoa and I parted on less than amiable terms, we never made those plans. And from there, we just lost track of each other.’

‘So... it’s not that you’ve been avoiding each other for four hundred years. You just haven’t crossed paths.’

‘Yeah. I’m sure she’s forgiven me by now. Or at least stopped caring.’

‘...You still haven’t told me what you did wrong.’

Garovel paused a moment. ‘She and her servant at the time had just opened an orphanage in this really isolated place. I felt that she should move everyone to a city where the kids could be better taken care of--or in other words, where someone else could look after them. She did not agree. She believed--quite correctly, as I would later find out--that the nearby towns were too dangerous; and moreover, she wanted to raise the children personally. I thought that was a job best left to normal people.’

‘Hmm. That doesn’t sound too bad, though. I mean... er, I can kinda see your point.’

‘Yeah, but the problem was, I had an overabundance of moral certainty about it. I specifically remember saying to her, “You’re wasting your time. Rather than taking care of these kids, you should be trying to make sure that this war doesn’t make orphans of any others.”’

Hector’s brow receded a little. ‘Geez...’

'I know, right?'

'That doesn't seem like something you'd ever say. Usually, you're more... uh... kind of, er... I'm not sure "cynical" is the right word...'

'Practical?'

'Yeah. You're practical. And that seemed like a pretty naive thing to say.'

'Wow. Getting called naive by a teenager. That stings.'

'Am I wrong?'

'No, you're right. It was stupid to think that Chergoa's servant could impact the war in such a way as to prevent any more children from being affected by it. But at the time, I really wanted to believe that.'

'Why?'

Garovel hesitated again. 'Well, that's another story. But I suppose it's one I should tell you.'

Hector waited.

'I had just recently released my servant of the previous sixty years. And not because my servant wanted me to.'

He blinked. 'What do you mean?'"

"818

Garovel floated away from him and stopped in the middle of the room. 'It's still a bit early for this conversation, but oh well.' He turned around to face his servant again. 'Hector, I want you to listen carefully to what I'm about to tell you. You may not like what you hear, but I hope you will never forget it, because it is one of the most important things I am ever going to say. And I will try to explain why that is.'

Hector shifted in his chair. 'Uh--okay. I-I'm listening...'

'There's something that happens to people when they acquire power,' the reaper said. 'It's not that it corrupts them, necessarily, but it can definitely change them. Whether it's political power or physical power, the result is essentially the same. Power of any kind grants you influence and control over others. And as you gain more power, more influence in the world, you become increasingly susceptible to that change. So for servants, that change is almost inevitable, because your power is constantly growing.'

'Are you saying... your servant abused their power?'

'In a word, yes. He started extorting innocent people. Said he could put their money to better use than they could. I think he saw it as a kind of "greater good" tax, like he viewed himself as some sort of governing figure when he'd really just become a thug.'

'Wow... and you couldn't just tell him to stop? Didn't he understand that he had to listen to you? I mean... we're called "servants" for a reason, right?'

'Yeah, about that... Maybe I shouldn't tell you this, but you'd probably realize it on your own eventually. And I trust you, I guess. See, when servants grow powerful enough, they can prevent their reapers from releasing their souls.'

Hector tilted his head. 'What? How?'

'It's pretty simple, actually. The reaper has to make contact with the servant's body in order to release the soul. So the servant can just keep the reaper in a soul-empowered prison and never allow themselves to be touched.'

'Oh...'

'It's an extreme solution. If you can't make contact with your reaper, then you lose access to your regenerative power, enhanced strength, and hyper states. And obviously, if you get killed, then your reaper probably won't feel like resurrecting you again.'

'No kidding...'

'Also, you'd have to worry about maintaining the prison. The soul power will drain from it over time, unless you have absurdly high synchronization with your reaper.'

"819

‘Are you... uh... I mean, did your servant do that to you?’

‘Yeah,’ said Garovel. ‘He kept me prisoner for two years.’

‘Geez...’

‘Looking back on it now, two years wasn’t very long at all. Only two out of thousands already lived. But it was one of the worst things I’ve ever experienced. Being trapped makes all the difference in the world, especially when you don’t know if you’ll ever make it out again.’

‘Agh, man... But, uh.... how DID you get out? Did the guy screw up?’

‘Partially. I tricked him. Another problem with imprisoning your reaper is that, guess what? They can still talk to you. In fact, unless you’re keeping other people around their prison, you are the ONLY person they can talk to. So naturally, I began by just constantly talking shit to him. Trying to drive him to the breaking point so he’d do something stupid, right? That didn’t work so well. Whenever I annoyed him enough, he’d just wound me to the point where I’d fall unconscious for a few days. Should’ve known that was a bad plan. He was a thug. Any problem he could solve with violence, he would. So instead, I very slowly convinced him to do one of the dumbest things I could think of. Reverse psychology. Being purposely vague. That sort of thing.’

‘What’d you have him do?’

‘I waltzed him into the territory of a famous member of Abolish. He thought there’d be treasure. There wasn’t.’

Hector had to stifle a laugh. ‘Wow, Garovel. I guess he deserved it, but holy shit...’

‘That Abolisher went on to become even more famous afterwards. His name was Suresh, and he was considered Dozer’s equal for a while.’

‘Whoa...’

‘Suresh is dead now, but his successor is still alive. Gohvis. Ever heard the name?’

‘No...’

‘The Monster of the East? The Black Scourge? Those are both him, too.’

Hector thought back. ‘Actually... yeah, I’ve heard of the Black Scourge. When I was little. I thought it was like... a plague or something.’

‘Nope. It’s a guy.’

‘Fuck...’

‘Yeah. He’s arguably even more famous than Dozer, his boss. Or so I hear. I’ve never met either of them personally, in case that wasn’t obvious. Maybe everyone is wrong about them, and they’re secretly super nice dudes.’

‘Right... Hmm. Dozer has a country named after him, but why is Gohvis so famous?’

‘Regicide. Genocide. And punching a hole into a volcano that then erupted and wiped out an entire Vanguardian stronghold.’

‘...What.’”

"820

‘That’s just what I’ve heard,’ said Garovel. ‘Gohvis is famous for lots of things, but I don’t know how much is true, if any. Still, I think it’s pretty safe to say that he’s someone we never want to meet.’

‘But... punching a hole into a--I mean, like, with his FIST?’

‘I guess so. Dunno.’

‘That’s ridiculous. I feel like I would’ve heard about someone doing something like that.’

‘Yeah, well, I’m pretty sure it happened before television was invented. Might be newspapers about it, though. That’d be an interesting headline. But I’m not surprised you haven’t heard about it. I don’t think it’s the type of thing they’d teach in school.’

‘If they had, I probably would’ve paid more attention. That’s awesome.’

Garovel’s skeletal brow twisted somewhat. ‘...You did hear the part about genocide and him being a member of Abolish, right?’

‘Oh, yeah... Fuck, man, why couldn’t he be a good guy?’

Garovel laughed.

‘Are there any cool stories about good guys doing insane shit like that?’

Still chuckling, the reaper said, ‘I think we’re getting a little off topic.’

‘Are we? I forgot what we were talking about.’

‘Wow, Hector.’

‘Hey, it’s late. I’m tired.’

‘We were talking about my sister.’

‘Right... uh...’

‘Chergoa.’

‘I knew that.’

Garovel shook his head. ‘Anyway, like I was saying before, I treated Chergoa and her servant poorly. My most recent servant had betrayed me, so I was... upset. And unreasonable. We parted ways without making plans to meet up again, and now, apparently, I’ve found her in Sair all these years later. And I would quite like to see her again.’

‘So you think we should go to Rheinhal with Lord Asad.’

‘Yeah. If I don’t see Chergoa now, it could be fucking ages before I get another opportunity to. But with that said, I won’t force you to go. Because it DOES sound incredibly dangerous.’

Hector scratched his forehead. ‘When does it not?’

‘I’m serious, Hector. These warriors aren’t like the ones we fought in Atreya. The Sandlords and the Rainlords are the real deal, and the Vanguard won’t be taking them lightly. We’ll almost assuredly encounter people both AT and ABOVE Harper’s level. So don’t just go with the flow on this one, alright? Understand what you’d be getting yourself into.’

The prospect gave him pause. More people like Harper? And stronger? Hector’s face scrunched up a little as he thought about that. He was starting to miss Warrenhold right about now.”

"821

But regardless of how he felt about it, Hector was certain that they couldn’t just leave after hearing about Chergoa. ‘It’s your sister, Garovel. We have to help her.’

‘You sure? I definitely won’t hold it against you if you’d rather stay out of it. Our involvement might not make much difference, anyway.’

‘Well... uh... I don’t know. Shit. Making the real decisions is your job. As long as we’re working to protect people, I mean--I’m not... I... agh, y-you know what I mean, right?’

‘Ha. Yeah, I do.’ Garovel looked toward the guest room’s other two occupants. ‘What about them? They said they’d understand if you chose to leave with Asad, but still.’

Lynn and Meriwether had their own beds, of course. The Prince’s snoring sounded like it belonged to a man twice his size.

‘Uh... well, it doesn’t seem like they need me. This castle seems pretty safe...’

Garovel paused. ‘You’re really just doing this to get away from Lynn, aren’t you?’

Hector decided not to grace that with a response.

It wasn’t long until morning arrived. Lynn awoke first, popping up from her pillow as if someone had ordered her to attention. She sat there a moment, scanning the room. She nearly looked like a different person without her braided ponytail or her white hood. She’d slept in her eye patch, though.

“Anything happen?” she asked.

Hector just shook his head.

She nodded and carried her luggage to the bathroom in order to shower and change. She took her time, but she was still done before the Prince was up. She started working on her ponytail while they waited for Meriwether to get ready.

“Thanks for taking the night shift,” said Lynn. She was looking at Hector via the reflection in the large mirror that she was using for her hair. “You should get some rest now.”

Hector stood. “Actually, uh... Asad leaves this afternoon, so, uh, I should probably go see Haqq first.”

Her hands stopped, and she stared at him. “You said you would sleep in the morning. That’s why I let you take the night shift.”

He knew that and couldn’t help smiling just a bit. “Yeah...”

She turned to look at him directly. “If you’re really leaving to go fight, then you should’ve slept.”

“Well... I told you I don’t need sleep in order to fight.”

“Hmph.” She went back to her ponytail.

“S-sorry...”

“It’s fine. I guess I just wish that I could go, too.”

"822

“W-why?” asked Hector. “You enjoy fighting that much?”

“I wouldn’t say I enjoy it. But I could use the experience.” She stopped braiding briefly in order to wave her gauntlet in front of her face. “Even with this, I’m not nearly as strong as I need to be.”

“Ah... I know the feeling.”

Lynn smirked. “You do, huh? Is that why you’re always inserting yourself into other people’s problems?”

“Uh... hah, yeah, I guess so.”

Silence seized hold of the chamber after that. Hector couldn’t help becoming increasingly uncomfortable as they waited. Lynn was just sitting there. Right there. Being herself.

This was clearly a problem.

Hector stood and went for his single bag of luggage. “So, ah... I should probably go meet Haqq now...”

At that, Lynn also stood. “Okay.”

“I don’t know if, uh... if I’ll have time to see you both again before I leave, so...”

“I understand.” She moved closer now, making Hector tense up. “Be careful out there, alright?”

“I-I will. Thanks.”

Lynn frowned at him and went in for a hug.

Hector’s eyes bulged, and he recoiled away from her.

Lynn froze up, then put her arms down and stood there woodenly. "I'm sorry. I didn't mean to--I just thought--uh. I'm sorry."

"Ah, oh, n-no, it was--um, eh... I'm the one who--mm... ergh--"

'Ugh, this is painful to watch,' said Garovel.

"S-sorry," Hector said again. He took an awkward step toward her, insanely thinking he would be able to reinitiate the hug, only to immediately realize his folly and step back again.

Lynn offered him a handshake instead.

Hector reached for it, but the journey proved too perilous, and he retracted his hand. "I'm... ah... s-sorry... er, again. I don't know what's... egh..."

'Holy shit, Hector.'

The young woman looked at her hand, perhaps wondering if there was something wrong with it.

'Just relax,' said Garovel. 'You've shaken hands with her before, remember?'

But it was too late. The moment had passed.

"Well, um," Lynn retied, "be careful out there... I mean, I already said that, but..."

"Y-yeah... Er. Y-you, too..."

And he probably should have waited around so that he could say goodbye to Prince Meriwether as well, but Hector couldn't bear the atmosphere in the room now and chose to simply flee instead.

He was grateful for the bustling corridor's sea of people. It allowed him to feel like he was disappearing into the shuffling mass of bodies as he made for the basement level once more.

Garovel followed silently for a while, until he apparently realized that Hector wasn't going to start the conversation. 'That was more gruesome than watching Harper cut someone in half.'

Hector sighed to himself. 'I panicked...'

'No shit.'"

"823

'Agh... I fucking suck.'

'Aw, don't feel too bad,' said Garovel. 'You'll do better next time.'

'The worst part is... now, she probably thinks that I'm grossed out by her or something...'

'Eh, you don't know that. Maybe she just thinks you're a spastic weirdo.'

'...Great. Thanks for that.'

'No problem.'

Hector just wallowed in his self-loathing as he joined the group of people waiting for the elevators.

'Why do you have a crush on her, anyway? Do you even know the reason?'

'Uh...'

'I'll take that as a no.'

'No, well, I mean... I know why.'

'Then tell me.'

'Ergh... because... I mean, because she's fucking awesome.'

'She is?'

'Yes! She's like--she's like everything I'm not. Really smart and strong and focused.'

'You're all of those things, too, Hector.'

'No, I'm not--'

'I think you literally just named your three best characteristics. When you don't know the answer, you generally ask intelligent questions; you've proven yourself in battle multiple times, as far as I'm concerned; and you meditate like a fucking Jesbolese monk. Smart, strong, focused.'

'I... that's not--'

'So essentially, you're telling me that you like her because she reminds you of yourself.'

'What the--?! No! I just--! I just don't know how to--!'

'Whatever, narcissist.'

'Fucking--! You... agh...'

'Maybe you just have an eye patch fetish.'

'...Is that a real thing?'

'Oh, I'm sure it is. I have immeasurable faith in humanity's capacity for perversion.'

At length, they finally arrived at the R&D lab again. The guards let them through without a fuss this time.

Haqq and Sazandara were both right there near the doorway. The reaper noticed them first. 'Hello again,' she said.

'Good morning,' said Garovel. 'Did you get a chance to perform the analysis?'

"Yes, I did!" said Haqq. "The results were absolutely fascinating! It seems your servant is able to materialize an ultra-rare quad-element compound of titanium, iridium, carbon, and plutonium! I'm not sure why I couldn't tell right away yesterday!"

Confused, Hector just kind of blinked dully. He didn't know what to say, but judging by the reaper's flat expression, Garovel apparently did.

'You're lying.'

"Of course I am lying. Just as I told you before, it is only iron. The embodiment of mediocrity and tedium. Why did you make me waste my time analyzing it? I was hoping that you had brought me something that was at least vaguely interesting, but no. Your servant is about as special as a sunny day in Kuros." He eyed Hector. "And probably just as useful.""

--BELATED donation bonus (day 5/7, page 3/3)--

Hector shrunk away from Haqq's gaze and flushed with a touch of humiliation. He knew that there were probably servants out there with abilities that were naturally more powerful, but he didn't think iron was that bad. Perhaps he'd been mistaken, though. Haqq was the expert, after all. He looked to Garovel, who was visibly irritated.

'We weren't trying to impress you. We just wanted confirmation. That being said, I'd appreciate it if you didn't insult my friend for no apparent reason. And by the way, iron is far from useless.'

Haqq gave a throaty laugh. "I suppose in relative terms, yes, you might be able to find some semblance of value in it. But when you find yourselves faced with real monsters, iron will not be enough to save your unremarkable lives."

'Wow,' said Garovel, louder now. 'I fucking hate ability-snobs like you. Power doesn't make the person, you moron. You'd do well to remember that, lest you have someone teach it to you the hard way.'

Haqq seemed to dismiss the notion.

'Garovel is correct,' interjected Sazandara. 'Haqq, you should apologize for insulting them.'

Haqq's expression soured, and he pulled his shoulders in. "No. They wasted my time. And so did you, for that matter. You know I have more important things to be doing."

'Apologize. Now.'

"Or what?" said Haqq. "You will release me? Because I insulted a couple of strangers? Be serious."

'They are no longer strangers. They are allies now.'

Haqq exhaled another laugh. "Allies? Why? Because they've decided to help Asad on his fool's errand? Please. I could not care less about their circumstances if you paid me to ignore them."

Garovel had heard enough, it seemed. 'Let's go, Hector. We got what we came for.'

'Please wait,' said Sazandara. She tapped Haqq on the head, and the man immediately dropped to the floor, unconscious. She floated closer to Hector and Garovel. 'I am deeply sorry that Haqq is such an insufferable twat. Frankly, I wanted Asad as my servant, but I got stuck with this social cataclysm of a person, instead.'

After a moment, Garovel relinquished a nod. 'It's fine. I understand. The apology is appreciated, though. Thank you.'

'Allow me to make it up to you.'

Garovel paused. 'What do you mean?'

'Follow me.' She floated away from Haqq's body and guided them into a deeper room where the walls were completely filled with lockboxes, as if they'd suddenly walked into a bank vault."

"825

Sazandara approached the room's apparent attendant, a youthful man at a desk full of notebooks and binders. The reaper said something to him in Valgan.

Nodding, the attendant pulled on a pair of gloves and fished a key out of a drawer. He moved to the rear wall, opened one of the larger boxes, and with visible effort, pulled out an impressive slab of metal with a gentle curve to it. Sazandara said something else to him, but this time, the attendant hesitated, looking from her to Hector and back again.

Before Hector even thought to ask, Garovel began translating for him.

'She's telling him to give it to you. He's asking if she's sure. Says Haqq will be upset.' Garovel broke for a chuckle. "'That's the point," she says.'

The attendant soon conceded and moved to hand the object over.

'Careful not to let it touch your skin just yet,' said Sazandara.

Hector did as she instructed, abruptly glad that he hadn't taken his own gloves off.

At first, even while holding it, he still wasn't sure what the thing was, but as soon as he turned it up vertically in his hands, he realized.

It was a shield. A heater shield, to be precise--a flat top with a rounded, pointed bottom. Smaller than a kite shield but larger than a buckler. Hector recognized it from his research into old world armor.

He was suddenly reminded of his afterschool armor-building project with Lance Alexander. It was only a few months ago, but it seemed like a different life. What was Lance doing now, he wondered? He recalled finding a small measure of relief when he saw the list of victims of the Calman High Massacre and realized that Lance's name was not on it.

Blinking, Hector pulled himself back to the present as Sazandara started talking again.

'This is a self-repairing shield,' she explained. 'It is extremely durable for a number of different reasons. These four vertical lines you see here--these are bars of tungsten carbide. Haqq synthesized them personally. The rest of the metal is a mixture of steel and titanium alloys. Also, the metal has been permanently soul-strengthened by Abbas Saqqaf, so I think you'll find that it can take quite a bit of punishment before ever needing to repair itself.'

'Permanently soul-strengthened?' said Garovel. 'Lord Abbas can do that?'

'Of course. But never mind that. I still haven't told you the best part.'

'Oh?'

"826

'As long as your servant's bare skin is making contact with this shield, his passive soul defenses will be dramatically increased,' said Sazandara. 'Unless, of course, his soul defenses are already superior to that of the shield. In which case, no increase is granted.'

Garovel hovered nearer. 'Hmm. I didn't realize that was even possible.'

'I would have been surprised if you did. Haqq made the breakthrough himself. It is still not a widely known development.'

‘I see. Are you sure you’re willing to part with it? This seems like an incredibly valuable object.’

‘This is merely a test piece, hence the antiquated simplicity of its design. Haqq wanted to see if he could integrate the materials properly. It took him several months to craft enough for just this shield alone. And admittedly, as irritating as Haqq can sometimes be, I was rather impressed. I don’t know how familiar you are with integration abilities, but being able to craft THIS much of any self-repairing material is quite a feat.’

Hector and Garovel exchanged glances.

‘In other words, yes, it is immensely valuable,’ she went on, ‘but I do still wish for you to have it--partly as an apology and partly to teach Haqq a lesson.’

Garovel shrugged. ‘Well, I won’t refuse such a useful gift. Thank you for your generosity.’

‘You are quite welcome,’ she said. Then she turned to Hector and added, ‘Lord Darksteel.’

Hector’s brow rose at that.

Sazandara’s bony smile widened. ‘After we met yesterday, I asked Haqq’s nephew to look into you. I didn’t realize it would be such an easy assignment for him.’

‘And here I was just getting accustomed to no one recognizing Hector’s face,’ said Garovel.

‘I must say, your actions in your home country have been quite bold. Are you not concerned that the Vanguard will come to recruit you?’

‘Recruit us?’

‘Indeed. Certain factions have recently been quite... aggressive in their attempts to gain more members. I imagine your servant’s fame will make him rather appealing to such people.’

‘Hmm. That’s odd. Not long ago, our Queen went on a veritable quest to find Vanguardian allies, and yet she was barely able to procure the aid of a single servant.’

‘Yes, but that was when your country contained the stench of Abolish.

Now that this is no longer the case...’

‘I see your point.’

‘Perhaps there is more riding on your alliance with Asad than you realized.’

‘Perhaps you’re right.’”

"827

Hector turned the shield over in his hands again, wanting a good look at the front. It was lustrously gray, apart from the four bars of tungsten carbide that Sazandara mentioned before. Those were a bit darker, but Hector wouldn’t have been able to tell that they weren’t simply paint if the reaper hadn’t told him. They fit so seamlessly into the shield that he couldn’t see even the slightest physical crease between them and the rest of the lighter-colored metal.

‘Before you use it, a couple of warnings,’ said Sazandara. ‘As soon as your skin touches it, the enhanced soul defenses will take effect. When you’re wearing gloves like you are now, no enhancements are granted to your body.’

“O-okay.”

‘Additionally, you will notice that touching the shield directly causes immense physical pain. That is a side effect of your body being made stronger than it is prepared to be. Garovel will therefore need to numb the pain for you whenever you intend to wield it barehanded.’

“Ah... and then I’ll feel the pain later.”

‘Naturally.’

Hector nodded. ‘Figures,’ he remarked to Garovel.

‘The shield will also take a toll on you, Garovel.’

‘Me? Why?’

‘The defensive increases are made possible by interfering with the soul-synchronization between the two of you. The shield functions as a catalyst, and through it, your souls are stretched beyond their limits in an effort to equalize themselves with the shield. And because the reaper is very much the “battery” of the relationship, this experience will gradually drain you.’

‘I see.’

‘How long has Hector been your servant?’

‘About three years.’

Hector’s expression flickered. He had to consciously keep himself from staring at Garovel. It hadn’t even been eight months.

‘Quite young,’ said Sazandara. ‘In that case, I would advise Hector not to wield it barehanded for more than thirty minutes per day.’

‘Understood,’ said Garovel. And then privately, he amended her number to, ‘Six minutes per day. Remember that, if you can.’

Hector wasn’t sure he understood the point of lying to their allies like this. Even if Sazandara somehow ended up betraying them, wouldn’t it be better if she thought they were weaker? Something to ask Garovel about later, he decided.

‘Is there anything else we should know?’ Garovel asked.

‘No, that is everything.’

‘Alright. Thank you for explaining. We appreciate your hospitality. Once things settle down, I’d like to invite you back to Warrenhold with us. I’m sure even Haqq would be able to enjoy himself there.’

‘Ah. I will keep that in mind.’”

"828 -- XCIV.

Chapter Ninety-Four: ‘Kindred souls, be swift...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It wasn’t long until Hector found himself aboard another airplane. He’d only arrived in Kuros a day ago--on his first ever plane ride no less--and yet now he was already leaving.

This second plane ride had a very different atmosphere, however. It did not provide quite the same level of comfort that the Prince's private jet did. Rather, this one felt more like he'd somehow become involved in a smuggling operation. Lord Asad had chosen to use a cargo plane for their trip, and one of the doors was kept open at all times, making the whole affair rather windy and loud.

He supposed it only made sense, though. Asad hadn't gained the approval of the other Sandlords for this venture, so a certain amount of discretion was to be expected. Moreover, the storage space allowed them to conceal military supplies among the normal cargo. The sight felt a bit surreal to Hector--piles of boxes belonging to the United Mail Service of Sair next to huge crates full of food rations and rocket-propelled grenades.

Apart from the pilots, only two other people had accompanied Hector and Asad. Both were female, though Hector hadn't been able to tell until they pulled back the hoods of their black-and-gold robes. And they both had those distinct yellow eyes, too. The older woman was Imas Najir, Asad and Haqq's sister. The younger woman was Jada Najir, Asad's daughter. With all of the air rushing around the cabin, it was too noisy for anyone to speak without shouting, and the ladies seemed content with letting their reapers do the talking for them. Hector had no problem doing the same.

Garovel spoke at length, explaining his and Hector's presence. Axiolis assisted. The other reapers welcomed the help but didn't seem too concerned otherwise.

Hector could see the landscape changing dramatically through the windows. Barren desert and wastelands gave way to harsh, craggy rock formations, and soon enough, enormous mountains came into view, standing between them and Rheinhal. Some of the peaks were so tall that the plane had to navigate around them due to its low altitude flight.

Hector also noticed that meditating was more difficult. Garovel explained that it was a mild effect of hypoxia and could therefore be neutralized if needed, but the reaper told him that the extra burden could prove beneficial as practice."

"828 -- XCIV.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

It wasn't long until Hector found himself aboard another airplane. He'd only arrived in Kuros a day ago--on his first ever plane ride no less--and yet now he was already leaving.

This second plane ride had a very different atmosphere, however. It did not provide quite the same level of comfort that the Prince's private jet did. Rather, this one felt more like he'd somehow become involved in a smuggling operation. Lord Asad had chosen to use a cargo plane for their trip, and one of the doors was kept open at all times, making the whole affair rather windy and loud.

He supposed it only made sense, though. Asad hadn't gained the approval of the other Sandlords for this venture, so a certain amount of discretion was to be expected. Moreover, the storage space allowed them to conceal military supplies among the normal cargo. The sight felt a bit surreal to Hector--piles of boxes belonging to the United Mail Service of Sair next to huge crates full of food rations and rocket-propelled grenades.

Apart from the pilots, only two other people had accompanied Hector and Asad. Both were female, though Hector hadn't been able to tell until they pulled back the hoods of their black-and-gold robes. And they both had those distinct yellow eyes, too. The older woman was Imas Najir, Asad and Haqq's sister. The younger woman was Jada Najir, Asad's daughter. With all of the air rushing around the cabin, it was too noisy for anyone to speak without shouting, and the ladies seemed content with letting their reapers do the talking for them. Hector had no problem doing the same.

Garovel spoke at length, explaining his and Hector's presence. Axiolis assisted. The other reapers welcomed the help but didn't seem too concerned otherwise.

Hector could see the landscape changing dramatically through the windows. Barren desert and wastelands gave way to harsh, craggy rock formations, and soon enough, enormous mountains came into view, standing between them and Rheinhal. Some of the peaks were so tall that the plane had to navigate around them due to its low altitude flight.

Hector also noticed that meditating was more difficult. Garovel explained that it was a mild effect of hypoxia and could therefore be neutralized if needed, but the reaper told him that the extra burden could prove beneficial as practice."

"829

He tried to meditate for a while, but intermittent bouts of turbulence kept shaking him out of it until he decided to just give up.

'Fun fact for you,' said Garovel, still privately. 'Under normal atmospheric conditions, turbulence is usually exclusive to higher altitudes, but since we're near a mountain range, the air currents are all wonky even at this height.'

'How interesting...'

'It IS interesting, you sarcastic fuck.'

Hector breathed a small laugh and looked down to avoid drawing attention to himself. The shield was right there in his lap. It seemed too valuable to not keep a solid grip on at all times, especially with that hole in the plane sitting right there. He really didn't want his luck with shields to be the same as his luck with motorcycles.

After a while, Hector remembered a question he'd been meaning to ask. 'By the way, uh... why did you lie to Sazandara about my age? Wouldn't it be better if people think I'm weaker than I actually am?'

'She DOES think you're weaker than you actually are.'

'W-what?'

'I told her three years. Truthfully, factoring in all the times you've achieved emergence and your constant practice and meditation, your iron ability is more like six or seven years old.'

Hector squinted with one eye. 'Wha? No way. That can't be right...'

'In terms of sheer volume and power, yes. It is. Trust me.'

'But... that means I'm, like, uh... er... e-eight times stronger than normal...?'

'Thereabouts, yeah.'

He thought back, trying to count. 'But I've, um... I mean, I've only achieved emergence, like... four times, I think.'

Garovel snorted. "Only four," he says. That's kind of a fuckload, y'know.'

'Is it?'

'Yes!'

'Hmm... but still, I mean... EIGHT times as strong?'

'I know it sounds ridiculous. That's exactly why I had to lie about it to Sazandara. If I tell people you're less than eight months old, and then they later see what you're capable of, that could bite us in the ass. If you're a bit stronger than average, no big deal. If you're eight times stronger, BIG DEAL. Big smelly, hairy deal. That kind of information is not to be shared lightly, Hector. Understand? That's how we end up with people like Gohvis knocking on our door, people who'll see us as a problem that should be nipped in the bud.'

'I understood that much. I just, uh... hmm.'

'You just, what?'

"830

'I just feel like... eight times is still too much. I mean, that one guy I fought... uh... the guy with the yellow crystals.'

'Sulfur.'

'Yeah. He was obviously older than me as a servant, but... he probably wasn't THAT much older, right? I mean, considering how you said he was weaker than Karkash, who probably wasn't that old, either.'

'Yeah. What's your point?'

'Well, that guy could add velocity to his sulfur pretty well. And even now, I can barely do that with my iron. So, I mean... logic would dictate that I'm still not as strong as that guy was, right?'

'Mm. That's a reasonable assumption to make, but alas still incorrect.'

Adding velocity to your element is a skill that also requires practice. It's something you have to actually understand "how" to do. Even if you'd achieved emergence a dozen times already, you wouldn't be able to add velocity to your element until you learned the particulars of it.'

'Oh...'

'In terms of raw power, though, I think you've already surpassed that sulfur guy. He only had the edge on you because his soul synch was higher. You'll get the velocity thing down soon enough.'

'Hmm.' Hector gave a sideways nod. It was true that he'd been thinking that he could still do more with the velocity than he'd so far managed. 'Then... are there any other "skills" like that?'

'Temperature manipulation. That's a pretty high-level skill for materialization users, though. Weirdly enough, it's easier for transfiguration users to do, perhaps because they don't have to also be mindful of spatial coordination like you do.'

'Spatial coordination?'

'Depth perception. Where you want to create your element. That sort of thing. Transfiguration users also just have tighter control over their elements, even being able to manipulate how intensely they react to other elements. So I suppose it's not too surprising.'

'Hmm.'

--++--++--

Rheinhal was not as Asad remembered it. Even from the air, he could see the difference. Barricades had gone up all over the city, forming concentric circles around Rhein's Keep. Vehicles were a rare sight as well. No doubt, the Rainlords had evacuated most, if not all, civilians by now.

Encouragingly, Asad did not see much in terms of property damage. He spotted a couple small craters near the castle, but nothing else. Yet the siege was still young, of course."

"831

As they neared the airport, Asad moved to the front of the plane in order to radio the Rainlords on the ground and ensure a safe landing. A car was waiting for them on the tarmac, as was a group of reaperless workers who began unloading supplies as soon as Asad and the others were clear.

It was a quiet car ride, even between the reapers. Perhaps everyone was nervous, wondering what difference four more servants would make. After a spell, Asad's daughter decided to break the silence.

"Where did you get that shield?" she asked. At twenty-two years, Jada was the oldest of Asad's three children.

It seemed to take Hector a moment to realize that she was talking to him. "Oh, uh... from your... uncle, I think?"

Asad had thought he recognized it.

'Less from Haqq and more from Sazandara,' said Garovel.

That made more sense. Asad's hand went to the ring in his pocket, rolling it absently between his fingers and wondering if he would need it. Haqq had given it to him just before leaving Kuros. Callous though he was, Haqq had always found other ways to demonstrate his concern for his big brother.

Soon, after passing a couple checkpoints, they arrived at a large hotel, around which stood a plethora of new reapers and servants. They all eyed Asad and his small entourage, but only one deigned to approach.

It was a very small person, Asad realized, fully grown certainly but no taller than a child. "Welcome to Rheinhal," the little man said.

Asad couldn't help hesitating, still unsure to whom he was speaking. "Thank you."

"The Lion of the Desert, is it? I do not believe I have ever had the pleasure." He certainly had a firm handshake, regardless of his stature. "I am Xuan Sebolt."

"Ah! A pleasure, indeed! Though, at this rate, I fear they will start calling me the Black Sheep of the Desert, instead. I am sorry I could not procure any more aid from my kin."

"You have nothing to apologize for," said Xuan. "This is not their fight. Were we in their position, we probably would have done the same."

Asad only frowned at that.

“Come inside, won’t you? I believe everyone has been expecting you.”

They followed.

The hotel lobby broadened into a casino floor, though all of the slot machines had been turned off. Lavish red-gold carpeting filled each walkway, lined with segmented lights.”

"832

‘The Seadevil is a dwarf,’ said Qorvass privately. ‘Was not expecting that.’

Asad had to agree. He supposed the size of a servant made no real difference in the measurement of their worth, but it was still quite strange to discover that one of the most feared Rainlords of Sair could seem so unintimidating. And it wasn’t just Xuan’s height that was responsible for that false impression, Asad realized. His easy smile and big, sea green eyes had contributed something to it as well. And then there was the way he bobbed from side to side as he walked, as if stepping in tune with a song only he could hear.

Xuan led them to the back with his unintroduced reaper following closely behind. They ventured through a series of doors and offices until they arrived at a boardroom.

Asad recognized most of the faces present. Octavia Redwater, Rayen Merlo, Santos Zabat, Evangelina Stroud, as well as a handful of their family members. A map of Rheinhal lay across the center table.

“Glad you could make it,” said Octavia, already standing there by the door. The tiny old woman wasn’t much taller than Xuan. “Ah, and who is this that you have brought with you?”

“My sister Imas and my daughter Jada,” he said, gesturing. “And their reapers, Orjand and Atalim.”

Axiolis assumed the responsibility of answering for the remaining two. ‘This is Garovel and his servant, the young Lord Hector Goffe of Warrenhold. They have come all the way from Atreya, and as it happens, Garovel here is Chergoa’s brother.’

That sent a ripple through the chamber. Asad saw Octavia exchange looks with Xuan before responding.

"I see," she said. "Then I suppose you are hoping to meet with her."

Garovel spoke for himself now. "Yes, I am. I was not made aware of Chergoa's ties to the Rainlords until just yesterday. Axiolis explained that she is a fairly new addition to your ranks."

"Your timing is unfortunate," said Octavia. "We'll have to speak quickly. Chergoa and her servant are currently being held hostage."

"What?!" said Axiolis. "Since when?!"

"Dimas Sebolt arrived here last night and informed us of an attack on Red Lake in which the Elroys were abducted. By Melchor Blackburn, no less."

"Melchor? Why would he do such a thing?"

"We don't know yet," said Octavia.

The Lady Rayen Merlo decided to chime in now. "We are sending the Sebolts and Delagunas to recover the children. Abel and Salvador are attending to the matter at this very moment and intend to leave Rheinhal before sundown."

"833

"In that case, I hope they will not mind Hector and I tagging along," said Garovel.

"I'm sure they won't," said Xuan. "I'll take you to them after this. They won't be leaving without me, so just stay close."

"Appreciated, thank you."

Asad had questions for Rayen and Octavia. "You are sending all of the Sebolts and Delagunas? That is nearly a third of your forces, no?"

"It is," said Rayen. "They will need no less than that in order to breach Marshrock."

"Even then, we may have trouble," said Xuan. He eyed Asad another time. "Your assistance would be most welcome."

Asad pursed his lips. "I came here in order to help free Zeff."

'Be that as it may, I think you should accompany Xuan,' said Axiolis. 'I know Zeff would tell you to prioritize his children over himself. And besides, this way, the Vanguard won't become aware of Hahl Najir's involvement. You'd be assisting us without doing anything that might cause reprisal against you and your family.'

'Axiolis is right,' said Qorvass.

"What about the fight here in Rheinhal?" said Asad. "If you send so many of your fighters to Marshrock, will you still be able to take the Keep?"

"Breaching Rhein's Keep may not even be necessary," said Octavia. "Thus far, we have only been testing their defenses, and while they have proven quite solid, it won't make much difference as long as we continue to hold the city."

"Our opponent has a time limit," said Rayen. "Sanko is coming. When she arrives, she will settle the matter for us. All we need do is prevent the enemy from escaping."

'You make it sound so easy,' said Qorvass.

"Simple, perhaps," said Rayen. "Not easy. Our forces are going to be spread thin. But if Asad wants to put his skills to the best use, he should go to Marshrock."

After a beat, Asad gave a reluctant nod. "Very well."

Garovel posed another question now. 'What more can you tell us about the children's captors?'

"Xuan can fill you in on such details," said Rayen. "However, do be aware that Melchor Blackburn is not a man to be trifled with. Do not attempt to fight him unless you have him absurdly outnumbered or Xuan is with you."

Xuan laughed. "Stop, you'll make me blush. I'm nothing special." Then he wiped his mirth away and turned to Garovel. "She's right, though. Don't try to fight him without me unless you want your servant to be turned into a fleshy pudding.'"

"834 -- XCV.

Chapter Ninety-Five: 'Where the streams darken...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

They'd been split up. Emiliana had a room all to herself. It was a comfortable prison, bearing a large bed and a television, but there weren't even any windows. Melchor had taken her mask from her, apparently thinking it important to see her horned-face. He'd taken Chergoa, too, but Emiliana could still communicate with her.

'Ugh,' came Chergoa's disembodied voice. 'I hate being stuck in a box.'

'What's the point of separating us?' Emiliana asked. 'I can still talk to you.'

'Because if you managed to escape, it'd save them the trouble of hunting you down. They could just kill me and not have to worry about you telling anyone anything.'

Emiliana appreciated the reaper's candidness, but sometimes it could be a bit much. She sat down on the edge of her bed and put her head in her hands, closing her eyes and trying to think. 'What about Marcos and Ramira? Why separate me from them?'

'A solitary escape attempt is easier to stop than a coordinated one. But guarding multiple prisons also requires more guards. From that, we can infer the Blackburns are not short on people.'

Emiliana didn't think it made much difference how many guards they had as long as Melchor was around. She would not soon be forgetting what she saw the man do at Red Lake. And if that wasn't disheartening enough, she'd gotten quite a good look at Marshrock from the outside. The name was not queerly chosen. The castle had literally been carved into a gigantic rock, and murky wetlands did indeed surround it and the entire town of Luzo. Marshrock was a dark monolith on an otherwise flat and muddy landscape, sticking up toward the gray sky like a mountainous child that had somehow strayed from its herd.

'I'm still wondering why in the world they're doing this,' said Emiliana.

‘No kidding. Their behavior is strange. Considering our circumstances, the Blackburns seem to be pretty cautious, and yet they decided to bring us to Marshrock, which is undoubtedly the first place the other Rainlords will think to look for us.’

‘Well, it is their stronghold.’

‘But it wouldn’t have been that difficult to hide us. I’m sure Melchor could have smuggled us out of the country, if he wanted.’

The reaper had a point.

‘It almost seems like they want the other Rainlords to come here,’ said Chergoa.”

"834 -- XCV.

Chapter Ninety-Five: ‘Where the streams darken...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

They’d been split up. Emiliana had a room all to herself. It was a comfortable prison, bearing a large bed and a television, but there weren’t even any windows. Melchor had taken her mask from her, apparently thinking it important to see her horned-face. He’d taken Chergoa, too, but Emiliana could still communicate with her.

‘Ugh,’ came Chergoa’s disembodied voice. ‘I hate being stuck in a box.’

‘What’s the point of separating us?’ Emiliana asked. ‘I can still talk to you.’

‘Because if you managed to escape, it’d save them the trouble of hunting you down. They could just kill me and not have to worry about you telling anyone anything.’

Emiliana appreciated the reaper’s candidness, but sometimes it could be a bit much. She sat down on the edge of her bed and put her head in her hands, closing her eyes and trying to think. ‘What about Marcos and Ramira? Why separate me from them?’

‘A solitary escape attempt is easier to stop than a coordinated one. But guarding multiple prisons also requires more guards. From that, we can infer the Blackburns are not short on people.’

Emiliana didn’t think it made much difference how many guards they had as long as Melchor was around. She would not soon be forgetting what she saw the man do at Red Lake. And if that wasn’t disheartening enough, she’d gotten quite a good look at Marshrock from the outside. The name was not queerly chosen. The castle had literally been carved into a gigantic rock, and murky wetlands did indeed surround it and the entire town of Luzo. Marshrock was a dark monolith on an otherwise flat and muddy landscape, sticking up toward the gray sky like a mountainous child that had somehow strayed from its herd.

‘I’m still wondering why in the world they’re doing this,’ said Emiliana.

‘No kidding. Their behavior is strange. Considering our circumstances, the Blackburns seem to be pretty cautious, and yet they decided to bring us to Marshrock, which is undoubtedly the first place the other Rainlords will think to look for us.’

‘Well, it is their stronghold.’

‘But it wouldn’t have been that difficult to hide us. I’m sure Melchor could have smuggled us out of the country, if he wanted.’

The reaper had a point.

‘It almost seems like they want the other Rainlords to come here,’ said Chergoa."

"835

‘Why would they want that?’ said Emiliana.

‘I don’t know. It’s particularly strange when you consider how Melchor tried to get us to go with him peacefully at first. Really not sure what to make of these people.’

‘Hmm. Maybe they really are trying to protect us in some way.’

‘I highly doubt that.’

She laid back on her bed and sighed. 'So what should I do now?'

'You're a prisoner. Not much to do other than wait. Try meditating, if you can manage it.'

'Right...'

'And entertain me. I'm super bored.'

'I don't understand how you can be so calm about everything...'

'I could pretend to be freaking out, if you want.'

'...Please don't.'

'I could tell you a nice story to help you relax.'

At that suggestion, Emiliana begrudged a half-smile. 'What kind of story?'

'What kind do you want? I know lots of stories.'

'Surprise me, then.'

'Alright. So I knew this girl once who was a total kleptomaniac. Stole stuff all the time. It was crazy. Anyway, she really liked it when I told her jokes, but I'd often have trouble explaining puns to her, because she always took things literally.'

A beat passed. 'Oh my god...'

'Good story, right?'

'I think I'll start meditating now.'

'So cruel.'

It was a fairly difficult transition to make, but Emiliana managed it after a while. She focused on clearing her head, mostly. Chergoa had previously explained that meditation was typically used in order to imagine the progression of one's power, what one desired to achieve with it in the short term, but since Emiliana still wasn't at all certain what that was, she was content with keeping it very general in her mind. At this point, all she knew was what she didn't want to become.

That monster kept creeping back into her mind. Trying not to think about it only made the task impossible, and at length, she decided that she should just stop meditating.

When she opened her eyes, however, the black-scaled monster was standing before her.

She froze up. Without her mask, she couldn't help feeling even more vulnerable this time.

It looked around the room, still deathly silent, and Emiliana decided to move away from the bed.

The monster's red eyes followed her.

Slowly, she positioned herself closer to the vanity mirror, wanting to see if the monster had a reflection.

It didn't.

She wasn't sure whether to be relieved or not. It was fairly compelling evidence that the beast wasn't genuinely there, which made it less dangerous, but that still didn't tell her what the damn thing was or why she was seeing it."

"836

The monster opened its mouth, which was a small revelation unto itself. The creature didn't have protruding lips of any kind, and until now, the place where its mouth resided had looked unsettlingly empty. But this wasn't an improvement. Emiliana spotted a tongue and at least two rows of sharp teeth. And by the way its mouth kept moving, the monster looked like it was trying to speak, but no words came out. No sounds, even. Just more uncomfortable silence.

Emiliana had to blink a few times. She hadn't even thought to try talking to it. After a few moments, she mustered up the courage to ask, "What are you?"

No answer.

And before she could pose another question, the monster faded away again, leaving no remnant of its presence. Emiliana checked the mirror one more time just to be sure it hadn't suddenly appeared there in the manner of some freaky horror movie.

Alone again, she wasn't sure if she should tell Chergoa about what had just happened. The reaper hadn't been able to tell her anything useful the first time, and it wasn't like anything had changed since then. Emiliana wrestled with the decision for a while until eventually choosing to keep the repeated encounter to herself. On top of everything, she didn't need to give Chergoa more evidence that her servant was going crazy.

--+-+--+--

Melchor needed his sleep. Even for him, it had been an exhausting night. Any time he and Orric had to use pan-rozum meant a bout of punishing fatigue was soon to follow. The recovery period had shortened immensely over the years, but it would still be many years more before they could use it without any recoil whatsoever.

When he awoke, he cleaned himself up and changed into a fresh suit. He let Orric continue sleeping. To his eyes, the reaper was a quaint jaybird, boasting deeply blue feathers with a few splotches of black and gray. The eyes glowed with black light, though at the moment, they were closed and so not luminous.

Melchor was still tired himself, but he knew that it was still a long ways yet before he could truly relax again. He left his empty bedroom behind and made for the Black Hall, where cousin Ismael was most likely to be at this hour. Relatives and attendants filled the barrel-vaulted corridors along the way, but they all made way for him whenever they saw him coming."

"837

The Black Hall was the largest room in the castle, and its walls were a testament to ancient Arman architecture with their elaborate stonework and inlaid columns. Its ceiling, however, consisted entirely of natural rock. Its slanted, craggy surface hadn't changed since the Armans first brought the rock to this wet place and carved a home out of it.

When Ismael noticed Melchor, he ordered everyone else to leave. Once upon a time, such an order from Ismael would have been shouted with confidence and perhaps even laughter, but here and now, Ismael only whispered his desire to his attendants, who then quietly ushered the crowd of people from the chamber.

Once they were alone, Ismael let the silence linger a while before finally speaking. "I am sorry for what I had you do," he said.

"The Lord of Marshrock should not apologize for his decisions," said Melchor.

Ismael's eyes went to the floor. "Forgive my weakness, then."

A tinge of irritation crossed Melchor's face, but he held his tongue this time.

"I know that my selfishness is to blame for our circumstances."

'Our selfishness,' the man's reaper said. This one was named Rholtam, and he had been with House Blackburn longer than anyone else. 'The responsibility is ours to share, my friend.'

Ismael did not respond. He and his wife Nere had both retained the youth of their mid-thirties, but it had grown difficult to tell. He didn't look old so much as just tired.

It pained Melchor to see him like this, but it had been many years since he'd seen much else in him. They were distant cousins by blood, but Melchor had come to feel like his older brother.

Rholtam gave a soundless ruffling of his feathers and looked at Melchor. 'Will Orric be ready for battle by tomorrow morning?'

"Yes. Is that when we expect our visitors to arrive?"

'Indeed. We have enough aerial defenses along the way. Our opponents will have to do some night marching up through the marshes if they wish to avoid needless losses. In the meantime, we have already started evacuating the town.'

"Where are you sending the refugees?"

'To Intar. We've organized shelters for those who need them. I'm sure they'll feel much safer across the border.'

Melchor nodded.

Ismael still hadn't reestablished eye contact with him.

"What of Ibai?" asked Melchor.

'He is under guard,' said Rholtam. 'He made quite a fuss.'

"I don't doubt it."

"838

The anterior door opened, and through it came Nere Blackburn. The manic and haggard look on her face was not so different from that of her husband. She scurried straight toward Melchor and wrapped her skinny arms around him. "I am so glad you are safe," she said into his chest. "I told Rholtam that we should not have sent you alone."

Melchor returned the embrace, though his wasn't quite the vice grip that hers was. He gave an acknowledging look to her reaper, who was hovering up behind her.

"I'm sorry I couldn't greet you as soon as you returned," she said. "Ibai wouldn't--he... he was..."

"Being difficult?" said Melchor. And when the woman only nodded in response, Melchor exhaled a tired laugh and kissed the top of her head. "It's alright. I'm fine." As much as Ismael was a brother to him, Nere was a sister. Between the two of them, Melchor wasn't sure whom he worried more about these days.

Nere released her hold on him and went to go sit next to her husband. Her strained eyes moved to Ismael's face, and she shakily found his hand with her own.

Melchor saw Ismael squeeze her hand, but it was still not enough to stir the man back to sociability.

Rholtam picked up the slack for him. 'Have you had a chance to assess the castle's defenses?'

"Not yet," said Melchor. "It is next on my to-do list."

'Good. If possible, I would like Orric to look them over as well. I'm sure he can--'

"I do not see an end to this," said Ismael.

Everyone looked at him.

Ismael raised his head, gradually moving his gaze from each observer to the next. "I thought it could work. I thought we could keep our family together, but now... what hope is there? Truly? What hope? Tomorrow, they will come, and everything will unravel. Everything I've... everything... everything..." He rubbed his face with his free hand.

'You're wrong,' said Rholtam. 'There is hope still. But there can be no peace for us while that man still lives.'

No one needed him to specify which man he was talking about.

Rholtam wasn't done. 'We all know this, yes? Even if we weather this siege and somehow reconcile with the others, it will not prevent future conflicts arising in this same manner. The problem will remain.'

"839

Nere was looking even more frantic than usual now. "What are you saying?"

Rholtam didn't answer. No one really needed him to. It was a discussion they'd had before.

"I fear Rholtam is right," said Ismael. "He must die."

"No!" said Nere. "We can't! And even if we could--!"

"I know what you would say," said Ismael, "but we have been down that road this entire time. Going along with him. And here is where we find ourselves. Again, we teeter on the verge of both treason and ruin because of his vile game."

Nere still did not seem to agree, but if she had further arguments, she was not able to put them into words.

Ismael looked to Melchor again. "You are the only one who can do it. Any resources you require, you need only ask."

Melchor inhaled deeply and folded his arms. "To be honest, I'm not certain I could manage it. Even under ideal circumstances, it would be a struggle."

"It does not matter how you accomplish it, only that you do." Ismael sat upright and seemed to find more strength in his voice as he spoke.

"You must do it. Whatever happens, I want you to promise me that you will. Even if you are the only one of us who survives the coming battle, I want you to hunt him down and end his life. Even if all it will achieve is vengeance. That will be enough. Swear to me, Melchor. I need your word."

Melchor looked at his cousin evenly. He hadn't seen the man look so sure of himself in ages. The bags under the man's eyes were still there, but that old clarity seemed to shine through regardless. Melchor's chest swelled with a sudden purchase of honor, of pride in the man he now saw before him. "As the Lord of Marshrock commands," said Melchor. "I swear, here and now before you all, that I will kill Parson Miles even if I must use my dying breath to do so."

--++--++--

These confines were exasperating. And just plain unfair, really. He was a grown man, after all. More than grown. Hell, at this point, he and his parents looked the same age.

Ibai Blackburn groaned aloud. He was already so bored. There wasn't even anything good on television. News, news, and more news. What few cartoons he could find, he'd already seen. His favorite shows didn't air new episodes until the weekend, and for all he knew, the castle might be in ruins by then."

"840

--BELATED donation bonus (day 6/7, page 1/3)--

He didn't understand why his parents wouldn't just let him fight. They were wonderful and loving people, but they could be so frustrating sometimes. A big battle was on its way to their doorstep, and yet all of a sudden, he wasn't allowed to participate? The absurdity of it boggled the mind.

He jumped up from his couch and paced across the room. There weren't even any windows to look through, and the walls were all soul-strengthened in order to make sure he stayed put, as well as to conceal his presence from any curious reapers. Sure, it was spacious, having its own den and kitchen and bathroom; and sure, it was filled with all sorts of toys and other things that were obviously meant to keep him distracted, but he just wasn't in the mood for--

Hold on. Was that a merry-go-round tucked away in the corner? It was a bit small, but he hadn't been on one of those since he was a kid. Oh, man, he'd have to give his mother a big hug later. That magnificent woman thought of everything.

After a while of unadulterated joy, a ringing noise arrived. Next to the sealed door, Ismael's face appeared on the monitor embedded in the wall. <"Ibai?">

He bounded off his mechanical wonder and rushed over. "Hello, Papa! Can I come out yet?"

<"I'm afraid not, mijoro. I just wanted to check in on you. You will need to stay in there for a while yet.">

"Agh!"

<"I know. But it is for your own safety.">

"Yes, yes, same old drill. But I want to fight!"

<"I know you do.">

He groaned again and walked away from the monitor, only to immediately walk back to it. "Okay, fine, no fighting. But still, Papa, there truly is no need to keep me locked up in here. You could send me abroad! Away from all the danger! I would adore a vacation! And I would be perfectly safe!"

<"You know why I can't do that.">

"I won't hurt anyone. I promise. And I won't cause trouble or attract too much attention, either. I know how important it is to remain hidden."

<"I wish I could believe you.">

"But you can! Papa, please! I understand! Believe me! Don't leave me in here!"

And he saw his father hesitate. A flicker of uncertainty achieved at last. But that was all it was.

<"I am sorry. I will let you out soon."> And the monitor went dark.

He was alone again. He clicked his lips apart and gave a loud sigh. And then, faintly, he smiled to himself. "Almost convinced you that time, Papa."

His hand brushed his chin and felt the fresh stubble there. Bah. Facial hair was such a bother. He moved to the bathroom and looked into the mirror. He extended two fingers, and from them, a brown shadow appeared. It formed a small blade, and he began shaving."

"841 -- XCVI.

Chapter Ninety-Six: 'Thy strong hearts, be welcomed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had never seen so many servants and reapers. By Garovel's count, there were about fifty pairings accompanying them to Luzo. The majority of them belonged to House Sebolt, apparently. The Sebolts distinguished themselves with bright blue bandanas worn over the left shoulder. The fabric had a distinctive white lightning bolt woven into it. The Delagunas, meanwhile, boasted white bandanas with dark blue squiggles. Hector wasn't too sure what those were supposed to look like.

Come to think of it, there must have been many more at the encampment in Rheinhal, but they'd been so spread out that he never got the chance to see them all together.

He was glad that they weren't flying this time, even if it was slower. Airplanes were neat and all, but he'd gotten his fill of them in the last couple days. Instead, the departing Rainlords were taking a huge convoy of automobiles all the way to Luzo. He rode in a limousine with the Najirs. Jada took the opportunity to pop her head up through the sunroof for a view of it all, and Hector had to join her.

It was a remarkable sight, seeing so many vehicles traveling together down one long road across the countryside. A lot of the reapers were flying up high around them, scouting no doubt, and there were a handful of servants who could fly as well. Hector spotted Dimas Sebolt among them, soaring through the sky with his gray raincoat billowing around him like a cape. At first, that raincoat seemed a bit superfluous, but Hector could see the dark clouds that they were all driving toward on the horizon. It wasn't long before the rain began to fall, and he and Jada had to tuck their heads back inside the limousine.

He knew there would be rain, of course, but as the convoy drew onward, he still couldn't help marveling at it. It just didn't end. In fact, it only continued to grow heavier. Rolling green hills gave way to huge rivers and lakes. Occasionally, there would be almost no visible land, and it would briefly feel like the bridge they were on was taking them across an ocean.

And those were the most spectacular things, he felt. The bridges. He'd never seen so many in so short a time. In some parts, they were more common than normal roads. And some of them were fantastically elaborate in design."

"841 -- XCVI.

Chapter Ninety-Six: 'Thy strong hearts, be welcomed...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector had never seen so many servants and reapers. By Garovel's count, there were about fifty pairings accompanying them to Luzo. The majority of them belonged to House Sebolt, apparently. The Sebolts distinguished themselves with bright blue bandanas worn over the left shoulder. The fabric had a distinctive white lightning bolt woven into it. The Delagunas, meanwhile, boasted white bandanas with dark blue squiggles. Hector wasn't too sure what those were supposed to look like.

Come to think of it, there must have been many more at the encampment in Rheinhal, but they'd been so spread out that he never got the chance to see them all together.

He was glad that they weren't flying this time, even if it was slower. Airplanes were neat and all, but he'd gotten his fill of them in the last couple days. Instead, the departing Rainlords were taking a huge convoy of automobiles all the way to Luzo. He rode in a limousine with the Najirs. Jada took the opportunity to pop her head up through the sunroof for a view of it all, and Hector had to join her.

It was a remarkable sight, seeing so many vehicles traveling together down one long road across the countryside. A lot of the reapers were flying up high around them, scouting no doubt, and there were a handful of servants who could fly as well. Hector spotted Dimas Sebolt among them, soaring through the sky with his gray raincoat billowing around him like a cape. At first, that raincoat seemed a bit superfluous, but Hector could see the dark clouds that they were all driving toward on the horizon. It wasn't long before the rain began to fall, and he and Jada had to tuck their heads back inside the limousine.

He knew there would be rain, of course, but as the convoy drew onward, he still couldn't help marveling at it. It just didn't end. In fact, it only continued to grow heavier. Rolling green hills gave way to huge rivers and lakes. Occasionally, there would be almost no visible land, and it would briefly feel like the bridge they were on was taking them across an ocean.

And those were the most spectacular things, he felt. The bridges. He'd never seen so many in so short a time. In some parts, they were more common than normal roads. And some of them were fantastically elaborate in design."

"842

A few of the bridges that they used had small settlements attached to them--quaint houses clustered around pit stops or refueling stations, even the occasional odd-looking tree. And in the areas where there was currently no flooding, Hector could often see wharfs or boathouses in the muddy grass, tied to the bridges via long chains and cables.

Bridge maintenance must have been a pretty popular and steady job around here, he figured.

Soon, night arrived. Knowing that they wouldn't be near Luzo until almost morning, the Najirs decided to rest up while they could. Hector was of a mind to do the same, but he had a bit of trouble falling asleep in spite of how exhausted he felt.

He had ample company in Garovel and Qorvass, though. Jada and Imas' reapers were off elsewhere, perhaps scouting or talking to people in other cars, and Axiolis had decided to remain in Rheinhal, as that was where his servant was.

'Do you mind telling us what Asad's ability is?' asked Garovel. 'It seems we'll be fighting together after all. Hector's is iron materialization, in case Sazandara didn't tell you.'

‘Ah. Asad’s is also materialization. In fact, he is probably the most powerful materializer among the Sandlords.’

Hector eyed the tattooed man’s sleeping face. He’d figured Asad was crazy strong, but still.

‘I’m glad he’s on our side, then,’ said Garovel. ‘What is his element?’

‘Not an element,’ said Qorvass. ‘A compound. Silicon and oxygen together.’

‘Oh! Quite the rare servant you have.’

‘Heh. Indeed.’

‘If I’m not mistaken, that’s an inherited power, isn’t it? Unique to the Sandlords?’

‘It is. And you might say that it’s also why we’re even here in the first place.’

‘How so?’

‘Zeff Elroy inherited the unique compound of the Rainlords. Hydrogen and oxygen together. I highly doubt Asad and Zeff would have become friends if either of them had different powers. When they were younger, they were both treated rather specially, which is an experience not many people can relate to.’

“W-what does that mean?” Hector asked. “Treated specially?”

‘They were the “darlings” of their respective peoples,’ said Qorvass. ‘You see, their abilities aren’t just strong. They have immense cultural importance. They are seen as confirmations of their bloodlines.’

‘A couple thousand years ago, their powers would have granted them the right to rule over all their brethren,’ said Garovel, ‘and the public would have viewed them as divine beings.’”

"843

‘Yes,’ said Qorvass. ‘It’s no longer so extreme as that, but an underlying reverence for their abilities is still very much alive. Even now that Asad and Zeff are older, they often have unfair expectations placed upon them.'

"Unfair?" said Hector.

'To simultaneously lead their people and yet also abide by the wishes of their elders,' said Qorvass. 'But that is just one example. Other times, people simply expect them to be more powerful or influential than they are. In some ways, Asad's power is more of a burden than an advantage. Not that I'm complaining.'

Hector began to wonder what abilities their other new comrades might possess, but he couldn't find an opening in the conversation to ask Qorvass about them. Garovel probably had it under control, though. Both of the reapers seemed interested in exchanging information, so Hector figured it was only a matter of time before the subject came up. However, after a while, Garovel addressed Hector privately.

'Hey, why aren't you asleep yet?'

'Uh...'

Garovel tapped him on the head. 'Here.'

And he was out. He plunged into a warm darkness, devoid of thought and worry. When he awoke, his body briefly argued with him before Garovel pulled that away, too.

They'd already arrived in Luzo, he discovered. Dark clouds filled the sky, but according to Garovel, it was past dawn. Apparently, a select group of Rainlords had gone ahead and forged a safe path to the city for the rest of them. That must have been a dangerous job. He wondered who'd done it.

Luzo's covered walkways offered protection from the pouring rain, though not from the booming crash of thunder in the sky. The lightning was so close that the resultant sonic boom left windows rattling in its wake. For a second, Hector thought he was about to encounter Karkash again, but that wasn't the case. The thunderstorm was natural. This region of Sair was known to experience them rather frequently, Garovel explained.

Hector followed the Najirs to another meeting, this time in a tall office building overlooking a river. It seemed there were no civilians around to object to the property seizure.

The Rainlords were waiting for them inside. Hector had already met the seven servants here back at Rheinhal, though only briefly. The Lords Abel, Xuan, Dimas, and Lady Amaya all belonged to House Sebolt, while House Delaguna was represented by Lord Salvador, Lord Alejo, and Lady Elba.

That was about all Hector could remember. He would definitely need to rely on Garovel in order to tell all their reapers apart."

"844

The Lord Abel Sebolt looked over the gathering of servants around his empty table. "Is everyone here, then? Good, let's begin." He gestured with one hand, opening his palm, and suddenly the table was no longer empty. A metal rock stood upon it, and it took Hector a moment to realize that it must have been a miniature replica of Marshrock. Abel added a few ant-sized people next to it for scale.

Even as he continued listening to Abel speak, he had to admire the precision of the replica. It had tiny windows and balconies and even courtyards and motionless flags. He had no clue how accurate of a representation it actually was, but as a fellow materialization user, he was duly impressed.

"Given the circumstances that brought about this conflict, we must assume that the enemy is fully prepared to receive us," said Lord Abel. "With our current strength considered, a direct assault on Marshrock has an unknowable outcome, but it would most likely result in the greatest number of casualties for both sides. Therefore, we will be taking a slower approach.

"Our first objective is to construct a soul net. We will organize into three teams headed by myself, Salvador, and Asad. Xuan will remain in a neutral position so that he may rush to the aid of any team that becomes targeted by Melchor. In the meantime, Dimas, I want you to harass the enemy aboveground in order to keep them occupied."

"Yes, Father."

"Do not commit to a prolonged attack or attempt to infiltrate the castle," said Abel. "If you see an opening in their defenses, the opponent is most likely trying to lure you into a trap. Make that clear to anyone you choose to take with you."

"Understood," said Dimas.

"Radio coms will be distributed to everyone for observational support. You will also receive physical maps and itineraries in case the enemy employs signal jammers. As for the net, I expect we will be able to complete construction within two-to-three days. Afterwards, we will begin putting true pressure on the castle and seek to infiltrate. Questions?"

Qorvass spoke up. 'Do you have a list of all known enemy combatants with their corresponding abilities and estimated threat level?'

"My wife will be handling that topic next," said Abel. "Are there any questions concerning our immediate strategy?" He waited, but there were none. He took a step back from the table and motioned to Amaya."

"845

The Lady Sebolt placed a briefcase on the table. "The Blackburns have kept to themselves in recent years, so it is possible that they have combatants we do not know about. However, it is a fairly safe assumption that our most powerful opponent will be Melchor, or Darktide, as he is sometimes called. I'm sure you have all heard of him, but here are pictures for anyone who does not know what he looks like." She pulled out a stack of photographs and handed them around. "If nothing else, please ensure that all of your subordinates know this man's face. His power is mercury transfiguration, but even if you believe that you have an elemental advantage over him, DO NOT attempt to engage him unless Xuan is with you."

Garovel chose to interject. 'Pardon my ignorance, but how old is this Melchor?'

'It's been 104 years since he was resurrected,' said Xuan's reaper. This one's name was Duvoss, as Hector recalled.

'Holy fuck,' said Garovel privately, coinciding with Hector's bulging eyes. Then publicly, the reaper asked, 'What about you, Xuan? If you don't mind saying, that is.'

Xuan made as if to answer, but then paused and deferred to his reaper.

Duvoss shook his skeletal head. 'Xuan is 106.'

Xuan frowned and scratched his cheek. "Damn. Are you sure about that?"

'Quite.'

"Shit, I'm old." He only had a few age lines on his face that Hector could see.

Garovel had still another question for him. 'In a straight fight, are you confident you could defeat him?'

"Not at all. It could go either way."

Lord Abel exhaled audibly. "Xuan, please don't be quite so candid with our troops."

"Yeah, yeah. Morale and all that jazz. I know my role."

Abel's flat stare did not imply an abundance of faith in the man.

Lady Amaya picked up where she had left off. "In addition to Darktide, the Blackburns have several other combatants of which everyone should be aware. Ismael and Nere are of course quite powerful, as they are the heads of House Blackburn, but according to our information, they have no children of their own." She started handing out folders with personal profiles. "Instead, House Blackburn's impressive numbers are attributed to its many branches. On the battlefield, other Blackburns to watch out for include Fidel, Silvia, Pilar, Tomas, Horatio, and Sabas. Any of them could rip through our forces if we fail to keep them in check.""

"846

Asad handed one of the folders off to Hector, who began sifting through it. There were many more names than the ones that Lady Amaya had just listed. Most had mug shots to go along with them, and about half had full bios, including breakdowns of their abilities as well as what they were known to be capable of with said abilities.

Hector stared at the pages like they were goddamn treasure maps. He wasn't accustomed to knowing this much about the enemy prior to battle, but he certainly welcomed the change. He held a page up for himself and another for Garovel as he pored through the intel. He wished he'd been allowed to look at these files yesterday.

'Do you have pictures of the Elroy children?' asked Garovel.

"Yes, of course." Amaya retrieved a much smaller stack of photos from her briefcase and handed them off to Hector. "Bear in mind, these were all taken about a year ago. Also, I will need them back before you leave."

Hector understood. The Elroys seemed to be in rather high demand around here. No doubt, Lady Amaya didn't want their images spread around. And indeed, Hector could see why. They all seemed to share the same black hair and harsh bone structure, not to mention the same hard gaze. He wondered if Rainlords considered it improper to smile when having their pictures taken.

Amaya pointed at three of the five faces. "These are the ones we're looking for. However, this girl here--" She picked out the apparent middle child. "--Emiliana Elroy, she is Chergoa's servant, and she now has four small horns on her face and claws on her left hand. She may be wearing a black mask if you see her."

'Ah,' said Garovel. 'Mutation user?'

"Yes."

Hector lingered on Emiliana's picture. The servant of Garovel's sister. How strange. It was as if he were looking at a long lost relative or something. He tilted his head and reevaluated the other four faces.

All through his childhood, his only family had been his mom and dad. No aunts or uncles or grandparents. Maybe this was what it felt like to have cousins. Sort of. Still kinda weird, seeing as they were all white people.

In any case, he tried to burn their faces into his mind. He knew Garovel would remember for him, but this struck him as important enough to warrant the extra effort."

"847 -- XCVII.

The meeting didn't last much longer after that. Hector returned the Elroys' pictures but was able to hold onto the enemy intel. Lord Dimas was the first out the door, immediately followed by his mother.

Qorvass had another question for Abel. 'Are you sure it was wise to task your own son with harassing the enemy? It's probably the most dangerous job you could have given him, no?'

Lord Abel nodded. "Dimas may be my son, but he is already stronger than I am. I have complete confidence in him."

Chapter Ninety-Seven: 'The Siege of Marshrock...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

At this distance, Marshrock was a hulking lump on the dark horizon. Dimas could hardly make it out, excepting only when lightning flashed and lit up the entirety of Luzo.

He adjusted the hood of his long raincoat, ensuring it was snug enough to hold his front-brimmed helmet in place and keep the rain out of his eyes. He knew that he'd also have to compensate for the added weight of his heavy combat boots and aramid fiber vest. Truthfully, he would've preferred to just wear his usual suit and tie, but his mother wouldn't allow it.

Technically, he was wearing clothes that she had personally prepared for him. He supposed that was one way to feel young again.

'Are you sure you don't want to take anyone with you?' asked Iziol.

'Yes,' said Dimas. There were a variety of abilities that could achieve flight, but some had an easier time of it than others, and even fewer had his level of control. Instead, he had already ordered Lorenzo Delaguna and cousin Carlos to begin their assault after he completed the first objective.

His boots lifted gently off the rooftop, and Iziol grabbed onto his back. He strengthened his entire body with his soul, flexed his folded arms, breathed deep and fully exhaled, and then rocketed off into the sky.

Marshrock wasn't that far, so there was no need to break the sound barrier. His view of the enormous fortress soon became much clearer. It really was a giant boulder with a few towers poking out from the top.

For the moment, he was not concerned with the castle itself. Instead, he turned upward and climbed toward the clouds. Lightning flashed again, only this time, it hit him.

This was expected. He was prepared for the impact with an invisible field of concentrated gravity. And yet, it still wasn't enough to trivialize the lightning. The sheer force of it knocked him off course, making him stagger in the air as electricity surged all through his body. After a moment, however, he regained his composure and kept climbing."
"847 -- XCVII.

--BELATED donation bonus (day 6/7, page 2/3)--

The meeting didn't last much longer after that. Hector returned the Elroys' pictures but was able to hold onto the enemy intel. Lord Dimas was the first out the door, immediately followed by his mother.

Qorvass had another question for Abel. 'Are you sure it was wise to task your own son with harassing the enemy? It's probably the most dangerous job you could have given him, no?'

Lord Abel nodded. "Dimas may be my son, but he is already stronger than I am. I have complete confidence in him."

Chapter Ninety-Seven: 'The Siege of Marshrock...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

At this distance, Marshrock was a hulking lump on the dark horizon. Dimas could hardly make it out, excepting only when lightning flashed and lit up the entirety of Luzo.

He adjusted the hood of his long raincoat, ensuring it was snug enough to hold his front-brimmed helmet in place and keep the rain out of his eyes. He knew that he'd also have to compensate for the added weight of his heavy combat boots and aramid fiber vest. Truthfully, he would've preferred to just wear his usual suit and tie, but his mother wouldn't allow it.

Technically, he was wearing clothes that she had personally prepared for him. He supposed that was one way to feel young again.

‘Are you sure you don’t want to take anyone with you?’ asked Iziol.

‘Yes,’ said Dimas. There were a variety of abilities that could achieve flight, but some had an easier time of it than others, and even fewer had his level of control. Instead, he had already ordered Lorenzo Delaguna and cousin Carlos to begin their assault after he completed the first objective.

His boots lifted gently off the rooftop, and Iziol grabbed onto his back. He strengthened his entire body with his soul, flexed his folded arms, breathed deep and fully exhaled, and then rocketed off into the sky.

Marshrock wasn’t that far, so there was no need to break the sound barrier. His view of the enormous fortress soon became much clearer. It really was a giant boulder with a few towers poking out from the top.

For the moment, he was not concerned with the castle itself. Instead, he turned upward and climbed toward the clouds. Lightning flashed again, only this time, it hit him.

This was expected. He was prepared for the impact with an invisible field of concentrated gravity. And yet, it still wasn’t enough to trivialize the lightning. The sheer force of it knocked him off course, making him stagger in the air as electricity surged all through his body. After a moment, however, he regained his composure and kept climbing."

"848

Dimas reached the clouds and stopped. He saw more electricity crackling within that dark fog, brewing up another bolt.

This was the first objective. His troops didn’t need the added distraction of a lightning storm, and the underground units would no doubt appreciate a break from the rain while they worked.

He gathered his power into his hand and punched a hole straight up through the clouds. Then his gravity bomb went off. Space bubbled and distorted as gravitic force gathered and then suddenly reversed outward, sending a visible shock wave horizontally through the sky and dispersing all clouds for at least a kilometer in each direction.

Sunlight poured through the opening, lighting up the city below and making its many domed buildings glisten. He could see the rain still falling like a curtain all around the hole he'd made.

The spectacle signaled the beginning of the assault for his comrades.

He released the orb of gravity around himself and plummeted into freefall, straight back down toward Marshrock's looming form. When he drew near enough, he pulled up and soared around the castle's upper reaches for a clearer view of its exterior.

'Can you sense the Elroy children?' said Dimas.

'No,' said Iziol. 'Melchor empowered the rock with his soul. I can't tell where anyone inside it is.'

'What if I make a hole?'

'It'd have to be a pretty big hole. Bigger than you'd be able to make, most likely. There's a reason Marshrock isn't just a pile of rubble after all these years.'

A part of Dimas wondered about that, but another part knew that this was not the time to be putting his pride to the test. 'Not a big hole, then. Many small ones.'

'That might work. You are going to piss off a lot of people, though.'

'That is the job, is it not?'

'So it is. But do be careful.'

He swooped down lower, just above a suspended extension on the western side. He mustered a gravitational bubble around his right hand. It pulsated, and he knew it was ready. He drew up close to the protruding tower and slammed his fist through it with force enough to make the entire extension crumble.

He'd been prepared to catch any hapless personnel that had been inside and take them hostage, but none had been there. Instead, he saw that the corridor that led into the rock had already been sealed off.

'I know I said small, but you'll have to do better than that,' said Iziol.

Dimas hovered there a moment. '...Very well, then.'

Dimas soared up high again. He could already see the clouds beginning to crowd back in on the hole he'd made. It would only be about half an hour until he needed to make it again, he knew.

He started plummeting back down toward the castle another time, gathering gravity around both hands and then combining them into one.

'Uh, Dimas, that might be a little too much...'

Dimas propelled himself even faster than freefall, veered horizontally along the top of the rock, and then barreled into it with both hands, releasing the gravitic force upon impact.

He tore through the rock like cardboard, gouging out a small valley of crumbling stone. He swooped back up into the sky to inspect his work.

Iziol sighed. 'I really need to teach you how to find the happy medium in things.'

Dimas moved closer to the craggy scar. Impressive as it was, it still hadn't made that much of a dent in Marshrock. The upper rock was so thick that the attack hadn't even broken through to a chamber or hallway.

'I sense someone close,' said Iziol. 'Eastern tower. Someone just exited.'

He turned and saw the man on the highest balcony there. Dimas recognized the flat face and pug nose from the picture he'd seen earlier. Horatio Blackburn.

The man shouted up at Dimas, exuberant enough to easily be heard over the bracing wind, "Could I ask you to kindly stop attacking my home?!"

Dimas let Iziol handle the response.

'We would love to do that for you! Just as soon as you release your hostages!'

Horatio gave a lame shrug. "I'm afraid that's not my call!" The man's friendly smile was entirely out of place, given the circumstances, and it reminded Dimas of a certain loud-mouthed Redwater. A loud-mouthed Redwater who had better still be alive. "Even so, I would really like to avoid fighting you!" said Horatio. "So I'm not going to attack first! I'm just going to stand here and hope that you go in peace, amergo!"

And they waited--Dimas hovering above and looking down, while Horatio only stood there and steadily met his gaze with a wide grin.

'Oi,' said Iziol privately. 'I wasn't prepared for politeness.' A beat passed. 'In fact, this is worse than being attacked. This is diabolical.'

'...Are you ordering me to stand down?'

'Agh. No.'

'...So I should attack him, then?'

'No!'

'Iziol...'

"850

'Just wait,' said Iziol. 'I'm thinking.'

Dimas waited.

'Try insulting him.'

'...What?'

'See if you can goad him into attacking us first.'

Dimas nearly gave a mental sigh.

'Call him a... a turkey. Maybe that'll get a rise out of him.'

'...No, Iziol.' The sad part was, he knew the reaper wasn't joking.

'Dimas, come on, help me out here. I hate having to be the bad guy. You can even use a crude word, if you like. A pissing turkey, maybe. Oh, or would that be too harsh? I don't want to hurt his feelings.'

'...I'm attacking him now.'

'Dimas!'

'I'll remember to feel bad about it later.' And without any warning to Horatio, he shoved one hand forward and launched a gravity wave at the man.

However, Horatio was prepared. With an extended hand of his own, a sudden explosion appeared in the wave's path. It was large enough to neutralize Dimas' attack, though a cloud of dust particles washed back over Horatio's tower before the man dematerialized his work.

Dimas did not let up. He pressed forward with both hands this time and forced Horatio to either leap off the balcony or be shredded along with it. Horatio retaliated with targeted dust explosions as he dropped down to the uneven rock below.

'Dimas, how can you be so heartless?! You're a monster!'

'Shut up, Izio!'

Horatio's reaper appeared from the gaping hole in the tower and latched onto the man's back. To Dimas' eyes, reapers were small wyverns--winged and dragon-headed, but with only two legs and a double-barbed fishtail.

Dimas never stopped moving and fired off a series of gravity bullets that Horatio couldn't see until he'd already been riddled with bloody holes. Another moment may have been enough to finish him off right then and there, but an explosion caught Dimas square in the chest and sent him spiraling off course with an impressive hole in his vest. His raincoat flapped wildly as he brought himself to a hard stop in mid-air. He could feel a rib out of place, but the vest had more or less done its job. Pity it could only take one hit, though.

'That's what you get for attacking first.'

'Izio, please--'

'I sense more approaching. I believe it is time for us to go harass some other part of the castle.'

That information, Dimas could appreciate."

"851

He fled. It would have been nice to capture Horatio, especially considering their files didn't have much information on him, but Dimas would probably need to use pan-moc in order to do so, and it was much too early into the siege to be going all out. If he didn't conserve his strength, he and Iziol would end up too exhausted to fight when they were truly needed. 'Were you able to analyze Horatio's ability?'

'No,' said Iziol, apparently focused on their mission again. 'There was too little to go on. I would need to see what else he can do with it.'

From his vantage point above, Dimas could see more Blackburns pouring out of Marshrock from different places. No doubt, Carlos and Lorenzo would be in need of his assistance very soon. He dove back down to go look for them.

--++--++--

The ground above them trembled, and trails of twinkling dust shook loose from the freshly materialized ceiling.

'Sounds like the battle has started,' said Garovel privately.

Their underground party numbered eight strong. Him and the three Najirs, along with four Rainlords--two destruction users for the tunneling and two integration users for the construction of the net.

Hector had carefully slung his shield over his back, positioned low so that it couldn't accidentally touch his bare neck and cause the pain that Sazandara had warned him about. It felt a little awkward there, but as long as he didn't need to sit down, he figured he'd be fine.

All things considered, Hector wasn't sure how much use he would be here. If they got attacked, the onus of protecting them would largely fall upon Lord Asad. But then, he supposed that was nothing new to him. It seemed like he was always relying on better fighters to do the real work. Hector just hoped he'd be able to find some small way of helping.

Asad also decided to handle the maintenance of the tunnel. Mushy didn't even begin to describe the ground here, and Hector could see veins of muddy water through the transparent ceiling and walls--which Asad made from crystallized quartz, according to Garovel's assessment.

They'd only just begun, but so far, progress seemed smooth. Flashlight in hand, Hector looked at his copy of the map, which said that their first checkpoint was located fifty meters from where they'd started. The net itself would form a rough circle beneath a section of the city, capturing not just Marshrock but also a few of the neighborhoods around it. One of the other tunneling parties would have to go through a river, Hector noticed. He didn't envy that group."

"852

When they reached the first objective, Hector observed the integration users at work. Together, they'd brought along immense lengths of uninsulated cables and a duffel bag full of compact electrical devices. They'd been laying the cables down as the tunnel progressed, but they only now stopped to plant one of the devices into the ground. Then they attached cables to the device and used their abilities to somehow craft a barricade around the device.

Hector had a number of fresh questions for Garovel and decided to start with the broadest one. 'So, uh... what are they doing, exactly?'

'Making limiters for the soul net,' said Garovel.

'Limiters?'

'Yeah. Ever wonder what happens when you try to empower an energy field with your soul?'

'Er. I'm not even sure what that means.'

'Then this won't be an easy explanation.'

'Hmm. I'm sure you can do it.'

'Ha. Well, I suppose I'll start at the beginning. Quite a long time ago, something like a soul net would have been considered impossible. We only knew that servants could empower physical mass with their soul, and we thought that things like light and electricity didn't have mass, but as was later discovered, they do--it's just such a small mass that there isn't enough to attach a soul to. If you tried, the soul power that you expended would just bleed out into the air and attempt to fill the entire body of gas that makes up the planet's atmosphere. Which is impossible to do, by the way. It's simply too big for even the most powerful servant's soul to fill. It'd be equivalent to spitting into an ocean.'

'Okay, I'm with you so far...'

‘Anyhow, it was later discovered that soul power CAN occupy an energy field, as long as that field is strong enough within a contained area. Relativistic mass plays a role here, but that’s probably more complicated than is worth going into right now. Simply put, a soul net is an energy field that has been empowered with someone’s soul.’

‘Uh, alright...’

‘In this case, the Rainlords look like they’re going to use a magnetic field. Those devices they’re carrying are most likely protective relays, which will serve to prevent the net from overloading--and possibly also amplify the electric current that will run along these cables. Someone will empower the current with their soul, and since the magnetic field is a product of that current, it will also be empowered.’”

"853

‘Huh. I think I understand... mostly.’ Hector scratched his neck. The integration users had completed their work, and the tunneling party was making headway again.

‘There are various ways to go about making a net,’ said Garovel. ‘Generally, you want your strongest combatant to empower the net so as to make it as durable as possible. Opponents will often try to break nets with EMPs and the like.’

‘Can’t the enemy just break these relays or whatever?’

‘They sure can. That’s where the integration users come in. They conceal their work so that the opponent won’t have such an easy time locating the net’s weak points.’

‘Er... I’m still kinda unclear about what the integration type actually is,’ said Hector. ‘I know that it fuses materials together, but, uh... how?’

‘Are you sure this is the time and place to be asking about all these different things? I can’t help but feel you’d retain the information better when we aren’t in mortal peril.’

‘Maybe, but... uh... I mean, as long as we’re not being attacked right this second, it seems like as good a time as any to me.’

Garovel gave a small shrug. ‘Fair enough, I suppose. Integration involves elements like materialization and transfiguration do, but it differs in that a single integration user can eventually learn to work with any number of different elements. An integrator starts off with only two elements already in their repertoire, and they have to manually acquire more from there.'

'How do they do that?'

'By using a hyper-state. Which is a whole different conversation, really, but the short of it is that integration and mutation users have a hyper-state called "pan-wzrost" which lets them learn to use new materials.'

'Hyper-states again... eesh. How many are there, anyway?'

'Four. Pan-rozum, -forma, -moc, and -wzrost. Rozum is the most difficult to use; wzrost is the easiest; forma and moc are about the same.'

'...I guess I need to know what they all do, huh?'

'Probably.'

'Ugh...'

Garovel chortled. 'What happened to that eagerness to learn you had earlier?'

'This is different. This shit is all, like... I mean, I'm nowhere close to using any of it, right? So... it's just...'

'Materialization can only use pan-forma and pan-rozum. But yes, they're both quite impossible for us, currently. I can save the explanation for later. Though, I do get the feeling we'll be seeing them in action fairly soon. I'd bet anything that Asad can at least use pan-forma.'

"854

Hector could hear more rumbling from aboveground. Part of him wondered if he wouldn't have been more useful up there with Lord Dimas.

'The hyper-states aren't so difficult to remember, though. Forma goes with the mass abilities; moc goes with the wave abilities; and wzrost goes with the mixture abilities. Oh, and rozum goes with them all.'

'Uh-huh...' And then Hector paused, squinting. 'Hey, wait a minute.'

'What?'

'Mutation. You know how they develop their powers now. Back when I first asked you about mutation, you said you didn't know any of the details.'

'Your memory must be playing tricks on you.'

'No, I definitely remember.'

'Nah. That never happened. Trust me. I'm Garovel. The smart one, in other words.'

'...You had one of the other reapers explain it to you while I was unconscious, didn't you? Who was it? Voreese? Mehlsanz?'

'I've always known, Hector. In fact, I'm actually omniscient. I just didn't tell you before because you obviously weren't ready for the incredible truth. But I'm glad I can finally reveal my secret to you now. Concealing my all-knowing super-coolness can be such a burden.'

'Hmm. Wait, was it last night? Is that why you put me to sleep so suddenly when you were talking to Qorvass?'

'I'm sure I don't know what you're talking about.'

Hector shook his head and smirked. 'Then you obviously don't know everything, do you?'

'It's just that one thing. Everything else, I totally know. Go on. Ask me anything.'

Hector took a second to deliberate. 'How many raindrops are above Sair at this very moment?'

'Sixty-one billion, three hundred and forty-nine million, two hundred and fifty-two thousand, one hundred and thirty-three,' said Garovel. 'Now, how do you intend to check if I'm wrong, exactly?'

'...Shit.'

'See? That proves it. I really am omniscient.'

‘I’m sorry I doubted you.’

That seemed to catch Garovel off guard, making the reaper laugh publicly. It drew a few strange looks, but no one said anything. Hector did notice, however, that Asad’s daughter was watching them now. Those golden eyes were easy to spot even in this relative darkness.

Despite being in their presence non-stop for the last thirty straight hours or so, Hector hadn’t been able to figure the Najirs out at all. Jada seemed slightly more outgoing than her aunt, but that wasn’t saying much. Both of their reapers seemed equally content to simply follow Qorvass in silence."

"855

Hector wondered what they thought of him. Maybe they thought they’d be better off without him. And maybe they’d be right. These people obviously knew what they were doing. Of course they wouldn’t need him.

No. He couldn’t fall into that old thinking again. That wouldn’t help anything. He wasn’t here to prove himself to a bunch of people he barely knew. He was here to help Garovel’s sister. He just had to remember that. After all his meditating, his practicing and studying, his fighting and struggling and winning and losing--after all of that in the last eight months, he wasn’t the same person as before. And he knew it. Even if it was easy to forget, he knew he was different.

He just hoped that difference was for the better, meager though it might be.

The party continued on, listening to the destruction users burrow their way through the mud. And it was slightly weird, Hector realized. He’d heard it before, of course, but he’d never really stopped and listened closely to the actual sound that destructive paths made. It was a kind of faint piping noise, almost musical even, like a brief gust of air through a tube.

He also noticed that their tunnel had a gradual slope to it, taking them continually deeper underground, probably to avoid the city’s utility lines and ensure that the soul net would run below any basement levels that Marshrock possessed. It would’ve been more convenient if there were some type of subway network to work from, but Hector doubted such a thing existed anywhere within the Rainlords' domain. If it did, it'd probably be more of a submarine network or something, he figured.

At length, Hector noticed the reapers all stop at the same time.

'A number of unfamiliar souls are heading our way,' announced Qorvass.

'Eighteen by my count,' said Garovel.

Asad took that as his cue. "Keep going," he told the four Rainlords, who voiced no objection. Then he turned to his sister. "Imas, protect them and construct the tunnel in my place."

Imas and her reaper both nodded and moved into Asad's previous position.

"Jada, Hector, you're with me."

Jada and Hector nodded as well.

"A vertical hole, please," ordered Asad, and one of the Rainlords punched a path through the roof of the tunnel. Asad lined the walls with quartz as Jada and Hector gathered around him, and then the Lord Najir pushed the three of them up on a crystal platform."
"856

With his flashlight, Hector could see a second pillar of quartz above them, pushing up and clearing the rest of the way to the surface. They popped up in the middle of a street. It was no longer raining, thanks to an apparent hole in the overcast sky, but the pavement was still plenty damp.

Hector pocketed his flashlight and removed the shield from his back, then began materializing fresh iron armor for himself, beginning with the helm--which was something of a relief to be wearing again. He'd been aching for something to hide behind ever since leaving Warrenhold. Decorum aside, he wondered how feasible it would be to just start wearing armor all the time. Considering he could simply dematerialize it whenever it became an inconvenience, maybe...

Hector had to concentrate. He was going for a genuine, complete set of plate armor, this time. It had taken him so long to study and comprehend all of the ins and outs of a full suit, but he was finally there. More or less. He'd occasionally tested his mobility in it during his downtime and patrols around Gray Rock, and it seemed to do well enough, but he had obviously not been able to test it against a true opponent yet. It certainly seemed to scare the hell out of the few criminals who'd seen it, though.

He didn't take shortcuts with it, either. The temptation was to simply coat himself in iron wherever he didn't need to worry about his joints or flexibility, but he knew that partial coatings would hang too loosely over his clothes and would not interlock with the other pieces of the armor. So he made sure that his ridged breastplate linked properly to the pauldrons, which linked to the segmented rerebraces, then to the spiked couters, then to the gauntlets--or rather, gauntlet, as he kept his left hand unarmored and also pulled off his glove there. He would need bare skin available on a moment's notice in order to use Haqq's shield to its fullest potential.

'Don't touch the shield directly until I tell you to,' Garovel said privately.

'Okay.'

The neck had been a bit of an issue, but he'd managed to come up with a gorget that allowed him to turn his head, and he'd also perforated the faceguard of his helm for a bit more visibility."

"857

Next came the faulds and modified tasset, which protected Hector's waist and crotch, respectively. Together, they basically looked like a metal skirt, though Garovel assured him that they made him seem very intimidating and manly. Hector wasn't too concerned either way, as long as they shielded his balls.

The piece covering his ass was called the culet, which had been perhaps the most difficult thing to find in his studies. There weren't many pieces of plate armor designed for the ass, probably because knights in full plate historically fought on horseback. Ultimately, he'd decided that a culet was slightly more practical than materializing a horse.

For his thighs, there were cuisses; for the knees, poleyns; and for the shins, greaves. All easy enough. And for his feet, he simply created a series of riveted plates, called lames, over the top of his shoes. He certainly didn't want to lose the superior traction of his modern footwear, especially on this already slick ground.

All together, it was heavy as shit. Which was another strike against wearing it all the time, he supposed. But of course, he would be cheating with undead strength as soon as the fight started. The knights of ye olden times must have been monsters to be able to fight like this. But then, as he thought about it more and remembered how long reapers and servants had been around, he began to wonder if they actually had been monsters.

'Hey, Asad, would you mind?' said Garovel, motioning toward Hector. 'Lend us a bit of your soul.'

Asad paused when he saw Hector. "Interesting," was all he said before pressing a tattooed hand against the iron. After a few moments, he removed his hand and said, "That should last about fifteen minutes."

"Th-thank you..."

"You are welcome." Asad crafted a glassy helmet for his daughter and handed it to her. "Tell me what I need to hear."

Jada donned the gift immediately. "Only as a last resort," she said. Her hands rustled beneath her dark robe for a second, and then she revealed a handgun. "Otherwise, I will provide support from a distance."

"Good. I will be fine on my own, so concentrate on helping Hector."

"Yes, abbi."

Asad did not bother creating a helmet for himself, Hector noticed, despite still having time to spare.

'They are surrounding us,' warned Qorvass.

Hector could see them approaching now."
"858 -- XCVIII.

Chapter Ninety-Eight: 'Tread not upon the Pride...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- (mobile link)

Garovel moved behind Hector. 'Nine servants with nine reapers.'

"Stay close to me," said Asad.

Hector intended to.

The Blackburns all wore brown-and-green raincoats that made them blend into the murky background of Luzo. He'd heard some of the other Rainlords referring to these people as the "Mudlords"--an unofficial title according to Garovel and from the sound of it, meant more as a slur than anything, but Hector was beginning to see where it had come from.

With their faces concealed beneath their hoods, Hector couldn't tell who they were. And weirdly, they did not seem interested in stopping to introduce themselves.

A massive copper boulder materialized before them, already hurtling their way.

Hector was about to dive out of its path when Asad simply raised a glass platform from beneath it, catching the hulking mass in mid-flight and smacking it away as if it had been nothing more than a kickball. The thing crashed down into a murky stream and tossed up a cloud of mud, blanketing a small footbridge entirely.

That seemed to give the Blackburns pause. They slowed their approach, and several of their reapers went underground.

"What is a Sandlord doing here?!" someone called out in a booming voice. It belonged to the man on their left. He pulled back his hood as he and two others stepped closer, all with their reapers still present. The remaining six servants in their party hung back.

Hector recognized the man's face from his file. Fidel Blackburn. And he was much more imposing than he was on paper, visibly muscular even through his raincoat. After a moment, the two others were revealed to be Silvia and Sabas Blackburn.

Hector's gauntleted grip on his shield tightened. Already, they'd encountered three of the people whom Lady Amaya had warned them about.

"You have no investment in this fight, amergo!" said Fidel, stopped now. "Begone! And no harm shall come to you! You have my word!"

"Very kind of you!" said Asad, shifting his feet and looking between them. "I have an even kinder counteroffer!"

"Is that so?! Go on, then!"

"Tell me why you have abducted the Elroy children! In exchange, I will do my best to avoid killing any of your reapers!"

"Aha!" said Fidel. "Very kind, indeed! Would you believe me if I said I do not know?!"

"I would, yes! As long as you bring me someone who does know!"
"858 -- XCVIII."

Chapter Ninety-Eight: 'Tread not upon the Pride...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Garovel moved behind Hector. 'Nine servants with nine reapers.'

"Stay close to me," said Asad.

Hector intended to.

The Blackburns all wore brown-and-green raincoats that made them blend into the murky background of Luzo. He'd heard some of the other Rainlords referring to these people as the "Mudlords"--an unofficial title according to Garovel and from the sound of it, meant more as a slur than anything, but Hector was beginning to see where it had come from.

With their faces concealed beneath their hoods, Hector couldn't tell who they were. And weirdly, they did not seem interested in stopping to introduce themselves.

A massive copper boulder materialized before them, already hurtling their way.

Hector was about to dive out of its path when Asad simply raised a glass platform from beneath it, catching the hulking mass in mid-flight and smacking it away as if it had been nothing more than a kickball. The thing crashed down into a murky stream and tossed up a cloud of mud, blanketing a small footbridge entirely.

That seemed to give the Blackburns pause. They slowed their approach, and several of their reapers went underground.

“What is a Sandlord doing here?!” someone called out in a booming voice. It belonged to the man on their left. He pulled back his hood as he and two others stepped closer, all with their reapers still present. The remaining six servants in their party hung back.

Hector recognized the man’s face from his file. Fidel Blackburn. And he was much more imposing than he was on paper, visibly muscular even through his raincoat. After a moment, the two others were revealed to be Silvia and Sabas Blackburn.

Hector’s gauntleted grip on his shield tightened. Already, they’d encountered three of the people whom Lady Amaya had warned them about.

“You have no investment in this fight, amergo!” said Fidel, stopped now. “Begone! And no harm shall come to you! You have my word!”

“Very kind of you!” said Asad, shifting his feet and looking between them. “I have an even kinder counteroffer!”

“Is that so?! Go on, then!”

“Tell me why you have abducted the Elroy children! In exchange, I will do my best to avoid killing any of your reapers!”

“Aha!” said Fidel. “Very kind, indeed! Would you believe me if I said I do not know?!”

“I would, yes! As long as you bring me someone who does know!”
"859

Rather than responding, Fidel merely let the heavy atmosphere linger. Only the occasional booms of distant thunder and battle above broke the oppressive stillness.

‘Guess he’s not going to bring anyone,’ observed Garovel.

Hector could see a wall of rain approaching from the other end of the street, could hear its noisy patter growing quickly louder.

Asad decided to strike first. With a mere flick of the wrist, the six rear Blackburns had glassy spikes bursting out the top of their skulls. They dropped immediately, all dead.

Fidel, Sabas, and Silvia attacked in unison, all gunning for Asad.

‘Don’t let them gang up on him,’ said Garovel, touching Hector’s bare hand.

That familiar vigor burned through him, awakening every muscle in his body and rendering his armor no heavier than a blanket. Garovel retreated halfway underground in order to observe the fight a bit more safely, while Hector bolted forward, armor clinking with each rapid step he took toward the closest opponent.

Silvia Blackburn, it turned out to be--a lanky woman with big green eyes and short black hair. Her file had mentioned her explosive ability. Cesium materialization. Dangerous even in a novice’s hands due to its violent reaction with water and tendency to spontaneously ignite in air. And Silvia had already been a servant for twenty-five years.

She noticed Hector’s approach right away and doused him completely in her silvery-gold liquid metal, which instantly set itself ablaze and engulfed Hector in blue flames. This, of course, was not enough to stop him from charging, so Hector just powered through.

And then she clobbered him with a block of frozen cesium the size of a bus.

Hector went flying, toppling, bouncing, and scraping across the open road. And that was also the unfortunate moment when the curtain of rain caught up with him. Each raindrop popped with the force of a firecracker when it touched him, reacting to the still-flaming cesium. On the one hand, it put out the fire; on the other, it caused a chain of explosions from every direction at once, pummeling his plate armor and rattling him so furiously that he could only flail like a fish on dry ground.

When the explosions finally subsided, his fist slammed against the pavement, and he struggled angrily back to his feet. The armor had done its job, even if it now bore so many dents as to look like he’d crafted it out of crumpled paper. Haqq's shield still looked pristine and untouched."

"860

Hector looked up to see that he was being ignored. And for good reason, too.

Asad was no longer on the ground. Rather, he seemed to be running on thin air, and it took Hector a second to notice the barely visible platforms beneath him. They didn't even touch the ground. The platforms were already moving in midair when Asad stepped on them, pushing him upward or outward or any which way he desired while the Lord Najir showered his opponents with an endless storm of glassy spears. So many at once, Hector saw, crashing down through the heavy rain and sticking into the pavement or shattering against each other.

It was all the Blackburns could do to weather the attack. Fidel's copper cage could hardly keep up with all the holes Asad was carving into it; Silvia had to focus on exploding the spears before they reached and skewered her; and Sabas appeared to have turned his whole body into a metal statue, sealing his own movement in exchange for making the quartz blades break ineffectually against his body.

Titanium transfiguration, Hector recalled from Sabas' file. Not the deadliest power but one that made him particularly difficult to kill, and if he was allowed to provide cover or a distraction for the other two, then it could be very problematic.

At the moment, however, Asad seemed to have the situation rather well in hand.

Jada had moved away from the battle and was now standing by behind a madega, busying herself with her firearms. Plural, Hector realized. He'd only seen the one handgun before, but she'd apparently been keeping a whole armory beneath her robe. The grenades especially caught his attention.

Hector still wasn't sure what her power was. Garovel had asked, but for whatever reason, the Najirs had kept that information to themselves. The reliance on firearms perhaps suggested destruction type, but now was not the time to be giving the matter more thought.

Soon, the Blackburns were buried in a mound of shattered quartz. But they were certainly not dead yet, and now Asad's own glass was in his way, so he let up on his attack and began dematerializing his work.

The Blackburns, of course, saw this as their opportunity to counterattack, and likewise, Asad seemed to predict as much. He leapt off his platform and grabbed a glassy handle that was already in motion, and for a brief moment, the man was flying--pulled quickly forward via the handle's momentum."

"861

Hector could only watch the Lord Najir in awe. The one glass handle could only sustain Asad's movement for a few seconds, but Asad created more on the fly, alternating between handles and platforms as he pleased, striding and soaring through the open air with such apparent ease and swiftness that Hector could hardly believe he and Asad shared the same ability type.

The Blackburns kept him busy, bombarding him with fleets of copper and cesium that he had to deflect while also keeping Sabas pinned down. They seemed to have regrouped very quickly, somehow.

'Careful, they're all using pan-forma,' said Garovel, and Hector understood why their three reapers had vanished from sight all of a sudden. 'Even headshots won't kill them now. You'd have to obliterate their entire bodies or tear their reapers away from them--neither of which you're capable of doing.'

Had the circumstances been less dangerous, Hector might have taken issue with how ridiculous that all sounded, but here and now, doubt was a luxury that he could not afford. He took Garovel at his word, and instead simply asked, 'What should I do, then?'

'Same as before. Asad needs space to breathe. Provide it for him.'

Jada was doing precisely that, Hector saw. She'd lobbed a cooked grenade at Silvia, which exploded before even hitting the ground and blew a chunk out of the woman's face. Silvia dropped but didn't stop moving, and Hector could see her head regenerating just as Garovel had said--and with a speed he'd never seen before, even. Combined with unrelenting gunfire, Jada had certainly earned the woman's attention and would doubtless be receiving an overabundance of cesium momentarily.

Hector was already sprinting by this point. And because he had the distinct impression that trying to coat Silvia Blackburn in iron would be about as effective as attacking with a feather pillow, he instead decided to materialize an iron chain in his free hand, broad and strong as he could make it. When he drew close enough, he chucked it at her with all his strength, and it caught her around the torso, huge links wrapping around her but still not stopping her.

A hail of exploding cesium came for Jada, and the young woman only managed to dive partially out of its path, losing her left arm, shoulder, and ear in the process. It did, however, buy precious time for Hector."
"862

Hector used the opportunity to accomplish two things simultaneously. First was simply adding to the chain around Silvia. The links grew thicker and more numerous, now carrying enough mass to actually weigh the woman down and give her a reason to break them--which Hector anticipated would not be a problem for her. Hence, the purpose of his second task. An iron meteor. It had served fairly well against Karkash, so he hoped it would do even better against someone without magnetic control.

He was quickly disappointed.

In spite of creating it faster than he could against Karkash, he still only managed to make about half the mass he wanted before Silvia noticed and decided that it was her turn to multitask. A cesium spear shot straight up and punched a hole through the iron like tissue paper, splitting it, exploding it, and knocking it off course. And simultaneously, she fired a second spear directly at Hector.

Shield raised, he braced himself.

The cesium exploded upon contact. Whether it was due to the impact or merely the rain, Hector could not tell, but he was quite surprised to find that the shield absorbed the blow very well, only pushing him back about a meter or so when he'd been expecting to be sent through a building. He glanced at the broadside of the shield another time and saw that it was scuffed but not at all structurally compromised.

Silvia seemed surprised as well, but she didn't get the chance to attack him again. A wave of molten quartz fell upon her, glowing harshly orange and yellow. It boiled the flesh off her bones in a matter of seconds, offering a faint hiss of steam with each drop of rain that fell upon it.

A vest provided Silvia with some protection, but Hector could see actual bone through the melted skin and muscle of her arms and skull. The quartz left her slowed, and Jada and Hector both capitalized--Jada with bullets, Hector with a materialized broadsword.

'Go for the limbs,' said Garovel while Hector was mid-sprint.
'Decapitation won't work.'

Hector went for her left arm and got it, severing it at the shoulder. One of Jada's bullets caught Silvia right in the forehead, splattering brain matter out the back of her skull.

Yet it was not enough. Silvia was still moving, still regenerating; and she still managed to swirl up and dropkick Hector square in the chest."
"863

Hector flew into the side of a car, which did not survive the impact nearly as well as he did. His weight collapsed the cabin like tin foil, but Hector certainly appreciated the softened landing. He could feel a few bones snapping back into place as he stepped back onto pavement, parts of the vehicle's shattered frame clinging briefly to his armor.

Already, Silvia had completely regenerated. It couldn't have been more than thirty seconds since he took his eyes off her, but all that melted flesh, even the missing arm, had returned. Only her shredded raincoat and still-smoldering vest remained as evidence of the attack she'd endured.

Jada was on the move now, bounding over fences and behind vehicles in search of fresh cover while cesium erupted in her wake. Hector helped her out, materializing a half-dozen iron logs above Silvia's head, granting them spikes for good measure. That bought Jada some space, while Hector thundered headlong into the breach for the third time.

A spear of frozen cesium shot toward him and broke upon his shield, causing him to miss a step and stagger to his right before finding his feet again. Silvia doused him in liquid cesium another time, but Hector was prepared. He stopped moving as soon as he heard the splash against his metal and added a much thicker layer of iron to the armor. The iron popped out all at once, shaking off most of the cesium before the rain could cause it to explode. A few splotches remained, but it was only enough for Hector to hear a handful of light pops from within his now brick-like iron shell. The cesium all around his feet was busy going off like a ring of fireworks as he annihilated his extra layer of iron so that he could move again.

Silvia seemed ready to receive him when a pyramid of solid quartz materialized all around her, sealing her movement.

And Hector stopped, abruptly unsure what he should do. Silvia Blackburn merely stood there, eyes moving while the rest of her was stuck fast, as if she were being preserved for posterity.

Hector looked toward Asad, who did not seem to be having very much trouble on his end. Fidel was suspended in the air, impaled on a huge glass spike while his melted arms and legs all struggled to regenerate; and Sabas was locked in hand-to-hand combat with Asad."

"864

Sabas was certainly getting his share of hits in, but Asad was hardly budging at all. Even when a titanium fist--no doubt with enhanced strength behind it--connected with his bare skull, the Lord Najir barely even flinched. But it also made something else happen.

With each blow that Asad received, his tattoos flashed golden yellow, lighting up for an instant and then returning to black just as quickly. Hector wasn't sure what he was seeing, but he didn't get the chance for further observation.

'She's breaking out,' warned Garovel, accompanied by the sound of cracking glass.

Hector went to work on a gigantic slab of iron high above Silvia's head. He could see that Silvia had coated herself in cesium, which seemed to be reacting with and corroding the glass; and after a few more moments, the cracks grew, and she was finally able to break herself out of Asad's glass, at the cost of having melted much of her skin via her own cesium.

At the very second she was free, the iron slab was right there to greet her. Having started its fall at only about eighty meters above the ground, Hector knew from his own practical studies that it didn't have nearly enough altitude to achieve its terminal velocity.

But that didn't mean it wouldn't hurt.

The slab crushed her into the pavement. The impact force kicked up chunks of road all around the slab and sent them reeling into vehicles and buildings, even right past Hector.

'Nicely done,' said Garovel.

And Hector waited, wondering if that was really enough to keep the woman down. He seriously doubted it, though it did seem to have bought them some more time.

Jada walked up from behind. She didn't say anything and instead offered him a nod of approval.

Asad seemed to be finishing up. He carried a helpless reaper in one hand while in the midst of extracting the other from Sabas' glass-encased body. Fidel had been skewered in a dozen different places and no longer seemed to be regenerating, perhaps because his pan-forma had been forcibly ended. Hector was immensely curious how Asad had accomplished that and so paid close attention to him trying to extract Sabas' reaper, but Sabas appeared to be making it impossible. Even Asad couldn't pierce the man's titanium flesh, which Hector intuited to be a necessary step in the procedure."

"865 -- XCIX.

At length, Asad simply gave up, instead choosing to add several more layers of glass to the pyramid around Sabas. Then he raised a platform beneath the prison and pushed it along behind him while he ventured over to collect Fidel's severed head.

Hector annihilated his own work, revealing Silvia's flattened corpse, splattered against the pavement in gruesome enough fashion that it actually made Hector grimace a little beneath his helm. He'd seen plenty of carnage before, of course, but it usually involved people who were still moving and regenerating. This brought back some of the more horrible things he'd witnessed. He had to remind himself that Silvia wasn't actually dead.

Garovel floated up behind Hector. 'Her reaper fled underground. We will be seeing Silvia Blackburn again, it seems.'

'Oh well,' said Qorvass. 'Two out of three isn't bad.'

'I see you've decided to spare their reapers after all,' said Garovel.

'You disapprove?' said Qorvass.

'Quite the contrary, in fact. It's nice to see a bit of mercy on the battlefield for a change, and I'm sure they'll make valuable hostages.'

'Indeed.'

They started back for the tunnel together with their captives in tow. Hector queried Garovel about Asad's tattoos, but the reaper didn't seem certain and so posed the question to Qorvass.

'By the way, why were Asad's tattoos flashing yellow?'

'Trade secret, I'm afraid.'

'Ah.'

Chapter Ninety-Nine: 'The Siege of Rheinhal...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Dunstan Rofal was not enjoying his new position very much, even if it was technically a promotion. All in all, the Rainlords hadn't pressed their assault very hard, but every time they did, he ended up directly in their line of fire thanks to his station in the southwestern tower. A week ago, Rhein's Keep boasted four towers, but the two easterly ones had since been knocked down.

A host of Vanguardian servants protected his tower from the outside, but only Dunstan had the privilege of occupying the tiny Watcher's Nest at its peak. There simply wasn't space for another person, especially not with this beastly swivel-mounted .50 caliber HMG in the middle of the chamber. It had an ammo feed up through the floor, which one of Dunstan's comrades attended to.

For the most part, though, he didn't get to use the gun. His primary job was simply to keep watch, as per usual, and when enemies came within firing range, they were typically repelled by someone else--often Cpt. General Miles. And so, whenever Dunstan DID get to use the gun, it naturally meant that he was in imminent danger of being obliterated along with the entire watchtower.

And that was not a very pleasant working environment."
"865 -- XCIX.

At length, Asad simply gave up, instead choosing to add several more layers of glass to the pyramid around Sabas. Then he raised a platform beneath the prison and pushed it along behind him while he ventured over to collect Fidel's severed head.

Hector annihilated his own work, revealing Silvia's flattened corpse, splattered against the pavement in gruesome enough fashion that it actually made Hector grimace a little beneath his helm. He'd seen plenty of carnage before, of course, but it usually involved people who were still moving and regenerating. This brought back some of the more horrible things he'd witnessed. He had to remind himself that Silvia wasn't actually dead.

Garovel floated up behind Hector. 'Her reaper fled underground. We will be seeing Silvia Blackburn again, it seems.'

'Oh well,' said Qorvass. 'Two out of three isn't bad.'

'I see you've decided to spare their reapers after all,' said Garovel.

'You disapprove?' said Qorvass.

'Quite the contrary, in fact. It's nice to see a bit of mercy on the battlefield for a change, and I'm sure they'll make valuable hostages.'

'Indeed.'

They started back for the tunnel together with their captives in tow. Hector queried Garovel about Asad's tattoos, but the reaper didn't seem certain and so posed the question to Qorvass.

‘By the way, why were Asad’s tattoos flashing yellow?’

‘Trade secret, I’m afraid.’

‘Ah.’

Chapter Ninety-Nine: ‘The Siege of Rheinhal...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Dunstan Rofal was not enjoying his new position very much, even if it was technically a promotion. All in all, the Rainlords hadn’t pressed their assault very hard, but every time they did, he ended up directly in their line of fire thanks to his station in the southwestern tower. A week ago, Rhein’s Keep boasted four towers, but the two easterly ones had since been knocked down.

A host of Vanguardian servants protected his tower from the outside, but only Dunstan had the privilege of occupying the tiny Watcher’s Nest at its peak. There simply wasn’t space for another person, especially not with this beastly swivel-mounted .50 caliber HMG in the middle of the chamber. It had an ammo feed up through the floor, which one of Dunstan’s comrades attended to.

For the most part, though, he didn’t get to use the gun. His primary job was simply to keep watch, as per usual, and when enemies came within firing range, they were typically repelled by someone else--often Cpt. General Miles. And so, whenever Dunstan DID get to use the gun, it naturally meant that he was in imminent danger of being obliterated along with the entire watchtower.

And that was not a very pleasant working environment."

"866

As a measure of caution, Rezamaar did not occupy the watchtower with him. Dunstan didn’t like being separated from her, but there was nothing for it. Though, if being separated had meant that he could no longer hear her talk, then he might have liked it very much.

‘Hey, Dunstan,’ she said from wherever she was inside the Keep.

‘What?’

‘I’m bored.’

‘That’s too bad.’ Dunstan occupied his eyes with his binoculars. Nothing moved among the ritzy hotels and empty streets below. It had been a few hours since he last saw a Rainlord. Usually, they sent someone to harass his tower at least once an hour.

Most likely, this was a deliberate tactic meant to make him and his comrades lose concentration with a suddenly longer period of downtime. It wasn’t going to work. Not on Dunstan, anyway. Perhaps the Rainlords would have better luck after his shift was over.

‘Wanna know what I think?’ said Rezamaar.

‘Not really.’

‘I think this whole business of throwing in with the Vanguard has blown up in your stupid little face.’

‘Thank you for that tremendous insight.’

‘Four years, you let them train you. And now they’ve involved us in this crap. I don’t know what’s going through their fat heads, but I don’t think this is the sort of thing you imagined us doing when you told me we should join.’

She wasn’t wrong. Dunstan hadn’t left home to become a pawn in someone else’s war game. He’d left in order to finally do something positive with his life. And to get away from his family. ‘...True, it is difficult to be completely onboard with the abduction of children.’

‘Oh. Yeah. That’s. Whatever. Listen, what I don’t like is having to go up against the goddamnn Redwaters. Or the Merlos. Or the Sebolts. Or just any of the Rainlords, really. These aren’t the type of people we should be fucking around with, regardless of what Lawrence or Miles or any of your other idiot bosses tell you.’

‘They’re your bosses, too, Reza.’

‘Yeah, sure they are.’

Needless to say, she had never quite embraced the ways of the Vanguard like Dunstan had. She could be very convincing with her feigned loyalty when she needed to be, but she certainly didn’t have any reservations about telling Dunstan what she truly thought. Ever since they'd joined, it was like being followed around by some kind of automated complaint dispenser."

"867

Dunstan hoped the conversation would die there so that he could return to watching in peace, but it seemed he was destined for disappointment.

'This is so stupid,' she went on. 'What is even the point of capturing these Rainlord children, huh? I've been asking all around, but no one fucking knows. Or they're just not telling me. Pricks.'

'Rumor is, the Elroys are Abolish spies.'

'I don't give a shit! Let them be spies! You don't screw with the Rainlords unless you have a damn good plan! And that twat Miles obviously doesn't!'

'Technically, it was Lawrence who ordered their capture.'

'Whatever!'

'If they really are feeding intel to our enemies, then we cannot simply allow them to continue.'

'Sure we can.'

'Reza.'

'Fine, then we could feed them false intel and try to lure Abolish into a trap. That'd be the smart thing to do.'

Again, she wasn't wrong. It was hard to imagine how the handling of this conflict could be anything but foolish and clumsy. If there really was some kind of greater plan at work, he couldn't see it.

'Maybe we should have joined Abolish instead,' said Rezamaar.

'Be serious.'

'I'm sure they aren't all crazy assholes. It'd just be a matter of finding the right faction.'

‘Abolish commits genocide, Reza.’

‘Well, yes, that is a problem.’

‘Even if certain factions were not physically involved, they are still guilty by association.’

‘Bit harsh. People make mistakes, you know.’

‘Genocide is more than just a mistake.’

‘Oh, I don’t know. Sometimes, you trip over a loose rock and accidentally stab a thousand people in the face. It’s important to look at the bigger picture, Dunstan.’

‘Your wisdom continues to astound me.’

‘The Vanguard has never been very good with the big picture. They’ve always been too busy winning battles to realize that they’re losing wars. They could probably learn a few things from Abolish. Or maybe Sai-hee.’

‘If that’s really how you feel, then why did you even agree to join the Vanguard with me in the first place?’

‘Because that was when you were all passionate and adorable about everything. I couldn’t tell you no. But now that you’re a turgid old curmudgeon, I can.’

‘You’re talking about four years ago.’

‘Yes, and you’ve aged like a beautiful oak tree that caught fire, fell into a river, and then got pulled along by a current into an illegal dump site for toxic chemicals.’

‘You’re a true poet, Reza.’”

"868

‘Really?’ said Rezamaar. ‘Nothing? I wish you would at least pretend to be upset at me for a change.’

‘Sorry. Though, you’ll have to let the aging thing go sooner or later. I know you wanted me to stay a teenager forever, but I--'

'That's not what this is about!'

'Sure it isn't.'

'Dunstan, I am so tired of your lip.'

'Are you, though?'

'Yes, I am! Agh! Don't test me! I will release your soul in a heartbeat!'

'Well, if you're gonna do it, then you're gonna do it.'

'What the fuck do I have to say for you to get angry?! It's really creepy the way you never get mad, you know! I basically called you a fucking swamp monster, and you don't even care!'

'I can't help it if you're into little boys, Reza.'

'I'm not into little boys!'

'Aren't you, though?'

'I'm into young men!'

'Are you, though?'

'And it's not a sexual thing! It's purely platonic!'

'Is it, though?'

'Shut the fuck up!'

'Alright.'

A long beat passed.

'I just find them adorable,' said Reza. 'Like teddy bears and puppies. Reapers don't even have sexual urges, you son of a bitch.'

'No judgment here. You're free to lust disgustingly over whomever you like.'

'God, I hate you so much, Dunstan.'

'Then I guess I am not long for this world.'

Reza just growled at him. For all her talk, Dunstan knew she wouldn't really do it. But even if she did, he honestly wasn't too concerned. He hardly considered himself alive, anyway. This was all just borrowed time, and it wasn't like anyone would miss him.

'You really need to make some friends,' said Reza. 'This is getting pathetic.'

'If you say so.'

'How about the Elroy boy? He seemed nice. Well, not nice, but loyal. Well, not loyal to us, but to his family.'

'He is also a frozen head, at the moment.'

'Yeah, but Dennex isn't.'

'Dennex?'

'His reaper. He and I have been talking. Dennex is cool.'

'Could you please not fraternize with the enemy when I'm not around?'

'I told you I was bored.'

'If the wrong person overheard the two of you talking, it could come back to bite us.'

'Please. I'm more careful than that.'

'Mm. Did Dennex tell you anything useful?'

'Well, he didn't admit to being an Abolish spy, if that's what you're getting at. But I have a sneaking suspicion that a spy might be reluctant to reveal that sort of thing.'"

"869

'Then what did you talk about?' said Dunstan.

'Mostly, Dennex has been trying to pump me for information. And he's pretty clever about it, too. I almost told him all sorts of juicy things.'

'Great.'

‘All in all, he seems like a bit of a stiff, but he’s still way better company than the rest of the reapers around here. Except maybe Overra. But I only got to talk to her a couple times. She’s always busy with Miles.’

‘I thought you hated those two.’

‘Oh, I do. But Overra is a hell of a conversationalist. She’s got a ton of ridiculous stories. Says she knows Tenebrach pretty well, and I believe her. And she’s met most of the strongest Abolishers in battle, too. She and Miles were there at the Battle of Lac’Vayce a few years ago.’

He was pretty sure that was more than a few years ago, but he didn’t bother trying to correct her. ‘Wasn’t that the one where nearly a million people were killed?’

‘Yeah. Lamont and Jackson against Jercash, Ivan, and Gunther. The fight leveled the entire city and completely wrecked the local ecosystem. And Lamont and Jackson almost lost. Barely managed to hold on until Sermung arrived and bailed them out. And Overra was THERE. Can you imagine?’

‘...Yes, I can. Quite easily.’

‘Oh. Well, I suppose this battle is somewhat comparable, but it’s hardly the same scale. Five of the strongest servants in the world all duking it out in one place. Overra said Lac’Vayce won’t be habitable again for hundreds of years. They basically made a mini version of the Dáinnbolg all by themselves.’

He didn’t much care for the way she talked about it as if they’d broken some kind of baseball record, but something caught his eye before he could tell her so.

A figure darted out from behind a building, only visible in the split second it took to reach a line of bushes.

He had a choice between two covered buttons on the arm of his chair. One was for the silent alarm, and the other was for the old analogue bell that would alert the entire compound. He lifted the cover and chose the silent alarm.

Without his binoculars, he surveyed the whole network of streets below, looking for any movement at all.

No more than a minute later, however, Cpt. General Miles appeared right outside the Nest, buffeting its bulletproof glass with a sudden flourish of wind. Overra melted out of the man's body, and Miles gave Dunstan an unworried smile. "What did you see, Corporal?"

"870

How strange it was, looking at this man and seeing someone only slightly his elder. By appearance alone, Parson Miles could have quite easily passed for Dunstan's brother. Dunstan could almost forget that he was staring at one of the most powerful Vanguardians alive today. But perhaps that was the whole point.

"Only one person, sir," he said, swinging his chair around to point Miles in the proper direction. "Third street over on your right, behind the bushes, sir."

'He's right,' said Overra. 'From here, I can sense someone there.'

Miles fished a pair of compact binoculars out of his coat and gave a look. "Hmm. Can't see 'em. Let's wait 'till they come a little closer, shall we?"

"Yes, sir." And he realized that Reza was still blabbering on about one thing or another, so he interrupted and said, 'Can't talk right now, Reza.'

'Tch.'

He fixated upon the location of the figure he'd seen with his binoculars. A thick silence fell as they waited, but Dunstan had recently come to learn that the Cpt. General didn't much care for peace and quiet, and indeed, the man soon broke it.

"...So how are you doin' up here?"

"Fine, sir."

"Tedious work, isn't it? I was a watchman myself once, you know. Surprisingly little has changed about the job. With how quickly tech develops, you'd think it'd be completely different by now." He knocked a finger against the clear wall. "Armoring has gotten a bit better, I suppose."

Dunstan wasn't sure how to respond, so he just said, "Yes, sir."

For some reason, that seemed to amuse the man. “Do you consider yourself a company man, Corporal?”

“Sir?”

“A company man. A believer in the system. In the Vanguard’s mission to provide protection and justice.”

“Yes, sir. Of course.”

“Good. That’s good. That’ll take you far.” A beat passed. “What about your family? How do they feel about the Vanguard?”

Dunstan hesitated. “...I’ve never told them about it.”

“Ah, so they’re just nice and normal folk?”

“Yes, sir. Though, I wouldn’t call them nice, exactly.”

“Mm. What is it that they think you do, then?”

“I... don’t know.” He blinked. He hadn’t meant to say that. He’d meant to tell some insignificant lie. That was what he usually did when someone asked him about his family.

“You don’t know?” said Miles. “How can you not know?””
"871

Dunstan shifted in his seat. He wasn’t sure how they’d ended up on this topic all of a sudden. He never liked talking about his family, even with Reza. “The truth is, sir... I ran away from home when I was fifteen.”

“I see. And why did you run away?”

He hesitated again, impulsively pulling his eyes away from the battlefield in order to glance at Miles. A mistake, Dunstan immediately knew. Miles didn’t seem to notice or care, but Dunstan was kicking himself for his unprofessionalism as he refocused on observing.

It was odd, though. Like a faint pressure in his chest. And around his head. His whole body, even. And as much as he would have preferred not to answer that question, remaining silent seemed somehow untenable, nor could he come up with an appropriate lie in time. "My family is full of criminals. If I didn't leave, I probably would've ended up like them."

"And your reaper didn't have a problem with that?"

"I didn't meet her until I was seventeen. She doesn't have any ties to my family. I doubt they even know reapers exist."

"I wouldn't be too certain of that."

Dunstan's gaze flickered again, and he had to concentrate in order to keep his eyes where they needed to be. "What do you mean, sir?"

But instead of answering, Cpt. General Miles chose to ask a different question. "Where was your family living when you left?"

And there it was again--that unexplained pressure, pushing him onward, compelling him to speak. "Dante. I think we had some cousins in Atreya, too. Why?"

"What is your grandfather's name?"

"Damian. Why, sir?"

"Ha. No reason."

"Sir, please stop being so mysterious. Do you know my grandfather?"

"I don't know anyone named Damian Rofal, no."

"Then...?"

"But you do remind me of someone I once knew. You have the same eyebrows he had."

'Same eyes, chin, and hair color, too,' added Overra.

"It's really the eyebrows, though," said Miles. "Very distinctive, those things. You could probably pull them off your face and use them as weapons."

'They're like angry boomerangs,' said Overra.

Dunstan tried to take that as a compliment. "Apart from his name, I don't remember much else about my grandfather. He only visited a few times when I was a child. I don't think he got along well with my parents.””

"872

“Ah, so you’ve actually met your grandfather in person?” asked Miles.

“Yes, sir.”

“Must be a different guy, then. The man I’m thinking of died about forty years ago.”

‘Unless he somehow survived,’ amended Overra.

Miles laughed lowly. “That would be awkward, wouldn’t it?”

Dunstan was curious now. “Who was the man you were thinking of?”

The Cpt. General took a second to respond. “He was a lunatic. The kind of person that the world is better off without.”

The abrupt severity in the other man’s voice did not escape Dunstan’s notice. “What was his name?” Dunstan asked.

“It’s not important. Best to just forget about people like that.”

Dunstan sensed something contradictory in that statement, but he decided to keep his mouth shut. Miles acted like the most laid back boss in the world, but the fact remained that Dunstan didn’t know the man very well. He’d rather not get on his superior’s bad side by asking too many questions.

Finally, something new caught his eye. Another figure darted across the street in the same location as earlier. Dunstan raised his binoculars in time to see it happen a third time.

“You see that?”

“Yes, sir.”

They waited, but there was no other movement.

Such was the thrill of being a watchman.

Personally, Dunstan didn’t mind the long periods of nothingness. Coping with tense downtime was a skill, like anything else. The trick was to think without getting lost in thought, to wonder without daydreaming.

And in spite of the man's earlier claim, Dunstan could not imagine Cpt. General Miles doing this job. And this notion was soon reaffirmed for him.

"They could be luring us into a trap." Miles allowed a beat to pass. "I'll go check."

Overra melted back into his body, and then Parson leapt away in a gust of wind that made the armored walls shudder.

Dunstan could see the man going to work, tearing through the air like a missile and falling upon the enemy's location with just as much force. An explosion of air crushed four buildings at once and flung their remains up from the ground. Broken trees and vehicles and slabs of concrete tumbled down the road together, and Miles just hovered there in the middle of it all, waiting.

After a weighty pause, the storm hit him. Crowds of metal spikes, audible gunfire, visible distortions in space even from this distance, and all manner of flaming chaos came for the man at the same time."

"873

Miles zipped away from most of the assault, endured the rest, and counterattacked with a storm of his own. The resultant explosion made the ground tremble even from this distance, and a thin tornado swirled into existence around Miles, ripping up more of the city.

Dunstan could not keep watching, however. He had to keep an eye on the rest of the battlefield. If the clash with Miles was somehow a diversionary tactic, then Dunstan would not allow it to work. But his caution proved needless, as he didn't see any other disturbances.

Then the analogue bell inside the Keep went off.

Dunstan held his position, knowing it was not his job to deal with whatever the problem was. He did, however, ask Reza for an update. 'What's happening?'

'Shut up, I'm looking into it.'

And again, he found himself waiting.

Cpt. General Miles got back to Dunstan before Reza did, arriving inside another rumbling gale. The man's shredded clothes barely clung to his body now, and his airman's overcoat was still smoldering with blackened stains. "Yep," he said in the dual voice of pan-rozum. "That was definitely a trap."

Dunstan's brow receded. "A-are you alright, sir?"

"Oh, sure, don't worry about us. We could really go for an ice cream sandwich, though. Think we'll go get one from the kitchen. You want anything?"

"Er, n-no thank you."

"You sure? Not even a drink? A bag of chips? One of those giant pretzels, maybe? Do we have those things?"

"Sir, the emergency alarm is going off."

"Ah. So it is. Guess we'll look into that, afterward." He allowed a beat to pass. "So did you want a snack or...?"

"No, sir, I'm fine."

Miles stared at him. "...We'll get you something, anyway." And he was gone again, leaving his residual gust of wind behind as usual.

Dunstan wasn't sure whether to be impressed or worried. When he looked back at the enemy's location, he saw a street riddled with blood and body parts.

'Well,' came Rezamaar's voice, 'I found out what all the commotion is about.'

'Tell me.'

'Someone managed to break into the freezer and destroy one of the captive Rainlords' heads.'

Dunstan's eyes widened. 'Which one?'

'I'm listening for that answer now. Sounds like... oh shit. It was Zeff. They fucking freed Zeff Elroy.'

"874 -- C.

Chapter One Hundred: 'How the Wind doth rise...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Lawrence's small office had begun to feel a bit cramped. Physically, only he and Parson were present, but the two reapers appeared to occupy plenty of additional space with their silent tornado bodies. There was also the matter of Dergoz' yelling.

'I know it was your doing! You're behind this somehow!'

Rather than responding, Parson seemed more interested in savoring the taste of his ice cream sandwich.

Overra answered for them. "Somehow," huh? Well, in spite of that very compelling, evidence-laden accusation, I'm afraid I'll have to go ahead and deny it.'

'It's painfully obvious!' said Dergoz. 'How stupid do you think we are, exactly?! It's no secret that you and Parson held this position before Lawrence and I did! Your affection for the Rainlords has clouded your judgment!'

Parson decided to interject now. "We don't really have time for this now, do we? The Rainlords--"

'Shut up!'

Parson frowned and went back to his treat.

'Parson and I were busy defending the western perimeter. You can confirm with Corporal Rofal, if you like.'

Lawrence wasn't sure what to make of the circumstances. He was mainly just glad to not be the target of Dergoz's ire for a change. Freeing Zeff had actually crossed his mind before, but pulling it off with Dergoz constantly attached to him would have been nigh impossible. If Parson and Overra really were responsible, then Lawrence would be impressed.

What Dergoz had yet to tell them, however, was that they'd already caught the supposed culprit. Lieutenant Colonel Adam Leroy was the one who actually destroyed Zeff's head, and the guards had only just managed to prevent him from destroying that of Zeff's son as well--not that it would have made much difference, since they had the boy's reaper in custody, too.

Regardless, that didn't seem to be good enough for Dergoz. As far as subordinates went, Adam and his reaper had never proven themselves as anything more than blunt instruments. Good at following orders and not much else. The only reason they'd achieved a higher rank than Zeff and Axiolis was because the Elroys decided to raise so many children.

Which was another thing. Where was Mariana in all this? According to the watchmen, she'd somehow killed six highly trained servants by herself and escaped, which was almost as surprising to Lawrence as the fact that she had apparently conceded the responsibility of reclaiming the rest of her family to the other Rainlords."

"874 -- C.

Chapter One Hundred: 'How the Wind doth rise...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Lawrence's small office had begun to feel a bit cramped. Physically, only he and Parson were present, but the two reapers appeared to occupy plenty of additional space with their silent tornado bodies. There was also the matter of Dergoz' yelling.

'I know it was your doing! You're behind this somehow!'

Rather than responding, Parson seemed more interested in savoring the taste of his ice cream sandwich.

Overra answered for them. "Somehow," huh? Well, in spite of that very compelling, evidence-laden accusation, I'm afraid I'll have to go ahead and deny it.'

'It's painfully obvious!' said Dergoz. 'How stupid do you think we are, exactly?! It's no secret that you and Parson held this position before Lawrence and I did! Your affection for the Rainlords has clouded your judgment!'

Parson decided to interject now. "We don't really have time for this now, do we? The Rainlords--"

'Shut up!'

Parson frowned and went back to his treat.

'Parson and I were busy defending the western perimeter. You can confirm with Corporal Rofal, if you like.'

Lawrence wasn't sure what to make of the circumstances. He was mainly just glad to not be the target of Dergoz's ire for a change. Freeing Zeff had actually crossed his mind before, but pulling it off with Dergoz constantly attached to him would have been nigh impossible. If Parson and Overra really were responsible, then Lawrence would be impressed.

What Dergoz had yet to tell them, however, was that they'd already caught the supposed culprit. Lieutenant Colonel Adam Leroy was the one who actually destroyed Zeff's head, and the guards had only just managed to prevent him from destroying that of Zeff's son as well--not that it would have made much difference, since they had the boy's reaper in custody, too.

Regardless, that didn't seem to be good enough for Dergoz. As far as subordinates went, Adam and his reaper had never proven themselves as anything more than blunt instruments. Good at following orders and not much else. The only reason they'd achieved a higher rank than Zeff and Axiolis was because the Elroys decided to raise so many children.

Which was another thing. Where was Mariana in all this? According to the watchmen, she'd somehow killed six highly trained servants by herself and escaped, which was almost as surprising to Lawrence as the fact that she had apparently conceded the responsibility of reclaiming the rest of her family to the other Rainlords."

"875

'I'm sure you have any number of collaborators in this game of yours,' Dergoz was saying. 'I don't think we'll be trusting anyone's word concerning your whereabouts. Why don't you just admit it?'

Parson exchanged lingering looks with Overra, perhaps indicative of a silent conversation between the two.

'Easy, Dergoz,' said Lawrence. 'He may be ridiculous, but we do not want to pick a fight with Parson, especially not here.'

'They need us as much as we need them,' Dergoz said privately. 'Sanko is coming, so they can't afford to fight with us now, either. This is the perfect time to press them with hard questions. In fact, it's probably the ONLY time.'

Lawrence wondered how much truth there was in that, but he knew there was no point in arguing.

Parson finished off his ice cream sandwich. He smacked his lips a couple times and took a long breath. "I'm just going to tell them. If they're this suspicious of us, then there's really no point in pretending anymore. We're all on the same side after all."

Overra gave a public sigh. 'I suppose you're right. Go on, then.'

"Oh, but soundproofing first."

'Right.' Overra flew into Parson's body, and a moment later, Parson's forearms disappeared, leaving his sleeves to flap wildly in the sudden whirlwind that consumed the room.

Lawrence had seen similar techniques before. The airy hum of Parson's oxygen would prevent physical eavesdroppers, and the tightly controlled movement allowed the man to also press his soul into the air and thereby prevent reapers from hearing them through the walls.

And Lawrence felt abruptly unsettled. Such a precautionary measure was disturbingly unlike Parson and Overra. Whatever they were about to say was not going to be pleasant, he felt.

Parson stepped closer. "Time is short, so allow us to make this quick. First, we know your secret. You and Lawrence belong to a shadow faction within the Vanguard--a shadow faction which believes Sermung is no longer fit to lead all of us. Which is true. He isn't."

Dumbstruck, Dergoz needed a second to respond. 'That's not... We're not--'

"Please. Let's not waste time. We also know that Lamont is the head of your shadow faction, and that no one is able to speak with him about it directly due to the immense secrecy required. Because he is constantly surrounded by Sermung supporters, Lamont is restricted to passing along coded instructions until the time comes when he can reveal himself."

"876

Given the accuracy and detail, Lawrence could tell they were not bluffing, but he had to wonder how Parson and Overra knew so much. It didn't sound like they were members themselves, but even if they were, it wouldn't explain how they knew that Lawrence and Dergoz were. All members of Lamont's faction kept their identities hidden, even from one another. Only Lamont himself should've known who everyone was. Lawrence wanted to ask as much, but he didn't know if he should say anything at all. Fortunately, he didn't have to.

"Your shadow faction was not founded by Lamont," said Parson. "It was founded via proxy. By us."

That earned a blink from Lawrence.

"So you see, telling us that you are not members is a bit like trying to sell ice cream to the ice cream man. I am that ice cream man. Incidentally, I really was an ice cream man for a time when I was younger. My favorite flavor was--ah, wait, no. Forget we said that. Um... where were we? Lamont's faction. That's right. We founded it in order to give Lamont the support he needs in order to take Sermung's place. It was important that our involvement be an especially well-kept secret, because at the time of the faction's inception, we had to take on the even more pivotal role of growing close to Sermung and earning his trust. Which we've since accomplished. Soon, Lamont will make his move, and the Vanguard will experience a regime change for the first time in five hundred years. Exciting, no?"

Lawrence had no idea what to say now.

'If all of that is true,' said Dergoz, 'then why in the world did you free Zeff? You did free him, didn't you? I assume that is where this explanation is going.'

"Yes, I ordered Adam to free him because I was bored--wait, no. We ordered Adam to free him because the siege has been proceeding too slowly. We have a timetable to keep, and we cannot justify crushing the Rainlords until they press their assault much harder than they have thus far. And obviously, leaving the Keep to fight them would be tactically unwise. With any luck, Zeff will be able to motivate them for us."

'What timetable are you talking about?'

"All you need to know is that Lamont will be needing our full attention shortly, so we cannot spend much more time in Rheinhal. But if we leave before this siege concludes, then many of our precious subordinates here will be killed or captured. Present company included, of course. It is quite the dilemma.""

"877

Dergoz seemed duly hesitant now, though whether it was out of respect, confusion, or fear, Lawrence could not tell. Perhaps all three. 'What about Sanko? Is she involved in your plan, too?'

"No, unfortunately. She remains entirely loyal to Sermung."

'But she could arrive any day now. If she joins the Rainlords against us--'

"It won't come to that."

'How can you be sure?'

"You will just have to trust us."

'You have something up your sleeve?'

Parson only smiled.

And Lawrence began to realize how wrong he'd been about these two. For as long as he'd known them, Parson and Overra had been the most moronic of all his superior officers. Parson perhaps a little more so than Overra, but still. They'd always been goofball slackers, enjoying themselves just a bit too much for Dergoz's liking, and Lawrence couldn't really disagree.

And yet, now that Lawrence was thinking about it, they had been largely successful in most of the missions where he'd worked with them.

No.

There was more to it than that, wasn't there? By now, he and Dergoz had worked with them dozens upon dozens of times, but Lawrence was struggling to think of an instance when they'd truly failed a mission. Things had certainly gotten messy sometimes, and no doubt, some of the official reports would indicate failure as a result, but that wasn't the whole truth of it.

Lawrence recalled an incident during the Jungle Wars where Parson lost track of a certain unruly Melmoorian diplomat whom they were supposed to protect. They eventually found the diplomat in an Abolish prison and rescued him. The man was so grateful that he went on to provide the Vanguard with decades of key political support that probably ended up saving Melmoore from the same financial ruin that caused its neighbors to crumble.

Then there was the assassination attempt that should not have succeeded but did anyway, because Parson insisted on an overlong equipment check that morning. They caught hell from Lamont for that screw up, and yet, a few years later, documents surfaced which indicated that the man they let be assassinated had been maintaining secret prison camps for Abolish.

There was always something like that, Lawrence was realizing. Parson would make some mistake, be labeled an idiot for it, and then everyone would forget. Or at least, Lawrence would. Only in retrospect did it become clear that most of those "mistakes" had since been vindicated in some way."

"878

Lawrence didn't see the point, though. It was one thing to conceal skill from enemies; it was another to conceal it from allies. But then again, given Parson's rank, perhaps the right people already knew all they needed to.

Lawrence marveled at how young and stupid he could still feel after all these years. He would have liked to stop being the ignoramus that he knew he'd been in his youth, but it seemed that was not yet to be. Dergoz didn't have that excuse, though. The reaper had several hundred years on him, which admittedly made him younger than most other reapers, but the point remained. If Dergoz couldn't see through their ruse, either, then Lawrence didn't feel quite so bad.

It did give him pause, however. If he could be so thoroughly wrong about Parson, then perhaps he was also wrong to continue holding onto his faith in Sermung. Dergoz and Parson both seemed so certain, and Lawrence knew that--for Dergoz at least--it wasn't a personal matter, either. Dergoz simply believed Sermung and Tenebrach could no longer handle the burden of leadership. And indeed, Lawrence would be lying if he said he didn't see some merit in that belief.

But still, it was hard not to worry about what would happen if Sermung ever fell. The Crystal Titan was a name that carried so much weight behind it. In some places, its mere utterance was enough to prevent war. And as long as those other names were out there--names like the Mad Demon, the Living Void, the Monster of the East, and the Salesman of Death--as long as those existed, the Crystal Titan seemed entirely needed. Lawrence could hardly imagine anyone ever being able to step up and fill those enormous shoes.

But he supposed one day, someone would have to.

--++--++--

Ismael Blackburn sat with his face in his hands. The Black Hall was deep enough into the castle that he could no longer feel the muffled quakes of the battle. He thought it would help him think, coming here, but all it did was make him mindful of the complete silence.

Three days had passed since the siege began. It wouldn't be much longer now. According to his scouts, the Sebolts and Delagunas had completed their underground net. It was only a matter of time until they launched an assault with their full strength."

"879

He needed to figure out what to do. Protecting the family was his responsibility. Even if Melchor was physically the strongest, Ismael was the one who had to lead the Blackburns away from the ruin that was knocking on their door.

It was such a mess. The whole reason he'd had Melchor bring the Elroy children here was to divide the other Rainlords' attention and make it easier for Parson to end the siege at Rheinhal quickly. After which, Parson would come to Luzo and help House Blackburn rout the enemy before anyone became the wiser. But now, Ismael doubted Marshrock would hold out that long.

If it had only been Houses Sebolt and Delaguna, then it might have been manageable, but that one extra Sandlord had proven to be the dreaded wrench in this machine. He was the reason they had completed their soul net so quickly. With all the attempts at interference that the Blackburns had been running, it should have taken at least twice as long. But no.

Certainly, it hadn't been the best plan with Ibai here, but Parson hadn't given Ismael much choice. If Ibai's presence were discovered, it would be the end of everything. It would not matter that Ibai had never actually killed anyone before, nor would it matter that Ibai was Ismael's only child--the only child that he and his wife had ever managed to create in the past thirty-eight years of trying. The other Rainlords would never allow an aberration to live. There were no exceptions. Especially now, after having kept Ibai a secret for so long, after what his family had done in order to keep Ibai a secret.

No, it was much too late to reconcile. The Elroys would want his house to drown in lakefire before the end.

‘Have you decided yet?’ came Rholtam’s voice with the echo of privacy.

Ismael looked up to see him floating above the center table. To his eyes, the reaper was a pterosaur, glowing faintly gray all over but also with only about a third of its flesh still intact, the rest decaying gorily or just missing altogether. He’d always wondered why his subconscious had chosen to see reapers as undead, extinct flying reptiles. Even taking into account his youth studying paleontology, pterosaurs still seemed like a strange choice. He had more important things on his mind at the moment, however.

“No,” he said aloud, as there was no one else in the Hall to hear. “Tell me what I should do, Rholtam. Tell me how this can end well for us.””
"880

‘Well, I suppose Parson and Overra could show up earlier than they promised and rescue us,’ said Rholtam. ‘But frankly, I’m not entirely convinced that they intend to show up at all. I’ve never been able to understand what their true goals are. Perhaps we’re just tools that have outlived our usefulness now.’

Ismael rubbed his forehead. “That was not what I wanted to hear...”

‘Now is not the time for lies, old friend.’

Ismael only sighed and let his eyes glaze over. The struggle was so exhausting. Perhaps it would be best to just give up already. Perhaps this battle was an inevitable reckoning. No stopping it. Even surrender would achieve the same outcome. Inevitable. Inevitable... And his mind drifted back.

A man. The day of his wedding. He has found the perfect woman. She can be a bit impulsive and unpredictable at times, but he loves that about her. He can hardly believe Nere agreed to marry him. He wishes his parents could have met her. They were both killed just two years prior. Cousin Melchor did not take their deaths well. That poor man has grieved so much for this family, living through the extinguishment of two entire generations. The groom is glad that Cousin Melchor is able to smile on this day.

Bliss does not last long. Cousin Melchor has become a person others fear, a person that even some of his own family fear. Melchor is possessed of an abiding hatred, a need to find everyone responsible for hurting his family in years long past. Melchor leaves both the family and the Vanguard, allowing none to accompany him.

In the meantime, Marshrock knows peace as House Blackburn attempts to rebuild its damaged bloodline. There are many weddings in only a few short years. The family is growing. All except the man's own.

He and Nere are seemingly unable to have children. Even after multiple work-ups and analysis, doctors tell them the problem is idiopathic. Unexplained infertility, is what they call it.

Years go by without any solutions. Current medicine is of little help. Adoption is not even worth considering. As the primary branch of the family, they require an heir by blood.

For a time, he and Nere are so distraught that they can barely look at one another. With therapy, however, their relationship manages a slow recovery. And just when it seems they are growing closer than ever before, a miracle occurs. Nere is pregnant."

"881

Suddenly on the cusp of fatherhood. He has never felt this way before. The anticipation, the excitement. It is even more wonderful than he had imagined. He'd thought his line had reached its end, that one of the younger branches would lead the family after he was gone. And it will be a boy, he is told. A son.

This is fate. It must be. He has never much cared to believe in such things until now, but there is no other way of explaining this avalanche of joy. Fate has blessed him after testing his family with hardship.

Nere's spirits are not quite as high, but he is only too glad to be the doting husband. He wants to do everything. Often, he sends her attendants away so that he can be the one to bring her whatever she desires. It annoys her, sometimes, and she tells him that he should concentrate on his work with the Vanguard; other times, she tells him she was wrong, and she cries as she urges him to stay with her. She is all over the place, even more unpredictable than usual as her hormones play havoc with her body.

And then the day comes. Ibai is born.

The moment he lays eyes on his son, his heart swells with such pride and joy that he can feel the change coming over him. He feels that he is no longer the same man. He is a father now, but it is also more than that, he realizes. He is a father by blood, but he has already been a father in spirit for some time. After the loss of the previous generation and the departure of Melchor, he is the one everyone looks to for answers and guidance. Rholtam has been trying to help him see this all along, and now he understands the depth of his responsibility. Ibai has shown it to him.

However.

Ibai is very strange. It first becomes clear when a doctor attempts to vaccinate him. The needle cannot pierce the boy's skin. A solid splotch of dark brown appears in its path each time piercing pressure is applied.

And they do not know why. They do not know what Ibai is. But they can tell that the brown shadow is a construct of imaginary power. The boy receives his vaccines with the aid of a soul-empowered needle. They take him home and attempt to understand what makes their son so special."

"882

By all accounts, he appears to be a normal baby, save only for that muddy shadow. After a week, the shadow begins to come and go at seemingly random intervals, twirling up from his tiny head and fingers and toes, only to vanish like smoke. At a glance, it could almost pass for some type of odd hair.

Then, Parson Miles arrives. As the current head of all Vanguardian forces in Sair, he has been a valued comrade and friend of the family for many years, especially after their most recent tragedy.

“Your son is what we call an aberration,” says Parson. He is normally jovial. He is not so now.

Knowledge of aberrations is still a top-level secret within the Vanguard, but given the family’s unique circumstances, Overra says they will make an exception.

And so Parson explains at length. Ibai is a monster in human form. How these monsters are created is yet unknown, but it involves Abolish in some way. Aberrations exhibit powers that are otherworldly, even by servant standards. And they grow more powerful by consuming souls. They are deadly beings. Ibai will only bring ruin upon their family.

So it would be best to kill the boy now.

They refuse, of course, and demand that Parson and Overra leave.

“Fine,” says Parson. “We will go. But if you will not kill him, then keep his existence a secret. You will eventually see the truth with your own eyes, and I suspect the rest of the Vanguard will learn about aberrations soon. When that time comes, you will not want them knowing what he is.”

Parson goes in peace, but the seed of doubt is planted.

He and Nere begin to worry about the future of their son. They decide to exercise caution and keep Ibai a secret from everyone outside the family. He orders all branches to return to Luzo. He wants his House brought together.

He explains their circumstances to all of the branch heads. They are all so terribly young. With Melchor gone, he is now the eldest servant by far, and similarly, everyone knows that Rholtam is one of the most ancient and loyal reapers in the family. As a pair, their age affords them both a certain reverence that helps them gather everyone's favor; and in the long lingering and still deeply felt aftermath of their most recent losses, he has never seen his House so united and comforting as it is now."

"883

Five years transpire.

Ibai is found clutching a dead cat in his sleep. The animal has been mutilated. Ibai is covered in its blood.

They are not sure how--or even IF--they should punish him. In spite of their shock and dread, they attempt to approach this rationally. They decide to speak with the boy first.

"Do you understand what you did, mijoro?"

Ibai smiles eagerly. "Yes, Papa! I killed him!"

And they come to realize that, at the age of five, Ibai possesses a concept of death. The boy already knows that life can end, despite never having had it explained to him.

Nor does it frighten him in the least. Instead, Ibai chooses to ask, "What is death like, Papa? Will I be able to die soon?"

"Death is not something to look forward to, mijoro."

"Why not?"

"Because life is precious. In fact, it is the most precious thing in the world. Do you understand? Ibai, what you did, taking that cat's life, was wrong. You must not do it again."

Ibai returns a curious look. "But I wanted to do it, Papa. Why would I want to do it if it was wrong?"

They have a hard time answering such a strange question. "Just because you want to do something does not make it acceptable," says Nere.

It takes a while for Ibai to comprehend that, and even after the boy claims to, they are not wholly convinced that he does.

Moreover, they come to learn that, despite knowing about death, the boy possesses no concept of pain. It seems he has never felt it before. They must endeavor to teach it to him. It will serve as his punishment, they decide.

Their efforts backfire. Ibai does not mind pain at all. Rather, it seems to only make him happier.

An incredibly disturbing discovery, it is. They begin to see that Parson may have been correct. But they will not give up on Ibai. That is unthinkable.

They devise an alternate means of punishment. Isolation and boredom. After only one taste--alone in a soundproof chamber with nothing to do for a mere fifteen minutes--Ibai proves much more agreeable. They have found something he genuinely fears. They must use this tool carefully in order to guide his behavior in the proper direction.

And for the most part, it seems to work. It is worrisome, yes, and certainly requiring patience, but Ibai appears to learn that he must not hurt others."

"884

Ibai is a difficult child, to say the very least, but they are managing him. Really, the boy just needs entertainment and supervision--but those two needs are constant. It becomes clear that Ibai is unfit to be the House's heir. They attempt to have a second child, but it is thus far proving fruitless.

He appoints Cousin Horatio as the new heir as a precaution. It is unfortunate, of course, and he does not tell Horatio of his decision, but he can at least rest easy in the knowledge that Horatio is a man of admirable, if curious, intelligence and fortitude. It should really be Cousin Melchor, he feels; but he has no idea where that man is, and even if he did, Melchor had already refused the role of leadership before and doubtless would again should the time ever come.

They reach out to Parson Miles once more. They aim to apologize for being so brusque with him before and hope that he has learned more about aberrations in the intervening years. Parson sends word, saying that he was planning to visit them soon, anyway.

When he arrives, however, he does not seem very interested in helping them with Ibai. Instead, he requires a favor of his own. "As Lord of Marshrock, you oversee the Northwestern Border Guard, do you not?"

"I do. Why?"

"On the fifteenth of next month, could I trouble you to give your guardsmen the night off?"

"What ever for?"

"I have some friends who need to get into the country."

"What sort of friends would need to sneak past the Border Guard?"

"The sort you would be better off not asking questions about," says Parson.

He narrows his eyes. "Excuse me?"

"Ismael, I come to you with this because it is a matter that requires discretion, which I know to be one of your strong points."

"I understand that, but even so, I am afraid I must know more about these people if I am to help you smuggle them into my homeland. And the way you speak of them does them no service in my imagination."

Parson's youthful smile wanes. "Well then, this is awkward, because I can't tell you anything else about them."

"Then I cannot help you."

"But you can. And you will. Or would you like the rest of your kin to know about your son?"

And there it is. The façade drops at last, though they do not yet know the extent of it."

"885

For a time, he does not believe what he is hearing. It is true that, even as his superior, Parson could not have gotten away with simply labeling the matter “classified” as long as it involved Rainlord territory, but even still, this is more than absurd. That such an old friend would threaten his family while they are so vulnerable is a betrayal beyond anything he has ever experienced.

But all the same, he does what Parson asks in the end. An international road is left unguarded for a single evening. It only connects Sair and Intar. He cannot imagine what need Parson would have of it. Vanguardian troops can already move between the two countries with relatively little difficulty. Perhaps Parson intended to move such a large volume of people that taking them through the proper channels might have spooked the other Rainlords. But if that was truly the case, then why would Parson not simply tell him so?

Then the news arrives.

House Elroy has been slaughtered. Only a pair of teenagers have survived.

And he realizes. This is no coincidence.

He contacts Parson immediately.

“I advise you not to say anything,” Parson tells him. “Else you may find yourself shouldering the blame for their deaths.”

“Parson... What did you do, exactly?”

“Again, I’ll thank you for your discretion, as long as you’ll thank me for mine.”

He can pull no more information out of the general. He learns from the other Rainlords that Abolish was the culprit, but they are all disturbed and bewildered by how such an apparently large and dangerous sect of Abolish could infiltrate Sair undetected.

And he finds himself faced with a choice. Remain silent or risk telling them what he knows.

It tears his heart out, but he and Rholtam decide to say nothing. They believe that, with how little they know of Parson’s plot, even telling the other Rainlords a “version” of the truth would likely blow up in their faces. They must not attract attention.

Thankfully, the other Rainlords discover a lead on the Abolishers, anyway. His House helps hunt them down while Ibai is kept under guard at Marshrock. The hunt ends abruptly and with little satisfaction when they find that the Abolishers have already been obliterated. Their severed heads have all been put on gruesome display. He later asks in private, but unsurprisingly, Parson does not claim responsibility."

"886

He does not know what to think. The Rainlords have been wounded many times in the past, but the massacre of House Elroy is undoubtedly the greatest scar of his lifetime. The losses in his own family a mere seven years prior pale in comparison and only serve to deepen his sympathy for what the young Zeff and Joana are going through.

And he played a part in it.

The guilt twists his stomach into knots. The shame rips his heart in half. And he can do nothing to mend them. If he confesses his involvement, the other Rainlords will learn of Ibai's existence. His family will fall to ruin. Parson Miles assures him of that. Only silence will protect his blood.

Years pass.

He observes with disgust and haunting dread as Parson is promoted to the rank of captain general. He is only glad that it means Parson will be leaving Sair.

A small measure of relief arrives when Cousin Melchor returns to Marshrock. After all this time, the man has finally achieved vengeance for their House.

He is fearful that Melchor will leave again--or worse, consider him a traitor for what he has done. But this is not a secret he can keep from the man. If he tried to, Melchor would never forgive him when he inevitably found out. So he explains everything.

And Cousin Melchor consoles him.

Of all the possible reactions, that was the last one he expected. It is enough to make him weep. He could not possibly be any more grateful for his cousin's return than he is in this moment...

Ismael blinked slowly as his mind came back to the present. The memories still weighed on him, on his soul. They wanted him to quit, to surrender and just let whatever happens happen. It was so tempting.

'I'm tired, too, you know.'

The reaper's heavy tone pulled Ismael out of his daze.

'Don't act like you're the only one,' said Rholtam. 'I've been right there with you the whole time. Your sorrow is my sorrow, Ismael. Your guilt is my guilt. And your worry--certainly, your worry is mine, too.'

Ismael only nodded.

'But our feelings don't matter now,' said Rholtam. 'It's time to stop being indecisive. If you intend to surrender, you can't put it off any longer.'

"Do you think surrendering would make a difference? Once they know the complete truth, do you think they would be merciful?"

'It's... possible, but...'

"887 -- CI.

"Even if they did show mercy, Ibai would still be executed," said Ismael. "As would you and I."

'I would be surprised if they let any of our reapers live,' said Rholtam. 'The non-servants might be spared, but they would be shunned for the rest of their lives and no longer be allowed to hold office in this country. Letting our House retain any power would just be asking our people to betray them the next time they were vulnerable.'

"I believe you are right."

'That sounds like a decision to me.'

“No surrender.”

‘Then let us see this through to the bitter end.’

And as if on cue, another reaper entered the Hall. It was Orric. ‘The enemy has breached the castle,’ he informed them. ‘Xuan Sebolt is leading their infiltration team, so Melchor and I will have to confront him. Your assistance would be most appreciated.’

Ismael stood.

Chapter One Hundred One: ‘The clash of Tide and Sea...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector climbed through the gaping hole in the rock that Lord Dimas had made for their group. They were entering through the front. The intention was to be noticed, after all.

With Xuan at the head of their party, Asad bringing up the rear, and Dimas and Salvador on either side, Hector was in awe of the power that surrounded him. These men were the strongest members of their respective houses, so it was a little intimidating, accompanying them to battle like this.

He had to keep his wits about him, though. There was a reason why it was only the five of them on this mission. They fully expected to face Melchor Blackburn, and according to Dimas’ father, combatants without the requisite soul defenses would only be a liability against the man.

Hector had figured that would disqualify him and Garovel from participating, but Garovel did not seem to agree. Instead, Garovel insisted on joining and even told everyone that Hector would be able to hold his own just fine.

‘Are you crazy?!’ Hector had said. ‘Don’t tell them that!’

‘Relax. You’ve got that shield of super-cheating, remember?’

‘This piece of shit isn’t gonna save me!’

‘You don’t think so?’

‘No!’

‘Well, let’s see if you’re right, then.’

‘Garovel, what the fuck?!’

Thanks to that, Lord Salvador had tested Hector personally. Which had been terrifying. But in the end, the shield did its job. Salvador hadn’t been able to hurt Hector and so did not object to the young Lord Goffe’s company."

"887 -- Cl.

“Even if they did show mercy, Ibai would still be executed,” said Ismael. “As would you and I.”

‘I would be surprised if they let any of our reapers live,’ said Rholtam. ‘The non-servants might be spared, but they would be shunned for the rest of their lives and no longer be allowed to hold office in this country. Letting our House retain any power would just be asking our people to betray them the next time they were vulnerable.’

“I believe you are right.”

‘That sounds like a decision to me.’

“No surrender.”

‘Then let us see this through to the bitter end.’

And as if on cue, another reaper entered the Hall. It was Orric. ‘The enemy has breached the castle,’ he informed them. ‘Xuan Sebolt is leading their infiltration team, so Melchor and I will have to confront him. Your assistance would be most appreciated.’

Ismael stood.

Chapter One Hundred One: ‘The clash of Tide and Sea...’

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Hector climbed through the gaping hole in the rock that Lord Dimas had made for their group. They were entering through the front. The intention was to be noticed, after all.

With Xuan at the head of their party, Asad bringing up the rear, and Dimas and Salvador on either side, Hector was in awe of the power that surrounded him. These men were the strongest members of their respective houses, so it was a little intimidating, accompanying them to battle like this.

He had to keep his wits about him, though. There was a reason why it was only the five of them on this mission. They fully expected to face Melchor Blackburn, and according to Dimas' father, combatants without the requisite soul defenses would only be a liability against the man.

Hector had figured that would disqualify him and Garovel from participating, but Garovel did not seem to agree. Instead, Garovel insisted on joining and even told everyone that Hector would be able to hold his own just fine.

'Are you crazy?!' Hector had said. 'Don't tell them that!'

'Relax. You've got that shield of super-cheating, remember?'

'This piece of shit isn't gonna save me!'

'You don't think so?'

'No!'

'Well, let's see if you're right, then.'

'Garovel, what the fuck?!'

Thanks to that, Lord Salvador had tested Hector personally. Which had been terrifying. But in the end, the shield did its job. Salvador hadn't been able to hurt Hector and so did not object to the young Lord Goffe's company."

"888

None of the Rainlords seemed to realize that Hector's resilience was all the shield's doing, but Garovel wanted to keep it that way, lest they decide that they needed it more than he did. Asad might have known of its power, being the crafter's brother, but if he did, he wasn't saying anything.

And so here Hector was, having somehow lied his way into a situation where no one in their right mind would want to be. He felt like the most ridiculous member of their party, too, clad in full plate armor that clinked every time he moved, while everyone else hardly even bothered with bulletproof vests. At least it wasn't a mission that required stealth.

Their purpose here was to draw Melchor's attention so that Lord Abel and the rest of their forces would have time to rush in and seize the castle. If they defeated Melchor, then that would mean instant victory, since no one else would be able to stand against Lord Xuan; but even if they somehow lost, Lord Abel's forces would have already gone through and neutralized enough of the other Blackburns that they could simply focus on the weakened Melchor and overwhelm him with numbers.

As far as plans went, Hector thought Lady Amaya had come up with a pretty solid one.

The first corridor they found was completely dark. Lord Xuan lifted a burning hand and illuminated the way forward with a greenish light. At first, it only flickered faintly, and then it became bright enough to reveal even the high ceiling.

'Is that really necessary?' said Duvoss. 'You have a flashlight, you know.'

"Yeah, but how often do I get to use my glowy powers to actual effect?"

'You're hurting your hand for no reason.'

"You'll fix it for me, won't you?"

'Use your bloody flashlight before you fill the air with toxic smoke.'

"C'mon, I have more control than that."

Lord Dimas intervened. "I do smell garlic..."

"Really? Shit!" Xuan's hand dimmed suddenly and flailed up and down, apparently having trouble undoing his own work. "Eek! Ow! Ah...! Whew... that was close..." In total darkness again, there came a clearing of a throat, and Xuan's flashlight clicked on. "Not to worry, everyone. I meant to do that."

Hector no longer felt the most ridiculous. 'I don't want to be rude, but... this guy is our ace in the hole?'

'I... I'm sure we'll be fine,' said Garovel privately.

Qorvass and the others looked similarly dubious, however."
"889

Hector hadn't wanted Garovel to join them on the mission, but the reaper insisted on it.

'It's fine,' Garovel had said. 'If we find Chergoa, I need to be there to talk to her; otherwise, she won't know she can trust you.'

'I could just tell her I'm your servant.'

'Could you, Hector? Could you really?'
'...Y-yeah. I mean, probably.'

'Well, even so, I'm sure you'll have need of my observational support.'

Hector couldn't tell if Garovel was being brave or stupid, but he knew that he didn't have much room to argue about it. He wasn't exactly an expert on how much value one should place upon one's own life.

The group proceeded on, making slow progress. With the stony walls all soul-empowered, the reapers couldn't sense where the enemy would be coming from, so they had to be cautious each time they entered a new room. Hector consulted one of the maps he'd been given and noticed they were coming up on a large complex of rooms which had been collectively marked as a foyer. It seemed to be the center of transit in this area, bearing two staircases, two elevators, a pair of bathrooms, and connecting three major hallways and a massive auditorium.

And when they approached its double doors, they found that the foyer's lights were still on.

Xuan waddled through them without much care, and everyone followed.

With only Xuan's exceptionally modest stature ahead of him, Hector got a clear view of the room. Spacious was the first word for it, bearing rectangular chambers on the first floor and staircases that led up to a second and third. Ornate was the second word, though perhaps not in the conventional sense. Polished rock was the theme of this place. The floor, the walls, the stairs, the guardrails, the chandeliers, even some of the furniture had been constructed from stone. The handful of chairs and sofas at least had darkly green cushions to go along with them, but it truly seemed like stone was utilized in every conceivable manner, save only where sheer practicality required otherwise.

The room reminded him of Warrenhold, actually--like what Warrenhold might have looked like in an earlier era, all furnished and obviously cared for. The only real difference to Hector's eyes was that the shadowy stone still didn't have quite the same pitch blackness that nightrock did.

Xuan stopped abruptly. "Ah. There you are, Darktide.""

"890

Hector saw the other man standing there on the second floor, watching them from over the hefty guardrail. "Hello, Seadevil. And company."

"I see you have decided not to ambush us," said Xuan. "That is appreciated."

"I figured you would want to talk," said Melchor.

Xuan chortled. "I'm surprised that you would."

"I am in no hurry."

Dimas took a step forward. "Only to tell us more lies, I imagine."

Melchor made no response.

Xuan picked up the slack. "How's about we stop all this nonsense, eh? Return the Elroy kids to us, and we'll leave you alone."

"I doubt that," said Melchor. "I'm sure you have pressing questions now that would keep you here, regardless. Not that it makes a difference. I cannot give you the children."

"Why not?" asked Xuan.

"I cannot tell you."

Xuan pursed his lips. "Are you sure? Because I really hate having to fight scary guys like you."

"Same old Xuan. I always did enjoy your ability to speak plainly. I would prefer to avoid this as well, if I am honest."

"Then why are we doing this?"

"Because your loved ones wish to hurt my loved ones," said Melchor.

Xuan frowned. "I don't think that's quite right."

"Unfortunately, it is."

'Why can't you tell us?' asked Duvoss. 'There must be a reason.'

"Of course there is. And I cannot tell that to you, either."

Several more people entered the foyer from the second and third floors. Hector recognized some of the faces from the photographs Lady Amaya had shown everyone.

'Nine new souls,' Garovel told him privately. 'Melchor makes ten. I also sense the woman from the other day.'

Hector remembered her. The cesium materializer, Silvia Blackburn. Already, Hector was wondering how much use he would be in this fight. He felt Asad touch his left pauldron and realized the man had soul-strengthened his armor for him again. He gave the Sandlord a grateful nod.

Lord Xuan pulled off his small coat and began rolling up his sleeves. "Well, then, if that's how it's going to be, then I hope--"

A gunshot cut him off, and Hector saw Xuan's head twitch and heard the ping of the bullet's ricochet. Xuan looked up to their right, but rather than looking up as well, Hector noticed the tiny bruise on the Seadevil's temple where the bullet had struck him."

"891

As Xuan eyed the apparent gunman, he burst into a laugh that had the deep rumble of a man thrice his size. "I've never had the honor--no, the pleasure--of meeting House Blackburn in real battle. And seeing as you've refused every chance at clemency, I hope--" He paused, perhaps to see if someone was going to shoot him again. "--I hope you won't disappoint me. I haven't had any good mayhem in a while, and I hate when my opponents die too quickly."

That made Hector blink, along with everyone else in the room--including Melchor, Salvador, and even Dimas, the Seadevil's own cousin.

They did not have long to be surprised, however.

Xuan and Duvoss chose that opportunity to converge. In an instant, the little Rainlord's body disappeared within a column of white smoke, billowing up and out in a way unlike any smoke Hector had ever seen.

And chaos erupted. Gunfire rang out from all around, as did the piping reverberations of destruction users, and Hector decided that staying in one place was a bad idea.

'Stay close to Asad,' Garovel told him coolly.

Hector concurred. The lone Sandlord launched up to the second floor's gallery amidst a flurry of bullets, explosions, and shattering quartz, and Hector followed.

Their first opponent, Hector recognized straight away. That was the face of Ismael Blackburn, Lord of Marshrock. The man's file said his ability was potassium transfiguration, which now manifested in the violet flames leaping from Ismael's body and shooting toward Asad like a volley of arrows.

Rather than stopping the flames with a wall, Asad doused them completely with a blanket of sand, allowing Hector to push closer with shield and materialized spear in hand.

Ismael severed a forearm and retreated, and Hector certainly did not need to be told why.

The shield took the explosion well, though the force still sent Hector flying. He grabbed the guardrail to catch himself, but it snapped right off and came with him, all the way to the other side of the chamber where his armored body left an impressive crack in the far wall.

For a second, he didn't know where Garovel was, and then he realized that the reaper had somehow wriggled into his armor and latched onto his back. 'Er--you okay in there?'

'It's actually quite cozy,' said Garovel. 'Wish I'd thought of this earlier. Careful on your right.'

Lord Salvador was there, dealing with three Blackburns all by himself."
"892

It was like watching a bull facing down a trio of wolves. The three Blackburns were attacking him in unison with minimal effectiveness, due to the Lord Delaguna's passive defenses combined with his cobalt transfiguration. However, they did have one destruction user, who finally managed to hit Salvador's metallic shoulder. Cobalt burst apart into a thousand brittle chips, but scarcely a moment passed before it regenerated, allowing Salvador to charge forward undeterred. The destruction user was forced to retreat sideways so that the other two Blackburns could buy him time to avoid being flattened.

Hector couldn't tell if Salvador actually needed help or not, but he wasn't going to wait and find out. He dove in shield-first and materialized a pillar beneath the destruction user, knocking the mustachioed man off balance. Hector swung his sword vertically, looking to lop the man's arm off, but instead, the iron blade only cut partially through the armpit before snapping in half.

The man, whom he now recognized as Tomas Blackburn, did not look pleased. Tomas brought a meaty hand around to use his ability, and Hector wrenched away in time to lose an arm instead of his head. The heater shield endured a pummeling and went flying out of Hector's shredded grasp.

Hector didn't let the loss slow him down, though. He discarded his busted sword, wrapped his good arm around Tomas' half-severed one, and pulled with all his strength. The appendage popped right off in a cloud of blood, and Hector clobbered Tomas in the face with the man's own soul-strengthened bicep in one smooth motion. Tomas went toppling backward, and Hector moved to recover his shield, which had nearly finished restoring itself to perfect condition already.

When he looked back toward Lord Salvador, he found the man overpowering his two opponents. Tomas was scrambling back into position, but it was already too late. A huge hand found one of their heads and tore it off as if nothing had been holding it in place. The other Blackburn retreated, and when Tomas arrived again, Salvador put him through the wall.

‘Maybe we should help someone else,’ advised Garovel.

Hector looked around the foyer and saw that everyone was quite occupied, apart from him. The frenzied collision of smoke and liquid metal in the middle of the room made the very air shudder, but he couldn’t even remotely tell if one of them was winning."

"893

Dimas had his hands full with the Blackburns on the third floor, but Asad seemed to be having the hardest time, forced to deal with Ismael, Nere, and Horatio all at once--probably the three strongest opponents after Melchor.

Hector broke into a full sprint as he cooked up the next strategy. Asad’s corner of the foyer blustered with flames and strings of targeted explosions, and Asad had to endure many of them in favor of dodging spatial distortions from Nere. It was clear enough that Asad needed some room to breathe. Perhaps another iron platform--

‘Shield above your head!’ Garovel yelled.

Hector brought the shield to bear in time for a swarm of mercurial spikes to break upon it, impacting with enough force to drop him on his ass. A spike skewered his left greave along with the leg therein. When the spikes subsided, he yanked the mercury out and clambered onto his right leg in order to limp onward while the other healed.

Before Hector could assist Asad, however, green light filled the chamber, and a veil of smoke washed past Horatio Blackburn, replacing the man’s body with a melting husk. Huge, snaking wisps of steam hissed off of Horatio’s vanishing clothes and boiling flesh. Even the man’s pan-forma-level regeneration was not enough to abate the Seadevil’s acid. Already, his limbs had been eaten through to the bone, dangling off of his torso like some kind of grotesque ornament and bringing him to his knees.

And Hector was abruptly glad that Lord Xuan was on their side.

The battle was clearly shifting in their favor now. With one less opponent to worry about, Asad was already getting in more shots of his own, pelting both Ismael and Nere with bursts of molten quartz and forcing them to give ground. His tattoos glowed an almost constant gold as he weathered Ismael's violet flames in order to keep pressing his assault. Salvador, in the meantime, had already cleaned up the three opponents on his end and went crashing up to the third floor to assist Dimas.

'Hold on,' said Garovel. 'Don't jump back into the fight just yet.'

Hector stopped, uncertain. 'Why not?' From his position by the second floor's staircases, he had a mostly clear view of everyone.

'Let's wait and see how things unfold. This battle might already be over. Be ready to jump in if and when you're needed, but not before.'"
"894

Hector observed the fight with grim wonder, trying to keep an eye on everyone. Dimas and Salvador appeared to have their situation well in hand, with Dimas occasionally boring enormous holes in the rock, earning more aerial space for himself. Hector watched the man fly into a tunnel of his own making, only to return a moment later, exploding through a wall behind one of the Blackburns.

Meanwhile, Xuan and Melchor were still a thunderous mess of scarcely understandable chaos. Pillars of white smoke and whiter flames slammed against sheets of flexing metal, making both burst apart each time.

'What are they doing?' Hector asked.

'Trying to overwhelm one another,' said Garovel. 'They've both mastered pan-rozum, so there aren't many ways they can subdue each other. Hyper states can be forcibly undone by tearing the reaper out of the user's brain. But in pan-rozum, the user can melt their brain mass down into something incredibly small without losing any of its functionality--and on top of that, it can be MOVED, too. So right now, they're both attempting to surround and destroy enough of one another that they can locate their opponent's brain and end the fight.'

Hector understood. 'Process of elimination...'

'Exactly. The less original mass the user possesses, the fewer places the brain can be located.'

Every now and again, Hector could see the smoke take on a vaguely human shape, sometimes with too many arms, all grasping at Darktide's only slightly more humanoid form. Javelins of white flame punctured the mercury in multiple places, looking almost like fiery claws as they tore through the liquid body. Xuan's own body expanded and contracted as he pleased, billowing one way and then the other, and not being particularly bothered by Melchor's smothering walls. Even when Darktide actually succeeded in boxing some of the smoke in and compressing it, the Seadevil simply cut himself free with fire or acid.

'What is Xuan's element?' said Hector. 'Do you know?'

'No one told me,' said Garovel, 'because I guess they like to keep their trump card secret when they can, but seeing it now--it's almost definitely phosphorus. The sheer volume of smoke is somewhat telling--though I'm a little surprised he can control the product of his chemical reactions so well. To make the smoke an extension of his body... well, I am quite impressed.'

'They did say he was 106...'

'Yes, they did.'"
"895

Hector kept thinking someone would attack him again, particularly Melchor, but it seemed that Darktide didn't want to divide his attention again, seeing as he did end up losing Horatio the last time he tried. Still, it was a very odd thing, just watching the violence unfold rather than participating.

Dimas and Salvador had thinned their opponents down to the last one, and Dimas moved to assist Asad, who'd been stuck in an apparent stalemate with Ismael and Nere up to now.

'This seems too easy,' said Garovel. 'The way they talked about Darktide, I figured he'd be able to do more with pan-rozum than flail around like this.'

Hector was getting a similar vibe. 'You think he's holding back?'

'Maybe. I'm not sure why he would, though.'

'Well, if it were me, I might try to create an opening first--possibly by tricking the opponent into thinking they were beating me...'

Garovel paused. 'Colt taught you that, didn't he?'

'Er. S-sorta... But, uh. I'm probably wrong. I'm sure that's way too simplistic for a fight of this level. And if I could see through it, then Lord Xuan would obviously--'

As if on cue, a chunk of Darktide's body pierced the center of the smoke and detonated with such force that even Hector was thrown into the wall. The blast filled the whole foyer, leaving behind long-lingering tremors that made Hector feel like he'd been caught in a sudden earthquake. He could hear more crumbling rock, but the smoke was so dense that he could scarcely even see until Dimas' gravity swept the air clear again.

And when Hector returned to the busted guardrail, what he saw made his breath catch.

Darktide's hulking form had been torn asunder, and pieces of mercury boiled beneath pools of acid. But the liquid metal beast was still standing, while the white fumes had all but dispersed. And Darktide was already in the middle of tearing Duvoss free from the Seadevil's almost smokeless figure.

'Time to help,' said Garovel.

Hector leapt off the second floor and slid down on an iron ramp, already running when his feet touched stone again. He chucked a materialized spear as he charged forward, shield first.

Melchor saw him, but just carried on anyway and let his liquid body devour the iron as if it had been intended to feed him."

"896

Duvoss and Xuan were separated now, and Melchor's body began to swallow them both.

Unsure what else he could do, Hector just kept flinging iron while he also worked on a spiked boulder above the liquid metal beast's head.

A visible pulse of gravity burst through Melchor's arm, and Duvoss fell away from him, still gripped by the severed hand.

And Hector dropped everything else, suddenly knowing his most important task. He bolted forward and lunged for the reaper. He snatched Duvoss up just before the wave of mercury could, and the mercury crashed against Hector's shield and armor both, sending him flying once more. But his concentration held firm, even as he crashed through the north wall into an auditorium and took out a row of seats before his armored body finally skid to a halt.

He pulled Duvoss close and kept him positioned just behind the shield, prepared to endure another metallic tidal wave, but it wasn't immediately necessary. He saw Lord Dimas buying them precious time.

'Can you move?' asked Garovel.

'N-no, I don't--agh...' Duvoss barely sounded conscious.

'Forget it,' said Garovel. 'Regenerate Xuan now. Hector will keep you safe.'

'W-where... where is Xuan's brain?'

'I lost him in the chaos. Just try regrowing him.'

And Hector saw a tiny speck appear in his own hand--a dot of brain matter. He had no clue how Xuan's previous brain had gotten destroyed, but he didn't have time to worry about it.

Melchor came crashing through the wall like a freight train.

Garovel's next words were kept private. 'It's time to cheat, Hector.'

And the young Lord Goffe switched hands with the shield. As soon as his bare skin touched it, he felt the enhancement course through him like a shiver that tautened every muscle, but he kept his focus. He raised a broad platform beneath Melchor, trying to throw him off and squish him against the ceiling, but the liquid mercury cut through his iron like butter and bounded closer, undeterred.

Hector launched himself away with a diagonal platform. The mercury caught up anyway and snaked around his leg, stopping him in mid-air before yanking him back toward Darktide's gaping maw.

The iron spikes came out, completely engulfing his body, and Melchor crunched through them without a single care. Hector's armor shattered and pressed against his flesh.

But Hector himself remained. Curled into a ball, he protected Duvoss and Xuan with his body alone."

"897

The mercury wanted through, but Hector wasn't budging. He could see the brain growing slowly larger with each passing moment.

'I think you owe your shield an apology,' said Garovel privately. 'It's clearly not a piece of shit, and it's definitely saving your ass right now.'

'I'll make an iron girlfriend for it later,' said Hector. He felt his bones cracking under Darktide's constant pressure, but it wasn't fast enough to be a problem for Hector's undead regeneration. The bones just kept breaking and healing again and again, though it wasn't exactly comfortable. He couldn't even move.

"You cannot win," came the calm double-voice of Darktide. "Give up Duvoss, and we will let you live."

'Don't answer,' said Garovel.

Hector didn't intend to. The fact that Darktide was trying to bargain now seemed indicative of a stalemate having formed, and a stalemate was in their favor, because all they needed to do was buy a few minutes for Xuan.

But it was going to be a long few minutes.

Abruptly, Hector felt the crushing pressure let up for a moment, only to be replaced by a dozen points of spinning force. Mercury drills, digging into his arms and back and neck and skull. And they were making progress. He tried to fight them with iron, but it wouldn't even materialize in here. The field density of Darktide's soul was much too strong for him.

Hector didn't know what else he could do. He was plainly overmatched, and Xuan still needed a lot more time.

Then Garovel decided to intervene. 'HEY!' he shouted, making Hector blink. 'WE'RE STILL ALIVE IN HERE! AND WE COULD REALLY USE SOME HELP RIGHT ABOUT NOW!'

Silence.

Then Darktide's belly splattered apart with gravitic force, and Lord Salvador's huge arm reached in. Liquid metal was on the man in an instant, but he already had a grip on Hector's forearm and yanked him out. Melchor still held Hector's legs, but Dimas was there to pummel the liquid beast with invisible bullets until Hector was finally free again.

Hector hit the ground rolling. His armor clattered off his body in sundered chunks, and the clothes beneath were full of rips and bloody holes and still-writhing mercury as his skin and muscles regenerated. But Duvoss and Xuan were safe in his arms, and Hector hoisted himself onto one knee, watching Dimas and Salvador engage Darktide in unison."

"898 -- CII.

Dimas kept his distance, staying in the air while trying to keep the army of silvery tendrils from overwhelming Salvador, who was busy sacrificing and then quickly regenerating his hands in order to hit Melchor with molten cobalt. And Melchor was handling them both, swirling around their attacks while countering with his own. It was all they could do to keep him from simply blowing past them and going after Hector again.

Hector, in the meantime, worked on remaking his armor. Much as he would've liked to help, he knew that rushing back in would just put Duvoss and Xuan in danger. The best he would've been able to offer was a distraction, but that was exactly what Dimas and Salvador were trying to provide for him now.

'Careful behind you,' said Garovel. 'We've drawn everyone's attention.'

Indeed, Hector turned in time to see Ismael's purple flames descending upon him. They smacked against his shield as he rolled away, but he found that they would not come off. Melting flesh stuck to the metal like glue, continuing to provide potassium fuel for the flames. Hector smothered them with an iron coating.

Asad appeared next to him, materializing a storm of glassy spikes to keep Ismael and Nere occupied. "Are you alright?" he asked with two voices.

"Yeah," said Hector. "You?"

"Wouldn't mind a little assistance. Here." Asad pressed a tattooed hand against Hector's fresh armor, but they were interrupted before he could finish strengthening it again. He and Hector were forced to dive in opposite directions to avoid a destructive path from Nere.

And Hector just tried to keep moving as he raised his shield to deal with more flames.

Chapter One Hundred Two: 'The demon in the mud...'

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Dust trickled down from the ceiling with each successive tremor, and Ibai Blackburn bit his lip as he stared up at it.

He'd been trying to ignore the shaking. He really had. But it just kept reminding him that a battle was going on out there. A real battle. And so close.

But Mama and Papa would be so cross with him if they found out that he left the room. Worse, they'd be disappointed in him. And of course, if he ended up having to explain precisely how he managed to get out, that would only make them even more upset.

But it had to be done. These quakes were simply too enticing to go uninvestigated. Maybe if he was sneaky about it, no one would find out."

"898 -- CII.

Dimas kept his distance, staying in the air while trying to keep the army of silvery tendrils from overwhelming Salvador, who was busy sacrificing and then quickly regenerating his hands in order to hit Melchor with molten cobalt. And Melchor was handling them both, swirling around their attacks while countering with his own. It was all they could do to keep him from simply blowing past them and going after Hector again.

Hector, in the meantime, worked on remaking his armor. Much as he would've liked to help, he knew that rushing back in would just put Duvoss and Xuan in danger. The best he would've been able to offer was a distraction, but that was exactly what Dimas and Salvador were trying to provide for him now.

'Careful behind you,' said Garovel. 'We've drawn everyone's attention.'

Indeed, Hector turned in time to see Ismael's purple flames descending upon him. They smacked against his shield as he rolled away, but he found that they would not come off. Melting flesh stuck to the metal like glue, continuing to provide potassium fuel for the flames. Hector smothered them with an iron coating.

Asad appeared next to him, materializing a storm of glassy spikes to keep Ismael and Nere occupied. "Are you alright?" he asked with two voices.

"Yeah," said Hector. "You?"

"Wouldn't mind a little assistance. Here." Asad pressed a tattooed hand against Hector's fresh armor, but they were interrupted before he could finish strengthening it again. He and Hector were forced to dive in opposite directions to avoid a destructive path from Nere.

And Hector just tried to keep moving as he raised his shield to deal with more flames.

Click to display entire chapter at once -- \(mobile link\)

Dust trickled down from the ceiling with each successive tremor, and Ibai Blackburn bit his lip as he stared up at it.

He'd been trying to ignore the shaking. He really had. But it just kept reminding him that a battle was going on out there. A real battle. And so close.

But Mama and Papa would be so cross with him if they found out that he left the room. Worse, they'd be disappointed in him. And of course, if he ended up having to explain precisely how he managed to get out, that would only make them even more upset.

But it had to be done. These quakes were simply too enticing to go uninvestigated. Maybe if he was sneaky about it, no one would find out."

"899

The walls had been soul-empowered by Papa and then later overridden even more strongly by Mel, so Ibai already knew that he couldn't simply bust his way out. What Papa and Mel didn't know, however, was that Ibai's ability had manifested a long time ago. He'd kept it a secret for nearly two decades now, knowing that it would only upset his family and make them look for a way to counter its effects. And that would've sucked all the fun out of it.

He had the layout of Marshrock more or less memorized. He'd probably spent more time here than anyone else in the entire world.

So teleporting out of this room was not going to be difficult.

He stood in the middle of the chamber, thought about where he wanted to be, and then wrapped himself in the brown shadow. It swirled around him and then winked out of existence, taking his body with it.

And for an instant, he could see.

The infinite void.

Everything and nothing. Life and death. A trillion burning stars in the sky and all around him. Souls suspended in space. Eleg, too, spinning and breathing and alive.

And all of them, ethereal. Massless shadows of reality. The universe of zero weight, where space itself was of no consequence.

In a flash, it was all gone, and Ibai reappeared in the next room over, stepping from his muddy shadow onto Marshrock's dark stone again.

